The reported murder of General M'Cook turns out to be a fabrication. It was incredible that, in a country swarming with Confederate guerillas, a Federal general should be travelling without a considerable escort, nor was General M'Cook guilty of such imprudence. He had with him a troop of soldiers, which must, at all events, have been nearly equal in numbers to the guerilla band it encountered, for, so far from throwing down their arms and asking quarter, there was a fight between the opposing forces, in the course of which General M'Cook, who took part in the skirmish, was shot. For this casualty of war seventeen innocent men were murdered by Federal soldiers.

At Knoxville, Tennessee, the Confederates have 15,000 men. General Morgan has taken Gallatin, a town connected with Nashville by railroad. He captured Colonel Boone and 300 men, and a Federal freight train containing sixty horses and a large quantity of stores.

According to a despatch from Mobile, dated the 2nd inst., General Morgan officially reports that he had captured twenty towns, 1200 prisoners, and 20,000 stand of arms. We also learn from Southern papers that the Federals have been repulsed near Cumberland Gap, with great slaughter. The only advantage claimed by the North is, that Colonel Peck surprised and killed thirty Confederates whilst they were sleeping.

In Missouri the Confederates are making considerable progress. Last week we recorded the capture of Newark and Alexandria, and since then the capture of Independence, together with a large quantity of military stores, has been announced. It will be observed that the Confederates are supplying themselves with arms and ammunition from the Federals. Before the capture of Independence the Federal forces, under Lieut.-Col. Buel, were defeated, and had to surrender.

Confederate rams are being rapidly multiplied. Two, with conical revolving turrets, are said to be in Charleston harbour, nearly ready for service. Another ram is being equipped at Savannah,

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, August 27, 1862.

Our last report left the market at the climax of its excitement, with Middling Orleans verging upon 24d., and Fair Dhollerahs at 15½d.

On Thursday the demand suddenly fell off without any assignable cause, and an immediate reaction set in. Speculators pressed to realise their profits, sellers withdrew, and American cotton was difficult to move, even at 1d. decline; in Surats there was more steadiness, but some transactions occurred at ½d. reduction—the total business only reaching 5000 bales. The same dull feeling prevailed on Friday, and a few sales were made at 23d. for Middling Orleans, the business being estimated at 4000 bales; but on Saturday the tone was again changed, the Australasia's news was to hand, and gave renewed confidence to buyers; it contained few additional items of interest, but rumoured the fears some had entertained that the approval of the conscription would create disturbances in the North. The cheap lots accordingly were withdrawn, and, with a business of 7000 bales, the top prices were nearly regained.

On Monday the demand opened very briskly, and prices improved ½d. to ¾d. with sales of 10,000 bales, putting Middling Orleans at full 24d. per lb.

On Tuesday the speculative movement gathered greater strength, and a large business was done in the forenoon at advancing prices; later in the day news arrived that Manchester had been very excited, prices there had advanced, on the average, 2d. to 3d. per lb. since the previous Tuesday, enabling spinners to pay the high prices ruling for Surat cotton, better than they could when it was much lower. The effect of this news was to stimulate a great additional demand in the afternoon, and the sales were estimated at 18,000 bales, at a further advance of ½d. on American and Surats, and about 1d. on Brazil and Egyptians, on which there was a great run.

To-day the speculative mania has been wilder than ever, and the sales on the spot are computed to reach the incredible amount of 30,000 bales, or one-half the present stock as shown by the circulars. Every sort of cotton has been most greedily bought up, and in some cases the advances since yesterday are immense. American cotton generally show a rise of 1d., the better grades of Surats 1d. to 1½d., the lower qualities ½d. to 1d., Brazils and Egyptians 1d. to 1½d. on the average. The greatest competition to-day has been for the higher grades of Surats, and for choice descriptions extraordinary prices have been paid—22½d. is quoted for prime saw-ginned, 20d. for the best Broach, and 19d. for Omrawuttie; these sorts are being bought up to supply the place of American cotton which is now forced quite out of common consumption and is become a fancy article. The following quotations approximate to the present value of cotton on the spot: 25½d. to 26d. for middling Orleans, 25 to 25½ for Mobles and Bowed, 17d. for fair Dhollerah, 17½d. for Omrawuttie, 18½ for Broach, and 21d., nominally, for saw-ginned Dharwar. In cotton to arrive an enormous business has been doing all the week, and prices for the last three days have been rising ½d. per day; the quotations now attained are 17½d. for May shipments of Broach, 16½ for May Dhollerah and Omrawuttie, and about 1d. less per month, according as the time of shipment is more distant.

The prevalence of easterly winds still keeps out arrivals of cotton to a remarkable extent; the import this week so far, is only 3000 bales, and unless some vessels turn up to-morrow, our apparent stock on Friday will be beneath 50,000 bales, of which it is doubtful if that of Surat will show much above zero. It is now becoming perfectly evident that the estimated stock is a mere fiction, and the sooner an accurate count is taken, the better for the true interests of the trade. It is thought by many that the real stock, if correctly taken, would show an excess of 50,000 bales on the assumed one, and certainly there is room for much amendment in that of Surats, for while the estimate to-day would scarcely allow for 10,000 bales in the port, there has been actually sold 15,000 bales, and there is probably, at least, as much more set aside for export.

There are now at sea about 50,000 Surats cleared before May 1, and consequently quite due, besides which 160,000 bales sailed in May and should arrive here in September, 120,000 cleared in June are due here in October, while 80,000 bales sailed up to July 27, due here in November. With these supplies in prospect no absolute famine need be anticipated.

This last commotion for our market is owing chiefly to the unexpected buoyancy shown in Manchester; more confidence is felt there on the future prices of cotton and cloth than at any future period in this crisis; the older accumulations of goods and yarns are now almost entirely swept away, and the actual consumptive demand can be met only from the small production—about one-third of the former quota. The confidence of spinners is strongly evinced by the fact that they have been very large buyers of Surat cotton afloat for some time past, many of those operations, no doubt, are to cover orders, but the bulk of them, probably, are purely speculative.

It is well to bear in mind, however, that prices at their present level are extremely hazardous; the public mind is now fully possessed with the belief that this American war must go on indefinitely, and very likely the conviction will prove just; but it will be strange if periods do not return when plausible hopes of a settlement reappear, producing panics in the market; besides, it is well to remember that in political convulsions, the darkest hour usually precedes the dawn. And it is just when matters seem most hopeless that the solution generally comes. The Russian and Italian wars came to an abrupt conclusion when it was least expected, and from those precedents a wholesome caution should be drawn.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday, August 26.

Although the demand for cotton in the Liverpool market, from Wednesday to Saturday last, was not so great as during the few days previous, our market for yarn and cloth has advanced in price from day to day, slowly and steadily.

Yarns for export in almost all quantities up to about 40s., realized no improvement of 1d. per lb., and finer grades about 1½d. per lb. upon Tuesday's quotations.

Home trade yarns have been in better demand, and for 32s twist cops 1d. per lb. advance was obtained, whilst for 40s and 60s twist cops 2d. and 3d. per lb., respectively, have been received.

Cloth of all descriptions continues to change hands at rapidly advancing prices, and up to Saturday the advances obtained on shirtings was from 6d. to 9d. per piece upon the rates of Tuesday. A proportionate advance was also obtained on printers, long cloths, and madapolams.

Some little surprise was manifested on 'Change during Saturday on its becoming known that one of our principal German houses had for sale 5000 bales of No. 30s water twist, of about 120 bundles of 10lbs. each to a bale, spun in Russia from American cotton entirely, which they would deliver at Hull, at about 2d. per lb. less than a similar yarn could be bought here.

To-day our market has been considerably excited, owing to the advices received from Liverpool yesterday and to-day, also to the general belief here that cotton will advance another 6d. per lb. before another pause takes place.

Yarns for shipment are realizing much better prices than on Friday last. Low warps are selling upon a basis of 18½d. per lb. for No. 12s, showing an advance of 1d. per lb. Mule yarns in bundle may be quoted fully 1d. per lb. higher. No. 28s throstle warps have fetched 2s. 4d. per lb., an advance of about 2d. No. 60s, 70s, and 80s double, are higher by 2d. to 3d. per lb. Twist and weft cops are about 1d. per lb. dearer.

Home trade yarns are again better to sell to-day, 32s twist cops are worth 2s. per lb.; 40s twist cops from 2s. 4d. to 2s. 6d.; 60s twist cops (Bolton spinning), 2s. 8d. to 2s. 10d., per lb., and all other numbers in proportion.

The demand for cloth still continues good, especially for India shirtings and printers, the former of which are worth another 6d. per piece, 8½ lbs. having been sold at 14s. 6d., although many of the principal holders of this fabric will not sell at less than 15s. per piece, and others again at 16s., which prices will probably be obtained before another month passes.

TOBACCO.

We have no change to notice in our markets this week. A fair demand has been experienced, for the season of the year, but buyers have found it difficult to make selections from the limited stock on sale. A few parcels of Western Strips were taken, at prices from 13½d. to 15d., and purchases of leaf were made for Ireland to some extent.

There are indications of business for export, for which purpose fair selections can be made in our market. The new import is now rapidly coming forward, and buyers seem disposed to await the sampling, which will shortly commence. The quality of the new crop is understood to be very fine.

The last advices from Australia reported greatly advanced prices for the manufactured article, and some small parcels recently arrived here will find ready sale so soon as sampled.

LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH.

BATTLE OF FORT REPUBLIC.

The following List of Casualties, in the 27th Virginia Regiment, is not quite complete. Four or five slightly wounded are not reported:—

Field officers—Wounded: Major Shriver.
Company B—Killed: Lieut. Lenard, Privates Chiltim and Joseph Smith. Wounded: Alex. Smith, Logan, Gowers, J. P. Chiltim, and Nooderspard.

Company C—Wounded: Welcher, Porter, Purseley, and Baker.

Company D—Wounded: Captain F. C. Wilson, Privates R. W. Sauds, F. H. Brown, and — Lotts.

Company E—Killed: Squire Johnson. Wounded: Lieut. Edgar, Privates Nofsinger, Harper, Holly, and H. Sandford.

Company F—Killed: Dick M'Clury, Andrew Martin, and — Carter. Wounded: Lieut. Showber, Privates Ackerley and Rowleson.

Company G—Killed: — Walton. Wounded: none.

Company H—Wounded: Privates Thomas, Hilbaner, Dranheller, Smith, Camden, and Mitchell.

Killed, 8; Wounded, 28; Total, 36.

The gentleman who furnishes the foregoing says:—

"When it is recollected that the 27th went into the fight with but 140 men, it will be seen at once that it suffered severely, the ratio being fully 30 per cent. All who witnessed the conduct of the regiment on this trying occasion, must admit that it was deserving of the highest praise. Colonel Grigsby and Major Shriver had their horses killed under them, and scarcely a man in the regiment but had a hole through some portion of his dress. The following is, I think, a correct estimate of the loss on both sides: Confederates, 600 killed and wounded; Federals, 1000 killed and wounded, and 500 prisoners—with loss of six pieces of splendid artillery, 2000 stand of small arms, hundreds of India rubber blankets, &c., &c."

The following is pretty nearly a correct list of the casualties in the 1st Maryland Regiment, during the late operations of Jackson in the Valley.

Wounded: Lieut.-Col. E. R. Dorsey, through shoulder.

Company A—Wounded: Captain Wm. W. Goldsborough, in the side; Colour-Corporal John B. Taylor, severely; Privates Cyrus Butler, severely; Martin L. Rider, in breast; James Lawson, left arm; Polk Mayberry, through ankle.

Company D—Killed: Lieut. Nicholas Snowden; Privates Edward Beatley, — Berry. Wounded: Sergeant H. Wells, dangerously; Corporal McIntyre, severely; — Simpson, severely; John Key, severely; — Acker.

Company E—Wounded: Colour-Sergeant Doyle, severely; Sergeant Wallace, dangerously; Colour-Corporal Cole, severely; Privates Quinn, seriously; Wm. Bannon, severely; Edward Lawn, severely.

Company F—Wounded: Sergeants Kennedy and Vogt; Private George Eisenburger.

Company G—Killed: Private Murphy. Wounded: Privates Ryan and Wagner.

Company H—Killed: Wm. Harris, — Schley. Wounded: Jos. Farr, mortally; W. T. Perry, mortally; Samuel Criddle, dangerously; Samuel Rogers, severely; Philip Coakley, severely; — Colston, dangerously; Renney White, dangerously; — Guy, slightly.

Company I—Killed: Captain M. L. Robertson. Wounded: Lieut. H. B. Bean, severely; G. J. Chapallier, J. G. Barber, L. S. Lancaster, Colour-Corporal Frederick Groves.

BATTLES BEFORE RICHMOND.

The following is more full than the lists we have previously published, and, indeed, so far as the regiments mentioned are concerned, may be considered complete:—

LIST OF CASUALTIES IN THE 7TH VIRGINIA REGIMENT.

The 7th Virginia Regiment went into the fight of Monday with about 240 men, and came out with about 140. The loss is not fully learned yet, but the following items may relieve the minds of the friends of the wounded:—

We had killed Captain Blackard, Lieutenant Gooding, Orderly Sergeant Apperson, — Bolling, L. Willis, John Shotwell, Huile, Storey, Webb, and Hucklestep. Captain Jones and Lieutenant Tensil are among the missing. The following are the names of a portion of the wounded:—J. W. Sarver, George Brown, Harley, Levi Dempsey, Orderly Sergeant Yates, Thornhill, Lieutenant Moore, Lieutenant Almond, Sergeant Major Tensil, T. P. Darrell, T. P. Mays, Ensign of the 7th, J. J. Balling, John A. Jenkins, Wesley Manual, Orderly Sergeant Cooper, Lieutenant Eates, Lieutenant Fogg, Lewis Monroe, Daniel Lish, Jesse Young, J. L. Kidd, Ayler, H. J. Wilburn, David Acres, B. P. Meadows, James Monroe, L. N. Monroe, W. H. McQasary, T. J. Mitchell, Orderly Sergeant P. Smith.

Killed and Wounded in the 12th Virginia Regiment, Colonel Weisiger, in the Action of July 1:—

Company A (Capt. Waddell)—Killed: Privates. H. A. Blanks, Jr., Wm. A. Graham, Robert F. Willcox. Wounded: Henry Fisher, T. F. Alley, J. W. Baylor.

Company B (Capt. Lyon)—Killed: none. Wounded: Geo. W. Mills, D. H. Dean, R. H. Johnson.

Company C (Capt. Bond)—Killed: none. Wounded: Lieut. Hawks, Privates M. D. Tatum, G. F. Hill, H. V. L. Bird, David F. Perkinson, Jos. Robinson, B. A. Lucy.

Company D (Capt. Critz)—Killed: J. Old, Nicholas Dawson. Company E (Capt. Banks)—Killed: none. Wounded: Lieut. A. M. Kelley, Sergeant Jos. Carr, Privates L. A. Burwell, Walter Kvan, J. T. Robinson, W. A. Shepherd.

Company F (Capt. Feild)—Killed: none. Wounded: Lieut. E. P. Scott, Jr., Corporal W. C. Brown, Private J. A. Collier.

Company G (Capt. Crawford)—Killed: Private J. B. Symington. Wounded: Privates J. Hovenstein, E. E. Nimmo.

Company H (Capt. Owens)—Killed: Corporal T. B. Braithwaite, Private Lewis Meyers. Wounded: Sergeant J. R. Baldry.

Company I (Capt. Jones)—Killed: Privates John Delbridge, W. E. Edwards. Wounded: Sergeant T. J. Harwell, Privates G. W. Lee, L. F. Kelly.

Company K (Capt. Lewellen)—Killed: none. Wounded: Corporal R. Mitchell, Private Wm. Mann.

A List of the Killed, Wounded, and Missing, from the 19th Virginia Regiment:—

Major John T. Ellis, wounded in the thigh.
 Company A—Wounded: W. W. Murray.
 Company B—Killed: James Durren. Wounded: Sergeant Lee Gilmore, Sergeant Shepherd, Sergeant P. Craven, Corporals Barker, O'Brien; Privates W. H. Garth, W. H. Jones, W. J. Robertson, A. Sauter, J. Hucklestep. Missing: W. Leak, P. Pearson.
 Company C—Killed: William Giles, George Rodemser, William Grant. Wounded: Captain J. E. Blair, Lieutenant S. H. White, Sergeant Robert Bowles, Privates M. R. Morris, James Napier, C. T. Thompson, W. D. Scruggs. Missing: Robert Herndon.
 Company D—Wounded: Lieuts. R. J. Harland, H. Baker, S. W. Farrar, Privates W. A. Ball, W. H. Duncan, W. T. England, A. M. Fortune, W. A. Moss, J. Scanlan, J. Strange, W. R. Woodson. Missing: E. M. Miles.
 Company E—Killed: W. C. Wood. Wounded: W. J. Garnett, P. O. Garrod, M. Wood, J. Sandridge, J. H. Pritchett, B. J. Edwards.
 Company G—Killed: W. W. Loving, W. B. Coffee, R. M. Fitzpatrick, Alcock Johnson. Wounded: Corporal B. Hamilton, Privates A. K. Kidd, A. B. Kidd, L. D. Kidd, Geo. May, J. W. May, W. H. Parrish, J. M. Plunket, N. B. Ponton, A. A. Purvis, S. J. Saunders. Missing: J. A. Lowry.
 Company F—Wounded: Privates D. Strange, J. Warron. Missing: C. Barnett, J. Lankford, F. Bohlinger. — Madison, Charles Walton.
 Company I—Killed: C. J. Higginbotham. Wounded: Sergeant T. H. Campbell, Privates D. G. Campbell, Jos. Campbell, E. W. Smith, W. L. Simpson, L. O. Jennings, D. F. M. Burford, W. A. Pendleton, A. S. Quinn. Missing: A. M. Franklin, L. P. Hawkins, T. P. Gill, W. H. Lavender.
 Company H—Killed: Herod Scott. Wounded: Sergeant T. McGinnis, Corporal P. Roberts, Privates G. Hite, John Watts, P. G. Cox, B. Cox, B. T. Joiner, J. Landrum, H. Stinnett, John Davidson, C. W. Brown, B. Settle, E. Cutter, D. Jennings, Lieut. Richardson.
 Company K—Wounded: Capt. J. G. Woodson, Lieut. A. J. Robertson, Sergeant J. H. Rae, Private M. L. Abel.

Report of Casualties in the 38th Regiment North Carolina Troops, on June 26th and 27th:—

Colonel J. L. Hoke wounded, Adjutant Cowels wounded.
 Company A (Lieut. Armstrong commanding) not in action.
 Company B (Capt. Cook commanding)—Killed: Corporal G. W. Wheeling, Private Jas. Stokes, Sr., Jno. Crezart, J. Blackman. Wounded: Sergeant H. B. Brown, J. A. Boon, G. C. Poplin, A. Grose, J. M. Atwood, G. D. Halcumb, W. M. Carter, A. S. Hair, W. Cook, J. E. Hutchins, A. R. Reese, R. D. Russell, D. T. Talley, W. H. Felts, L. J. Wells, W. R. Hains, John H. Grose, C. F. Armstrong.
 Company C (Capt. Wilson commanding)—Killed: Privates L. Gurley, O. M. Warwick, J. S. Britt. Wounded: Sergeants J. W. Walker, G. L. Dougherty; Corporals W. T. Sutton, W. A. Andrews; Privates R. B. Jackson, R. Cobb, W. McLamb, J. B. Cotton, R. B. Stith, W. Brewer, S. W. Sutton, J. S. Sanderson, M. Vaughn, W. B. Harlington, W. H. Pope, J. H. Warwick.
 Company D (Capt. Ashford commanding)—Killed: Lieut. Joseph W. Darden. Wounded: Sergeant O. B. Morrissey; Privates Joseph Persithe, Robert Shipp, M. Lockkany, W. E. Brewer, W. H. Stevens.
 Company E (Capt. McRae commanding)—Killed: Lieut. M. T. Covington, Privates James T. Bostick, M. V. B. Covington. Wounded: Sergeant A. G. Dawkins, Privates H. H. McCaskill, E. Kelly, J. Benoit, N. T. Baldwin, K. M. Covington, C. Crouch, M. Chappell, W. C. Mitchell.
 Company F (Capt. Yount commanding)—Wounded: Lieuts. D. F. Roseman, J. Yount, A. Deal; Corporal N. E. Lignan; Privates A. Arwood, John D. Hoke, John Hetrick, David Hoffman, Jacob Hoffman (since dead).
 Company G (Capt. Flowers)—Killed: R. A. Hines, J. S. McLaio. Wounded: Sergeant Hartness, J. W. Hartness, J. W. Linney, Corporal C. J. Deal, T. F. Murdoch, D. E. Campbell, M. M. Clary, W. L. W. Ellis, J. Q. Elder, J. Gamt, S. N. Hines, J. V. Lackey, J. Wesley Lackey, J. C. Lackey, R. C. Lackey, W. L. Lackey, D. M. Mathison, A. V. Turner, D. A. Wilson, J. R. Murdoch, Capt. Flowers, Lieut. Harrington.
 Company H (Capt. Thornburgh)—Killed: N. H. Crawford, A. M. Dorset, D. N. Miller. Wounded: Sergeant J. L. Andrews, Sergeant T. L. Russell, Corporal E. T. Kearns, A. C. Steed, T. W. Bell, A. M. Bell, P. W. Carter, B. H. Hopkins, James Howell, T. E. Luck, Wm. M. Newby, A. W. Saunders, Jesse Scarlett, H. M. Tomlinson.
 Company I (Capt. Magnus)—Killed: D. D. Hamrick. Wounded: J. Childers, (since dead) R. D. Hughes, E. Macswain, Lieut. Beao, Corporal D. W. Powell, Corporal T. B. Hean, P. Green, W. C. Hamrick, M. Haines, G. C. Kitchen, C. B. Powell, J. C. Williams, A. G. Wickins, Colour Sergeant John Waters.
 Company K (Capt. McLaughlin)—No report of names. Killed—3; wounded 16.

E. GOLDMAN, Acting-Adjutant 38th N. C. T.

List of the Casualties of the Jeff. Davis Artillery, Capt. J. W. Bondurant, Garland's Brigade, in the Battles of June 26th and 27th.

Killed: Corporal J. C. Gregory, Private T. H. McDonald. Slightly wounded: Sergeants R. E. Cobb, J. F. Maul; Corporal E. W. Noble; Privates J. W. Cox, J. J. Howell, J. A. Logan, J. A. Oliver, J. P. Putegnat, R. W. Woodward, W. H. Templin. Severely wounded: J. W. Carter, J. D. Campbell, J. M. Jones, J. R. Smith, J. O. Flaughton. There were 28 horses of the battery killed and disabled.

D. V. BATES, Orderly Sergeant.

Casualties in 13th Virginia Regiment, Elzey's Brigade, June 27th.

Company A—Killed: Captain Cook, Corporal Thomas Slaughter, Martin Burruss, Joseph Burruss, Robert Burruss; William B. Peake, Robert Powell, Edward Staples. Wounded, Sergeant T. Brockman, Reuben Newman, Herbert Newman, F. D. Hume, A. Hensworth, Henry Diggs, W. T. Diggs, Joseph Brockman, S. Cave, W. H. Ricketts, J. O'Neal, A. Walters.

Company B—Killed: J. P. Haynes, J. W. Franklin. Wounded: Captain C. T. Crittenden, Lieutenant A. Grinnell, Sergeants B. B. Ashley, W. A. Judd, Roane Alcock, Beckham, G. Kibby, John F. Freeman, Martin Smith, J. R. Tapp, Thomas Kibby, Stephen Green, J. J. Jones.

Company C—Wounded: Capt. Goodman, Lieut. Grubbs (since dead), Sergeant Major William Mansfield, C. H. Carter, John Bible, O. P. Mallory, D. Hay, George Magruder, R. Moore.

Company D—Killed: Sergeant R. N. Trice, Jos. Browe, J. W. Campbell. Wounded: Lieut. S. H. Parsons, Colour Sergt. Fendall Chiles, Ro. Dunn, Price Perkins, James M. Trice (since dead), P. E. Jones, D. A. Trice, Joseph Sanna.

Company E—Wounded: W. P. Pendleton, D. Newcomb.

Company F—Killed: J. L. Chewoing. Wounded: Capt. Eheart Lollon, Lieut. Linn Graves, Orderly Sergeant E. Z. Brooking, Sergeant John Keaton, Corporal I. Shotwell, A. G. W. Gilbert, H. H. Thompson, H. C. Johas, R. L. Richetts, George Davis, John Johns, J. W. Page, J. A. Calvin, J. L. Harvey, Thomas Harvey, B. F. Carpenter.

Company H—Killed: Lieut. R. B. Strite, H. W. Gilbert, James H. Carter. Wounded: Capt. Sheuan, J. B. Farnsworth, E. R. Legg, F. S. Russell.

Company I—Killed: Colour Sergeant G. W. Chesbire, George Buckland. Wounded: Lieut. Morehead, D. S. Hessey, Joel Robinson, William Loy, F. Shingleton.

Company K—Killed: Lieut. F. D. Sherrard, Owen Millersoo, W. B. Bird, John W. Washington, Thomas Offerell. Wounded: Orderly Sergeant J. A. Hammen, John F. Wright, Thomas Brooks, James Peet, Thomas Pugh, Isaac Gibson, Isaac Armstrong, John Flory, Isaac Hartman, Joseph Gill, Joseph M. Keam. Total killed, 24; total wounded, 80.

Casualties in Company A, 5th Battalion Alabama Volunteers, on the 28th and 29th June, 1862.

Killed: Lieut. D. W. Hustid, Orderly Sergeant J. H. Boyle, Sergeant J. W. Wrenn, Sergeant E. L. Houston, Corporal B. Braeh, Corporal T. Camber, Privates F. Ford, W. Steele, F. M. Hodges, J. Bonnycastle, R. E. Harwood, R. H. Moon, J. J. Whitaker, J. Tomkins, W. Murphy. Wounded: Capt. A. S. Vance Graaff, slightly in foot; Privates J. T. Bradshaw, arm, L. L. Clary, J. R. Bradshaw, leg, W. G. Frost, N. Little, head slight, B. B. Little, side slight, Newton Hill, head slight, J. W. Holloway, head slight, B. D. Nance, leg, J. Ormond, John Patton, E. T. Ramsey, arm amputated, S. B. Spight, W. W. Drummond, T. J. Gilbert, head slight, T. Barnes, N. L. Ferguson, severely, Alex. Griger, foot, M. S. Holland, through lower jaw severely, G. N. Boyd, slight, Wm. S. Hale, severely in mouth, E. E. Heyden, leg and arm severely, J. T. Carpenter, three fingers shot off, C. Dunning, both hands. Missing: E. L. Fargo, James Thompson, M. N. O'Connor. Total—killed, 15; wounded, 24; missing, 3. Total—killed, wounded, and missing, 42.

The loss in the three other companies of the battalion was very heavy. Among them are killed: Adjutant Holcombe, Captain Burton, Company C; Lieutenant Pettit, Company B; Wounded: Lieutenant Rusi, Company C; severely; Lieutenant Mattison, Company B, slightly; Sergeant Porter, Company B, severely.

List of Casualties of the 16th Regiment of Mississippi Volunteers, in the Engagement of June 8, 1862, at Cross Keys.

Colonel Carnot Posey wounded.
 Company A—None killed or wounded.
 Company B—Mortally wounded: Private R. H. Harper. Wounded: Private A. B. Caston.
 Company C—Killed: Private Andrew J. Curry. Wounded: 1st Lieutenant W. R. Brown; 3rd Sergeant W. H. Catching.
 Company D—Killed: Corporal W. S. Horner, Private Charles Quinn. Wounded: Private Henry Willows.
 Company E—Wounded: Privates William Garner, J. B. May, A. P. Sparkman, W. Yarborough.
 Company F—Wounded: Privates James W. Lawless, Martin G. Tardier, William Thompson.
 Company G—Killed: Private Richard Payton. Wounded: 1st Lieutenant John B. Coleman, Sergeant Peter Stewart, Privates D. B. McIver, John Matchlen, Thomas Lowry.
 Company I—Killed: Private Thomas Cagon. Wounded: Private James Casey, George Hetchcock.
 Company K—Killed: Private Lewis Davis. Wounded: Privates George Estis, R. C. Terry, Theodore Foltz, Thomas McMorris, William Patterson, J. L. W. Phares, T. W. Roland, Thomas T. Roche.
 Killed: 6; wounded: 28. Total, 34.

List of Casualties in the Sixteenth Regiment of Mississippi Volunteers in the Battle of June 27, 1862, near Richmond.

Company A—Killed: Capt. James Brown. Wounded slightly: Colour-Sergeant J. C. Diel, Privates N. Hiller, John Long.
 Company B—Killed: Privates C. H. Robinson, D. J. Baren. Wounded slightly: Lieuts. H. S. Arnold, P. A. Howard, J. R. Drummond, Privates J. A. Barber, J. F. Massey. Wounded severely: Private Elijah Young.

Company C—Killed: Sergeant Frank E. Tillman, Private James A. Fatherie. Wounded severely: Privates — Mastins, M. Minnus. Wounded slightly: Harry T. Lewis.

Company D—Killed: Privates John Cayney, Timothy Carney. Wounded severely: Corporal G. H. McGregor, Privates Timothy Hancock, Albert Wagener. Slightly: Sergeant J. P. Kettingham, Privates H. R. Hadsall, George Murdock, Henry Phipps.

Company E—Killed: Private Joseph Collins. Wounded severely: Lieut. John Holmes. Slightly: Privates Geo. Root, George Simmons.

Company F—Killed: Privates Clement James, Thomas J. Overstreet, William W. Bruce, George W. Keeton. Wounded severely: Captain J. J. Walton, Privates W. M. Davis, Richard Irving; slightly: Sergeant Thomas L. Smith, Privates William J. Dowus, Private Juriah Monger supposed to be mortally.

Company G—Killed: Privates H. Bobo and James McLure. Wounded severely: Captain George H. Fulkerson, Private John Teriot. Wounded slightly: Privates William Murray, Abe Hunter, and Sergeant Dennis Collins.

Company H—Severely Wounded: Sergeant Baxter Summer, Privates D. O. Summer, and Zach. M. Russell.

Company I—Killed: Private Martin Murray. Wounded severely: Privates Martin Welsh, H. Dallan, F. Gillio, Thomas Drury. Wounded slightly: Captain J. W. Lambert, Sergeant Edward Pirault, William Baker.

Company K—Severely wounded: Sergeant S. Oury, Privates D. Babers, J. T. Haynes. Wounded slightly: George Pilant, F. M. Stocket, and George Thornton.

Killed 15; wounded, 49.

J. J. SILANON, Lieut.-Colonel, Commanding 16th Mississippi Regiment.

List of Killed and Wounded in 21st Mississippi Regiment on the 30th:—

Company A (Capt. Atwood)—Wounded: F. Hume and A. B. Redding.
 Company C (Capt. Brooks)—Wounded: Private V. Smith.
 Company D (Capt. Sims)—Killed: Sergeant W. C. Smith, Privates E. B. Binnie and H. Mackall. Wounded: Privates Jas. Downs, C. Humphreys, J. Schuber, Sullivan and Hemset.
 Company E (Capt. Stawps)—Killed: Privates Thomas Kirkland and J. Cline. Wounded: Lieut. O. H. Cox, Privates H. Grace, N. Mesenger, and Benjamin C. Collier.
 Company F (Capt. Fitzgerald)—Killed: Privates John Walters and Robt. Neal.
 Company G (Capt. Dudley)—Wounded: Sergeant C. M. Stewart, Corporal N. B. Stewart mortally, (since dead), Privates C. M. Stewart, A. E. Williams, S. D. Williams, John Ransack, G. and F. Mitchell.
 Company I (Capt. Gibson)—Killed: A. W. Waggoner. Wounded: Lieut. Martin, Privates J. Corgan, W. R. Ratliff, E. P. Jones, Lynch, John Warmack, and — Ellis.
 Company K (Capt. Renfrow)—Killed: Private J. Shelton. Wounded: Lieut. Foster, badly, Privates R. Bottoms, J. Dausby, J. Noland, A. Miller, C. K. Martin and M. Tucker.
 Company L (Capt. Green)—Killed: Private D. McHue. Wounded: Thomas Fostray.

R. G. SIMS.

1st Lieut. and Adj't. 21st Miss. Regt.

List of the Wounded in the Lynchburg Beausgard Artillery:—

W. S. Reid, C. A. Boyd, — Johns, J. Stratton, A. Stratton, — Mayo, J. D. Stevens, — Green, — Folkes.

List of Killed and Wounded in the 1st Regiment of Rifles, South Carolina Volunteers, Commanded by Colonel J. Foster Marshall, at Gaines's Mill, June 27:—

Field and Staff—Killed: Sergeant-Major A. H. McGee. Wounded: Major J. W. Livingston, slightly, Adjutant Joe Berry Sloan, severely.

Company A—Killed: Privates Jasper Crain, G. B. Stephens, W. D. Reeves, J. M. Clayton. Wounded: Lieut. J. W. Philpot mortally, Sergeant W. P. Hester severely, Privates J. M. Beasley ditto, W. A. Lay ditto, J. P. Durham ditto, M. Colburn slightly, J. J. Morgan severely, J. D. Albertson slightly, F. Bowers ditto, J. B. Reid ditto, P. B. Powers ditto, D. M. Niel severely, L. Herndon ditto, A. J. Martin, slightly, R. M. Martin ditto, F. Rogers ditto, A. J. Bell ditto, W. P. Riggins ditto, C. C. Morgan ditto, M. A. Martin severely.

Company B—Killed: Privates W. H. Perrin, Lockwood, Webb, J. G. Blackburn, W. C. Round. Wounded: Lieut. W. C. Davis, Corporal W. W. Sharp, Corporal W. A. Kyle, L. A. Bell, J. H. Delany, W. H. Hamilton, C. V. Hammond, W. A. Hareison, G. Houser, W. A. Lanier, P. H. McDowell, J. N. McIlwain, A. P. Riley, C. C. Riley, T. J. Rikard, W. A. Shelits, G. White, L. W. White, J. P. McCom.

Company C—Killed: Sergeant John Rogers, Privates Ira Barker, E. D. Slaton, M. L. Johnson, Miles M. Caloway, Jos. B. Powell, C. P. A. Whitten. Wounded: Capt. J. J. Norton, Private Nimrod Sullivan, F. J. Hall, Jesse M. Hall, John Thomas, William Hodge, Isaac Hobbs, Feril Spied, Sergeant James Robins, A. Colly, J. W. Cameron, Ira Nicholson, W. N. Ransons, F. Vonholden, H. Huskamp.

Company D—Killed: Sergeant W. R. Burrough, Privates T. C. Burrs, T. D. Braddy, But Young. Wounded: Captain F. E. Harrison, Sergeant J. R. Sadler, Privates, G. O. Anderson, John A. Bates, I. C. Braddy, A. D. Campbell, H. B. Grant, E. L. Hall, J. R. Haynie, M. P. Lewis, B. S. Mitchell, L. W. McLees, J. D. McConnell, W. P. Robinson, G. W. Richardson, W. L. Simpson, J. F. Strickland, Jesse R. Woolhright, S. J. Webb, Warren Watkins, S. H. Yeargon, J. H. Goodram, A. C. Beatie, P. J. Osborn.

Company E—Killed: Lieut. L. R. McFall, Sergeant Miles Knox, David A. Ross, John W. Morgan, Warren D. Morgan, William R. Whitten, James R. DeArman, Andrew S. Hunnicutt, Warren R. Cannon, Thomas Chastian. Wounded: 1st Sergeant C. C. McKenny, Nathan B. Robertson, John B. Moody, David S. Todd, Robert C. King, William B. Lawrence, James Hopkies, Thomas J. Stribling, John M. George, Henry Hartman, William H. Gibson, David C. Rankin, Joseph Gibson John L. Morgan, Francis M. Cleveland, John C. Knox, John M. Rankin, James Stone, James Jackson, James H. Johnson, Harmon Stillwood, David L. Leroy, W. J. H. Leroy, S. N. W. McFall, William F. Morgan.

Company F—Killed: Captain Hawthorn; Privates J. J. Henderson, James Lyles, and G. T. M. Brown. Wounded: Sergeants Armstrong, Miller and Ballenger; Privates Thomas Reeden, Thomas Price, H. N. Harrum, W. T. Beardin, H. R. Hughes, R. B. Hayse, J. Dickson, Henry Sanders, Charles Mason, William Maldin, W. T. Abbott, T. R. Morris.

Company G—Killed: Corporal A. P. Lindsay; Privates L. A. Calanan, J. L. Grier, R. F. Cunningham, J. A. Davis, L. Fields, W. P. Morrison, E. W. Fruit, G. B. Richey, William H. Simpson, Joseph Smith, F. Clinkscales, L. O. Reid. Wounded: Capt. G. McD. Miller; Lieut. Latimer; Sergeant Means, Sergeant R. W. Hadden; Corporal J. A. Burton; Privates W. D. Anderson, C. A. Botts, L. D. Bowie, William Boyd, A. P. Brooks, T. W. Brooks, J. W. Brook, W. J. Calvert, W. T. Cowan, M. Flinn, M. Freeman, B. T. Parsavay, T. S. Gordon, A. C. Johnson, J. F. Latimer, J. L. Latimer, W. T. Latimer, E. J. Humphries, J. G. Martin, J. H. Mattison, G. W. Milford, B. M. Milford, A. H. McGee, J. M. Fruit, R. A. Robertson, J. W. Thomson.

Company H—Killed: Capt. J. H. Hugoin; Lieut. J. G. Brown; Corporal S. A. McCormick, Corporal N. Leggit, Corporal R. P. James. Wounded: Lieut. G. W. McCoy; Privates J. B. Moody, L. Wiggins, C. W. Peabody, A. H. Hines, H. Finkley, P. T. Saunders, A. G. Walter, N. H. McInos, Sergeant N. Smith, J. F. Faltering.

Company K—Killed: R. A. Branyan, George Craymes, B. M. Slatt, J. C. Telford, W. A. Gambrel, J. J. T. Mitchell, J. W. C. Mitchell, Reuben Keaton, William McMurry, T. H. Morrison, R. C. Key, Corporal William Williamson, J. H. Haake, Jesse Davenport. Wounded: Captain G. W. Cox, Lieutenant W. C. Norris, W. A. Bighy, W. A. Bagwell, G. W. Bagwell, J. P. Alexander, L. R. Williams, J. M. Dunlap, W. F. Cox, W. M. Fuiks, L. L. Telford, Perry Gains, L. P. Man.

Company L—Killed: Privates A. Mitchell, J. C. Young, J. A. Holoway, C. C. Burus, R. E. Carter, J. M. Geotree, E. T. Chambl'r. Wounded: Corporals H. D. Rowland, W. S. Harris, D. F. Anderson, Privates R. S. Kay, J. M. Watson, L. W. White, J. O. Hammet, L. G. Williams, J. W. Fowler, J. M. Fowler, G. W. Vandiver, J. L. Vandiver, L. P. Woodruff, W. T. Simmons, A. Y. Shearly, Albert Johnson, D. C. Stott, J. M. Geer, Israel Nelson, R. F. Brown, W. L. Shearer, C. C. Bolt.

List of Casualties in the 3rd Alabama Regiment, July 1, 1862.

Sergeant Major C. Whitman, wounded.
Company A (Mobile Cadets)—Killed: P. L. Lockwood, F. J. Stewart, W. M. Caulfield, W. J. Ledyard, jun. Wounded: Lieutenants W. H. Averill, B. F. Yniestra, J. M. Redwood, Sergeant J. H. Hastings, Corporal J. B. Gillet, T. B. Allen, Benjamin Baldwin, C. Caster, C. Dunn, J. T. Harpin, W. B. Holt, R. L. Krebs, E. Ledyard, J. Newburger, J. Price, H. Pritchard, Charles Pollard, J. C. Reynolds, P. C. Randel, Joseph Thornton, E. K. Waterhouse, D. Wheeler, jun.
Company B (Gulf City Guards)—Killed: W. C. Ayres, L. J. Kims, J. T. Berton, G. L. Sammersett, Thomas Giblin. Wounded: O. C. Donnavan, James Hudson, G. E. Turner, T. H. Bibb, F. F. Hampshire, T. H. Kellogg, W. C. Johanson, H. H. McCoy, W. F. Sammersett, Lieut. A. F. Robbins, C. Steele.

Company C (Tuskegee Light Infantry)—Killed: H. H. Bailey, John Crawford, E. F. Scott, John M. Turner. Wounded: J. Alexander, B. Breedlove, Capt. C. J. Bryan, Lieut. E. A. Etheridge, Corporal D. F. Wright, W. B. Holt, John R. Harris, Otis Monaca, L. B. Pierce, Walter Ransom, J. J. Rutledge, E. B. Small, Jas. Snider. Missing: Sergeant E. F. Baber, Henry Foster, Stephen Pace.

Company D (Southern Rifles)—Killed: T. J. McBryde, L. B. Feilder, R. N. McNeil, J. M. I. Gillis. Wounded: C. C. Perry, Capt. Powell, Thaddeus McGowan, Joe Roe, P. G. Thompson, S. H. Smith, W. Swink, A. S. Connel, G. C. Baker, T. J. Bagby. Missing: C. Rosenthal.

Company E (Washington Light Infantry)—Killed: J. S. Foley, Leo. Goldsmith, G. F. Bowers. Wounded: Sergeant J. C. Turner, Corporal M. Bouillet, A. W. Foster, J. Y. Gilmore, J. C. Levy, T. J. McLaughlin, Capt. J. W. Chester, Sergeant Stephenson, Corporal J. M. Coleman. — Bridges, John Burton, W. Hamstung, T. A. McDonald, W. Shearer, George Taggart, C. F. Westfall. Missing: Thomas W. Cocks, W. G. Cocks, E. McVoy.

Company F (Metropolitan Guards)—Killed: Charles Powell. Wounded: Sergeant H. Myer, Privates Cabon, Toomer, Bergin, Arrington, Bonham, Durden, Hausman, Henley, Lorre, Keating, McDaniel, Pringle. Missing: Privates Dolin, Dreyfus.

Company G (Sharpshooters)—Killed: None. Wounded: N. M. Cowling, J. Stubbs, P. Giduce, A. Sadler.
Company H (Lowndes Beauregard's)—Killed: Sergeant Keese, Sergeant Shelby, Privates Myley. Wounded: Privates Sharp, Stone, W. Stanley, W. H. Turner. Missing: Privates Pierce, W. H. Alexander, W. Alexander, B. H. Dudley, Lever, Broadway, Scofield.

Company I (Wetumpka Light Guards)—Killed: Colonel-Sergeant W. M. Due, Privates W. F. Lindsay, H. C. Tommy. Wounded: Lieutenant L. H. Hill, Privates J. E. Carter, C. K. McMorris, B. J. Goss, W. A. Benson, L. A. Callaway, J. R. King, G. A. Jones, W. Jeter, W. M. Teague, J. Skinner, D. Price, C. A. Ready, Sergeant J. A. Davis. Missing: Privates Bea Bross, J. C. Banks, J. A. Dixon, William Lloyd, John Lynch, Charles Law, J. N. Nirwood, H. J. Norris, N. A. Rawls, J. J. Stoker.

Company K (Mobile Rifles)—Killed: Corporal William Trent. Wounded: Sergeant Traylor, Corporal McGuire, Privates Buford, Jones, Keeler, Mosely (1), Mosely (2), Inerarity, Clark, Lesesue, Young, Hunter, Howard.

Company L (Dixie Eagles)—Killed: Privates J. A. Pipkins, W. J. Keener, G. Hudson. Wounded: Lieut. Kennon, Sergeant Martin, Privates C. Delbridge, M. W. Dick, C. Oliver, M. Kennon, Young, Patterson, Coggins, Greenwood. Missing: Privates Owens and Tillery.

List of Killed and Wounded in Company A, 1st North Carolina Regiment.

Killed: Orderly-Sergeant J. W. Hartsfield, Privates Oscar L. Mitchell, Isham W. Mitchell, John Smith. Wounded: Elijah Belvin mortally, Sergeant M. F. Scarborough severely, Atlas H. Jones seriously, James W. Powell, James H. Grady, W. H. Pace, James Belvin, John Pully, Baldy Pierce, Calvin Pierce, Wesley Young, Wesley Jones, Joseph Howland, Wm. Buffalo, Wm. A. Jones, Anderson Williams, Perry Lloyd, Wm. T. Massingale, Jackson Ellis, Augustus Hicks, H. C. Hodge, Henry Perry, Lewis Browning, Green Sanderford, Lieut. J. Z. Terrell severely in the ankle, Young B. Clifton, Jacob Frazier, M. Pearce. Total—killed, 4; wounded, 27.

CONFEDERATE REPRISALS.

The following is the text of the order in reference to reprisals for General Pope's orders and conduct:—

Adjutant and Inspector-General's office, Richmond Aug. 1.

GENERAL ORDERS, No. 54.

1. The following orders are published for the information and observance of all concerned.

2. Whereas, by a General Order, dated July 22, 1862, issued by the Secretary of War of the United States, under the order of the President of the United States, the military commanders of that Government within the States of Virginia, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, and Arkansas are directed to seize and use any property, real or personal, belonging to the inhabitants of this Confederacy which may be necessary or convenient for their several commands, and no provision is made for any compensation to the owners of private property thus seized and appropriated by the military commanders of the enemy.

3. And whereas by General Order No. 11, issued on the 23rd of July, 1862, by Major-General Pope, commanding the forces of the enemy in Northern Virginia, it is ordered that all commanders of any army corps, divisions, brigades, and detached commands will proceed immediately to arrest all disloyal male citizens within their limits, or within their reach in the rear of their respective commands. Such as are willing to take the oath of allegiance to the United States and will furnish sufficient security for its observance, shall be permitted to remain at their homes, and pursue in good faith their accustomed occupations. Those who refuse shall be conducted South beyond the extreme pickets of this army, and be notified that if found again anywhere within our lines, or at any point in the rear, they will be considered as spies, and subjected to the extreme rigour of military law. If any person having taken the oath as above specified, be found to have violated it, he shall be shot and his property seized and applied to the public use.

4. And whereas, by an order issued on the 13th of July, 1862, by Brigadier-General A. Steinwehr, Major William Steadman, a cavalry officer of his brigade, has been ordered to arrest five of the most prominent citizens of Page County, Virginia, to be held as hostages, and to suffer death in the event of any of the soldiers of the said Steinwehr being shot by bushwhackers, by which term is meant the citizens of the Confederacy who have taken up arms to defend their homes and families.

5. And whereas it results from the above orders that some of the military authorities of the United States, not content with the unjust and aggressive warfare hitherto waged with savage cruelty against an unoffending people, and exasperated by the failure of their efforts to subjugate them, have now determined to violate all the rules and usages of war, and to convert the hostilities hitherto waged against armed forces into a campaign of robbery and murder against unarmed citizens and peaceable tillers of the soil.

6. And whereas this Government, bound by the highest obligations of duty to its citizens, is thus driven to the necessity of adopting such just measures of retribution and retaliation as shall seem adequate to repress and punish these barbarities; and whereas the orders above recited have only been published and made known to this Government since the signature of a cartel for the exchange of prisoners of war, which cartel, in so far as it provides for an exchange of prisoners hereafter captured, would never have been signed or agreed to by this Government, if the intention to change the war into a system of indiscriminate murder and robbery had been made known to it; and whereas a just regard to humanity forbids that the repression of crime which this Government is thus compelled to enforce, should be unnecessarily extended to retaliation on the enlisted men in the army of the United States, who may be unwilling instruments of the savage cruelty of their commanders, so long as there is hope that the excesses of the enemy may be checked or prevented by retribution on the commissioned officers, who have the power to avoid guilty action, by refusing service under a Government which seeks their aid in the perpetration of such infamous barbarities.

7. Therefore it is ordered that Major-General Pope, Brigadier-General Steinwehr, and all commissioned officers serving under their respective commands, be, and they are hereby expressly and specially declared to be not entitled to be considered as soldiers, and therefore not entitled to the benefit of the cartel for the parole of future prisoners of war.

Ordered further, that in the event of the capture of Major-General Pope, or Brigadier-General Steinwehr, or of any commissioned officer serving under them, the captive so taken shall be held in close confinement, so long as the orders aforesaid shall continue in force and unrepelled by the competent military authority of the United States; and that in the event of the murder of any unarmed citizen or inhabitant of this Confederacy by virtue or under pretext of one of the orders hereinbefore recited, whether with or without trial, whether under pretence of such citizen being a spy, or hostage, or any other pretence, it shall be the duty of the Commanding General of the forces of this Confederacy to cause immediately to be hung, out of the commissioned officers, prisoners as aforesaid, a number equal to the number of our citizens thus murdered by the enemy.

By order, S. COOPER, A.A.G.

The following is the letter of Jeff. Davis to General Lee, instructing him to communicate the facts in the above order to the Commander-in-Chief of the United States' armies:—

Richmond, Virginia, July 31.

Sir,—On the 23rd of this month a cartel for a general exchange of prisoners of war was signed between Major-General D. H. Hill, in behalf of the Confederate States, and Major-General John A. Dix, in behalf of the United States. By the terms of that cartel it is stipulated that all prisoners of war hereafter taken shall be discharged on parole till exchanged. Scarcely had that cartel been signed when the military authorities of the United States commenced a practice of changing the character of the war from such as becomes civilized nations into a campaign of indiscriminate robbery and murder. The General Order issued by the Secretary of War of the United States, in the city of Washington, on the very day that the cartel was signed in Virginia, directs military commanders of the United States to take the private property of our people for the convenience and use of their armies, without compensation.

The General Order issued by Major-General Pope on July 23, the day after the signing of the cartel, directs the murder of our peaceful inhabitants as spies, if found quietly tilling the farms in his rear, even outside of his lines, and one of his Brigadier-Generals, Steinwehr, has seized upon innocent and peaceful inhabitants to be held as hostages, to the end that they may be murdered in cold blood, if any of his soldiers are designated as "bushwhackers." Under this state of facts, this Government has issued the enclosed General Order, recognizing General Pope and his commissioned officers to be in the position which they have chosen for themselves,—that of robbers and murderers, and not that of public enemies, entitled, if captured, to be considered as prisoners of war. We find ourselves driven by our enemies, by steady progress, towards a practice which we abhor, and which we are vainly struggling to avoid. Some of the military authorities of the United States seem to suppose that better success will attend a savage war in which no quarter is to be given and no age or sex to be spared than has hitherto been secured by such hostilities as are alone recognized to be lawful by civilized men in modern times.

For the present we renounce our right of retaliation on the innocent, and shall continue to treat the private enlisted soldiers of General Pope's army as prisoners of war; but if, after notice to the Government at Washington of our continuing repressive measures to the punishment only of commissioned officers who are willing participants in these crimes, the savage practices are continued, we shall reluctantly be forced to the last resort of accepting the war on the terms chosen by our foes, until the outraged voice of a common humanity forces a respect for the recognized rules of war. While these facts would justify our refusal to execute the generous cartel by which we have consented to liberate an excess of thousands of prisoners held by us beyond the number held by the enemy, a sacred regard to plighted faith, shrinking from the mere semblance of breaking a promise, prevents our resort to this extremity.

Nor do we desire to extend to any other forces of the enemy the punishment meted above to General Pope and such commissioned officers as choose to participate in the execution of his infamous orders.

You are, therefore, instructed to communicate to the Commander-in-Chief of the Armies of the United States the contents of this letter, and a copy of the enclosed General Order, to the end that he may be notified of our intention not to consider any officers hereafter captured from General Pope's army as prisoners of war.

Very respectfully yours, &c.,

JEFF. DAVIS.

General R. E. Lee, commanding, &c.

The following letter gives an interesting account of the Battle on James Island:—

Anderson, South Carolina, June 28.

My dear —,

Uncle C— wrote you by the "M." that I had received my first wound. I reached the city the day after he wrote, and, after two weeks' confinement in bed, came up to this place; my wound is healing by degrees, and I hope to be in Charleston about a week from this, though I shall not be fit for duty for a fortnight or more. I also received a slight bruise in my side from a piece of a shell, which only troubled me a few days. After following up the enemy all the winter, about the middle of May they made a demonstration on James Island. Our battalion, known as the Charleston Battalion, under Colonel Gaillard, was put in advance so as to give us a front position in defence of our homes and firesides. After many days and nights of watching, and many an anxious time, being continually under fire of the shells from their gunboats (from which we managed to protect ourselves), on the evening of June 2 the pickets reported the landing of a regiment of Federals about 4 p.m. Our battalion advanced to meet them, but they declined the combat; and as we could not attack them without exposing ourselves to the fire of their gunboats, we waited for them till June 3, about 3 a.m., and then fell back to our camp, leaving two companies out as pickets. After a short rest and a good breakfast, about 6 a.m., on the same day, our pickets began firing on the enemy, who consisted of a regiment from New York, one from Pennsylvania, and one from Massachusetts; we were soon under arms, with six companies of the Charleston Battalion, under Colonel Gaillard, and five companies from Colonel Stevens' regiment, under Colonel Ellison Capers, who being senior took command (two of the above companies were the pickets). We were soon in sight of the Yankees, and every man as cool as if he were on a deer hunt, opened the ball. The enemy, finding our men good shots, fell back from thicket to thicket, until they reached a settlement, where they posted themselves in the houses, and opened a hot fire on us; we laid and their fire passed over our heads, and, at a given signal, six companies were detailed to charge them. The Sumter Guards, under my command (Captain King being absent as Judge Advocate on a court-martial), were among those detailed; we were soon on our feet, and had to go 250 or 300 yards over an old field to reach the houses; and when about fifty yards off, they gave us a volley, which was too high, and hit only a few; Colonel Capers then gave the command to fire, and, after pouring in a volley, we charged with the bayonet at "double quick," when the rascals ran like sheep; the sport then was like shooting rabbits. We broke the centre of the Pennsylvania regiment (the others being the first to run), and after taking a few prisoners, we found some Federals in a small thicket, who opened fire upon us. I held a captain with my left hand, who had been brought out by one of our men, and just as I was handing him over to a man who was going to the rear, a ball struck me in the right shoulder, passed under the small bone connecting the collar-bone and arm; striking it slightly, it glanced and passed through my back, between the shoulder-blade and ribs, and came out near the spine; it hurt a little, which enraged me. Our men being about twenty steps from the thicket, and having as I thought, used powder enough, I sheathed my sword (my right arm being useless) and placing my hand in my waist strap, gave the order to "apply the steel," and as soon as the scamps saw the metal, they "caved in," and gave up. Our orders being to retire as soon as the boats opened on us, we fell back, having chased the enemy about two miles, and on our way back I was struck by a shell. Our company was fortunate; William Macbeth and myself only being severely wounded, and young Valentine, slightly wounded. The surgeons tell me I am very lucky, as a half-inch lower in front would have lost my right arm, and a half inch further in the back would have broken my spine, and killed me. I think I am spared for a wise purpose, and hope I may be as lucky in my next fight. Our company acted well, and every man did his duty. After this fight on the 3rd of June everything remained quiet near our camp until the 16th, when the enemy attacked us with 5000 men, we having but 500 men; but in a battery with four heavy guns. After two hours of hard fighting, we had 500 more men sent to us, and in another hour the enemy were off. They made three attempts to storm the battery; in the first attempt they reached the ramparts, our men not being prepared for them, as they came up slyly about 4 o'clock in the morning, and we had only a few men at the battery; but when our men did come up there was great havoc. In three hours fighting we lost 40 killed and 100 wounded, whilst the enemy lost about 500 killed, and 500 wounded and prisoners. General Evans says it was one of the hardest fights of the war. Being previously wounded, and in the city, I knew nothing of it until it was all over. Our company was the first to enter the battery under a galling fire, and our men fought like bulldogs. Our loss was heavy; poor Henry King was shot as he ordered the men to charge, he fell passed through his lungs, and he only lived thirty-six hours. Poznanski was killed instantly; Valentino, already alluded to as wounded, was shot, and died an hour after; Sam. F. Egerton was shot and died during the night; and poor John Edwards, after the fight was over, was killed by the last shell fired—he did not know what hurt him. Our wounded were Dr. Tennent, G. W. Dingle, Tom Lockwood, Joe Wells, Terry Roumillat, H. Valentine, R. C. Evans, W. W. Johnson, and H. Neuville, all of whom will recover. Henry S— was in both fights. I am promoted to the captaincy of the "Summers," and in our next fight will make them avenge the death of our comrades. As the city was likely to be attacked, most of the females have been removed, and our family are all at this place, quite well, though they do not like having to leave their homes. The city is strongly fortified; and one thing is certain, the enemy can never take it by land, unless they do it over many a gallant soldier. We are all looking for a battle in Virginia, and the Federals will no doubt give their version of it, but we shall beat them. Having been checked here in the vicinity of the city, they will probably wait until they can attack us with a large fleet, being afraid to try again without it. This may be the last time you may hear from me, as I expect always to be in the advance guard, and may fall a victim to the shot of the Northern hirelings.

Yours, &c.

Foreign Correspondence.

(From our Commercial Correspondent.)

New York, August 13.

Affairs in Wall-street are in a melancholy state; the spirit that formerly animated that thoroughfare and the region round about seems to be fast disappearing. Everybody is afraid to enter into time transactions, as no one can tell what even a day may bring forth. Exchange and gold will soon advance rapidly. The shipments of breadstuffs, although tolerably large, amount to very little in comparison with the indebtedness to Europe, which is estimated as follows: importers in the European trade, $60,000,000; importers in the China, East and West India, and South American trade, $25,000,000; produce dealers and shipowners $20,000,000; bankers and stockbrokers, $80,000,000; miscellaneous, $15,000,000; making a total of $200,000,000. Will this frightful sum ever be paid?

The holders of foreign merchandise are in a quandary; they do not like to sell on credit, and although the stocks of goods in the possession of middle men are very small, a hand to month business is being done for cash. But few promissory notes are making against bona fide transactions. Accommodation bills still "go," because (paper) money is so easy.

Great anxiety is manifested in reference to drafting; there is a rumour to-day that the conscription is to be put off until September 1; if so, Mr. Lincoln may be preparing himself for peace. Such a wise conclusion may have been dictated by the severe reverse that "Stonewall" Jackson has inflicted upon General Pope. It is to be hoped that the mist of the immediate future will soon be wiped from our eyes; all is darkness just now, and we pray for light. We should tumble into a military despotism, if there was sufficient brains in the powers that be, but the absence of that commodity, as well as the little respect that is still paid to state lines, prevents that finale to this inglorious war.

PARIS, August 27.

Every other political question, whatever may be its intrinsic importance, has just now sunk into insignificance in comparison with Italian affairs. You remember the vehemently Gallic discussions which took place, and the excitement that was produced in the whole of the Parisian press, by the statement of M. de la Guéronniere's paper La France, on the 21st of this month:—"Yesterday, M. le Marquis de Lavalette called on His Holiness the Pope. The French Ambassador, it appears, gave to His Holiness, in the name of the Emperor, the assurance that the French Government would not allow any invasion of the territory of the States of the Church, and would guarantee its integrity."

On the 25th, the following appeared in the Moniteur.

Several newspapers have asked what will be the attitude of the French Government in view of the agitation which now prevails in Italy. The question is so clear that any doubt seems impossible. In view of insolent threats, and the possible consequences of a demagogic insurrection, the duty of the French Government, and its military honour, oblige it more than ever to defend the Holy Father. The world must be well aware that France does not abandon those to whom, when in danger, she extends her protection.

That was (to use General McClellan's happy style) a finisher. Le Siècle, L'Opinion Nationale, Le Temps, Les Débats, on one side, Le Constitutionnel, Le Pays, La Patrie, on the other, did not come up in time. L'Indépendance Belge has shown more pluck; that veracious sheet bears in general its independent name as a fine modern example of antiphrasis; but in this instance it went so far as to print that "the note in the Moniteur, announcing the resolution of the French Government to resist the threats of Garibaldi, has thrown no light whatever on the subject." Every one else had considered the announcement clear enough; but the Brussels editor has got an opinion of his own. He was the man who found out that McClellan had got thirty miles out of the way in the Richmond battles, without losing his footing.

The latest news from Italy that has come to hand is, that Garibaldi, having left Catania in the night of the 25th, has embarked on board an English ship, accompanied by a few of his staff, and has landed safely in Calabria. According to the latest accounts, he was still at Mileto, at the head of 1300 men. The royal troops had re-entered Catania after his departure, and taken a few hundred volunteers prisoners.

The Neapolitan provinces have been proclaimed in a state of siege, and General de la Marmora has been appointed Extraordinary Commissioner. Tranquillity prevailed at Naples, but great excitement existed in Calabria. The towns of Bovat, Oppido, Nicotera, Mileto, Palmi, Gerace and Carignano had pronounced in favour of Garibaldi, and others were expected to follow their example. A large number of ships, which had brought Garibaldian volunteers from various parts of Italy, were anchored off Gioja. The division of General Brignone had received orders to proceed to Calabria immediately. General Ciakini has left for Sicily, after having concerted measures with General de la Marmora, who had issued a proclamation "directed against those subversive men who, under the pretence of hastening the accomplishment of Italian unity, have provoked civil war in Sicily." The proclamation continues thus:—"General Garibaldi, their chief, has thrown himself on this continent, threatening to introduce anarchy. It is the duty of the Government to crush the rebellion. A state of siege has therefore been proclaimed. The commanders of divisions will unite military and civil powers. All assemblages are to be dispersed by force. The exportation and retention of arms is prohibited. All arms must be given up within three days. The liberty of the press is restricted."

The sacred cause of national independence has the warmest friends everywhere; but, all liberal minds are getting every day more and more disgusted with demagogues. It is to be hoped that the liberties of Italy will survive this painful crisis.

Garibaldi's appeal to the Hungarians to get up an insurrection amongst them against the Emperor of Austria, and General Klapka's remarkable rebuke, have been published too extensively for my mentioning those curious documents.

The Eastern question is getting more and more into the shade for the present, but it will certainly take a fresh start before long.

The only fact worth mentioning about home politics in France is that, contrary to what had taken place for several sessions before this, there were no political speeches from the Presidents of the several departmental Conseils-généraux. The Duke de Morny himself, in his opening speech, abstained from all mention of politics.

La France has published a series of articles on the American question, which show a knowledge of that country and its people seldom met with here, and they were written with a degree of talent which our journalists do not often deign to bestow on the subject. The conclusion of M. J. Cohen's argument is immediate recognition. To give you an idea of the flippancy of the French journals, could you believe that the Opinion Nationale, not later than Sunday last, attributed to Jefferson Davis the very orders of General Pope against which President Davis so nobly and so rightfully protested? "C'est ainsi que l'Opinion Nationale écrit l'histoire."

But it is refreshing to see that fair justice is done to the South in such a paper as La France, whose political principles have just received such a sanction as that which I mentioned at the beginning of this letter.

The journal La France has published a series of articles on the American question, from the able pen of M. J. Cohen. We reproduce the concluding communication.

To every practical man, to every earnest and intelligent mind, the separation of the American Republic is decisively and irrevocably accomplished.

Numerous and all-powerful causes of inevitable dissolution have been threatening the Union of the American States for the past fifty years, but there is further the wild passion and unforfeited hatred engendered by civil war which no concession will satisfy.

The South may be vanquished; it never can be reconquered. Such a gigantic rising of a whole nation cannot be put down with cannon balls. When a people fight under such conditions as the Southerners do, they may be crushed but not exterminated. If the North could possibly rebuild the Union by military coercion, it would still be under the continuous threat of other, and more and more formidable insurrections, and nothing could tame the fiery resentment of the subdued nation.

Woe to the United States if they could renew, after a successful warfare, the Federal tie now broken. The seceded States might perish; but, worse still, the liberal principles, the glory, the free institutions of North America would be lost for ever. Even so, the triumphant North might proclaim the emancipation of the blacks; but the liberties of the American people would be for ever annihilated.

In order to keep down a population quivering with hatred, to repress never-ceasing plots and conspiracies, to elude continuous attempts at independence, dictatorship becomes indispensable, martial law must be the only law, public order can be preserved only by force and maintained by settled despotic rule. No more free press, no more free speech, no more personal liberty; but stringent laws against all those suspected of disaffection, and the prisons filled, and under pretence of public safety all human rights trampled down. Such would be the inevitable consequences of an artificial reconstruction of the Union.

And we should see free America in her turn fatally bound to the ruinous system of large standing armies. How would her Government manage, after the subjugation of the South, to give satisfaction to those numerous soldiers, now accustomed to the life of the camp, excited by their fighting habits, and eager for new struggles and new battles? Where would their warlike ardour find an outlet? In Canada or in Mexico? A dangerous problem it would be, and a terrible threat to the peace and security of the whole world!

But no! never can the North subjugate the South. More than a year has elapsed since the fierce struggle has been raging, and there is no sign of a decisive victory in favour of the North. The South can stand any number of unimportant reverses, without being seriously weakened. The South has on its side what its ancestors had in the War of Independence, what the Russians had in 1812,—time and space. Its armies can fall back and disappear, can use up the invader's patience and wear out his strength, and then turn on him and compel him to retreat before their desperate attack.

This is no speculation—it has actually taken place more than once during the last twelve months. The Federal troops had advanced in large numbers into the heart of the Confederate States—they had been successful in several conflicts. The North was already loudly boasting of its triumph. Kentucky, Missouri, Tennessee, were under its sway; New Orleans was occupied. And now the tables are turned. The South has got the ascendancy, and the Confederate armies threaten the city of Washington, whilst the terrible war of guerillas has begun in earnest in every region where the Federals have carried the flag of the extinct Union.

Such a struggle can last for years, inflicting irreparable ruin upon the country of which Washington was the founder, and drowning it in blood. What motives, therefore, can be urged for waiting any longer?—what further disasters are we to witness between these infuriated nations? It is folly to entertain the slightest hope that they may cool down, and that reason and humanity can take the place of anger and hatred. They are in such a state of excitement that nothing can stop them but utter prostration and death. It is the duty of civilized Europe to throw the whole weight of its power into the scale—into that scale where, together with the destinies of America, are mixed up some of the highest interests of the world. Europe has long offered her friendly advice in the name of justice and humanity; her conciliatory tone, the amicable expression of her kindly feeling, have been disregarded—the time has come for her to assume a sterner attitude.

After all, Europe suffers from this war just as much as does America. Her workshops are closed; her manufacturing population is reduced to unparalleled sufferings; her industry is utterly paralyzed; her political status itself is endangered by the consequences of the American crisis. It is impossible that the present state of affairs should continue without awful disasters to herself. It is her bounden duty to protect her most vital interests, and hence her sacred right, after useless entreaty, to act.

There are three modes of action: mediation, intervention, and the recognition of the Southern Confederacy.

Mediation is impossible; the consent of both belligerents would be required—one of them should be led to propose or accept of an armistice; but animosity on both sides is now wrought up to such a pitch that the attempt is useless.

Intervention is nothing else than a declaration of war. What European statesman could be found to plunge his country into war.

The recognition of the Confederate States is, on the contrary, an efficient means, a legitimate one, and one in perfect accordance with the principles of modern right.

What encourages the struggle is the passive attitude of the European Powers. It has been pretended that the sympathy of the civilized world for the cause defended by the South was an encouragement to the resolute defence of their soil by the Confederates. As long as the North can rely on the neutrality of France and England, it will persevere in its system of war to the knife, which is certain to cause the utter ruin of both parties, and the destruction of the free institutions of America.

The South has won the sympathy of public opinion at large, for the sole reason that it has on its side justice and right. What does the South require? The liberty of choosing its own Government, of making its own laws, and it is a right which it has always enjoyed, and which was expressed to the fullest extent in the Federal contract. There are some who call the Southerners rebels and insurgents; this would be true if the United States had ever been a power, where a part of the people might have revolted against the Sovereign Power. But they were only a Confederacy in which each State preserved its sovereignty, its independence, its absolute right to break the Federal connection. The North has wilfully ignored these plain truths; the North has violated the Federal contract; the North wants to make the South a slave to its autocracy. The Southern States, therefore, present the noble spectacle of a people fighting for its liberty; for more than a year it has given the proof—by its free vote at the ballot, that its citizens will be independent—by its gallant fighting, that its citizens are able to defend their independence against the foreign foe.

These are the two conditions which modern international law demands for a new nation to be recognized, and the Southern Confederacy has more than fulfilled both of them. Modern international law says that the new State must have an existence of its own; it must be organized; it must be in accordance with the wants of the country; it must be the expression of the will of its inhabitants; it must be strong enough to defend itself—it must be just what the Southern Confederacy undeniably is.

France has proclaimed these great principles of public right, France has acted on them, France cannot trample them down by wronging a nation which has been long offering her friendship, and asking from her justice—a nation to whom she is united by congenial ties, by near relationship, by so many and so important interests. It is easy to understand the hesitating policy of England. In spite of the professed friendly feelings of her statesmen, it is impossible to forget that, after all, North America is to the United Kingdom an old foe and a formidable rival; and one might well believe that the proud British, who claim an undisputed sway over the seas, would not be overcome by grief in the event of the States of America having inflicted on themselves irreparable disasters. But the interest and policy of France are different—it is her object to encourage, on the opposite side of the Atlantic, the welfare of friendly nations, with whom she may rely on for the lasting benefits of mutual friendship and advantageous intercourse.

In France, in England, and even in America, public feeling is evidently more and more impressed with the justice and the propriety of the formal and early recognition of the Southern Confederacy. It is a highly important symptom. When a question is thus solved in its principle by public opinion, the time is near when it will be practically settled by the wisdom of the interested Governments.

A LIBERAL DONATION.

Dr. James Camak, of Athens, Ga., has been appointed a special agent of the Georgia Hospital Association, to look up and attend to the wants of the 12th Georgia Regiment. Previous to leaving Athens he received the subjoined communication, enclosing the handsome sum of $1000, from Judge Lumpkin, as a patriotic contribution to the wants of that gallant and suffering regiment:—

Dr. James Camak, Special Agent Georgia Hospital Association:

I have deposited $1000 of my salary, this year, as a fund to be used in enabling indigent sick and wounded soldiers from Georgia to get home when discharged, without means for that purpose, from the hospitals and army. While in the hospitals their wants may be supplied, and transportation furnished by the Government. But to turn a sick and wounded soldier adrift, poor and penniless, to reach his humble home, 600 miles distant, is cruel indeed. Two reached Athens recently just in this condition; one of them having his leg shot off by a cannon ball, in the fight at Lee's Farm, on the 16th of April. Even his clothes were unchanged since the amputation of his leg—three or four weeks previously. The army abounds in such men, who patiently bear suffering and privation, freely giving toil, obedience, and blood to the cause. Was the like ever seen?

Before Dr. Camak's recent appointment, I had selected the Reverend Mr. Crumley and Dr. Flinn, chaplain to the 16th Georgia Regiment, to disburse this fund. The appointment of Dr. Camak at once directed my attention to him. Will he consider the money as appropriated to the foregoing object, and subject to be used at such time, and by such persons, as he and Mr. Crumley may see fit to select, or by themselves, if opportunity occur?

I have thought that Governor Brown might venture to take the responsibility of appointing a special agent for Virginia, where, it is computed, we have 40,000 soldiers from this State, and place $5000, or even $10,000 in his hands, to be applied to the aid and comfort of indigent sick or wounded soldiers from Georgia. The Legislature would ratify such an appropriation.

J. H. LUMPKIN.

Augusta, Ga., May 3, 1862.

Judge J. H. Lumpkin—Dear Sir—Your letter and the enclosed $1000 was received just as I was leaving Athens, too late to reply. I have been so liberally supplied with funds by the Georgia Hospital Association, whose agent I am, to be used for the purposes that you so nobly and generously have provided for, that I cannot use yours until I have disbursed that of the Association.

As there is some risk in carrying the funds with me, permit me to return them to you.

I have the honour to be,

Respectfully and truly yours,

JAMES CAMAK,

Special Agent Ga. Hospital Association.

THE SEVEN DAYS' BATTLE.

The Charleston Daily Courier publishes the following graphic letter written by a captain in the Confederate army who is not yet of age:—

Camp on James River, Thursday Morning, July 3, 1862.

Dear Father,—I take the advantage of this, my first opportunity, of penning a few lines to let you know that I am quite well, and, with the exception of a few bruises, am, by the mercy of God, still on my feet, and ready for another round. But I will endeavour, in my limited time and space, to give you a few details of our experience since I wrote to you on last Thursday. On the next day our regiment was sent down to make a demonstration in front of the enemy's batteries, to attract their attention from Jackson's forces, who were moving in their rear. After waiting until the afternoon, the regiment was drawn up in line of battle, and my company and Harrison's thrown out as skirmishers. We advanced in front of our pickets, and encountered those of the enemy in a very thick wood, where they waited our coming, and opened on us with a heavy fire of rifles, which killed Albert Miles, and wounded two of Harrison's men. I received a shot through the breast of my jacket, but none of my men were hurt. We drove the picket to the reserve, and the reserve to the regiment in rear, when the enemy opened on us a terrible fire of grape and shell, which wounded several men in the regiments in our rear. Having discovered the enemy's position, and accomplished our object, we fell back, and were much complimented on our little action. This having been the first time our men had been under musketry, or fired a gun, I was much pleased with the gallant manner in which they stood their ground. Night closing in soon after, we returned to camp, where we spent the next day in resting. On Sunday morning, about 2 o'clock, we were roused with orders to cook rations and prepare to march, as the enemy were falling back from their position in our front. About 5 o'clock the regiment was formed, and the brigade moved on towards the Chickahominy. About 8 o'clock we passed through the enemy's fortifications, and came upon the rear of their column. As soon as we came in sight our brigade was formed into line of battle, skirmishers thrown out, and immediately after their artillery opened upon us. We advanced slowly through some terrible swamps, in which we often sank waist deep in mud and water. About sundown we came upon their position, just beyond a skirt of thick woods upon reaching which they opened on us with a very heavy fire of grape and shell, which cut down the bushes and trees on every side of us. For a while we lay down in the bushes, when a volley cutting down many of our men, and taking off both legs of Sergeant Tom Hill (a particular friend of Ben's and mine), and a volley poured into us by a line of infantry just in our front, proving too hot, we rose and charged about a quarter of a mile, driving back the enemy's line about 300 yards, and coming within about forty yards of a brigade of infantry, which was formed just in front of our regiment; here we halted under a terrible fire, and began to return volley for volley, our men coolly loading and firing, and making every shot tell. During the fight, the right and left wings became separated, and I took command of the left wing. Just then the fire was most deadly, and our men were falling on every side, but not one quailed. As I passed down the line encouraging the men, a grape-shot struck me on the left thigh, and brought me to my knees, but, concealing the pain, I moved down to the rear of my company, and took my position where I could watch them. Just then Ben Taylor, who was capping his gun alongside of his brother, turned his head to the rear and said, "Give it to them, boys," and put his gun to his shoulder to fire, when a ball struck him in the head, and he fell upon his face dead. He never spoke again. Poor Jim, I felt so sorry for him; he laid down his gun, turned Ben over, and gazed upon him in mute sorrow. Stepping up to him, I put my hand upon his shoulder, and said, "Jim, I have no consolation to offer you except that Ben has fallen at his post; there he lies, yonder is the enemy; avenge him." He picked up his gun, and turning his pale, quivering face to me, he said "Captain, I can fight them now," and he did fight them right gallantly. About the same time Dolphus Johnson was shot in the thigh, the ball ranging upwards and lodging in his groin: Bill German shot through the lower part of the ankle; Sergeant West through the arm just above the wrist; and Corporal R. Reardon through the arm above the elbow. Not a man of them uttered a groan, but coolly crawled to the rear. When Johnson was shot I took his rifle and cartridges and used them until we retired. During the fight Colonel Bluna was shot through the arm, and I was left Lieutenant-Colonel; and Sentall was shot through the ear. While loading, a Minié ball took off the top of the second knuckle of my first finger, and a second struck me in the breast; the first brought the blood pretty freely, but the second, striking just upon a Yankee Bible, razor, and bullet moulds, which I had picked up and stuck in my pocket, paralyzed my whole side for some time, and keeled me over, and was much the more painful. Soon after we were ordered to retire, as our friends in the rear were firing into us, and had killed several of our men. This we did, falling back in beautiful order, and being highly complimented by General Kershaw. We fell back to the skirt of the woods from which we had advanced, and the firing having ceased we threw our pickets upon the battle ground, and started to bring in our wounded. By this time night had closed in, and a heavy rain was falling. Worn out, the men lay down in the water and slept until morning, except when awakened by the cries of some poor wounded fellow, who was suffering, waiting, watching, and praying for the appearance of daylight and relief. Thus the night passed and the morning dawned, and the sun came out; but the enemy, under cover of night, had left, leaving a line of ghastly dead and wounded Yankees, to mark the spot where the conflict had raged hottest. In the engagement, out of 300 men, we lost 100 killed and wounded. The 3rd Regiment lost 150 out of 300, and the 2nd and 8th lost heavily. The enemy fought desperately, but unavailingly, and left the ground strewn with men from the 5th and 6th Vermont and some regiments of regulars, with which forces our regiment had to contend. We were employed during the early portion of the day in burying our dead, and caring for the wounded, and about 10 o'clock, being relieved by Stonewall Jackson, we marched to the support of Longstreet, who was trying to cut the Federals off from the river. We pushed on all day, and after a weary march of twenty miles, by a very circuitous route, over a rocky road, where my shoes were actually torn off my feet (I performing the latter part of the march barefooted), we reached the ground (where our forces had fought terribly for several hours, and from which they had finally driven the enemy) about 3 o'clock a.m., footsore, weary, and exhausted. Moving in front of Longstreet's lines, our division formed in line of battle just as the grey dawn broke in the east, and discovered to us piles of dead and wounded, who were thickly strewn over the fields and woods as far as the eye could reach. Here was where our men and the enemy had met in the shock of battle, and where they had fallen thickest, and there we lay down to rest and wait until we could see sufficiently well to make another attack. What the reflections of men were, who, worn out, dispirited, and around whom lay all the scenes of carnage which characterize a battle-field under these circumstances, you may imagine, but I cannot describe. About sunset we advanced upon what we supposed the enemy's position, but not a gun opened upon us. Scores of dead men, whose glazed and open eyes stared glassily at the sun, and whose blood stained the grass, showed where they had been. Dismounted guns, shattered caissons, dead horses, and mangled limbs and trunks showed where they had fought, and a line of baggage, knapsacks, coats, guns, &c., showed the direction in which they had fled, and in that direction we pursued, marching often through swamps that seemed almost too thick for a bird to penetrate, and again across fields and down lanes where we were almost stifled with dust, and forced to yield to the power of the sun. At length, about 5 o'clock, p.m., the enemy were reported occupying a very strong position just in our front, which they had fortified. Our artillery was ordered out to open on the enemy, and a brigade of Georgians and Alabamians to support it. No sooner had our guns opened than they were dismounted, the caissons torn to atoms, and the horses and men piled and mangled together. Other batteries were ordered out with the same success, and the few men and horses who were left came dashing back, panic stricken, and sought refuge in flight. Then we saw what was coming. Our brigade was ordered to the front, to support the one already sent out, and, forming in line, we marched to the skirt of woods which separated us from the open ground, where the enemy had formed to receive us. His position could not have been better selected. Upon a hill, about half a mile in our front, were planted thirty siege guns and twenty light batteries, manned by United States' regulars; while in front the ground descended gradually to our position, midway between which and their batteries was a line of 30,000 of their best troops, who were selected to cover their retreat to their gunboats, two miles distant. Upon this line and their batteries we advanced. For the first half mile of the mile and a half we marched the shells burst around us incessantly. After that, just as we got into the woods, the gunboats opened upon us with their broadsides of rifled guns, the shells from which came hurling through the woods, crushing and bursting, and tearing down numbers of the largest trees in their course. Then came the grape and canister from the batteries in our front, and soon the musketry opened, actually sweeping down whole lines of men in our front, and from our own ranks, and making our path one over dead and dying men. We passed over four lines of men, who, sent out before us, were unable to stand the fire, and lay close to the ground, from which no threats or persuasion could move them. Our men trampled them into the mud like logs, and moved on in an unwavering line, perfectly regardless of the numbers who were falling around them. It was just here that Arthur Parker, who had been quite sick, said "Boys, I am almost done; but I'll go as close to them as I can." Scarcely had he spoken when a ball passed through his bowels. He did not speak, only pressed his head to his side and turned round, when a second ball passed through his head, and he fell dead. Keedle was shot through below the knee at the same time, and Lieutenant Burcknight through the head, while Ebby Butler and Sergeant Miles were both killed instantaneously by grape-shot passing through their breasts, and Warreu Brooks was struck in the leg by a ball. But we pushed on until we found the line we were to support within 600 yards of the battery, and there we halted under cover of a hedgerow, and lay down to rest. The line in front of us, unable to stand up in front of the fire, had laid down, while the troops in our rear poured several volleys into us, wounding and killing many men. Finding the place untenable between friend and foe, General Kershaw proposed to the general in our front to charge the battery, and let us support him. This he refused to do. Kershaw then offered to charge it with our brigade, if they would support him after he took it. This they also refused, and, as the Georgians and Louisianians on our right were moving up, we could not fire without injuring them, and we could do no good where we were; we were directed to fall back to our original position and reform line of battle. I held our position with the left wing until the right was beyond range, and then directed the left to retire, I keeping some distance in their rear and falling back very slowly. No sooner had our men retired when there came a portion of the Confederate soldiery dashing past me panic stricken, and huddled together like sheep, presenting elegant marks for the grape and cannon balls which cut paths through them, and hurled them, writhing and digging, into the mud and water of the swamp. One man, in his haste to get out of danger, shoved me on one side, and just at the instant a canister shot tore his head off, and splattered my face with his blood and brains. As you may suppose, I was not much vexed at his impoliteness. On our way out we passed over the ground which we travelled in going in, and found men lying dead in every direction. Upon reaching the rear we were marched into a skirt of woods to rest for the night, the fight having now closed, and the enemy ceased firing. When morning dawned they were gone again, having reached James River, and being safely under cover of their gunboats. Early in the morning I rode over the battle ground, our brigade having been marched up to occupy it, and the sight which was there presented beggars description. Entering the field at the point where our artillery had been posted, I came upon numbers of dead and dying horses, who, with the drivers and gunners, lay in a pile together; their several dismantled guns, their caissons, fired and blown up by the enemy's balls, all presenting an aspect of desolation and ruin. Then came the point at which our infantry lines advanced through the open fields and engaged that of the enemy. For a mile the ground was thickly strewn with the mangled and dying, showing with what desperate energy our men had advanced, and with what energy they were repulsed. Men, mangled in every conceivable manner, to the number of 10,000 were strewn out before me. The painful details of our own wounded I will spare you; but will pass to the enemy's side of the field, where one-half of the number lay; there were men with their arms, legs, and hands shot off, bodies torn up, features distorted and blackened. All this I could see with indifference; but I could not but pity the wounded: there one poor devil, with his back broken, was trying to pull himself along by his hands, dragging his legs after him, to get out of the corn rows, which the last night's rain had filled with water; here another, with both legs shot off, was trying to steady the mangled trunk against a gun stuck in the ground; there a fair-haired Yankee boy, of 16, was lying with both legs broken, half of his body submerged in water, with his teeth clinched, his finger nails buried in the flesh, and his whole body quivering with agony and numbed with cold. In this case my pity got the better of my resentment, and I dismounted, pulled him out of the water, and wrapped him in a blanket, for which he seemed very grateful. One of the most touching things I saw were a couple of brothers (boys) both wounded, who had crawled together, and one of them in the act of arranging a heading for the other, with a blanket, had fallen, and they had died with their arms round one another and their cheeks together. But your heart will sicken at these details, as mine did at seeing them, and I will cease.

THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF GENERAL M'CLELLAN.

(From the Times.)

"Thus far," writes General George B. M'Clellan—page 8 of his Military Commission to Europe—"the allied generals displayed none of the qualities of great commanders—their measures were half-way measures, slow and blundering—they failed to keep constantly in view the object of the expedition, and to press rapidly and unceasingly towards it." This criticism refers to the period when on the 27th of September the allied generals had got to Sebastopol, having landed their army on an open beach on the 14th of September, fought and defeated the enemy at the Alma, sent their sick and wounded away, buried their dead, and taken up a position never afterwards abandoned till their object was achieved. "Although (he says, page 5) fully aware that it is much easier to criticise operations after the result is known than to direct them at the time, I shall not hesitate to invite attention to what appear the evident mistakes on either side. This, not for the purpose of finding fault or of instituting comparisons" (though the very next sentence contains a comparison between the petty operation of landing near Vera Cruz and the disembarkation of the allies in the Crimea), "but with the hope that it may serve to draw the attention of our officers to the same points, and perhaps assist in preventing similar errors on our own part hereafter." It is almost cruel to the young officer to proceed with these quotations, and we shall only add one more:—"If a deficiency of men and means is assigned as a reason for the early operations of the allies, it is but another proof that in undertaking this affair they neglected one of the clearest rules of war—that is, to undertake no important operation without full and reliable information as to the obstacles to be overcome, and the means of resistance in the hands of the enemy." "We cannot afford," he says, "a Moscow campaign." How little when he wrote these lines in January, 1862, did the American officer imagine that he should be at the head of an enormous army levied for the purpose of invading a State once incorporated in the country he served, and of destroying the city in which his enemies, once his own countrymen, were assembled to defend their homes and their liberties! The deductions he draws from his observations in the Crimea are applied to the effect of a foreign invasion of the United States, and he remarks that, though a small army could be crushed by the superior numbers of the people, a force of 100,000 disciplined men would be quite invincible, because the multitude brought to bear against them work their own destruction, for "if without discipline and instruction they cannot be handled, and are in their own way." There is a sort of analogy between Sebastopol and Richmond. Neither Williamsburg nor White Oaks was quite equal in results to the Alma, it is true, but the covering force was obliged to retire. The enemy blocked up the water entrance to their city; the Federals command the sea as the allies did, and they have not been able to force the water batteries. The Confederates are said to be as strong as the Russians were. Their Gortschakoff is in the field outside. The Federals, too, have been attacked on their right before the place. Are they quite as proud of their Interman? Does General McClellan stand the test of his strictures on those who were in a position somewhat like his own? We make the Americans a present of the comparison. The latest news we have from his army is that it is moving somewhere or other, having made a fiasco in the advance to Malvern Hill. McClellan has now been more than a month in his place of refuge at Harrison's Landing. At last he "prepared for a great battle." "On Tuesday, August 5, he moved out and took possession of Malvern Hill, and sent back for the greater part of his army, but the messengers took the wrong road and the troops did not come up till it was too late. "The enemy were not asleep," but came out in force. General McClellan went back to his camps again, and the Confederates took possession of Malvern Hill, and are, we suppose, there now. All that comes from the Federal army is the same intelligence of great sickness, aggravated by intense heat, and certified by boat loads of sick soldiers, and promises of something going to happen. We must wait with patience for the march of events, which move more rapidly than the Federal arms, as it is nearly always the case that the initiative is taken by the Confederates.

LIGHT ON A DARK SUBJECT.

Vanity Fair has a bit at the "intelligent contrabands," who figure so largely in the correspondence of the press from the various seats of war, and at the verandah of editors and readers who believe one word in twenty spoken by the coloured individuals in question. Here is a part of Vanity Fair's squib:—

"You b'long to de army, mars'r?" asked the intelligent contraband, uneasily.

"Yes. That is—I am—yes; I am with the army, sir," replied the Tribune correspondent; "and I would like, sir, to ask you a few questions. Where is Beauregard, at Corinth or at Richmond?"

Intelligent Contraband.—"Yis, mars'r."

Tribune Correspondent.—"Where, at Richmond?"

Int. Con.—"Yis, mars'r."

Trib. Cor.—"And how many men has he?"

Int. Con.—"Niggers, mars'r?"

Trib. Cor.—"No, soldiers!"

Int. Con.—"Bout sixty hundred thousand, I spec's."

Trib. Cor.—"What! Are you sure? Aren't you mistaken?"

Int. Con.—"Yis, mars'r."

Trib. Cor.—"Well, when did he arrive here?"

Int. Con.—"O, two, tree, four mants ago."

Trib. Cor.—"You mean weeks, don't you?"

Int. Con.—"Yis, mars'r."

Trib. Cor.—"Do you think the rebels will evacuate Richmond?"

Int. Con.—"O, yis, mars'r, dey'll fite like de debil."

Trib. Cor.—"You don't understand me, sir. I mean, will they run away?"

Int. Con.—"Yis, mars'r, dey ollers runs away."

Trib. Cor.—"But if McClellan had attacked the city three weeks ago, he could have killed them all, couldn't he?"

Int. Con.—"Yis, mars'r; he killed 'em all, I spec's. I got under a fence, an' he didn't saw me."

At this point of the chat, the mind of the Intelligent Contraband seemed illuminated by the vague splendour of some familiar memories, for he screwed his not very expressive visage into a grin, and added, "Now, mars'r, couldn't ye gib dis nigger a drop o' rye? I orlful dry workin', mars'r."

The Tribune Correspondent expressed an opinion that alcohol was a poison, and that nothing could be more terrible than the effects of drunkenness. To which the Intelligent Contraband replied,—

"Now, mars'r, dat's jes wat I want."

"Whose slave were you?" asked the Correspondent, after a pause.

Int. Con.—"Mars'r Davis's."

Trib. Cor.—"What, Jeff Davis?"

Int. Con.—"Yis, mars'r."

Trib. Cor.—"And he treated you with great brutality, no doubt?"

Int. Con.—"Yis, mars'r, treat me fus' rate."

Trib. Cor.—"But you want your freedom, don't you?"

Int. Con.—"O yis, mars'r."

Trib. Cor.—"How would you like to go North?"

Int. Con.—"Putty cold Norf, ain't it?"

Trib. Cor.—"O no. Ever been North?"

Int. Con.—"Yis, mars'r."

Trib. Cor.—"To what place?"

Int. Con.—"To Florider, mars'r."

Trib. Cor.—"Florida?"

Int. Con.—"Yis, mars'r."

Trib. Cor.—"Why, did Jeff Davis live in Florida?"

Int. Con.—"O yis, mars'r; he lib dar some forty, fifty year, I spec's."

The evidently untrustworthy nature of the replies of this Man and Brother began to strike the correspondent at about this juncture, and he shut up his note-book and retired.—The Savannah Republican.

AN AFFAIR ON THE AUCILLA.

(From the Tallahassee Floridian and Journal.)

Captain G. W. Scott, of the Tallahassee Guards, has reported to General Finegan the following particulars of an affair on the Aucilla. It occurred some time since, but the account has not lost its interest:—

Tallahassee.

Sir,—I have the honour to report that I left my camp, in Wakulla county, at 3 p.m., on Friday, 30th ult., with fourteen men and five days' provisions, for a scout to the East bank of the Aucilla River. At 7 p.m., on Sunday, we reached the edge of the Aucilla Swamps, when we picketed our horses, finding it impossible to take them any further. At half-past 1 a.m. Sunday, having secured a trusty guide, we entered the swamp in an old trail, with three days' provisions on our backs. Desiring to get as near the coast as possible, I made for a point about two miles from the mouth of the river, nine miles from our horses, and sixty-five from my camp, which point we reached about 7 a.m. Sunday, having waded most of the way through mud and water. When within half-a-mile of the river we saw many signs of the enemy having been there.

Leaving the squad in charge of Sergeant Lester, I proceeded with the guide and one man to make a reconnaissance of the river bank. We soon discovered smoke ahead, and after a cautious approach came on to the enemy's camping ground, which he had left but a few hours previous, as his fires were still burning; here we found wood sawn up ready to be taken aboard, Boston and New York papers dated as far back as November, and many other evidences that they had camped here for months, feeling perfectly secure, as they have since told us that they did not believe that white men could penetrate the swamp. Having brought up my men and made our camp close by, I determined to await their return. Placing my pickets half a mile below, and selecting a position in which to meet them, I gave each man his post, so that he could be into it at a moment's warning. Thus we awaited their approach until 12 o'clock Monday, when my pickets from below reported "The boats are coming." In an instant my men were at their post. Now my position was such, that if one of the boats succeeded in passing me they would cut me off, as the trail by which he entered the swamp, and which was the only way we could get out, passed close by where they cut wood, about two miles above, so I determined, as there were three boats bearing down on my little command, and had no means of knowing the number of men they contained, that justice to my men required me to make sure of the first boat, so I instructed my men at the report of my pistol to fire a volley.

Half a mile below my position the river made a curve, the wind being fair, the first boat or cutter rounded the curve and came up beautifully, her large sail hanging so low that it was impossible for me to tell how many men she had. I let her approach within twenty steps, when I rose and fired my pistol and my men their rifles. I immediately demanded a surrender—the enemy dropped to the opposite side of the boat, which threw up the side next to us, thus concealing them entirely. Four muskets were raised over the edge of the boat, one or two of which were fired without effect, (when we took them two had been discharged) my men then fired again, when I ordered them to cease firing. The boat then agreed to surrender. Two men were killed and two wounded in this boat.

Detailing Sergeant Croom and three men to take the prisoners into the swamp, I prepared to meet the other boats. Moving my men further down the river, as the next boat came up I was in position to see that she had eight men. I permitted them to come up to within twenty paces, when I stepped out on the bank and demanded an immediate surrender. The enemy dropped into the boat just as the others had done, but coming down a little too hard she went clear over, emptying men, arms, casks, and all into the river. The officer of the boat called out that he surrendered—the men, however, struck for the opposite shore, but when I ordered them to return, or I would have them shot, they all came back. The tide running out carried the casks, oars, seats, &c., of this boat down the river, so that when the third boat rounded the curve, seeing the disaster that had occurred to the others, she headed for the other shore, and thought it not prudent to come up in range of our rifles.

By this time I had a prisoner for each man I had for duty, and having nine miles of thick swamp to carry them through and but a narrow, dim trail to travel, I thought it best to save what I had and get out of the swamp before dark. Having no implements which to dig a grave, we covered the dead bodies up carefully in one of the boats and run it into a narrow creek. After securing the other boat and securing the arms, sails, oars, &c., we took up the line of march for our horses, and reached them about sunset. I immediately made an arrangement with my guide and some other citizens to return and bury the dead, and convey the boats, arms, &c., to a place of safety, all of which, I am happy to state, has been accomplished, the party reporting that the enemy had not visited the place since I left. Each boat had four muskets and each man had a revolver. The muskets of the first boat we secured, but the men dropped their revolvers overboard. The arms of the second boat were lost when she capsized, but I have made an arrangement by which I hope to secure all the arms.

The prisoners taken were, Samuel Curtis, Master and Acting Second-Lieutenant, and eleven men of United States gunboat King-Fisher, now blockading St. Mark's River. From statement of prisoners, she has 120 men, and mounts four 68-lb. guns, and one 30-lb. rifle; they have been getting their supplies of wood and water from the point at which I met them, and one of the men told me that, at one time when he was out, they shot three beavers, but did not take them aboard. I found no evidence of their having any communication with persons on shore.

I cannot close this report without mentioning the manner in which my men discharged their duties. During the five days they were not dry, but in going to and from their posts, passed through water waist deep. Then constant duty, together with the numerous insects, rendered their situation extremely unpleasant, yet they bore it all without a complaint, and when the enemy was coming down upon them with his three boats, they stood to their posts with a cool determination that evinced that the motto in each heart was "victory or death," and that they were men worthy to enjoy that liberty for which they are struggling.

I am much indebted to Mr. Jacob Chaney, a citizen of Taylor county, who guided us through the swamp, and did everything in his power for our comfort; also to his lady for her kind attention to my sick and wounded prisoners.

I am, sir, yours with respect,

GEORGE W. SCOTT,

Captain Commanding Tallahassee Guards.

Brigadier Gen. Jos. Finegan, Com'd. Dep't. E. & M., Florida.

STOKE-UPON-TRENT.

Mr. A. J. B. Beresford-Hope is a candidate for the representation of the above place in the House of Commons. In reference to the American war, this gentleman has always maintained a thoroughly consistent attitude, and from the first has denounced the conduct of the North, and clearly foresaw the impossibility and understood the iniquity of attempting to subjugate the South. Mr. Hope is a Liberal-Conservative, and, from his social position and high character, has an unmistakable claim on the suffrages of the constituents. The following is his address to the electors:—

Gentlemen,—I venture to offer myself for the representation of your borough, in succession to your late respected member Mr. Ricardo.

Connected as I am with North Staffordshire, I feel that I do not approach you as a stranger, while I can promise that if I succeed, my best exertions will never be wanting to further your interests.

I come before you as a Liberal-Conservative, untrammelled by party connections, and anxious to maintain our country prosperous at home, honoured and influential all over the world, enjoying the largest amount of freedom compatible with good government, and ready alike to repel attack or to second its just pretensions by the display of sufficient physical resources.

I shall accordingly support all measures calculated to place the national armament on a sufficient, though not extravagant, basis, convinced as I am that stinginess on this head will in the long run prove the most extravagant policy. I am also a warm supporter of that great volunteer movement, to which I am convinced that England in no little degree owes her present security.

A Churchman myself by conviction, I desire to secure to those of my fellow-citizens, whose convictions tend other ways, the same toleration which I claim for my own opinions.

I approach foreign politics with all the painful feelings produced by the sight of the growing distress in the manufacturing districts. While private and public benevolence can do much to alleviate the sufferings of our countrymen, and while British enterprize can be turned to open fresh cotton markets, it is idle to expect that trade can be fully restored until commerce is renewed with the Confederate States of America. At the same time England ought never to speak when she is not sure her voice will be respected. The time must soon come when the judgment of united Europe will ratify the independence of the Southern States. In the meanwhile it is open to us to sympathize with the gallant exertions of an unanimous people struggling for constitutional freedom against tremendous odds. It is equally open to us to deplore the unhappy infatuation which has driven the Northern Union to venture its all upon the cast for empire, misnamed liberty, and thus to risk the material ruin of both sections of the former Republic and its own moral degradation.

As to questions nearer home, it is enough to say that it is England's best interest to keep friends with France, by letting France feel that our friendship is not extorted by fear.

Trusting that this expression of my opinions will be agreeable to you, I have the honour to remain, gentlemen,

Your faithful and obedient servant,

A. J. B. BERESFORD-HOPE.

"Bohemian," the Richmond correspondent of the Mobile Register, in referring to the fight at Mechanicsville, near Richmond, says:—

The part taken by Captain Rosser, of the 2nd Company Washington Artillery, in the fight of Saturday, has won him great praise. He managed his two guns so skilfully, and brought them so beautifully from a position where all supposed him lost, that the spectators looked on in amazement. Although belonging to the Washington Artillery Battalion, he is now on detached duty, and with General Toombs. Still a young man, a West Point Cadet in the last class that graduated under the five years' regime, a brave, talented and efficient officer, Captain Rosser has gained the admiration of the whole army. Since the campaign in Virginia began, no man has seen more active service, as he has been constantly on the outposts, and with General Stuart, of the cavalry, was instrumental in holding Munson's and Mason's hills so long a time, and of waving the Confederate flag for weeks in sight of the Capitol at Washington.

He is a particular favourite with General Toombs, of whom a good story is told in connection with the fight at Mechanicsville. Seeing Rosser at a post of great danger and without adequate support, he raved about furiously and sent repeated requests to the generals to reinforce him. No attention was paid to this, until finally, when an additional battery of the enemy appeared, he sent a courier to General Magruder to say that he should lead his brigade to assist Rosser, unless other reinforcements were immediately sent. "You had better not do it without orders," was the reply. Toombs chafed under this for some time, and at last his fiery spirit could stand it no longer; it seemed certain that the brave men who were fighting would be sacrificed. His brigade was put under arms, and orders or no orders, he was just preparing to rescue his favourite, when Rosser extricated himself in the beautiful style already spoken of. Those Georgians, who are justly proud of their leader, would have fallen to a man or accomplished their object.

"SKEDADDLE."—We have received many inquiries as to the true meaning of this new vulgarianism. We have no lexicographic authorities to which to refer; but "Skedaddle," as we understand it, is a new Yankeeism, invented by them to express the difference between a regular RnR stampede and panic, and a hasty retreat in which the retreating forces are not quite frightened out of their wits.—Savannah Weekly News.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any rate, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HORTZ, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 2s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. Advertisements to be forwarded to the publisher at 102, Fleet-street.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, AUGUST 28, 1862.

The Collapse of the Federal Armies.

BEFORE we go to press it is probable that the overdue mails will arrive with some days later intelligence, but the news received from New York up to the 13th inst., though less exciting than usual, is by no means devoid of interest or instruction, for every incident is a commentary on the collapse of the Federal armies.

What has become of the 700,000 men? Or, allowing liberally for the difference of the army on paper and its actual strength, what, we ask, has become of the 600,000 men who were sent forth to conquer the South? The three principal armies are those under Generals McClellan and Pope, and the army in Tennessee. At the highest Northern estimate they do not comprise a force of 250,000. Where are the rest? Granting that 100,000 are scattered about in smaller bodies, how are we to account for the missing 250,000? Perhaps instead of 700,000 troops, the North never had more than 500,000, but the larger number have been charged in the estimates, and we are inclined to think that the actual levies have exceeded the smaller number. Assuming, however, that only half a million have been raised, we have still to account for the whereabouts of 150,000 soldiers. A portion have deserted, or, as it is called, are away from service on leave of absence. A still larger portion are in the Northern hospitals or in their homes wounded and maimed, and, no doubt, intensify the disinclination to recruit the Federal army. The largest portion have fallen in battle, or have succumbed to disease. Let any one add up the Federal losses as admitted by themselves, and let him consider the whispered reports of the numbers that have died from pestilence, and he will see that it is tolerably certain, supposing the North has not had more than half a million of soldiers, that the present effective force is far less than 350,000. If ever the truth is known, it may be found that in two campaigns the Federal losses have been not much less than 200,000 men.

The present position of the United States' armies testifies to the extent of their disasters. The grand army of the Potomac is shut up in a position from which it cannot advance, except to be driven back with loss; from which it cannot retreat, except at the hazard of being cut up by the victorious foe, and in which it cannot remain without being decimated, if not annihilated by pestilence. The rumour of the abatement of sickness in General McClellan's army, in consequence of a supply of fresh vegetables, turns out to be fallacious. There it lies in the Peninsula, assailed from day to day, and from hour to hour, by an enemy which claims more victims than cannon-ball or sword. So much for the pet army, led by the pet general of the United States.

From Pope's command we hear that typhoid fever is so prevalent that 180 cases were reported in one regiment. General Pope, too, looked upon but a few weeks since as the coming man who was to lead the troops to victory, and whose arrogant boasting that he came from the West, where he had seen only the back of the enemy, and whose sarcasm in reference to McClellan's slowness, were hailed at Washington and

New York as delightful omens, has already proved a failure. His rashness is as disastrous as the caution of General McClellan. He has been surprised by the enemy, sustained a disastrous defeat, and, together with his staff, narrowly escaped capture. We do not wonder at the angry comments of a portion of the New York press in reference to the battle near Cedar Mountain. We have now sufficient details to appreciate the importance of the Confederate victory. General Banks was driven back, with great slaughter and loss of prisoners, and instead of the Federal commander being asked by General Jackson for permission to bury the Confederate dead, the last-named general notified to General Pope that he would be allowed two days to remove his wounded and bury his dead, but that he would not be permitted to carry off any of the spoils of the field. The retreat of Banks, though it terminated the battle, did not save the Federal army from further disaster. That ever-ready commander, General Jackson, attacked his foe by night with artillery, and produced that species of panic and that kind of rout which Federals call a "skedaddle." Thus the army of the Valley of Virginia has been tried and found wanting, and instead of inspiring confidence, its future excites the liveliest apprehensions.

We have very little to say about the army in Tennessee. That State is overrun by guerillas; the Confederates are threatening the capital, and are capturing towns. Likely enough, as Mr. Chandler told the United States' Congress, General Beauregard did not evacuate Corinth until his enemy had been defeated by disease. Certain it is, the army of the West has done nothing, is doing nothing, and that the boundaries of its encampment include the area of its influence. The army led by General Halleck into Tennessee, and which was to crush out the rebellion in that and the adjoining States, seems to have melted away, or, at all events, the remnant is reduced to a condition of forced inactivity.

The Federal general has been driven out of Arkansas, and is no more spoken of. The Federal army in Missouri is not strong enough to hold the towns that the Confederates attack. The army in Kentucky cannot repress the universal manifestation of loyalty to the Southern cause, and the progress of Southern arms under the admirable direction of General Morgan. In Alabama we are only reminded of the existence of the Federal army by the atrocious brutality of its commander. South Carolina and North Carolina are all but decimated of Federal forces, which have been transferred to the Federal armies of Virginia. General Butler, of New Orleans, thinks his position insecure, and like the rest of the Northern commanders, implores his Government to send him more men. We need not extend the list of Federal failures, though many of them, such as the defeat of Secessionville, are worthy of consideration. Failure has marked every movement, and collapse, more or less complete, is the condition of the armies of the United States. We do not offer any speculation as to the future, but we may remark that 300,000 recruits will only place the Northern armies, in point of numbers, as they were before they were crippled by the casualties of battle and by pestilence.

The Federal navy, which, like the army and even more than the army, was declared to be invincible, has been equally unsuccessful. What are its triumphs? Excepting New Orleans and Memphis no important towns have been taken by its agency, and it is not able, at least in the opinion of Federal commanders, to guarantee the continued Federal occupation of those towns. But the career of the Federal navy has been singularly inglorious, not to say disgraceful. It ought to have conquered, for it was pitted against a power without a navy. Yet it was beaten by the Merrimac, and it has been beaten by the Arkansas. A portion of it is in the James River, unable to proceed to Richmond, unable to attack Fort Darling, from which it has been repulsed, and unable to protect the Federal transports from Confederate attack. At best, it has saved the routed army of the Potomac from capture, and this is its only service. Commodore Farragut could do nothing before Vicksburg, except digging a ditch eight feet wide to divert the course of the Mississippi; and, at present, so far from assuming the offensive, his object is to beat a safe retreat. The fleet before Baton Rouge has been driven away, and was, therefore, unable to prevent the Confederates taking that place. Commander Porter's fleet has returned to the James Roads, but not crowned with laurels. Charleston and Mobile have been threatened with destruction, but the threats have not been carried into effect. Yet the United States' navy, let us admit it, has done something; it has made war on unarmed merchant ships, most gallantly bullied unarmed crews, and exultingly insulted the flag of England. But these are victories which only the United States would tolerate, much less glory in.

The Undercurrents of Disunion.

WHEN the war began we were assured that it could not last. The Secessionists were but a faction at the South; the North was agreed as one man in the cause of the Union. This was then the cry of every friend of the Federal Government in America, from the Secretary of State down to the editor of the New York Herald. This cry was repeated in England by politicians and journalists, some of whom would not, and others, perhaps, could not, know any better. The fiction of Unionism at the South was soon exploded. In the autumn of last year, no one of good information and sober judgment believed in it; after the capture of New Orleans it found credence only in the official despatches of Federal generals and ministers; now, we may doubt if Mr. Seward himself, even officially, believes it. The next cry was—grant that the South is resolved, with perfect unanimity, never to re-enter the Union; the North is three times as strong in numbers, ten times as strong in available wealth and military materiel; and the North is perfectly unanimous in resolving never to consent to the dissolution of the Union. Sharpsighted observers soon began to discern that the pretence of Northern unanimity was as baseless as the former pretence of Southern divisions and dissensions; and what, three months ago, was known to close observers is now patent to the public; hardly to be mistaken by any man who ever reads a newspaper. It is not wonderful that this should be the case; it would be strange if it were otherwise. The North is fighting for empire; is waging a war of aggression for an object of gratification to the national vanity, but unnecessary to the national greatness or security; is endeavouring to conquer a foreign country in order to impose upon it systems favourable to the interest of one class or one territorial section in the North, but as detrimental to other classes and other sections as to the South itself. In a war of aggression no country ever carries with it the full sympathy of all its citizens; a mercantile, money-making, money-loving community, where capital is very scarce and human labour very valuable, always contains numerous classes averse to all wars, except wars of self-defence; and the greater the sacrifices entailed by avoidable war, the more numerous and powerful does the peace party become. Interest, sentiment, and political conscience combine to array against this war a strong and respectable, if as yet silent and uninfluential, section of the Northern people.

There is in America a lack of political courage, which always leads Englishmen, at a time when the feeling of the dominant and noisy classes sets powerfully in one direction, to underestimate the force of the counter-current. We always underrate the numbers of an American minority, because American minorities are slow to show, scarcely even venture to feel, their real strength. This is a phenomenon which, as characterizing the politics of a free country, we find it difficult to understand. Brought up in no habits of implicit deference to the will of a majority, Englishmen are never afraid to be singular in their politics. Even our most extravagant mob-worshippers—even those arch-demagogues who hold that the rabble can do no wrong—have courage to defy, if need be, not only the censures of the sober and thoughtful portion of society, but the clamour and curses of the multitude. Mr. Bright dares to withstand, at the same time, the convictions of statesmen and the passions of the people—to be sneered at in the House of Commons and pelted in the streets, as at the commencement of the Russian war—in mere vindication of his consistency to a crotchet; and nobody thinks it strange that he should do so. We admire his pluck; but we feel that there are hundreds of Englishmen as brave as he, if not in so bad a cause. But in that land which he admires, among that people which he adores, Mr. Bright would be simply an impossibility; no Northern American dares to be unpopular. And therefore, when we hear the first murmurs against a war sanctioned by popular passion, and supported with all the strength of that moral and material tyranny which is wielded by an American majority, we may be very sure that the murmurers feel that there is strength also on their side—that strength of numbers which alone gives political courage and self-confidence to the free citizens of the Great Republic.

There is anything but unanimity in the North; there is a conflict of interests, a conflict of feelings, a conflict of opinions; and if we take together those whose obvious interests, those whose political attachments, and those whose sober convictions, incline them against the war, it may be doubted whether they constitute at present a minority of the Northern people. That people is in no respect homogeneous; its different sections have varying occupations, are of different origin, and regard the present crisis from utterly distinct points of view; and the progress of events brings out their differences with daily increasing clearness, and renders it daily more difficult to avert an open rupture.

In the first place, the States of the West have nothing in common with New England, and little in common with New York and Pennsylvania. The West is agricultural; it depends on its enormous production of grain, to which its industry is almost entirely devoted; it derives from other regions everything, except the coarser kinds of food, which it requires. Not only tea and coffee, wine and spirits, spices and silks, but cotton and woollen stuffs, iron and steel, all its instruments of production, all its clothing, all its luxuries, come to it from outside its own frontiers. In this respect its position and its interests coincide with—and until recently it never forgot that they did coincide with—the position and the interests of the South. The Eastern States are mercantile and manufacturing communities. Even the great State of New York is not an agricultural country; that is to say, it consumes more of bread-stuffs and other agricultural produce than it can raise. The States of the Atlantic seaboard north of Mason's and Dixon's line produce generally less food than they consume; they are fed from without. They received their supply of grain from the West, and from the South, until the war cut off the latter source of supply. They produce far more cotton and other manufactured stuffs, hardware, and so forth, than they require, and with these they must buy their food. In order to make their own commodities as dear and those of their sister States as cheap as possible, in order to buy in the cheapest and sell in the dearest market, they imposed heavy restrictions, by means of navigation laws (for they are the shipowners of America), on the export of Southern and Western produce, and heavy duties on the import from foreign countries of those cheaper manufactures which, in the Western and Southern markets, would have lowered the price of their own. The South emancipated itself by secession from a commercial slavery which extorted from it an indirect tribute of about ten millions sterling per annum; advantage was instantly taken of that secession to double the weight of the chains imposed on Western commerce, and the amount of the tribute extorted from Western industry. The first use made of their advantage by the Eastern States was the passage of the Morrill Tariff.

The interests of the West and the South were identical; the Abolition agitation has been skilfully used for years past to divide them. The Western men care nothing for the negro; free or slave, they will not have him on Western soil. As a free man, he lowers the rate of wages when he is willing to work, and when he is not, he supports himself by theft. As a slave, his labour has been made competitor with theirs for the possession of territories. Hence the antagonism of the West to slavery; arising, first, as the treatment of the free negro proves, from hatred of negro competition for land or for wages, but aggravated, no doubt, by that European antipathy to the institution brought in by the new settlers who flocked from England, Ireland, and, above all, from Germany, to the Far West. Therefore, at the beginning of this contest, the sturdy Western people readily took up arms for Fremont and Abolition, to conquer, to revolutionize, and, perhaps, to despoil the South. But they are beginning to understand that, in regard to Abolition, they have been cheated; that the South will not be conquered; and that the prolongation of the war, the infamous tariffs, which can only subsist while Southern ports are blockaded, and the interruption of trade along the Mississippi, are ruinous to Western interests. They are beginning to comprehend that they are fighting to rivet their own chains and mutilate their own prosperity. And it leaks out, in spite of the vigilant censorship of Mr. Seward, even in the press of the Eastern States, that the West is growing tired of a war waged on such terms, and will not much longer lavish those lives which are its best wealth in the service of ungrateful and treacherous associates. The bugbear of a possible closure of the Mississippi by the Confederates has vanished on reflection. The farmers of Illinois and Iowa are now aware that this great natural highway, closed by war, will certainly be reopened by peace; and peace they evidently begin to desire.

Even in the East, many of those who had much to lose are beginning to count up their losses, and to weary of them. They see that conquest is impossible; they see that they can never regain their monopoly of Southern trade; and they are asking themselves—for as yet they dare not ask the Government—whether it be well to throw away all that remains to them in the desperate endeavour to recover that which is irretrievably lost.

To the dissensions caused by divided interests, we must add those which arise from the divisions of political party, smothered but not stifled by war and tyranny. The Democratic party still exists, is still numerous, still counts in its ranks the majority of thoughtful and moderate politicians, still influences the great States of the West, still predominates in the Empire City. Mr. Lincoln, it must be remembered, was the elect of a party, not of the nation. Had the Democrats remained united in 1860, it is not probable that he would have had a majority in the North, and he would not have been President. But the Democrats split, and the result was that, with a very strong Northern party against him, the Republican candidate had every Northern vote, but three, in the Electoral College. It must not be imagined that in losing the South the Democratic party has been extinguished. Even in Congress it is still formidable; in the country it is scarcely a minority. The Democrats, at first, were for the most part in favour of the war. It was for their party interest to reclaim six millions and a-half of Southern Democrats for the Union; it was in accordance with their political convictions that every effort and every sacrifice should be made to maintain or to restore the Union. On the Union and the Constitution the Democratic party had always taken its stand; in the name of the Union it had demanded and extorted sacrifices and compromises from the South, and overawed the clamorous Disunionists of New England. For the Union it was willing to spend freely and fight fiercely; and therefore at the commencement of the war—while as yet it seemed that reunion might be possible, while as yet the war was waged in the name of the Constitution, while as yet Abolitionism was discouraged and Emancipation unnamed in the Cabinet—the Democratic party gave its cordial and energetic support to the Government. But it never entertained that ferocious and cowardly hatred of the South—that diabolical malignity towards Southern women and children—which characterizes the Republicans. It had no desire to reduce the Border States to a desert, and to hound on negro incendiaries to burn the cities which the Federal army could not reach. It desired no tampering with the Constitution, no violation of Federal law, no invasion of the rights of the individual States. The devastation of Virginia, the enslavement of Maryland, the infamous crimes of Butler, Mitchell, and Andrew Johnson, were outrages on the principles and feelings of the Democratic party. Mr. Lincoln's absurd scheme of gradual emancipation and wholesale transportation, and the abolition of slavery in the district of Columbia, were felt by that party as wrongs and insults to itself. Thereafter the Democrats ceased to be supporters of the Government; and when it became manifest that the South was unanimous in secession, and that reunion was utterly impossible; when this change in the conditions of the contest was practically recognized by the conduct of the Federal Government and of the Federal armies; when the war became a war of pillage, devastation, and murder—in a word, a war of vengeance—then the Democratic party remembered that all its old ties of friendship and fellowship, all its political and personal connections, were with the South. It realized the fact that it was fighting side by side with its inveterate antagonists, not for the restoration of the cherished Union, but for the destruction of its ancient and faithful allies; that it was serving not under the banner of constitutional law, but under that of illegal tyranny; not to repair a breach that never could be healed, but to waste the property of the friends whose support had made it strong, and to hang, if they could be caught, the leaders whom it had trusted and admired. With such objects as these the Democrats have no sympathy; in such a conflict their good wishes cannot be with the aggressor; and, therefore, nothing but the terrorism of the Government and its mob supporters prevents the Democrats from rising in violent opposition to the war.

The foreign element in the population of the North was at first, for different reasons, no more opposed to the war than the Democratic party. The emigrants are mostly Abolitionists, and the Abolitionist leaders promised them a war against slavery. The Irish are always ready to fight; the Germans were ready to enlist for ninety days of war, with a vast prospect of pay, plunder, and promotion. But the former have been disgusted with bad leadership, with hardships, illusage, and starvation; with the insolence of civilian officers, and the cowardice of a citizen soldiery. They have had enough of swamp water and hard biscuits; of Butler, Banks, and Sickles; of Pennsylvania and Wisconsin comrades, who throw down their arms at the first fire. The Germans find that pay is irregular, plunder perilous in presence of a superior cavalry, and promotion not to be hoped for; that they have to serve, without fame or favour, under native American commanders, and for purely American objects. And neither soldiers nor civilians of foreign race are willing to make enormous exertions and painful sacrifices to restore a Union or maintain a Constitution for which they feel no peculiar affection. They came to America hoping to find security, prosperity, freedom, and no fiscal burdens; they find order and industry ruined, and are subjected to inquisitorial tyranny and grinding taxation. No wonder that they are heartily weary of the war.

The preposterous Tax Bill, the terrible conscription, are daily making thousands of converts to the cause of peace. The Western States, threatened with imposts on every occupation and on every article of consumption—with heavy pecuniary burdens which they cannot afford to meet—utter murmurs ominous of angry and effectual resistance. The quiet citizens of the North, threatened with forcible enlistment in the ranks of armies rapidly wasting away in unhealthy garrisons, or pestilential swamps—and driven back from the seaports and the frontiers, at every attempt to escape, to the recruiting office—are beginning to ask why, if these things are to be endured from Mr. Seward, they should not prefer the dominion of Mr. Davis. They may reasonably ask if it be worth their while to bear these things, in the vain hope of imposing a similar tyranny upon the South. Already the Northern Government exists only by force, and carries on the war with resources only to be obtained by military tyranny; and if the people of the North summon up courage to resist that tyranny, the Government and the war must cease together.

The Justice and Duty of Reprisals.

FORBEARANCE is not always a virtue. When it is so extended as to give impunity to vice it becomes a crime. A criminal code that slurs over wrongdoing, or a lax administration of justice, is injurious to the community, and encourages and fosters the disposition to transgress the law. Mercy to the criminal does not consist in suffering his evil deeds to go unpunished, but rather in prompt and sufficient punishment. This principle, thoroughly understood and acted on in civil affairs, is applicable to a state of warfare. It has been agreed by all civilized nations that the horrors of war should not be unnecessarily intensified. Instead of following the savage custom of murdering captives in cool blood, or even of selling them for slaves, their lives are considered sacred, and at a fitting time they are restored to their country. So far has this been carried that they have as little restraint as is consistent with safety, are often permitted to go at large on parole, or they are exchanged at the earliest opportunity. It is considered disgraceful to make war on women and children, and so before the bombardment of a town notice is given that the women and children may depart. When a country is occupied it is the business of the commander to see that private property is respected, and particularly, to protect the persons of the civil inhabitants.

In the last great European war outlying pickets were forbidden to fire into each other, because the slaying of a few picket soldiers does not, in any way, decide the contest, and is, therefore, a useless expenditure of blood. But it sometimes happens that civilized nations are obliged to act contrary to these and other humane provisions, that rob war of much of its bitterness, and which prevents it from degenerating into mere savage ferocity. In India, for example, we executed the Sepey prisoners by blowing them from the mouths of cannon, on account of their diabolical treatment of women and children. In China we have been reluctantly compelled to retaliate on the Chinese for their barbarity, for we had no other means of checking it. Not that Englishmen in either case changed their nature and became savages, but their severity was the reply to the brutality of their enemies, and did not proceed from a mere spirit of vengeance, but was looked upon as a simple and bounden duty. No one who considers the question can fail, we think, to recognize the paramount obligation of reprisals, and assuredly no one can deny that the acts of the United States call loudly for retribution and punishment. We regret unfeignedly the necessity for Southern reprisals, but as there is the necessity, we rejoice that the Confederate Government has determined to avenge outraged humanity.

Some persons may be of opinion that the declaration of reprisals should have been made months ago, and that even now it is too merciful in its tone, but no man can pretend the declaration is made too soon, or that it is too stern, and, at the same time, Europe must admire the generous hesitation of the Confederate Government in punishing the extreme barbarity of the United States.

On the part of the Southerners there would have been some excuse for eager and almost unscrupulous vengeance. They only ask of the North to be let alone, and the North replies by invading their country and desolating their homes. Yet, so devoid of offence has been their conduct that calumny has been almost hushed, and the partisans of the North have been obliged to repeat ad nauseam the old story about the Confederates scalping and boning their enemies, and making drinking-cups of Federal skulls, and children's toys of Federal back-bones. When the provocation is allowed for, it is impossible to help a feeling of surprise at Southern forbearance. The name of Butler has been heard above the din of battle, and doubtless the remembrance of his rule in New Orleans has nerved many an arm with giant strength, but the fight being over, the prisoners and the wounded received the most humane treatment.

What a contrast is presented by the conduct of the North! How have the Federals treated those whom, with bitter mockery, they choose to designate their fellow-citizens? We do not intend to recite all the authenticated crimes of the Northern soldiery, or even to dilate on a few of the most conspicuous. We shall not dwell on the murder of a civilian on his way home from church, without trial or provocation, in the presence of his wife and children; or upon the murder, at the same time and place, of a boy fifteen years old. We shall not note the violations of the sanctity of the flag of truce. We shall not notice the attempt to introduce pestilence into a Confederate army. Even the action of Turchin, in Alabama, when he gave up defenceless schoolgirls to his licentious soldiery, and sanctioned inexpressible and devilish brutality—even the act of General Mitchell, in approving such conduct, will not be the subject of our remark. We shall content ourselves with citing deeds that have been approved by the Government of Washington; and they are sufficiently numerous and gross to justify the loud cry of indignation that has been raised in Europe, and the unanimous condemnation of the North, as unspeakably degraded, brutal, and savage.

General Butler has made his name historical. The murder of Mr. Mumford might have been forgotten. His suppression of the liberty of the press—and we learn by late advices that he finds it necessary to suppress the paper edited by his own creatures—would, in a month or so, have passed into oblivion; his notoriety evoked by bullying foreign nations through their representatives might not have endured. But the name of Butler will be remembered in connection with his infamous order about the ladies of New Orleans. That proceeding was denounced as execrable by the British Parliament, and by the press and people of Europe, but it has been approved by the people, press, and Government of the North.

The ravings of New York, the savage demand for the blood of the South, the proposal to exterminate the Southerners, if possible, by a servile war, are not offences against the Government of Richmond; but we submit that the late war-meeting at Washington, owing to the presence and participation of Mr. Lincoln, and the character of the resolutions passed, was an offence to the people of the Confederate States, as represented by their constituted authorities. The United States have been obliged to formally renounce the "rebellion" sham by signing a cartel for the exchange of prisoners. Yet the President of the United States approves, by his presence, of a resolution passed by a mob-meeting, condemning the leading Southerners to death, and their property to confiscation. With just as much right the President of the Confederate States might assent to a resolution decreeing a sentence of confiscation and death against Mr. Lincoln, his civil coadjutors, and the officers of the United States' army and navy.

But the Confederate Government has not thought proper to notice any but official and avowed violations of the laws of civilized warfare. President Davis, in his letter to General Lee, states the reasons that have induced him to issue an order for reprisals. On July 23 was signed a cartel for the exchange of prisoners, by which it was stipulated that all prisoners hereafter taken shall be discharged on parole until exchanged. The prisoners in the hands of the Confederates exceeded by some thousands those in the hands of the Federals. On the same day that the cartel was signed, the Federal Secretary of War published an order to the commanders of the United States to seize the private property of the peaceful inhabitants of the South for the use of their armies, without compensation. That is, Mr. Stanton, on behalf of the United States' Government, recognized plundering as a duty of United States' commanders. We need not remark that it is totally opposed to the practice of civilized warfare to plunder the peaceable inhabitants of the enemy's country. When a country is the seat of war the peaceable inhabitants suffer, because the commanders are not able to keep the soldiers in perfect discipline, though they do their best by punishing theft by death. But to directly encourage plunder is an unparalleled enormity.

The day after the cartel was signed, and it is evident that the arrangement for the exchange of prisoners was to be the signal for an outburst of savageness, General Pope who has distinguished himself by allowing his soldiers to rob the people of the Virginia Valley without let or hindrance, and, indeed, by his express command, published an order for the murder of suspected persons as spies, though, as President Davis observes, "found quietly tilling their farms in his rear—even outside of his lines:" and General Steinwahr, under his command, seized upon some of the inhabitants and kept them as hostages to be slaughtered, if any of his soldiers were killed by some unknown persons, whom he calls "bushwhackers." These orders place the lives of the peaceable inhabitants at the disposal of General Pope's soldiers. Now, it is contrary to the usage of civilized warfare to treat people as spies without convincing evidence that they are spies, and that they are, or have been lately, occupied in that capacity, and it is clear that an army is bound to look after its own security, and not murder civilians because it cannot protect itself against small bands of the enemy. It would be a waste of space to further illustrate the United States' transgression of the laws of civilized warfare.

The reprisals of President Davis are merciful as well as just. He perceives the trick of the cartel, but he will not, until all other means are exhausted, infringe on its humane provisions. He does not demand an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth. If there were produced a score of Butlers, Mitchells, and Turchins, the women and schoolgirls of the North would be in no danger of retribution. This is, of course, small consolation to those who can treat women as Butler, Mitchell, and Turchin have done, and who care much less for their countrywomen than they do for themselves. At present reprisals are limited to the officers in General Pope's command, though, if that should prove an ineffectual check, a more general retribution will become indispensable. Notice of the reprisals is given to the United States Government, so that by countermanding General Pope's orders the affair may be adjusted. It will be remembered that at the outset of the war it was said that Confederate sailors were to be treated as pirates; and that a threat of reprisals deterred the North from executing its barbarous purpose; and we should not be surprised if President Davis's determined action does put a stop to the outrages it denounces. If not, its rigid fulfilment cannot fail to have a salutary effect. Nothing checks savage ferocity but the fear of punishment, and the civilized world cannot but applaud President Davis for adopting the only possible means of terminating a state of affairs disgraceful to humanity. We doubt not our readers will agree with us that further forbearance on the part of the Confederate Government would have been a crime.

Federal and Confederate Resources.

POLITICAL Economy leads us to compare the resources of nations, or organized communities, to those of individuals; and it is on this principle that the great bankers of the world scrutinize closely the natural advantages, the character of the population, the debt and general standing of the Governments for whom they negotiate loans. The United States of America have never been, properly speaking, a nation; the Constitution, their articles of co-partnership or bond of Union, was a mere league or treaty between the States for mutual protection, postal arrangements, coinage of money, and free trade with each other. The practical recognition of the individuality of the States, however, has been confined to their respective inhabitants, the people of other nations having regarded them as a whole; but now that a separation has taken place, it becomes necessary to analyze the strength and position of the several members of the late political firm. The North, up to the present time, has continued business at the old stand, under the same name, and, therefore, retains in a measure the credit that has been formerly lavished upon the united concern. Upon the basis of this prestige it boasts of its resources as being without limit, and in every way superior to the South. It can easily be shown that such is not the case. The tendency to centralization of financial power in the North began in the year 1816, when a system of high duties on foreign merchandize was adopted in order to pay off the indebtedness incurred in carrying on the second war with Great Britain; this had the effect of fostering manufactures in the New England States, whose people ever afterwards claimed protection from the Government in the shape of exorbitant tariffs against the wishes of their neighbours of the South, who contended that a tax on importations could only be levied for purposes of revenue. The monopoly of the money affairs of the country was further increased by the advent of the steamships Sirius and Great Western at New York in 1838, which commenced that commercial revolution that finally caused the city to be the great financial entrepôt for the entire Union, by reason of its becoming the stopping place for the foreign bankers. Up to that period the transactions in exchange on London were conducted solely to balance the imports and exports; the regularity of steam communication put another face on matters, and the capitalists of Europe found profitable employment for their money in Wall-street, lending it to their correspondents there, with the same freedom, and certainty of time in getting it back, as they would to their customers at home. Hence New York, for a number of years past, has had a floating indebtedness to Europe of $200,000,000, for which she has paid only 4 per cent., reloading the amount to the West and the South at double that rate of interest, thereby commanding the business of those two sections, and reaping a harvest of hundreds of millions of dollars. New York had gained a step in the same direction some years previously by the construction of the Erie Canal, which gave her water communication with the lakes, and attracted the trade of the West at the expense of the other Atlantic cities, who were too slow in the prosecution of their plans of internal improvements. The failure of the Bank of the United States was also a benefit to New York, as that misfortune caused Philadelphia to cease being the financial centre, and, at the same time, took away her commerce with India and China, which had been conducted through credits issued by that institution. Charleston, too, that for more than half a century had been the great port for trade with France, was obliged to yield to her Northern rival; and finally, the whole country became tributary to the commercial emporium. The sun of Wall-street lent its rays to the surrounding States, drawing the moisture of wealth from the other portions of the Union, and the fortunes thus made have been invested in real estate in large cities, manufacturing establishments in small towns, railways, and other fixed properties, that must necessarily become valueless by the loss of connection with the South; and which, if appearances indicate correctly, will be followed by that of the West. As we remarked in our last number, "these two sections have not been pampered up by the false principles of Protection; they have depended on their natural resources, and never sought artificial aid; they, therefore, will be unharmed by the dissolution of the Union; while their old co-partners, who have so stupidly disregarded the teachings of Adam Smith, will be ruined." The heavy tolls that they have been subjected to by the Northern States have necessitated them, in a degree, to assume the position of dependencies.

It is idle for the people of the North to assert that their late co-partners of the South have been indolent and careless of progress. In the cultivation of cotton, rice, tobacco, naval stores, and other products suited to their soil and climate, they have exhibited an enterprize unexampled in the history of the world, without contending against the laws of nature. The same may be said of the West in the growth of cereals and raising of animals. The North, both in food and clothing material, has not sufficient for its own consumption, and will be "poor indeed" when the transformation scene now taking place reaches its culminating point.

Though we may admire Republican institutions, as they were inaugurated by Washington, Jefferson, Franklin, Hamilton, and the other illustrious founders of the Revolution, and as they have ever been carried out by the people of the Southern States of America, we must, nevertheless, candidly admit that our Transatlantic cousins progressed as rapidly and prospered as much under the Colonial Government as they did the first thirty-five years after their independence. Does not Australia advance as quickly as California? It is a mistake to suppose that the "Union" has done such wonders. It no doubt has benefited the North to the injury of the South, and the whole civilized world is now praising the Confederates for their noble effort to throw off the commercial and political shackles placed upon them by the domineering power of the Federalists.

It is well known that the American States in no manner began to develop themselves until the cotton crop grew to be of importance to England, France, and Germany, and the great staple became the king of commerce. This fact gave the United States a financial credit with European nations that they otherwise would not have had, and has been the true lever of their prosperity, enabling them to construct railways, canals, and engage in those various enterprizes, both public and private, which have made them alike the wonder and the admiration of the world. The cities of New York, Philadelphia, and Boston, having been established as commercial places, became the bankers and commission merchants for the South; and consequently they increased in population and in wealth with almost mushroom growth; manufactories of every nature and kind were erected in the Northern States, principally to supply the Southern States, now containing twelve millions of inhabitants. The mines of Pennsylvania were opened to meet the demand for coal and iron. Imports were made through New York to supply the South and the West with the fabrics of Europe, as well as to furnish the large Northern communities employed as bankers, brokers, merchants, artisans, manufacturers, and mechanics, who were receiving every year increased employment from their Southern neighbours.

So dependent has the North been upon the South, that the ships built in the New England States have been constructed, for the most part, out of timber cut from the forests of Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, and Florida, while their freights have been derived principally from carrying the raw material outward and northward, and the manufactured articles homeward and southward. The exports of the South have paid for eight-tenths of the imports into the Northern cities. The South has purchased freely of Northern imports and manufactures; has patronized Northern hotels and watering places, and has sent her children to Northern colleges and schools. But the schism that has been created will naturally change the order of things. Ships will be built in the Southern States, where there is timber and iron in abundance; manufactories will spring up south of Mason and Dixon's line, where there is the very finest water power, and where coarse fabrics can be made just as cheap as in Massachusetts. Imports direct from Europe will go on in an extended scale, as Free Trade is a cardinal principle with the Southerners. Colleges will be multiplied in Norfolk, Charleston, and other cities. The climate of the South, moreover, is so diversified that it will grow as much corn and feed as many animals as required, without interfering with the production of cotton, rice, and tobacco; Virginia, indeed, having always been a large exporter of wheat and vegetables to the Northern States.

The South has long felt that she was being drained of her earnings by the grasping conduct of the North; but it is always difficult, without a political change, to alter the current of commercial transactions. The establishment of the Confederate Government will enable its citizens to engage in transactions with other countries, without being subjected to an onerous system of high tariffs or extra commissions to the North. Although the cotton crop of the Confederate States has never exceeded 4,700,000 bales, it is estimated that the production the first year after peace is restored will amount to 6,000,000 bales; the natural increase in the number of slaves, as well as the few sent from the Border States to the Cotton States proper, in consequence of the pending conflict, warrants this conclusion. At this stage it is not easy to say what point in the Confederacy will become the financial centre; the laws of trade will soon, however, decide the locality for a Southern Wall or Lombard-street. The North had an advantage in early intelligence from this side of the Atlantic; but the establishment of telegraphic communication has brought the South equally near to Europe for all mercantile purposes.

Rebellion, or War: the Consequences of a Misnomer.

No nation engaged in a great war ever yet behaved towards its enemy and towards foreign States as the Northern people and Government have behaved for the last eighteen months. No belligerent ever yet dreamed of treating as inferiors—as scarcely entitled to the laws and usages of war—an army and a people whose equality had been proved in a series of severe battles, almost all of them ending in his own signal discomfiture. No country, already obliged by the quarrel actually on its hands to send into the field in one year above a twentieth part of its whole male population, ever dreamed of insulting foreign Powers, and doing its best to provoke a quarrel with the world in arms. Yet the North has done both these things. It has assumed to treat as subjects the citizens of the South, who were never at any time its subjects; it has plundered their territory in violation of the usages of war, and shot and hanged them, as if it possessed over them a jurisdiction which, while the Union subsisted, the Federal Government never dared to claim. And, while its whole available force is required to carry on, with no sensible success, the one quarrel already on its hands, it seems anxious to provoke a war with England, and by no means solicitous to avoid a war with France. If we were not aware of the profundity of American ignorance, we should be penetrated with admiration of American pluck; but as it is, we believe that the North is but dimly conscious that it could not endure a European war, and almost entirely unconscious that only the most untroubled patience and forbearance on the part of England has prevented a declaration of war at any moment during the last twelve months. We believe that the Northern people do not know, and that the Northern Government scarcely understands, that it has given us a hundred such causes of war as would have provoked us to draw the sword against France or Russia. The North utterly misconceives its own position and its own behaviour; it takes liberties alike with the laws of war and the law of nations; not only because it habitually disregards all law, human and divine, but because it has hardly yet realized the fact that the laws of war and the rights of neutral Powers have any bearing on the contest in which it is at present engaged.

The Government and the people alike set out with the idea that they were going to put down an insurrection, or rather, to quell a riot. Mr. Lincoln spoke and acted as the Sheriff of Lancashire would speak and act if an Irish mob got for a day or two the upper hand in Liverpool; he proclaimed the fact of a riot, and called out a sort of posse comitatus to quell it. And this view has influenced throughout the conduct as well as the language of the Northern press, people, army, and Government. One by one, belligerent rights have been conceded to the South. The right of hanging prisoners as rebels, before it had been exercised, was practically disposed of by the defeat of Manassas Junction. The pretension to treat Southern privateers as pirates was abandoned when Mr. Lincoln was compelled, by the threat of reprisals, to give up legal proceedings against the crew of the Savannah. The status of Southern officers and soldiers has been acknowledged by the regular negotiation of a cartel of exchange; but still Northern generals affect to treat the citizens of a Confederate State as rebels; still Mr. Seward absurdly calls Confederate men-of-war "pirates;" still the North does not seem fully to realize the fact that it is at war. As concerns the belligerents, their treatment of one another is a matter which they may be left to settle between themselves. But Mr. Lincoln proposed at first to exert his right of "crushing rebellion" in a way that would have brought him into immediate collision with neutral Powers; he pretended, under an Act of Congress passed for that purpose, a right to close the ports of the South by mere proclamation, or to levy customs duties on vessels going in and out, by means of war-ships stationed outside; and it became necessary that foreign Powers should inform him that they would not tolerate such an assumption of authority by the Federal Government in respect to ports which, to whomsoever they might belong de jure, were practically in possession of a Government, or quasi-Government, at war with that of the United States. Without abandoning the pretension, the President wisely forbore to act upon it, and the neutral Powers were satisfied.

Still persisting in their resolution to regard one of the greatest and bitterest wars of modern history as a mere riot, and an army of nearly half a million as "an assemblage of disorderly persons," the Northern people were naturally very indignant at the recognition by England and France of the belligerent character of the Confederacy. Furiously they protested that there was no war; that there could, would, and should be no war; that 600,000 men, drilled, armed, regimented as soldiers, and subject to martial law, were only 'a number of special constables sent South to keep the peace, and protect the law-loving, Union-abiding citizens of the Southern States. Mr. Seward had said all this in his despatches, and had threatened, if any foreign Power dared to declare that the Federal Government was making war on the South, he would undecieve such Power by making war upon it in serious earnest. But neither the bluster of the Minister, nor the ravings of the press of America, could alter the fact, or affect the determination of the neutral Powers; and by degrees, as Mr. Seward learned something of public law from diplomatic controversies, and as the necessities of war compelled the North to have recourse to regular warlike operations, they learned how much they had gained by a declaration which, in their own despite, conferred on them the rights and powers of belligerents.

But while they have eagerly accepted those rights, and exercised those powers, they have failed to fulfil those correlative duties which a belligerent's position imposes on him in presence of the flag of a neutral State; they still cling to their first notion of treating the whole war as an affair of police, and cling to it in their dealings with neutrals, even when they have abandoned every one of its consequences in their dealings with the Southern forces. Had Captain Craven succeeded in capturing the Nashville, he knew that his Government must treat her crew as prisoners of war; yet he reviled us for harbouring a "pirate," and waxed furious when we enforced our intention of placing exactly on an equal footing the men-of-war of two Powers with whom we desired to remain on terms of equal amity. Had America been at war with France, the Tuscany would never have pretended a right to watch a French ship in an English port, or attack her in English waters. Nor, in the case of a war with Great Britain, would the captain of the Iroquois have found fault with hospitalities accorded by French and Spanish colonies to a British cruiser, as he found fault with the reception of the Sumter. The outrage on the rights of Morocco, in the capture of Confederate citizens on her soil, was a consequence of the same inveterate determination to usurp the rights but not observe the duties of a belligerent character. Nay, the crowning insult offered to Great Britain in the seizure of Mason and Slidell arose out of the same temper. Put aside Captain Wilkes's astounding ignorance of public law, and his wonderful nonsense about incarnate despatches, does any one suppose that he would have dared to seize those gentlemen if he could not have pretended to call them rebels? Had they been Mexicans proceeding during the Mexican war from one neutral port to another, would any American captain have thought of seizing them under the British flag? In these cases, as in many others, this very disposition to deny their own position as belligerents has led the Northern Government and its officers to strain in a most violent manner the rights which belligerents claim as against neutrals in time of war upon the seas—rights to which, except as belligerents, they would have no claim whatever.

As belligerents, they are entitled to blockade the enemy's ports, and to intercept his supplies of all goods contraband of war; and, moreover, as not being bound by the Treaty of Paris, we cannot deny, though their own jurists deny it, their right to capture the enemy's goods under our flag. In order to enforce these rights, they have a further right, strictly analogous to a policeman's authority to apprehend suspicious characters—the right of search; that is to say, they are entitled to stop any vessel carrying—first—goods the property of an enemy; second—goods contraband of war, if the vessel be bound to an enemy's port; thirdly—goods of whatever kind, bound for a blockaded port. If the vessel contain no enemy's goods, and be not bound for an enemy's port, whatever she may contain, and whatever may be the destination of her cargo, the belligerent cruiser has no right to detain her for an hour. These rights can only be exercised on the high seas, or within the jurisdiction of the belligerent. Within three marine miles from a neutral shore, the neutral vessel is neutral territory, and the cruiser that attempts to overhaul her is guilty of exactly the same offence as an army which carries on operations on neutral ground; that is to say, of an act of war against the neutral Power. And further, the right of search and detention must not be vexatiously exercised. It is just ground of complaint if the cruiser detain and search a vessel not suspected of having enemy's goods on board, and obviously bound for a neutral port. It is ground for heavy damages if a cruiser detain and carry into port a vessel not in strict law amenable to capture; and in innumerable instances British prize courts have awarded to American vessels, busily engaged in contraband trade, heavy damages against British officers whose zeal to apprehend the offender has led them beyond the letter of the law.

How have the Americans used their privileges as belligerents? They have from the first blockaded, or held under nominal blockade, the ports of the South. As it is only an effective blockade that gives the right of capture, and as their blockade was at first notoriously ineffective, every British ship seized by their squadrons off those ports, if not carrying contraband of war, ought to have been restored, with compensation. Not one vessel was so restored.

As the blockade became more efficient, Nassau, in the British island of New Providence, was made the entrepôt of an active contraband trade. Arms, ammunition, &c., were sent from England to Nassau—an innocent voyage, for there can be no contraband of war between neutral ports. With this voyage the United States' cruisers had no right whatever to interfere; but these arms and stores were destined to be shipped to Southern ports on the first convenient opportunity; and any vessel caught on this voyage is clearly liable to capture, as carrying contraband of war to an enemy's port, whether blockaded or not. The Federal cruisers, acting under orders from the same Secretary of the Navy who approved the outrage on the Trent, have blockaded the port of Nassau. This, if not an act of hostility, is clearly an act of international discourtesy, of which our Government was entitled to complain. It was passed over. The Federal cruisers boarded, searched, and often captured vessels leaving Nassau, in the exercise of their rights; but as the vessels engaged in the contraband trade always watched their opportunity, this was not enough; and so the Federal ships—in violation of law—took to searching and capturing vessels entering the port of Nassau. Such vessels, trading between two neutral ports, are exempt from capture, except in the case of having enemy's goods on board, which renders them liable to be detained for trial and condemnation of the goods. Such vessels, therefore, ought in no case to have been condemned, and never should have been detained, except when enemy's goods were found on board; but, as a matter of fact, they have been searched not for enemy's goods, but for arms; these being found, they have been carried into United States' ports, and there—without regard to the fact that they were engaged in a strictly lawful voyage—they have either been condemned or released without compensation.

British shipowners have protested without effect; they have complained to the British Secretary for Foreign Affairs; and Lord Russell, with strange misapprehension of the facts, or, still stranger indifference to the honour of his country, replied that if the United States would not permit them to carry on this perfectly lawful trade between Liverpool and Nassau they had better abstain from it. Such advice might be worthy of the Government of Holland or Portugal—might be wise in a weaker Power, compelled to yield to superior force—but it comes with very ill grace from the Minister of the first of Maritime Powers. However, as no redress for their wrongs was to be obtained through the Foreign Office, the British shipowners had to choose between trusting to the speed of their vessels, and abandoning all trade with Nassau, for with all trade to that port do the Federal cruisers interfere. Almost before they had time to ponder and decide upon the course to be taken news arrived from the Bahamas, which put the question in a new light.

The British steamer, Adela, carrying mails from Bermuda and Liverpool, left the former port for Nassau on July 4. On the 7th she was within a marine league of the Abaco Lighthouse, a point of British territory, and therefore within British jurisdiction. She was chased by a large vessel, which fired two shells into her, but showed no colours, and was, therefore, presumably a pirate. The Adela hoisted the English flag; the stranger hoisted the Stars and Stripes, and fired three more shells in quick succession into the unarmed and unoffending merchantman. The latter then stopped, and was boarded by a boat from the United States' frigate Quaker City, which carried her into Key West for adjudication, refusing even to give up the mail-bags.

The British steamer Herald, steering for Nassau, was chased within British waters by the United States' steamer Adirondac, which fired shot and shell into her. The Herald held on her way, and entered Nassau in safety. The captain of the British man-of-war Greyhound protested. The captain of the Adirondac maintained his right to chase and fire on British vessels in British waters, and by such defence admitted the fact of having done so, which he has since denied.

Again, is it not plain that this is not the conduct of belligerents—that the Government which gives orders to its cruisers to act in this matter is treating British merchants and shipowners, not as neutrals in war but as accomplices in rebellion?

In both cases the Federal cruiser committed piracy, by firing on a merchant vessel without making her any signal, by blank gun, to bring-to, and in one case without showing her colours. In both cases the offence was committed within British jurisdiction, and was exactly of the same nature as if the Tuscarora were to attempt to cut out the Emily St. Pierre in the port of Liverpool. In both cases the Americans were guilty of an attempt to murder, for which our Government is entitled under treaty to demand their surrender, to try them, and to punish them according to our municipal law. In neither case, fortunately—as the captain of Her Britannic Majesty's ship Petrel remarked—was murder actually committed. But if any seamen had been killed by the shot or shell of the American ships, murder it would have been, and murder committed “against the peace” of the Queen of England. If subsequently taken within reach of British law, the officers and crew of the Adirondac or the Quaker City would have been amenable to our laws for the punishment of wilful murder.

In order that murder may not be committed, it behoves our Government to demand the immediate withdrawal of the Federal squadron from the Bahamas. It is their duty, also, to exact ample reparation for past offences, and ample security against their repetition. If they fail to do this, they will be answerable for the consequences; first, for the murder of British seamen by pirates sailing under the flag of the United States, and secondly, for the war by which that murder will certainly be avenged.

A Very Verracious Story.

LET no man who desires to seem grave attempt to read the following paragraph except when he is alone. It is taken from the leading columns of a London daily newspaper. We are not joking. The story, as we give it, was published in the Daily News of yesterday, being a part of its first leader. We should not refuse to recognize merit. We grant the imagination of our contemporary—who has told more than once the story of Federal skulls being used for drinking cups, and Federal back-bones for children's toys—is nasty, decidedly nasty, but it really is powerful. The Daily News thus writes:—

Among European Savans the name of M. Honzeau is well known. He is a Belgian, who happened to be in Texas when the present war broke out. All last year he was prevented from escaping; the Confederates were afraid of what he might tell if they let him go; and when he did find means to fly it was only to Matamoros, in Mexico. He left his house empty; mere bare walls, he says, with the ashes of his burnt papers for the only contents. He dared not carry with him the notes he had made of his residence in Texas. One paper, however, he did carry, though if it had been found it would have caused him to be hanged on the next tree. The Unionist citizens of San Antonio entrusted him with a memorial to President Lincoln. He rolled up the manuscript, and carried it in the barrel of his rifle till he found means to transmit it to Washington. These facts are related by M. Honzeau himself, in two letters to the Independence Belge, which appeared there on the 6th of last month. The arrival of these letters in the Northern States has evidently intensified the rising excitement there on the Negro Enlistment question, as may, indeed, well be. In them M. Honzeau tells some things that he has seen since the Confederates have felt the pressure of the war, and have understood how desperate their condition is becoming. He has seen—not in a single instance, but as a regular procedure in certain neighbourhoods—the burning of the slaves together with the cotton and plantation stores. We will say no more than that the whole property was collected for destruction, in the alarm of the Yankees coming, after the fall of New Orleans; the negroes were called into the workshops and storehouses, locked in, and burnt with the rest of the property—the whites surrounding the buildings to prevent escapes. The witness's remark is one which may be of use to us, as well as to the Northern citizens, who have at length thus received some information from the far South:—“This revolution will in time be regarded as the great feature of modern history, not only because it hastens the freeing of American slaves, but because it furnishes the most wonderful example of social monomania—a furious monomania contracted under the prolonged influence of the very spirit of despotism and pride.

We beg our readers not to spoil their enjoyment of the fun by being critical. The idea of the illustrious Savan being kept twelve months in Texas and then having to escape via Mexico—seeing that a host of people have been allowed to leave Texas in the interim—is absurd; but let it pass. The picture of the bare walls of his house, and the ashes of the notes of his residence in Texas, is a pretty flight of post-prandial fancy. One paper he did take away, which, if it had been found, “would have caused him to be hanged on the next tree.” He rolled up the precious manuscript and put it “in the barrel of his rifle.” What a comfort the gun did not go off! A common-place, matter-of-fact person might ask, why on earth the Savan did not carry the tale in his head instead of his rifle, and so avoid risk of his life; but we protest against any such questioning. Our contemporary does not address matter-of-fact people; and, besides, the manuscript in the gun-barrel is a telling part of the romance. Then comes the great sensation. The Savan has seen—it is evident, though a prisoner, he was not confined,—“he has seen, not in a single instance, but as a regular procedure in certain neighbourhoods,” the cow jump over the moon, and “the burning of the slaves together with cotton and plantation stores.” The description is very graphic, the negroes were huddled into the workshops and storehouses, locked in and then burnt, whilst the whites remained outside preventing the egress of their slaves, and enjoying the perfume of the burning flesh. The Savan has not quite finished the narrative. After the negroes were thoroughly baked, and done to a turn, the whites regaled themselves upon the cooked carcasses of their slaves. The Savan has tasted negro flesh, not in a single instance, but as a regular procedure in certain neighbourhoods. In order that the luscious feast might be complete, phlebotomy was performed upon female slaves, and the cooked flesh was washed down by copious draughts of negro blood. The Savan has tasted this delicious drink, not in a single instance, but as a regular part of the diet in certain neighbourhoods. The Savan brought away a portion of the cooked negro-flesh concealed in his left eye, and we are happy to say he sees none the worse for it. We congratulate M. Honzeau at his escape from the cannibals, which, if his body bears any resemblance to his imagination, is easily accounted for; and we bid him beware of our contemporary, who, since he can swallow his story, might feel inclined to taste his flesh, for we have seen, not in a single instance, but as a regular procedure in certain neighbourhoods, Savans cruelly roasted by their editorial friends.

Reviews.

THE PORT AND TRADE OF LONDON.*

A FOREIGNER who thinks he can see London in a week or a month is deceived. He may traverse the great thoroughfares, but by so doing he will get a very inadequate conception of the districts that lie on either side of them. Even the Londoner is by no means familiar with London. There are important streets, huge suburbs, and densely-populated quarters of which he has hardly so much as a passing knowledge. The stranger is impressed with the interminable streets and motley crowds, and with the difficulty of being “anybody” in Modern Babylon, yet he feels unable to grasp the idea of what London is. He can only view it in parts, and cannot weld the parts together. But if the sojourner would pass his time on the Thames, on the wharves, in the docks, in the dock vaults with their countless miles of railroad, and in the great storehouses brimful of merchandize, he would have a more vivid appreciation of the vast city than many intelligent cockneys have who were cradled within hearing of the chimes of Bow bells, and who have never left the place of their birth except to eat shrimps at Gravesend, or to pass a week at that salubrious but unsightly watering-place, Margate. The commerce of London is at once the expression and the cause of the vastness of the metropolis. Without it nearly three millions of people could not exist huddled together on the same spot; with it, one understands how the multitude is attracted, and why the metropolis is so large compared to the country. Still we must not forget that the port of London does not stand alone. There are other important depots in the United Kingdom, notably Liverpool, the worthy peer of London, and into which is poured a large portion of the riches of the New World. England is not only the mother of the Anglo-Saxon race, but the old country is the commercial metropolis of the empires conquered by the energy of her offspring.

Mr. Capper commences his history of the commerce of London from the time of the Romans, and we regret that the historical part of the work is so contracted that the subject is disposed of with a brevity that leaves much unwritten that, if it had been written, would have been read with profit. It would be instructive to watch the slow development of the infant commerce, for slow, very slow, was the early growth of our trade. Even before the Roman Conquest trade had been carried on with Britain. Alfred is reported to have done all he could to foster commercial enterprise, and from the first the people manifested considerable aptitude for barter and money getting. Still England was looked upon by foreigners, even to the reign of the Tudors, as doomed to comparative poverty; a very good breeding ground for soldiers to fight the battles of warlike French Kings, but no one had the least suspicion that she could and would become commercially great. Yet the individual merchant, at an early period, became very powerful. Our author tells us how

John Mercer, a merchant of Perth, who traded with France, when returning home from that country in 1377, was driven by stress of weather on the coast of England, and was seized and confined in the castle of Scarborough, until an order from court effected his discharge. His son, to avenge the injury, collected a fleet of Scotch, French, and Spanish vessels, with which he cruised before Scarborough, and made many captures. At this time the navy of England would appear to have been very deficient; and the Duke of Lancaster, who governed England in the minority of his nephew, appears to have been unable to attack Mercer's fleet. Therefore, John Philpot, an opulent citizen and alderman of London, took upon himself to collect vessels in the Thames, to arm them with a thousand men, and send them to sea in search of Mercer, whom they took, together with his prizes and fifteen vessels, his consorts, all richly loaded. By this enterprize, Philpot got much envy and ill-will amongst the nobles and military men of the kingdom, and he was called and questioned on the subject in the King's Council; but he obtained much applause from his fellow-citizens, who elected him Lord Mayor at the next election.

During the reign of Elizabeth English commerce advanced considerably, and this was due, in the first place, to the removal of the prohibition upon the importation and exportation of merchandize in foreign ships; that is to say, the freedom enjoyed by trade enabled it to take advantage of a conjunction of fortunate circumstances.

The voyages of Drake, Frobisher, Raleigh, and the other sea-kings of the Elizabethan era, fostered a spirit of enterprize, as well as enlarged the trading area. But the event which had, at that period, the most direct bearing on the growth of English commerce was the Spanish war in the Netherlands. The manufacturing industry of the oppressed, yet struggling country, was expatriated, and “about a third part of the merchants and manufacturers who wrought and dealt in silks, damasks, taffeties, bareges, serges, &c., settled in England.” Queen Elizabeth was ceaseless in her endeavours to promote commerce, and her endeavours were singularly successful. She granted letters patent for the establishment of the Company of Levant Merchants; and articles of peace were signed with Algiers, Tunis, and Tripoli. Under her auspices was founded the mighty corporation of the Honourable East India Company.

James was not less favourable to peaceful pursuits, and to him belongs the glory of laying the foundation of English-American colonization. It is recorded in a private letter of that period, that—

Our Iceland fishery employs 120 ships and barks of our own.

And our Newfoundland fishery, 150 small ships. And our Greenland whale fishery, fourteen ships. As for the Bermudas, we know not what they will do; and for Virginia, we know not what to do with it, the present profit of these two colonies not employing any store of shipping.

To-day, the paralysis of the commerce of the then new-born nation, and which was then so commercially inferior to Iceland and Greenland, has crippled the great industry of Europe, and pauperized her artisans.

In 1623, the exports of all England were £2,320,436; the total imports, £2,619,315. We shall not attempt to follow Mr. Capper in his survey of the progress of our commerce until the £5,000,000 of exports and imports in 1623 had increased to £375,000,000 in 1860. But the increase from 1800 to 1860 is still more striking. In 177 years, that is, from 1623 to the first year of the nineteenth century, our trade had increased from £5,000,000 to £73,000,000. But during the next sixty years, it advanced from £73,000,000 to £750,000,000. It is the fashion with some politicians to talk about the wars of England as mistakes, and her profuse expenditure as money wasted, but if she had not maintained her independence and asserted her maritime supremacy, her trade would not have attained such enormous proportions. Spain fought for the subjugation of the Netherlands, and the cost of that war ruined her; England fought for liberty and for her interests, and her expenditure was a profitable investment.

* The Port and Trade of London: Historical, Statistical, Local, and General. By CHARLES CAPPER, Manager of the Victoria (London) Docks. London: Smith, Elder, and Co.

The legal port of London extends from London Bridge to the North Foreland. The five docks have a water area of 272½ acres; and the warehouse, vault, and shed accommodation is 106,039,358 cubic feet, and this does not include the warehouses in town belonging to the docks. There are also bonded and other warehouses of considerable extent. In 1860, the shipping of the port of London was 2943 vessels of 919,591 tons burden. The number of vessels employed in the trade of the port is not represented by the shipping belonging to it. In 1860 there were :—

ENTERED INWARDS:—
	No.	Tonnage.
British Sailing Vessels	19,990	3,371,681
" Steam Vessels	4,676	1,610,083
Foreign Sailing Vessels.....	4,414	1,011,319
" Steam Vessels	462	142,888
Total.....	29,542	6,135,971

ENTERED OUTWARDS:—
	No.	Tonnage.
British Sailing Vessels	9,394	1,302,355
" Steam Vessels	3,475	1,086,133
Foreign Sailing Vessels.....	3,852	848,589
" Steam Vessels	438	134,639
Total.....	17,159	3,371,637

The progressive increase of steam vessels belonging to the United Kingdom has been very rapid, as may be seen from the following table :—

Vessels.	Tons.
1814	59
1829	3,018
1830	30,009
1840	87,539
1849	158,729
1860	454,327

After giving an account of the Port of London as to its extent and adaptation to the requirements of commerce, Mr. Capper summarizes the foreign commerce. With regard to the United States, Liverpool has such a lion's share of the trade, that he treats it in the aggregate. In 1860, the amount of our trade with the United States was,—

Imports	£44,724,312
Exports	22,907,681
Total	£67,631,993

In that year the importation was,—

Of cotton.....	£30,069,306
Of tobacco	1,181,182
Total	£31,250,488

These were the chief but not the only articles of Southern produce. Mr. Capper observes :—

Of the great import trade from the United States, the bulk was raw cotton, which we imported to the amount of no less than thirty millions of money. This enormous quantity of produce was chiefly received from the Southern States, the shipping ports being New Orleans, Mobile, and Charleston; whilst, on the other hand, the great bulk of our exports of manufactured goods was to the Northern States, which diffused them through the Union by means of coasting craft and railways.

This well-known fact cannot be too often repeated or too much studied. Not only will the independence of the South, by breaking up the monopoly of the Northern manufacturers, increase our exports to America, but by sending our exports direct to Southern ports the cost of the transit via the North will be avoided, and the saving will be shared between the English manufacturer and the Southern consumer. It is only the bare truth to say that, next to the Southern States, England will derive the greatest advantage from their independence.

Mr. Capper's book is not only worthy of careful perusal, but it is invaluable as a work of reference. We trust the author will receive so much richly-merited encouragement as to induce him to continue his useful labours, and to supplement the present volume by a more elaborate treatise on those points he has not fully dwelt upon, and on those cognate questions which he has altogether omitted. But those who read "The Port and Trade of London," will be more surprised at its comparative completeness, than inclined to canvass its deficiencies.

A VOICE FROM PENNSYLVANIA.

Lord Adolphus Vane Tempest, M.P., has favoured us with the following letter which he has received from America :—

Philadelphia, July 29.

My Lord,—You cannot conceive with what a thrill of pleasure thousands upon thousands look upon any proceeding in Parliament, or elsewhere, tending to peace in this distracted country; for although there seems an outward unanimity in favour of the war at the North, it is only because of the complete suppression of freedom of speech and the press. Not a word can be uttered even to a few friends, not a public meeting held, not a step taken in favour of peace. It is Austria or Russia over again. From a careful observation, we may fairly assert that at least one-third of our reflecting people, perhaps one-half, would vote for a peaceful separation, North and South, if they had the opportunity. But we can perceive no such opening, at least outwardly. The defeat of the North at Richmond has made the Southern Confederacy more confident and resolute, and the North professes its intention of persevering to the end, and has called for its 300,000 new recruits, one-third of which it may perhaps obtain. But when we consider the little progress actually made by the Government, and at what a stupendous cost of life and money, and that its only success has been owing to its command of the water by its fleets, it can scarcely be doubted that a mediation on the part of England or France would be accepted. And so little independence is there left in the community, that what the Government would accept, the mass of people would, like a flock of sheep, hasten to sanction, as in the Trent case. It has been stated by the Government organs, that the original number of 700,000 men called out, had been reduced to about 300,000 before the late battle at Richmond, by the casualties of war, sickness, and desertion; and at that battle, from comparing the accounts of both sides, the Northern loss in killed, wounded, and prisoners has not been less than 25,000 men, besides a loss of army supplies to the value of about $3,000,000.

It is said that one-third of the troops are now sick and useless, and, of course, regiments of new recruits would not only be useless without discipline, but mere food for the sickness of the country at this hot season. Moreover, the tidings of death, sickness, and wounds, have reached every town and village in the land, and the spirit of voluntary enlistment is far different from its zeal of last year, when young men considered the war as a mere holiday frolic, and when the fighting element was generally absorbed. We may say, with certainty, that not over one-third of the new call will be answered. In the next place, there seems no other mode of continuing the Government, but by a steady issue of paper currency; the result of which all past experience has shown us. The last downward step is substituting postage stamps for silver, for all sums under one dollar. It is said that about $80,000,000 will be required for this purpose. The present estimate is, that were the war now concluded, $1,000,000,000 would not cover the whole debt already incurred; and when we come to bounties payable at the end of service, half-pay and pension, the result almost defies calculation. Then we have such a system of internal taxation as was, perhaps, never known in any country, and a new Tariff Act which would have disgraced a monarchy of the last century. Indeed, not only the present, but prospective, difficulties of the Government are so great, that we may justly infer that it would accept mediation if offered. The Emancipation party now sees very clearly that the war is for the restoration of the Union, with slavery secure as before, and, but for being kept down by the bayonet, it would give the Administration a deal of trouble. But it dares not organize, hold any public meetings, or take any steps in opposition. This party would, no doubt, hail a mediation.

And what sympathy can England possibly have with the North? She is at war to restore slavery; she has passed a prohibitory tariff; she has destroyed all liberty within herself; she has always bullied, and continues to bully, England, notwithstanding the wonderful and magnanimous neutrality of the latter. Nor is it an unfair inference that it is malice towards England, by depriving her of cotton as much as any desire to coerce the South, that leads to the blockade of her ports.

Let us see if England can have any sympathy with the North on the score of patriotism in this contest. The real motives of the war were three. Firstly, the enjoyment of what is called "the spoils," or plunder of the public purse, common to all parties, but immensely increased by war expenditures. Secondly, the firm establishment of the "Protective system," by an immense national debt and consequent taxation. Thirdly, the retention of slavery in the Union. It needs no acute observer to have perceived that the North has realized a large proportion of its wealth and prosperity by slave-labour. It was the factor of, and controlled the labour and supplies of, four millions of slaves, and thereby added ship to ship, warehouse to warehouse, spindle to spindle. In fact, while the South had the shell, the North had the kernel of the nut. The latter saw at once the loss of this stupendous profit, if the Southern Confederacy succeeded, and placed itself under the control of any foreign Power; it deemed a war for the recovery of the Union with slavery far preferable. But too wary to state its motives, it raised the cry of Union, Constitution, Patriotism, and thus awoke the naturally excitable temperament of the people to a state of madness. Now, in view of this trinity of selfish motives, can England sympathize with the North in instituting this horrible war, and thus violating the very basis of the Government as laid down in the Declaration of Independence—"the consent of the governed?"

Nor among the conceded rights of the free sovereign States to the general Government, was that of withdrawal, and the Constitution declares that all powers not expressly conceded are retained by the States. Hence, the right of secession is, at least, a doubtful one, calling especially for measures of compromise, or peaceable separation, instead of war, on the part of the North.

The madness of this latter step is apparent, for even success is only conquering and holding by the bayonet certain subdued provinces, as in the case of Poland or Hungary; the foundation principle of the Union is utterly lost—"the consent of the governed." On the other hand, the sympathy of England ought to be, as it ever has been, with the brave and resolute weaker party. Her interests are stupendously involved in a separation; the supply of the whole South, and much of the North under a low tariff; the obtaining the crops of the former on her own terms, and a share in the coasting trade; the employment of her thousands of starving operatives at home; and, above all, subserving the true interests of humanity, civilization and religion, and even those of our Northern States themselves, hugging their chains and approving their tyrant.

Propter causas vivendi perdere vitam.

Only to Europe, then, do we peace-men look for an early settlement of this horrible contest. One of whom, a native American, of six generations, subscribe himself,
Your Lordship's most obedient servant,
A SEPTUAGENARIAN.

THE CONFEDERATE CONSCRIPTION.

Below we give the text of the Conscription Act passed by the Confederate Congress, which came into effect on May 17, 1862. The object of the Bill, as appeared by the debate at the time of its passage, was for the purpose of giving the Executive authority to systematize and apportion the levies in the several States, districts, counties, and parishes. The eagerness of the people to enlist in defence of their homes and country, was depopulating whole neighbourhoods, and rendered such an Act indispensable.

A BILL TO BE ENTITLED "AN ACT TO FURTHER PROVIDE FOR THE PUBLIC DEFENCE."

Sec. 1. The Congress of the Confederate States of America do enact, That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to call out and place in the military service of the Confederate States, for three years, unless the war shall have been sooner ended, all white men who are residents of the Confederate States, between the ages of eighteen and thirty-five years at the time the call or calls may be made, who are not legally exempted from military service. All of the persons aforesaid who are not now in the armies of the Confederacy, and whose term of service will expire before the end of the war, shall be continued in service for three years from the date of their original enlistment, unless the war shall have been sooner ended: Provided, however, That all such companies, battalions, and regiments, whose terms of original enlistment was for twelve months, shall have the right, within forty days, on a day to be fixed by the commander of the brigade, to re-organize said companies, battalions, and regiments, by electing their officers, which they had a right heretofore to elect, who shall be commissioned by the President: Provided, further, That furloughs not exceeding sixty days, with transportation home and back, shall be granted to all those retained in the service by the provisions of this act beyond the period of their original enlistment, and who have heretofore not received furloughs under the provisions of an act entitled "An Act providing for the granting of bounty and furloughs to privates and non-commissioned officers in the Provisional Army," approved 11th December, Eighteen hundred and sixty-one, said furloughs to be granted at such times and in such numbers as the Secretary of War may deem most compatible with the public interest; and Provided, further, That in lieu of a furlough, the commutation value in money of the transportation herein-above granted shall be paid to such private, musician, or non-commissioned officer who may elect to receive it at such time as the furlough would otherwise be granted; Provided, further, That all persons under the age of eighteen years, or over the age of thirty-five years, who are now enrolled in the military service of the Confederate States, in the regiments, battalions, and companies hereafter to be organized, shall be required to remain in their respective companies, battalions, and regiments for ninety days, unless their places can sooner be supplied by other recruits not now in the service, who are between the ages of eighteen and thirty-five years, and all laws and parts of laws providing for the enlistment of volunteers and the organization thereof into companies, squadrons, battalions, or regiments, shall be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Sec. 2. Be it further enacted, That such companies, squadrons, battalions, or regiments organized, or in process of organization by authority from the Secretary of War, as may be within thirty days from the passage of this act so far completed as to have the whole number of men requisite for organization actually enrolled, not embracing in said organization any persons now in service, shall be mustered into the service of the Confederate States as part of the land forces of the same, to be received in that arm of the service in which they are authorized to organize, and shall elect their company, battalion, and regimental officers.

Sec. 3. Be it further enacted, That for the enrollment of all persons comprehended within the provisions of this act, who are not already in service in the armies of the Confederate States, it shall be lawful for the President, with the consent of the Governors of the respective States, to employ State officers, and, on failure to obtain such consent, he shall employ Confederate officers, charged with the duty of making such enrollment in accordance with rules and regulations to be prescribed by him.

Sec. 4. Be it further enacted, That persons enrolled under the provisions of the preceding section, shall be assigned by the Secretary of War to the different companies now in service, until each company is filled to its maximum number, and the persons so enrolled shall be assigned to companies from the States from which they respectively come.

Sec. 5. Be it further enacted, That all seamen and ordinary seamen in the land forces of the Confederate States, enrolled under the provisions of this act, may, on application of the Secretary of the Navy, be transferred from the land forces to the naval service.

Sec. 6. Be it further enacted, That in all cases where a State may not have in the army a number of regiments, battalions, squadrons, or companies sufficient to absorb the number of persons subject to military service under this act, belonging to such State, then the residue or excess thereof shall be kept as a reserve, under such regulations as may be established by the Secretary of War, and that at stated periods of not greater than three months details, determined by lot, shall be made from said reserve, so that each company shall, as nearly as practicable, be kept full. Provided, That the persons held in reserve may remain at home until called into service by the President. Provided also, That during their stay at home they shall not receive pay. Provided further, That the persons comprehended in this act shall not be subject to the rules and articles of war until mustered into the actual service of the Confederate States, except that said persons when enrolled and liable to duty, if they shall willfully refuse to obey said call, each of them shall be held to be a deserter, and punished as such under said articles. Provided further, That whenever, in the opinion of the President, the exigencies of the public service may require it, he shall be authorized to call into actual service the entire reserve, or so much as may be necessary, not previously assigned to different companies in service under provision of section four of this act; said reserve shall be organized under such rules as the Secretary of War may adopt. Provided, The company, battalion, and regimental officers shall be elected by the troops composing the same. Provided the troops raised in any one State shall not be combined in regimental, battalion, squadron, or company organization with troops raised in any other States.

Sec. 7. Be it further enacted, That all soldiers now serving in the army or mustered in the military service of the Confederate States, or enrolled in said service under the authorizations heretofore issued by the Secretary of War, and who are continued in the service by virtue of this act, who have not received the bounty of fifty dollars allowed by existing laws, shall be entitled to receive said bounty.

Sec. 8. Be it further enacted, That each man who may hereafter be mustered into the service, and who shall arm himself with a musket, shot, gun, rifle or carbine, accepted as an efficient weapon, shall be paid the value thereof, to be ascertained by the mustering officer, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, if he is willing to sell the same, and if he is not, then he shall be entitled to receive one dollar a month for the use of said received and approved musket, rifle, shot-gun, or carbine.

Sec. 9. Be it further enacted, That persons not liable for duty may be received as substitutes for those who are, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

Sec. 10. Be it further enacted, That all vacancies shall be filled by the President from the company, battalion, squadron or regiment in which such vacancies shall occur, by promotion according to seniority, except in cases of disability or other incompetency; Provided, however, That the President may, when in his opinion it may be proper, fill such vacancy or vacancies by the promotion of any officer or officers, or private or privates, from such company, battalion, squadron or regiment, who shall have been distinguished in the service by the exhibition of valour and skill, and that whenever a vacancy shall occur in the lowest grade of the commissioned officer of a company, said vacancy shall be filled by election: Provided, That all appointments made by the President shall be by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Sec. 11. Be it further enacted, That the provisions of the first section of this act relating to the election of officers shall apply to those regiments, battalions or squadrons which are composed of twelve months' and war companies combined in the same organization, without regard to the manner in which the officers thereof were originally appointed.

Sec. 12. Be it further enacted, That each company of infantry shall consist of one hundred and twenty-five rank and file; each company of field artillery of one hundred and fifty rank and file, and each company of cavalry of eighty rank and file.

Sec. 13. Be it further enacted, That all persons subject to enrollment who are now in the service, under the provisions of this act, shall be permitted previous to such enrollment to volunteer in companies now in the service.

I.—ORGANIZATION OF TROOPS—ELECTION, APPOINTMENT, AND RANK OF OFFICERS.

1. Volunteers tendering themselves directly to the Confederate Government for three years, or the war, may be accepted, either singly or in companies, battalions or regiments, organized by the election of their officers. When the officers have been elected, vacancies are filled by promotion within the same company, battalion or regiment, except in the lowest grade of company officers, which is filled by election.

2. When troops have been raised by the several States for the Confederate service, all appointments thereto, except staff appointments, are made and commissions issued by the State authorities under their own laws. Such troops must be organized, in all other respects, as herein provided, and are considered as in the Confederate service from the date of their transfer, during the term of their enlistment.

3. A regiment is composed by law of ten companies, neither more nor less, which must all be of one arm. A battalion cannot be accepted as such with less than five companies, and is entitled to but one field officer, unless the number of companies exceeds five.

4. A company must consist, if infantry, of at least sixty-four privates; if cavalry, of at least sixty; if artillery (unless otherwise expressly authorized), of at least seventy, in addition to all officers. Companies now in service, whether for twelve months or for the war, may be filled up under the recruiting regulations; but no company shall contain more than 125 rank and file. The muster rolls of companies stand as the evidence of the rank of their officers until commissions are issued.

5. Officers hold rank from the date of the muster or acceptance of their respective commands into the service of the Confederate States, or, when appointed by the President, from the date of their appointment.

The officers of the regimental staff—assistant quartermaster and commissary, surgeon, assistant surgeon, chaplain, and (when not already a lieutenant of the regiment) the adjutant, and the officers of the general staff—are always appointed by the President, through this department. The recommendation of the commanding officer is respected in making these appointments.

A battalion is entitled to no adjutant except from among the lieutenants thereof; and only to one assistant quartermaster or commissary, and to one medical officer.

Except staff appointments, upon the recommendation of the commanding officer upon whose staff the vacancy exists, no appointments are now made from civil life.

II.—TERMS OF ACCEPTANCE—ARMS AND EQUIPMENTS.

6. No troops, other than twelve months' volunteers, re-enlisting for two years, will be accepted for less than three years or the war, except for local or special service.

7. All troops will be armed and equipped before being ordered into the field; or their arms and equipments will be paid for, if required, upon inspection and valuation by the proper officers.

8. No horses are furnished to cavalry; but forty cents per day are paid for the use and risk of horses, and those killed in battle are paid for.

9. Batteries with equipments complete, including horses, will be furnished to all light artillery companies, in the order of their acceptance, or will be paid for at valuation, if furnished by the companies. Companies may be accepted as heavy artillery, when required to man stationary batteries; but no companies re-enlisting from other arms of the service will be accepted as light artillery unless specially recommended by superior officers.

10. No troops will be accepted for local service, unless required by the officer commanding the district in question, and then only as prescribed by the act of Congress, receiving pay, subsistence, &c., only while in actual service.

Except under this act, no troops will be accepted with any condition as to where they will serve.

III.—ENLISTMENT AND MUSTER INTO SERVICE—PAY, BOUNTY, ETC.

11. Troops thus organized and inspected are mustered into service by officers designed for that purpose, and are considered as in service and entitled to pay and allowances from the date of their muster; or when previously accepted and placed under orders by authority of this department, from the date of such acceptance, which should then be indicated on the muster rolls by the mustering officer.

Where men have been sworn into service, and accepted upon inspection prior to such organization, their pay and allowances will begin from the date thereof, which should also be noted upon the muster rolls.

After troops have been mustered, the muster rolls should be forwarded at once to the adjutant general, and the mustering officer is authorized to call upon quartermasters and commissaries for their due supplies, transportation, &c., until they are otherwise provided for. No commissions will be issued until the muster rolls are received.

12. Twelve months' men re-enlisting under the regulations for two years or the war may be mustered into service in companies, battalions, or regiments, as soon as the organization thereof is agreed upon; and their period of enlistment and the rank of their officers elected will date from such muster. But the re-organization cannot take effect, nor pay begin under such muster, until the period prescribed by the regulations.

New volunteers enlisting for three years or the war may be received into such re-enlisted companies, or may form companies with re-enlisted men, which may be mustered during their furlough, such muster and reorganization to take effect as above provided.

13. Volunteers or recruits enlisting for three years or the war will receive a bounty of $50, payable as soon as they are sworn into service and accepted upon inspection by a medical officer, together with transportation and subsistence from the time and place of enlistment, until inspected and mustered.

Persons authorized to receive enlistments may order the men enlisted to rendezvous at an appointed time and may make requisition for their subsistence there until fully organized; but volunteers enlisted by officers commissioned in advance by the President are not entitled to any allowance until organized into companies.

14. The right to receive recruits for three years or the war, to the number of 125 rank and file, has been extended, by acts of Congress, to companies now in service for twelve months, as well as to re-enlisted companies, and to all companies now in service for the war.

The regulations in regard to recruiting (General Orders, No. 6), and the regulations in regard to re-enlistment (General Orders, No. 1), and all the blank forms necessary for recruiting and mustering into service, may be obtained from the adjutant-general.

IV.—SUPPLIES AND ALLOWANCES.

15. All equipments, transportation, clothing, subsistence, &c., or commutation therefor, are furnished to troops in service by the proper officers, in conformity with regulations, and no person, not expressly commissioned for the purpose, can be authorized to make any purchase or contracts whatsoever for the government.

16. Contributions of clothing, or other stores for soldiers, hospitals, &c., will be transmitted free of charge, if delivered properly addressed to any officer of the quartermaster's department. Agents of States in charge of such articles will be allowed free transportation from their homes to the place of their destination and back.

Commutation is allowed the soldier for clothing, at the rate of $25 for six months.

V.—FURLOUNDS, DISCHARGES, RESIGNATIONS, ETC.

17.—Applications for furloughs must be addressed to commanding officers.

No discharge will be granted except in case of physical disability, certified by a medical officer, unless a substitute be furnished for the war, in conformity with the regulations.

No resignation will be considered unless forwarded by commanding officers, nor accepted unless for satisfactory reasons stated.

18. All communications from persons in the service must be transmitted through the office of the adjutant-general, and all communications from subordinates must be duly forwarded through their commanding officer, or they will not be considered.

NOTE.—All communications from camps should contain, in addition to the specifications of the regiment, the name of the post office to which answer should be addressed.

INCIDENTS OF THE OCCUPATION OF MEMPHIS.—A gentleman who left Memphis about the time of its occupation by the enemy, furnishes us with some interesting incidents, which we append:—"When the Federals ascended to the roof of the post-office, for the purpose of hoisting the Stars and Stripes, the cheers, groans, yells, and hisses, of the inhabitants made the place a pandemonium, and some one in the crowd fired a pistol shot, which shattered the bricks on the cornice, barely missing the officer on the roof. A citizen slipped quietly up to the trap-door and locked it inside, and the Federals were prisoners. Word was sent to the Commodore, and he threatened to shell the town in twenty minutes if they were not released. The threat had its effect, and the Mayor took occasion to inform the Commodore that he was not responsible for the 'indignity.'—A Confederate flag was discovered on the bluff, flaunting in full sight of the Yankee squadron. The Commodore ordered it down. It wouldn't come. It was nailed to the masthead. A detachment was sent up with axes to cut down the pole. Again ensued a scene of angry commotion. The crowd surrounded the mast, and swore that the first man who touched it would be killed. Some of the Conservatives in the throng, because they counselled moderation, were set upon by the newboys and whipped. Several knock-downs took place. The detachment found it impossible to stem the current. Word was sent to the colonel of the regiment at the foot of the bluff, and four companies were despatched to cut down the Southern flag, which was done amid the groans and hisses of the crowd. Quiet was now again restored, and nothing more ensued during the day or night to disturb it.—Mobile Register.

THREE HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF SETTLEMENT OF CAROLINA—JUNE, 1562.

(From the Charleston Courier.)

At any other period so important an anniversary as the completion of the three hundredth year since the planting of the first European colony on the shores of Carolina, and the erection of the first fortification on the Atlantic coast of North America, could not pass unnoticed by some signal commemoration; but we are now engaged rather in acting history than in recalling it. But even at this crisis, amid the din of arms, and during the impending conflict, it may not be uninteresting to go back 300 years, to the landing of Ribaut at Port Royal, in June, 1562.

The reign of Charles IX of France is memorable for the long struggle between the Huguenots and the adherents of the Church of Rome, a struggle embittered by the fires of religious animosity, and carried on with varying fortunes until it culminated in the massacre of St. Bartholomew. The Lord Admiral de Castillon, better known to us as Admiral Coligny, had been enabled hitherto to maintain the cause of the Huguenots, but he saw evident symptoms of renewed conflicts, which might eventuate in their destruction. Taking advantage of the disposition of the times to carry on explorations and found settlements in America, he conceived the project of establishing a Transatlantic colony, which might serve as a place of refuge for his co-religionists, in case of disaster.

With this view, an expedition had been sent to South America, which, through the treachery of its leaders, had failed to accomplish its purposes. On February 18, 1562, another expedition set sail from France, under the command of Captain Jean Ribaut, an officer of much distinction and merit. This expedition consisted of two vessels only, but embraced many persons of gentle birth, and reputation. Among these was René de Laudaniere, who afterwards was the commander of Port Caroline, and to whom we are indebted for an account of the expedition. Ribaut arrived on the coast of Florida, near St. Augustine, in the month of April, discovered the entrance of the river St. John's on May 1, and from that circumstance gave it the name of the River May. He planted a stone column on shore graven with the arms of France, and performed the ceremonies of taking formal possession of the country. Coasting to the North, he discovered the rivers along the coast of Georgia, and gave them, from some fancied similarity, the names of the principal rivers of France, the Saône, the Loire, &c. After passing the Savannah, called by him the Gironde, a storm arose, during which the pinnaces sought shelter in the harbour of Port Royal, where they were in a day or two joined by the larger vessels.

The French were struck with the extent and beauty of the harbour, "which, because of the fairness and largeness thereof, were named Port Royal, for the depth is such, namely, when the sea beginneth to flow, that the greatest ships of France—yea, the Argosies of Venice, may enter in there"—says Laudaniere. The precise date of Ribaut's arrival at Port Royal is not known, but it was probably about the 1st of June, 1562, as he arrived in France, on his return voyage on July 2. Several days were spent by Ribaut in exploring the rivers emptying into the bay, and in further examination of the coast. There was, at that time, a generally entertained theory that some connection by water could be discovered by which access might be attained to the Pacific, or at all events, into the interior of Mexico. The river Jordan was the name attributed to this fabulous river, and Ribaut, from the size and depth of the entrance of Port Royal, concluded that he had discovered the famous river or stream which connected with it.

A column of stone, engraved with the arms of France, was erected a few days after their arrival upon a small island within the harbour. A plate in "DeBry's Florida," represents the location of this column, but as the column itself has never been found, its precise position cannot now with entire certainty be ascertained. Ribaut, after considerable exploration of the country, determined to plant a colony there. The position selected by him for the erection of a fort was upon an island, upon the banks of a creek, and as the garrison was to consist of but twenty-six men, the fort was made only sixteen fathoms in length and thirteen in breadth. The exact location of this fort, which they named Charles Fort, has been the subject of considerable discussion. The researches of late years have now established it with tolerable certainty, but I have not space here to refer to them.

The new Charles Fort being sufficiently completed for occupation, Captain Albert, with a garrison of twenty-five men, provisioned, and supplied with ammunition, were placed within it, and Ribaut prepared to further explore the coast, prior to his return to France, but soon turning his prow homeward, he reached the shores of France on July 20, 1562. The little garrison he left to occupy the country (which in his parting address to them he called New France), laboured assiduously to strengthen their defences, and encountered no great difficulties, until they found their store of provisions running short, which forced them to seek help of their Indian neighbours. To this was added the misfortune of the destruction of their fort by fire. With the assistance of their Indian friends, this was reconstructed in the short space of twelve hours. The scarcity of provisions increased, and with the want of food, came harshness and tyranny in their leader, and discontent and mutiny with his followers, which resulted in the execution of one of his men by the captain, and in his own assassination afterwards. Captain Albert having been killed, they chose Nicolas Barré as their chief, and the promised succour from France never having reached them, they determined to build a small vessel and return to their native country. With great difficulty, they succeeded in constructing a small pinnace, and with a scanty store of provisions, embarked for France, where they eventually arrived, after suffering great hardships, being picked up by an English vessel, when they were on the eve of perishing from hunger and thirst.

Such is a brief outline of the planting of the Huguenot colony, at Port Royal, 300 years since. The entertaining pages of W. Gilmore Simms, in the "Lily and Totem," invest with romantic interest the sojourn of Captain Albert and his followers on the coast of Carolina, while the reader will find in the dignified and accurate work of Professor Rivers the interesting historical facts connected with this expedition—as, if inclined to antiquarian research, in the ponderous folios of Hakluyt and the quaintly illustrated work of De Bry.

G. R. F.

PAYNE, HUNTINGDON AND
CO., NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A.,
Cotton Factors.

MOSES GREENWOOD, NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Cotton
Factor and Commission Merchant.

McDOWELL, WITHERS, AND CO., MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A., Commission Merchants.

GARLAND GOOD, MOBILE,
Cotton Factor and Commission Merchant.

BOYKIN AND McRAE, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

MILLER AND BATIE, Exchange
Brokers, MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

R. AND D. G. MILLS, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
GALVESTON, TEXAS, C.S.A.

ROTCHFORD, BROWN, AND
CO., Cotton Factors, NEW ORLEANS,
LOUISIANA, C.S.A.

R. W. RAYNE, NEW ORLEANS
LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Commission Merchant, offers facilities to European Consignors of Boots and Shoes to supply the markets of Tennessee, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Alabama. Specimen illustrations of goods suitable to these markets.

ANDREW LOW AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

CHARLES GREEN,
Commission Merchant, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

H. D. WEDE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

JAMES CHAPMAN,
Commission Merchant, CHARLESTON.

N. A. HARDEE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

J. W. ANDERSON AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

R. N. GOULDINE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Charleston.

REID AND STEWART, Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.
Represented by Andrew Stewart, 1, Rufford-place,
Liverpool.

J. H. ASHBRIDGE AND CO.,
Shipping and Commission Merchants, NEW ORLEANS.
Office—No. 80, Tower-buildings West, Liverpool.
Agents—Liverpool and New Orleans Mail Steam
Navigation Company.

H. O. BREWER & CO.,
MOBILE, ALABAMA,
General Commission and Shipping Merchants.

ROBINSON & OLIVER,
Commission Merchants,
NEW ORLEANS,
C.S.A.

Represented by
Jos. T. ROBINSON & Co.,
India Buildings, Water-street,
Liverpool.

JOHN FRASER & CO.,
CHARLESTON,
South Carolina.
FRASER, TRENHOLM, & CO.,
Liverpool,
Commission Merchants.

WARWICK AND BARKSDALE,
GALLEGO FLOUR MILLS.
This immense establishment of capacity to manufacture 1000 barrels of Flour per day, purely for
South American Market. RICHMOND.

JOSEPH R. ANDERSON,
TREDEGAR IRON WORKS
Manufacturers of Locomotive and other Engines,
all descriptions of Machinery, Rifled Cannon, &c.,
RICHMOND.

DUNLOP, MONCURE, & CO.,
General Commission Merchants,
RICHMOND.

A. G. MILWAINE, AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Tobacco, Cotton,
Grain, and other produce, PETERSBURG,
VIRGINIA.

C. W. WHITE,
Commission Merchant,
ST. THOMAS, WEST INDIES.

FRANCIS FORD, Manufacturer,
MANCHESTER: Three and Six Cord Spool
Thread, Cotton Balls, Knitting and Embroidering
Cottons. Imported by FOSTER AND MOORE,
Norfolk, Va.; F. RIMALLIO AND NEYREY, or Orleans.

HAMILTON AND GRAHAM,
Importers, Wholesale Dealers in Dry
Goods, &c., PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA.

H. LEVY AND SON,
Commission Merchants, MOBILE.

R. D. RUSDEN, MANCHESTER,
ENGLAND, American Drills of all kinds,
Denims, Stripes, Shirtings, and all sorts of Manchester Goods.

SEARING AND CO.,
Commission Merchants,
MOBILE and NEW ORLEANS, C.S.A.
Represented by R. G. DEESLEY, Cotton Broker, 2, Byrom's-court, Royal-exchange, Manchester.

HARPER AND CAUGHEY,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA. Represented by J. and A. CAUGHEY,
Tempest Chambers, Tempest Hey, Liverpool.

MR. WILLIAM FREEMAN,
Publisher of THE INDEX, will promptly
attend to all orders from or for the Continent of Europe and the States. Commissions for books and goods of all kinds undertaken on moderate terms.
102, Fleet-street, London.

WORKS RECENTLY PUBLISHED
BY WILLIAM FREEMAN,
102, FLEET STREET.

SHIPPING SCENES: and Other Poems. By J.
STANLEY BIGG. Fcap. 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.; hand-somerly bound, 5s.

POEMS OF TRUTH AND FANCY. By S. R.
REDMAN. Crown 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.

THE WEARMOUTH ABBOTS. (Second Edition.)
A Tale, Illustrative of Saxon Christianity. Fcap.
8vo., cloth, 3s. 6d.

JESUS THE SOUL'S NEED. By C. A. PORTER.
Royal 32mo. paper, 8d.; cloth, 1s.

PROGRESS; or, The International Exhibition?
By the Rev. W. ANDERSON, Author of "Self-
made Men." Royal 32mo. paper cover, 3d.

THE FATHERS OF THE WESLEY FAMILY.
By the Rev. S. BEALE. Crown 8vo. cloth, 1s. 6d.

DECISION AND CONSISTENCY. Exemplified
and Honoured in the Life of Daniel and his Three Friends. By THOMAS COLEMAN, Author of "Two
Thousand Confessors." Fcap. 8vo. cloth, 2s. 6d.

HOW THEY GOT THERE. By the Rev. W.
BARKER. Being an Answer to "How Did They Get There?" Crown 8vo. sewed, price 2d.

PUNCH IN THE PULPIT. (Second Edition.)
TO BE, OR NOT TO BE? or, Man's Present and Future Condition Considered.

JESUS! OUR ARK.
ESSAYS: CRITICAL, BIOGRAPHICAL, and MIS-
CELLANEOUS. By S. F. WILLIAMS.

London: William Freeman 102, Fleet Street.

European and Confederate States
Advertising Agency.
THE object of this Agency is to
effect a direct trade alliance between the European and the Southern Press, through the medium of advertising. The most practicable mode
of introducing the Merchants, Manufacturers, Capitalists, Insurance Companies, &c., of Foreign Countries, to the Southern Trade, is by an organised,
classified, and liberal SYSTEM OF ADVERTISING.
Such like time and energy to every Northern man. The commerce of the world will not pause in ruinous inaction, but will commence its irresistible ebb and flow the moment peace is established. One of the most dangerous, corrupting, and insidious means to be used by the North will be the medium of advertising in Southern papers. Advertising Agencies are already created in every Northern city, and only hide their time. We must see to it that our papers are so filled with Foreign Advertisements
and the advertisements of Southern Importers,
Dealers, and Manufacturers, that there will not be
space left in any Southern newspaper for the advertisement of a single Yankee notion. Then will our papers present to their readers a faithful
mirror of Dealers, Manufacturers, &c., in the Old World, and of our business men at home, and thus attach to Southern interest that mighty lever "the Press," and disrupt the tie which, by means of Northern advertising, has had so much influence in binding the South to dependence upon its enemies.
Through the medium of a liberal advertising
patronage, our Southern editors can be maintained
against the stagnation in their business, which proceeds from interrupted or disorganised trade.

The object of this Agency is threefold:—
1st. To advertise European Merchants, Manufacturers, Hotels, Railroads, Insurance Companies, &c.,
&c., in Southern papers.
2nd. To advertise Southern business, property,
&c., in European journals.
3rd. To advertise home industry and Southern enterprise in our own papers, and thereby build up
the cities of our Confederacy, instead of those of
our enemies.

Our arrangements abroad are all completed. We now address you this preliminary Circular, to ask you to send us duplicate copies of your paper, accompanied by a private letter (which shall be strictly confidential), stating your terms of advertising, &c.

We will soon appoint agents in each important sea-board and inland city. Atlanta, at present, is selected for the Central Office, on account of its geographical position. We respectfully ask for this enterprise your hearty co-operation and assistance,
and guarantee, in return, strict integrity in all
business transactions.

By order of the Board of Directors,
WILLIAM H. BARNES,
SUPERINTENDENT.
Atlanta, Ga., August 29, 1861.

TO SOUTHERN AMERICAN FAMILIES IN
PARIS.

A FRENCH LADY—living with
her mother and her daughter in a pleasant location close by the Champs-Élysées—offers the comforts of a home and motherly care and attention, together with the advantages of the best
education and excellent music-teaching, for TWO YOUNG CHILDREN, or for a YOUNG LADY
under fifteen.

Address: ADAMÉ DE W., care of Mr. Jargier,
17, Rue de la Paix, Paris.

A. M. GAUTIER, Tailor, 220,
Recent Street, London (and 20, Rue de la Chaussée d'Antin in Paris).

THE AMERICAN REPUBLIC.
On Wednesday, the 30th, will be published, in 1 vol. 8vo.

THOMAS JEFFERSON: an Historical View of Democracy in America. By CORNELIUS DE WITT. Translated, with the Author's sanction, by R. S. H. CHURCH.
London: LONGMAN, GREEN, AND CO., 14, Ludgate-hill.

Citizens' Mutual Insurance Company.
The Board of Trustees, have resolved to pay an interest of SIX PER CENT. in cash on the outstanding certificates of profits to the holders thereof,
or their legal representatives, on and after the second Monday in February next; also, to declare a dividend of Twenty per cent. (20 per cent.) on the
net earned premiums of the Company, for the year ending 30th November, 1861, for which certificates
will be issued on and after the second Monday in February next.

TRUSTEES.
Geo. W. West, Vice- President.
D. Jamieson, President.
A. Miltenberger, Secretary.
J. Leisy.
Jas. A. White.
Douglas West.
M. Masson.
R. P. Hunt.
Martin Gordon, jun.
Cesaire Olivier.
A. Bohn.
Nuno Augustin.
Omer Gaillard.

Home Mutual Insurance Company of
New Orleans.

OFFICE..... 78, Camp Street,
Amount of premiums for year ending
31st December, 1861..... 433,725 47
Amount of Profits for year ending 31st
December, 1861..... 252,008 88
Amount of Assets on 31st December, 1861..... 1,338,306 77
The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of FIFTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent.
interest on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved
to redeem the Scrip of 1861.
Interest and redeemable Scrip, payable in cash on
and after 10th February next.
Certificates of Scrip, for the year 1861, deliverable
on and after 15th March, 1862.
A. BROTHIE, President.
JAMES H. WHEELER, Secretary.
New Orleans, January 11, 1862.

Louisiana Mutual Insurance Company.

OFFICE:
Iron Building, corner of Camp and Natchez Streets.
Amount of Premiums for the year ending 28th February, 1861..... 609,528 70
Amount of Profits for the year ending
28th February, 1861..... 213,759 74
Amount of Assets for the year ending
28th February, 1861..... 806,420 38
The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of THIRTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent.
interest on outstanding Scrip, and have ordered the redemption of Fifty per cent. of the Scrip issue
of 1861.
Interest and redeemable Scrip payable on and after the second Monday of May next.
Certificates of Scrip for the year 1861 deliverable
on and after 15th June, 1862.
CHARLES BRIGGS, President.
R. P. JANVIER, Secretary.
New Orleans, March 29, 1861.

Merchants' Mutual Insurance Company of New Orleans.

At a meeting of the Board of Directors held this day it was resolved to declare a Scrip dividend of TWENTY PER CENT., on the net earned premiums of the last year, and also to pay Six per cent.
interest on the outstanding Scrips of the Company. Scrip Certificates to be issued on and after the first day of August next.

DIRECTORS.
Geo. Conolly. J. N. Nevins.
John Pemberton. S. O. Nelson.
P. Maspero. C. H. Slocomb.
P. Pont. B. F. Voorheir.
C. Hoid. B. O. Vignand.
G. Miltenberger.

Crescent Mutual Insurance Company.
OFFICE:
Corner of Camp and Commercial Place.

TWELFTH ANNUAL STATEMENT.

Amount of Premiums for ten months
ending 30th April, 1861..... 531,876 14
Profits for ten months to 30th April, 1861..... 237,238 27
Assets, 30th April, 1861..... 1,442,639 16
The Trustees have declared a Scrip Dividend of THIRTY PER CENT., after paying interest at the rate of Six per cent. per annum on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved to redeem Forty per cent.
of the issue of 1858, payable as follows:—
Twenty per cent. 10th June, 1861.
Twenty per cent. 10th September, 1861.
Scrip Certificates for the year 1861, deliverable on
and after the 12th day of August next.

THOMAS A. ADAMS, President.
G. W. SPRATT, Secretary.

BRITISH AND NORTH AMERI-CAN ROYAL MAIL-SHIPS.

NOTICE.
These Steamers call at CORK HARBOUR on both Outward and Homeward Passages, to receive and land Mails.

Freight by the Mail Steamers to Halifax and Boston, and to New York, 43 per ton, and 5 per cent.
primeage.

PATTERN PARCELS.—Parcels containing samples of Goods on board will be taken free of freight by
the Mail Steamers.

Freight on other Parcels 6s. each and upwards, according to size.

Parcels for different Consignees, collected and made up in Single Packages, addressed to one party for delivery in America, for the purpose of evading
the payment of Freight, will, upon examination in America by the Customs, be charged with the proper Freight.
Dogs not taken on any terms.

The British and North American Royal Mail
Steam-Parcel Company, draw the attention of Shippers and Passengers to the 329th section of the New Merchant Shipping Act, which is as follows:—

"No person shall be entitled to carry in any ship, or to require the master or owner of any ship to carry therein, quarantines, oil of vitriol, gunpowder, or any other goods which, in the judgment of such master or owner, are of a dangerous nature; and if any person carries or sends by any ship, any goods of a dangerous nature, without distinctly marking their nature on the outside of the package containing the same, or otherwise giving notice in writing to the master or owner, at or before the time of carrying or sending the same to be so carried, he shall for every such offence be liable to be fined not exceeding £200; and the master or owner of any ship may refuse to take on board any parcels that he suspects to contain goods of a dangerous nature, and may require them to be opened to ascertain the fact."

The Index,
A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS,
LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

Published every Thursday Evening.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

Subscriptions, Twenty-six Shillings per annum.
Stamped, Thirty Shillings per annum.

Nos. I. to XVIII. NOW READY.

Office:—102, Fleet-street.

In this great metropolis, on the native soil of free speech and a free press, every interest—political social, religious, literary, scientific, benevolent
commercial, however remote, however small the
class to which it addresses itself—has long had its recognized representative in Journalism, through which it seeks to obtain a share of the public attention. The one solitary exception has heretofore been in the case of the Confederate States of America. Engaged in a life-and-death struggle against a vastly superior foe—hemmed in on all sides, quite as effectually by the deserts of the Bay
West and of Mexico, as by the enemy's armies and navies—they suffer even more from that intellectual blockade which excludes them from communion
with the rest of mankind, than from the commercial difficulties of obtaining their much needed
supplies. The disruption of the American Union—despite repeated warnings—started Europe without at once awakening it to a full consciousness of the reality and importance of the event. So little had the internal politics of America entered into
the routine of European thoughts, that even now—
when the effects are undeniable and irrevocable—
the causes still remain a mystery and a riddle to be far the greater portion of the intelligent European public. When the catastrophe occurred, the Northern States had the ear of the Governments
and of the peoples; and so zealously have they retained it, so ingeniously and persistently have
they pleaded their cause, so imperfect and distorting was the medium through which alone the South's voice could be heard, that Europe may fairly be said to have listened to but one side of the quarrel. It is true that the respectable portion of the English press has treated the weaker party in that spirit of fair play upon which every Englishman prides himself; and, as the struggle progressed, has evinced a painstaking study of a perplexing subject, which stands in honourable contrast to the flippancy and indecorum of American Journalism. But this has not supplied the want, so long and keenly felt, of some organ of Southern interests and Southern opinions, to which the Statesman, the Journalist, the Merchant, and the public at large might look for reliable intelligence
of the progress of events, and for valuable indications of the manner in which the South itself views and weighs the importance and bearing of those
events.

This want it is one of the principal objects of
"THE INDEX" to supply as far as possible. The measure of success which may reward the effort will necessarily depend upon the co-operation of the friends, and of the private, as well as official, representatives of the South in Europe. This cooperation has been most generously accorded us.
There is a large amount of Southern intelligence which reaches Europe through various private channels. Still more important information is obtained from Northern sources, which finds no
outlet through the muzzled press of those States.
Much of such valuable material has already been placed at our disposal; and we have a reasonable
prospect of making "THE INDEX" the receptacle
and depository of all, or nearly all, that is available in the United Kingdom and on the Continent. Our arrangements are such that our friends may rely on
this respect upon a scrupulous and sound discretion, and the inviolable sanctity of private communications.

While we have thus frankly explained one of the principal objects of "THE INDEX," it may be necessary to state—in order to prevent a possible
misapprehension—that it is not the sole object
Literature and General News—in fact, every ingredient of a Weekly Journal—will command our earnest attention; and it will be our unremitting
endeavour to make "THE INDEX" worthy of that liberal patronage which is promised us in advance.
"THE INDEX" will be represented by competent Correspondents at the different capitals of the Continent, at Washington, and at Havana. It is our design, also, that "THE INDEX" should partake of
the character of a Magazine, without departing from its proper sphere as a Review of current
events.

For the leaders and literary contributions, we shall enjoy the valuable aid of the pens of gentlemen already favourably known to the public.

The Cotton Market will monopolize much of our space, and is entrusted to hands theoretically and practically familiar with the subject and all questions bearing upon it.

It is superfluous to add that "THE INDEX" is necessarily committed to the advocacy of the principles of Free Trade.

Subscribers will be furnished with handsome
Covers for each Half-Yearly Volume.

A full list of the original "INDEX" Subscribers
and a carefully prepared Table of Contents will accompany the concluding number of each Volume.

Subscriptions and Advertisements to be sent, and
Post-office Orders made payable to

WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102, FLEET ST., E.C.

Printed by HENRY F. MACKINTOSH, of 11,
Crane-court, Fleet-street; and Published for the Proprietors by WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102,
Fleet-street, London E.C.—August 28, 1862.

THE INDEX

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS, LITERATURE, AND NEWS.
OFFICE:—102, FLEET STREET.

Vol. I—No. 19.] LONDON—THURSDAY EVENING, SEPTEMBER 4, 1862. [PRICE 6D.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK	289
COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET—
Liverpool Letter	291
Manchester Letter	291
TOBACCO MARKET	291
LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH—
Lists of Killed and Wounded	291
Private Letters	292
FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE—
New York	293
Paris	294
LEADERS—
The Federal Position in the South	296
Recognition: Europe, England, and the English Government	296
Continental Money—Assignats and "Greenbacks"	297
Duration of the War	298
The Case of the Factory Operatives	299
Mr. Smith on England and Canada	300
REVIEW—
President Jefferson Davis	301
THE CONFEDERATE CONGRESS	302
EXTRACTS FROM SOUTHERN PAPERS
ADVERTISEMENTS	304

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

The Confederate Congress assembled at Richmond on the 18th inst.

According to the telegraphic summary, the message of President Jefferson Davis (which we give in extenso in another page) is mainly devoted to suggestions for improvements in the naval and military departments of the Southern Confederacy, and to a denunciation of the war policy pursued by the North.

The President then says,—“The military events have assured the friends of Constitutional liberty of our final triumph in the pending struggle against despotic usurpation.”

The President denounces the Federal generals for arming slaves, and General Butler's proclamation; and states that the Federal Government evaded answering the inquiry whether they sanctioned these acts by replying that the inquiry was insulting. “Retaliatory measures must be adopted against those who disgrace the profession of war by making it an occasion for the commission of monstrous crimes.” The exasperation caused by failure has aroused “the worst passions of the enemy.” Relative to finance, President Davis says that the accumulated debt is small. An increased issue of Treasury notes for the service of the country is recommended. “The very large increased force of the Federal Government may hereafter render it necessary,” he continues, “to extend the provisions of the Conscription Act to citizens of from thirty-five to forty-five years of age. The vigour and efficiency of the present Confederate force, and the skill and ability of its leaders inspire the belief that no further enrolment will be necessary, but foresight has caused Congress to grant power to call more troops into the field if necessary.”

Among the proceedings in the Confederate House of Representatives, on the first day of the session, were the following:—“A Bill was introduced, making Treasury notes a legal tender in payment of debts, and it was referred to the Committee on Judiciary. A resolution was passed, directing the Committee on Military Affairs to inquire into the expediency of compelling the Commissariat Department to furnish the soldiers with more and better food. Bills were introduced to extend the application of the Conscription Act to all citizens under forty-five years of age. To provide that slaves taken in arms shall be delivered up to the authorities of the State in which captured, to be disposed of according to its laws, and the white officers either to be hung or delivered up to the State authorities. Also several Bills for retaliatory purposes, among which it is provided that any Federal officers who may have refused to treat Confederate soldiers as prisoners, or punished innocent private citizens, shall be put to death if captured; that an equal number of prisoners (officers preferred) shall suffer the fate inflicted on captured Confederate soldiers or citizens; that Federal armies, incongruously composed of white and black, shall not be held entitled to the privileges of war, or to be taken prisoners, and that of such as may be captured, the negroes shall be returned to their masters or publicly sold, and their commanders to be hung or shot as may be most convenient. The various measures were referred to the Military Committee. Bills were likewise offered providing for the raising of 250,000 additional men, and for an export duty on cotton and tobacco of 20 per cent., to aid in indemnifying the losses of citizens by the enemy.”

In following the late movements in Virginia, it is necessary to bear in mind the positions occupied by the Northern armies at the beginning of August. General McClellan had been driven into a trap, and had remained shut up since the seven days' battle, menaced on every side by the Confederates, and cut off from supplies of fresh provisions, indispensable in Virginia at this season of the year, not merely to prevent sickness but to save an army from annihilation. His transports were, in their passage up or down the James River, within range of the Confederate batteries, and every day the remnant of the Army of the Potomac was being thinned by pestilence. He could not be succoured; he could not advance. To remain where he was invited certain destruction. He had to choose between surrender and retreat. Meantime the Washington Government reported that the attack on Richmond was to be renewed, but no one believed the report, or failed to perceive the critical position of the army. On August 16, General McClellan commenced his retreat. He divided his forces into two parts—the smaller half embarked on transports and proceeded down the James River, and the other portion retreated by land to Williamsburg and to Yorktown. It must be inferred, from the brief Northern announcement, that the retreat had been effected without any loss; but, at all events, we must remember that at the latest dates the retreat had not been completed. It is not likely that more, if so much, as a fourth, of McClellan's army embarked in transports on the James River.

The transports passed down the river and proceeded, via Fortress Monroe, to the Potomac River, which they ascended, and landed the troops at Acquia Creek, a place situated between the Potomac and Rappahannock Rivers.

It is worthy of remark, that though the North manifests exceeding gladness that McClellan has retreated, it is not boasted that the retreat is a great strategic movement; and we should not be surprised to learn that this moderation is induced by disasters incident to the retreat, which have been carefully concealed from the public. All letters from the camp are liable to Government inspection, newspaper correspondents have been sent home; newspapers are under strict censorship; and for a private citizen to speak of Federal disasters, is to run the risk of imprisonment. So, for a few days, the United States' Government can conceal bad news. It is amusing to hear that McClellan's army is being daily reinforced. Whither are the fresh troops sent—to Williamsburg or to Acquia Creek? And further, are we to believe that an army preparing to retreat was daily reinforced?

So much at present for the Army of the Potomac. Let us now turn our attention to what is called the Army of the Virginia Valley. It was originally intended to protect Washington, and lately to make a diversion in favour of McClellan. The Battle of Cedar Mountain disconcerted the Federal plans. General Pope's mendacious narrative of that affair comes too late to deceive. We have detailed Southern accounts of the number of prisoners taken, including forty officers in Pope's army; and the completeness of the Confederate victory is also apparent from the subsequent movement of the Federals. General Pope, at first reported that he was pursuing General Jackson; next, we are told the Confederate commander has effected a retreat across the Rapidan, and gone the Northerners knew not where, and that he could not be followed because the Rapidan was impassable; that is, immediately after the passage of the Confederates, there was a sudden, we ought to say miraculous, increase of the waters of the river! The simple truth is, General Pope could not, and did not, attempt to follow his victorious foe, and his reported pursuit was just as veracious as his reported capture of 10,000 men of General Beauregard's army. After the Battle of Cedar Mountain there is a break in the Northern narrative, and we next hear that General Pope has adopted the strategy of retreat, that he has crossed the Rappahannock, and effected a junction with a portion of McClellan's army, which has been landed at Acquia Creek.

At last the truth oozes out. General “Stonewall” Jackson has again been at Pope, forced him to retreat, captured a staff-officer (and how many men, and how much booty?), and General Pope's personal baggage, maps, official despatches, and most valuable papers relating to the campaign. When Pope came to Virginia he said he had “never seen in the West anything but the backs of his enemies.” Certainly he has now shown his back to the enemy. We expect the official despatches must be amusing reading. Possibly there is a draft despatch for the capture of General Jackson's army, or at least 10,000 prisoners.

Assuming that Pope has effected a junction with a portion of McClellan's troops, it is certain that the united armies are acting on the defensive; for the Northern accounts state that from the opposite, that is the south bank of the Rappahannock, the Confederates have several times attacked the Federals, but that General Pope has been able to hold his ground, and it is said that "the Federals can hold their position till the arrival of reinforcements enables them to assume the offensive." What a position for an invading army! Since the division and retreat of General McClellan's army, the Confederates would be able to concentrate an immense force against the Federals in their new position. It is likely that General Pope is ordered to protect Washington, and that any intention to advance on Richmond is not pretended. The New York telegram of August 25, says,—"It is rumoured that when the whole Federal army is concentrated in Virginia, General Halleck will assume the command-in-chief." When will the Federal army be thus concentrated? It seems to us that the Federal situation is critical; their forces are divided, and the army on the north bank of the Rappahannock is not only menaced by the Confederate forces withdrawn from the neighbourhood of Richmond, and from the James River, but it is open to an attack from General Jackson. The condition and situation of the Federal forces in Virginia are not, in our view, of a character to make the North confident and cheerful.

In our last issue we considered the subject of Confederate reprisals, and we intimated an opinion that the firmness of President Davis would check the savage lawlessness of Federal commanders. We were right. General Pope has issued an order which is equivalent to the withdrawal of his license to plunder the peaceful inhabitants, and he threatens to punish acts of pillage and outrage: General Halleck has also issued an order that officers and men are to be accountable for all property taken from the enemy, and that officers or men taking private property without authority will be shot. The officers of Pope's army, who were taken by General Jackson, have, despite their earnest protest, that they knew nothing about the order for reprisals, been treated as criminals, and not as prisoners of war; and we have very little doubt that this will induce the Federal authorities to annul Pope's other savage orders, and will generally improve the conduct of the Federals. We know of no other curb for brutality than the fear of punishment; but, happily, that is very effective.

We stated in our last issue that the Confederates had taken Baton Rouge, and our statement was strictly accurate. There was a plan for a combined assault; that is, whilst General Breckinridge attacked the Federal army the Arkansas was to drive off the Federal fleet. The Confederate commander knew perfectly well that the Northern troops would run to the shelter of their gunboats, and he wished to cut off this retreat. If we can place the slightest reliance on Northern accounts of the affair, it seems that General Breckinridge was not successful at the first assault, and therefore General Butler, as soon as a rumour of it reached New Orleans, sent a despatch to the Washington Government announcing a complete Federal victory. Towards the evening the attack was renewed, and the Federals were forced from their entrenchments, driven through the city, and had to seek the shelter of their gunboats. They were present to afford the needed protection, because the Arkansas had met with an accident which prevented her co-operation. The Confederate troops retired from the pursuit as soon as the enemy was covered by the fire of his gunboats; but not until they had made a large number of prisoners. They remained in Baton Rouge during the night, captured a valuable booty, and destroyed about $500,000 worth of Federal property. Next morning General Breckinridge took up a position on the Comite River.

From latest accounts, it appears that the Federals have returned to Baton Rouge, and are daily expecting another attack, and that they have prepared to destroy the town if they are obliged to evacuate it. If the system of destroying Southern towns is commenced, we trust President Davis will at once

Put a stop to it by destroying a few Northern towns. If an invader cannot hold a town, he has no right, according to the laws of civilized warfare, to destroy it.

There is little doubt about the total destruction of the Arkansas. It is thus explained:—

The Arkansas left Vicksburg to co-operate in the attack on Baton Rouge. After passing Bayou Sara her machinery became deranged or disabled. While engaged in repairing, a fleet of gunboats from below attacked her. Gallant resistance was made, but the vessel had to be abandoned and blown up. The officers and crew reached the shore in safety. Lieutenant Stevens, of South Carolina, commanded the Arkansas; Commodore Brown being detained at Vicksburg, not having recovered from his wounds.

Although her career was so short, the Arkansas will never be forgotten by the historian of naval warfare.

Commander Farragut is reported to have destroyed Donaldsville, near New Orleans, because guerillas had fired on his fleet from the banks of the river. Donaldsville was a small, defenceless place. It is natural that a Federal commander who cannot beat his enemy, and has, on the contrary, been beaten, should satiate his vengeance on women and children. If guerillas offend, why not punish them, and not the people of Donaldsville? For two very sufficient reasons. The guerillas are not to be caught, and the peaceable inhabitants of a defenceless town can be attacked without fear of their retaliation. Commander Farragut has at length done something with his fleet.

Amongst the private letters which we publish in another part of this impression will be found some from New Orleans, from which may be formed an adequate conception of the miseries of the place, and of the anxiety felt by the tyrant Butler for the safety of his command and person. A telegram states he will "not be superseded at New Orleans." Not superseded! Any but a Northern commander—perhaps most Northern commanders—would have resented after being censured as he has been. Mr. Reverdy Johnson, according to a semi-official despatch—

Has made a report to the Federal Government upon the points which he lately went to New Orleans to examine, and President Lincoln has approved his conclusions. He recommends the return to the Dutch Consul of the $800,000 seized by General Butler, and the payment to the French Consul of $716,000, and also that a large amount of sugar and other merchandise should be relinquished to British, Greek and other foreign merchants in New Orleans. Mr. Johnson declares that these seizures by General Butler cannot be justified by civil or military law.

Let it be remembered how General Butler bullied the Consuls about this transaction, and it seems incredible that he can consent to hold office after this official condemnation.

General Butler has ordered a forced contribution of $330,000 from the bankers, cotton-brokers, and merchants of New Orleans, for the support of the poor. The assessments are made in proportion to the sums subscribed by the merchants for the defence of New Orleans against the Federal Government. Nearly 200 firms are assessed. The principle of this assessment is remarkable. It is ex post facto legislation in its worst form. Men are to be punished for deeds done against the Federal Government when the Federals were not in New Orleans. General Butler is cunning as well as brutal. By this doctrine the whole of the inhabitants of New Orleans are guilty of treason, and all the property is at his disposal. Indeed, the general confiscation has begun.

General Butler has ordered all persons in New Orleans to deliver up all private arms.

The French Consul has protested against the compelling of French subjects to deliver up their arms, as unmistakable symptoms of a tendency to revolt had shown themselves, and in such a case the protection of the Federal Government could not be effective against internal enemies, whose language became daily more unrestrained, and who are only kept partially in subjection by the conviction that their masters are armed.

General Butler replied that there was not just cause of complaint, and that all persons must deliver up their arms. He has likewise ordered that as the people are now unarmed all burglaries and robberies with violence, and all aggravated insults, would be punished with death. All slaves giving information of the Confederate army would be emancipated.

The latter paragraph shows that General Butler is fully aware of his inability to keep order and to protect the inhabitants. Possibly a general insurrection would meet with Butler's approbation, and hence his disarming the population.

The Confiscation Act has been put in force in Memphis by the seizure of 300 houses. In consequence of the absence of the owners, Mr. Lincoln cannot have the gratification of putting in force that part of the act which consigns them to death.

The war news from Tennessee is important. The Confederates are said to have been repulsed in an attack on Edgefield, a town to the north of Nashville, and which may be considered a suburb of that city. To have made the assault shows the power of the Confederates. They have captured Clarks-ville, and were advancing on Fort Donelson, and it is reported they have attacked it. In East Tennessee there is continual skirmishing, a kind of warfare that is doubly harassing to an invader. The Federals claim a victory at Cumberland Gap. They were lately repulsed at that place with great slaughter; and it appears that since there has been a skirmish, in which three Federals were killed and fifteen wounded. We have later advices from Tennessee, and they state that no battle has been fought since the engagement in which the Federals were defeated. It is said, "On August 12, the Federal General Miller, with two regiments, left Nashville and surprised a portion of General Morgan's command." If so, it was a very small portion, for General Morgan's forces are not numerous, and when on active service he keeps them well together.

Kentucky has been entered on three sides by the Confederate forces. The whole country is turned into a camp. Governor Magoffin has resigned, finding his post utterly untenable. The Mayor of Henderson has joined the Confederate army. At Richmond, twenty-five miles South of Lexington, there is a body of 3000 Confederate cavalry. General Kirby Smith, in command of 15,000 infantry, an adequate number of cavalry, and with twenty-four pieces of artillery, has captured Somerset and London, the latter place being in the direct rear of the Federals. Under the circumstances, it was hardly necessary to inform us that "the Federal General Buell is cut off, and it is feared he is in a precarious position. Communication between Kentucky and Nashville is interrupted." The Kentuckians are now fighting the battle of independence with the utmost ardour. In this conjuncture the Federals were withdrawing some regiments from Indiana. Two have gone and seven more are promised. "They will go amply prepared in all but discipline for the conflict." To send forth well equipped and undisciplined troops is very much like making a present of warlike stores to the enemy. But if the regiments were the best troops in the United States, what use are they in such a State as Kentucky? And with a conspiracy numbering 15,000 persons to aid the Confederate cause, is it safe to denude Indiana of Federal forces?

From Missouri we learn, through Northern channels, that one or two guerilla bands have been repulsed or defeated. This may be true, but nothing, at all events, is said about the recapture of the towns taken by the Confederates. We have latterly noticed that the accounts of Confederate successes are usually preceded by guerilla bands being repulsed.

The Washington Government has created a new military department, composed of the States of Ohio, Michigan, Illinois, Indiana, Missouri, and Kentucky, east of Tennessee River, including Cumberland Gap, to be called the Department of Ohio, under the command of General Wright. Before General Wright can command he will have to conquer.

In Arkansas the Confederates have been reinforced, and their ordnance has been increased. The following Northern item is an apology for a defeat:—

An engagement is reported to have taken place at Clarendon, Arkansas, between six regiments of Federal infantry, under General Hovey, and eight cavalry regiments, and part of an infantry brigade. The Federals are reported to have been victorious, capturing 700 prisoners. The loss was heavy on both sides.

The Federals are only "reported to have been victorious," whereby we know them to have been defeated; and "the loss was heavy on both sides" means that the disaster was severe. But our readers do not require our assistance to translate Federal war news.

At Fort Ridgely, Minnesota, there has been a massacre by the Indians of 500 white persons.

There was an accident on the James River, one transport getting foul of another, and eighty sick soldiers were drowned. But when a whole army of Federals has perished in Virginia, the death of eighty sick soldiers by drowning seems a trifling incident.

Mr. Cassius M. Clay has made two speeches, one at Washington and the other at Pittsburg, and as they both violently denounced England, it is hardly necessary to add that they were received with enthusiasm. In Washington he said:—

England is the most unfriendly nation upon the earth. Her conduct on the Slavery question was hellishly damnable hypocrisy. She was looking for America's downfall, but France protected America. He would not desist speaking against England. When England threatened the national existence, Napoleon was the firm and fixed friend of America. Therefore, let America appeal to France not to stand by and let the American Republic be destroyed by England. Russia was a strong ally of America. He was surprised and struck with admiration at the condition of the Russian people; for England had so misrepresented them. The Russian Royal family is the most lively, intelligent, and virtuous family that ever occupied a throne.

This is the return England gets for neutrality, a neutrality that is, in fact, friendship to the United States and hostility to the Confederate States. The reference to the private life of the Royal family of Russia is an indelicate impertinence, intended, no doubt, to show the gaping audience that Mr. Cassius M. Clay is familiar with courts.

Mr. Lincoln has addressed a deputation of coloured men in a speech that has given great offence to the Abolitionists. He said:—

You and we are a different race. We have between us a broader difference than exists between almost any other two races. There is an unwillingness on the part of our people, harsh as it may be, for you free coloured people to remain with us. When you cease to be slaves you are yet far removed from being placed on an equality with the white race. You are cut off from many of the advantages which the other race enjoy. The aspiration of man is to enjoy equality with the best when free, but on this broad continent not a single man of your race is made the equal of ours. Go where you are treated the best, and the ban is still upon you. I do not propose to discuss this, but to present it as a fact with which we have to deal. I cannot alter it if I would. I do not know how much attachment you may have toward our race. It does not strike me that you have the greatest reason to love them, but still you are attached to them at all events.

The chairman of the delegation briefly replied that they would hold a consultation, and in a short time give an answer. The President said, "Take your full time. No hurry at all." The delegation then withdrew.

The coloured race hardly needed to be officially informed of Northern hatred, for they knew that by experience. The "no hurry at all" was rather sarcastic, though perhaps unintentionally so.

The bounties have been raised, and the enlistments are said to go forward more rapidly. In some cases the bounty amounts to $500. Drafting was to commence on September 1.

On the 22nd August,

General Cocoran entered New York amid public demonstrations of welcome surpassing those extended to the Prince of Wales. The demonstration was planned with the view of encouraging enlistments among the Irish.

We question if the Irish are to be caught by such a bait, since they have been able to refuse large bounties.

This General Cocoran was captured by a lad sixteen years of age, belonging to the 4th Alabama Regiment.

Gold at New York is 15½ per cent. premium, and advancing.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, September 3rd, 1862.

We have had so repeatedly of late to describe wild and excited markets, that the subject has almost become stale, and the advances have been so rapid and continuous, that the mind is scarcely able to grasp them in all their bearings. We can only repeat that the week under review has not yielded to any of its predecessors in violent excitement and great appreciation of values.

Our last report left Middling Orleans with 25½ to 26, and fair Dhollerah 17d., with an immense speculative business doing. On Thursday there was no abatement; the sales reached 24,000 bales, at ½d. advance. On Friday the demand was less active; sales 12,000 bales, but firm, ½d. to ¾d. dearer. The week's returns showed a smaller delivery to the trade than was expected, viz., 14,000 bales, on which account the stock remained at a higher figure than was looked for—62,000 bales.

On Saturday the Arabia's news was to hand, and proved intensely warlike in tone. The North was getting its first instalment of 300,000 men without very much difficulty, and the determination of the people to carry on the war to the subjugation of the South was apparently growing in strength. In addition to this stimulus, our market was powerfully affected by the prevailing feeling in Manchester. The excitement there was even greater than here, and an immense business was done on Friday, which brought spinners freely into our market on Saturday. The consequence was, that we had one of the most excited days yet witnessed, with a business of 15,000 bales; American cotton advanced 1d. to 1½d., and Surats ¾d. to 1d.

On Monday, the eagerness to buy was just as great, and a further rise of about equal amount took place; but on Tuesday, some hesitation began to be shown. A marked pause occurred in the forenoon, and operators anxiously waited for the response from Manchester. The report from there was to the effect that the market was wild with excitement, at 3d. advance on yarns since Friday, and 2s. 6d. per piece in goods; and this gave renewed confidence to buyers. A fair business was done in the afternoon, making the sales 8000 bales, and putting Middling Orleans to the long-talked-of figure of 2s. 6d. per lb. To-day, however, a decided change in the tone has occurred. A fair speculative inquiry showed itself in the morning; but as sellers met it freely, buyers began to lose confidence, and stopped operations; and in consequence some little weakness in prices has been evinced. American cotton in a few cases can be bought at ¾d. to 1d. below the extreme points reached, and Surats ¾d. per lb. The sales are estimated at 5000 bales, and the quotation for middling Orleans may be given roughly at 29d. to 30d. In Surats the greatest rise for the week has been in Broach and Saugurind, which are increasingly required to take the place of American. These qualities have been sold as high as 24d. and 27d. The quotation for Fair may be put at 22d. for Broach, 19d. for Dhollerah, 19½d. for Omrawuttee, and 18d. for Comipat.

In cotton to arrive, the turn-over, as usual, has been enormous; and the nominal value for to-day is 20d. for May Broach, 18½d. for Dhollerah and Omrawuttee, and about ¾d. less per month as the time of shipment is more distant.

Our market is now so purely at the mercy of unreasoning and blind speculation, that it is impossible to form any safe calculation of its future movements. The immense gulf of unemployed money at Manchester and here, applies an increasing stimulus to its lagging energies, and no sooner is one set of operators tired of the game than another is ready to take their place. Still it is perfectly plain that our market, at those extravagant prices, is exceedingly liable to squalls, and it would not be surprising if it was suddenly upset by a gust from some quarter that is little expected.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday, September 2nd, 1862.

The excitement which has prevailed in our yarn and cloth market during the past week, is such as was never witnessed here before. Speculators having come forward and taken nearly everything that was offered for sale, price being scarcely a consideration, especially as regards India shirtings and jaconets.

On Wednesday there was a brisk demand for export yarns, and an advance of from ¾d. to 1d. per lb. was obtained upon the prices of Tuesday. India shirtings realised 3d. per piece advance upon the prices of the day before.

On Thursday the demand was very active for India shirtings, when 1s. per piece advance was easily obtained. The total amounts of sales of this fabric being very great. No 14s warps spun from Surats, fetched 2s. per lb. or 5d. per lb. advance upon Tuesday's quotations, and to show the anomalous state of our market, we have only to mention that if these No. 14s warps had been converted into T cloths, they would only sell to-day at 22d. per lb. Madapolans have sold to-day at 23d. per lb., and if the material had been yarn instead of cloth it would be worth 2s. per lb., and again, if the yarn had been in the raw cotton state it would be worth 2s. 3d. per lb.

On Friday we had another excited market, shirtings advanced another 1s. per piece, and jaconets could not be obtained on a basis of 6s. per piece for 14 by 14, 20 yards, 7s. being the price demanded; Printers sold at the rate of 2s. 1d. per lb. for 9/8 17 by 17.

Home trade yarns were from 2d. to 3d. per lb. over Tuesday's quotations for all numbers up to No. 40s, and from 60s upwards, an advance of from 3d. to 4d. per lb. was obtained. No. 30s water twist realised 2s. 6½d. per lb., but we heard of one large lot, of 20s water spun from American cotton having been cleared off at 2s. per lb., a comparatively low figure owing to this number having been rather neglected.

On Saturday there was more enquiry for cloth, especially for Indian qualities, but as 17s. to 18s. were asked for good nikes of 8½ lb. very little actual business transpired.

On Monday the demand for cloth continued, and large quantities of 8½ lbs. shirtings were sold at 17s. 6d. per piece, another 1s. advanced. 9/8 16 by 16 printers 8½ lb. sold for 19s per piece, whilst 17 by 17 ditto 10 lbs. were held for 23s. to 24s. per piece. No. 20s water spun from American cotton, had 2s. 3d. per lb. offered for it and was refused.

To-day speculators have brought largely of both cloth and yarns, but more especially the former, consisting of shirtings, jaconets and printers. India shirtings have been sold at another advance of from 1s. to 1s. 6d. per piece for 8½ lb. of the best makes, in all about 4s. 6d. per piece above the price of this day week. 9/8 printers realised an improvement of 2s. to 2s. 6d. per piece on the rates of yesterday; T cloths have improved proportionately, long cloths being rather neglected, quotations are only nominal. Madapolans are much enquired for to-day, but as they are very hard to find, we have heard of no sales in them. Domestics remain at about 22d. per lb. It must be borne in mind that all the large purchases of cloth made during this week will have to be brought on this market again for resale, as the business has consisted entirely of sales from one speculator to another.

Holders of export yarns have not been enabled to obtain the advance asked to-day, so that we have to report very little actual business in them.

Home trade yarns are again higher in price, 32s. twist cops; best spinings are worth 2s. 6d. per lb.; 40s. ditto, 2s. 8d. to 2s. 10d. per lb.; 60s. ditto have been sold at 3s. 1d. per lb.; but most spinners are holding for 3s. 4d. per lb., all finer grades being in proportion.

The following are to-day's quotations for some of our principal fabrics:—9/8 printer's, 16 by 16, 9 lbs., 22s. to 22s. 6d. per piece; 17 by 17 ditto, 10 lbs., 24s. 6d. per piece; 18 by 18 ditto, 10 lb. 8 ozs., 26s. per piece; 72 reed ditto, 22 picks, 30s. per piece; 25-inch ditto, 16 by 16, 8 lbs., 19s. per piece; 27-inch ditto, 17 by 17, 8 lbs. 4 ozs., 20s. per piece; 7 lbs. T. cloth, 14 by 14, 14s. per piece; Mexican T cloth about 2s. 4d. per lb.; 6 lb. shirtings, 12 by 10, 14s. to 14s. 6d. per piece; 7 lbs. ditto, 14 by 13, 16s. to 16s. 6d. per piece; 8½ lbs. ditto, 16 by 16, 19s. was taken by some, and refused by others.

TOBACCO.

The sales of American tobacco for the month of August were 1761 hog-heads in London, and 1235 in Liverpool. There is scarcely any stock of Virginia, and the small quantity on hand being held for extreme prices, buyers were thrown chiefly on Western leaf and Marylands, and such small proportion of Western strips as is absolutely essential to their trade. The gradual hardening of the market brought low tobacco and every kind of substitute more into play, and the taking of Marylands by the Irish for their fillers, is strong evidence of the scarcity of all short cheap tobacco for this purpose.

The returns of duty paid for the seven months ending July 31, show a further falling off in the consumption of stemmed, but a total increase upon the same period last year. The figures are as follows:—

Duty-paid tobacco for the United Kingdom during seven months, ending July 31,— 1861.	1862.

Stemmed	11,024,207 lbs.	9,157,129 lbs.
Unstemmed	8,944,238	11,113,424
	19,968,445	20,270,553

The excess in leaf more than making up the falling off in the use of strips.

The tendency of the market is upward, and the advices to hand to-day, per City of Baltimore, promising a Confederate tax on tobacco by an export duty of 20 per cent., has imparted an additional stimulus.

STOCKS, SEPTEMBER 1, IN HOGSHEADS AND TIERCES.

	Virginia.		Western.
	Strips.	Leaf.	Strips.	Leaf.	Marylands.	Total.
London	508	521	5287	7635	6218	20,169
Liverpool ..	781	325	6310	4041	4213	15,670

Of negro-head and Cavendish the quantity is 2329 packages in London, 1112 in Liverpool, and the stock is held for higher prices. The last Australian accounts quote a considerable advance in manufactured tobacco, and merchants are disposed to await the arrival of another mail, when a scale may be established in proportion to the Australian prices.

QUOTATIONS.

Virginia leaf	10d.	to 13d.	per lb.
Do. strips	17d.	" 20d.	"
Western leaf—
Common to medium export..	5½d.	" 9d.	"
Good and fine	9½d.	" 12d.	"
Western strips	12d.	" 16d.	"
Marylands	5½d.	" 9d.	"
Negro-head and Cavendish....	Nominal.

LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH.

LIST OF KILLED AND WOUNDED IN ALABAMA REGIMENTS.

The Mobile Register has the following lists:—

Company E ("Hamp. Smith Rifles," of Mobile), 8th Alabama Regiment, in the battle of 27th June, at Gaines's Farm, north-east of this city. Killed: 1st Sergeant Robert G. De Haven. Wounded: Capt. C. Blackwood, stunned and knocked down by the explosion of a shell near him, then severely injured by our troops running over him in the charge; Lieut. Eugene Brooks, stunned and disabled for several hours by explosion of a shell near him, now recovered; Privates Edward Moore, painful in shoulder; James Mammell, in arm and shoulder; Robert Strickland, in leg; Jacob Stanton, in leg, slight; James McMeckan, right breast, dangerous; M. Fitzgerald, right shoulder; James Dimond, right shoulder; Edward Skehan, in leg, slight; James Bracken, in foot, severe; Patrick Cannavan, left foot and right thigh.

All on our right acted with desperate courage, charging the enemy's immense force and driving them from covering of woods and breastworks of logs, protected by a wide ditch; then from their earthworks. The enemy had sixteen pieces artillery, two divisions infantry, and four companies cavalry defending the position, which was stormed and carried by Fickett's, Pryor's, and (our) Wilcox's brigades. The enemy were in three lines of battle first, in wooded ravine—line formed behind breastwork of logs, with wide ditch and a fence in front; second, line of battle in open field, 150 yards in rear of first, and on ascent of hill; third line of cavalry, infantry, and ten pieces of artillery on top of hill. We charged for near half-a-mile through open fields; down a hill to ravine (under fire of their three lines); across fence and ditch and breastworks of logs, and (there 1 was stunned and trampled on) through woods, up hill; then, about 7 o'clock, p.m. General Jackson's division opened on enemy's flank and rear (our extreme left), and their retreating forces fled to the swamp. Our troops were under the most continuous and severe fire of artillery and infantry that has occurred in this war, from 4 o'clock p.m. to 7 o'clock p.m. Our brigade fought Porter's division of United States' Regulars, and we never wavered, never faltered, pressed steadily forward, through the fire of a division of infantry and sixteen pieces of artillery, using shell, canister, and grape at "point blank" range.

The following is a list of Officers Killed and Wounded in 8th Alabama Regiment:—

Killed: Capt. Thos. Phelan, Company A, stunned and died in a few hours, by explosion of shell near him—no scar, no wound; Lieut. Maynard and Loyal, Company B; Lieut. Jansen, Company G (German Fusiliers, of Mobile); Lieut. Lane, Company F. Wounded: Lieut. R. Heard (Company A) in leg; Capt. G. W. Hamon (Company B), in groin, dangerously; Lieut. McKew (Company C), in hand and leg; Stephens' Guards, of Mobile—Capt. C. Blackwood (Company E), stunned by explosion of shell and severely bruised—recovering slowly; Lieutenant Eugene Brooks (Company E), stunned by explosion of shell—recovered nearly entirely; Captain Emrich (Company G), in right shoulder, severely; Capt. Livingstone (Company H), in leg, slightly.

Company H (Independent Scouts of Mobile)—Wounded: Lieut. Scott, in leg; Lieut. Rice, in arm.

Company I (Emerald Guards of Mobile)—Wounded: Lieut. McGraw, in neck, severely.

Company K—Wounded: Lieut. Bennett, in thigh, dangerous.

In the fight at Frazier's Farm, south-east of Richmond, on Monday, 1st instant, my company was commanded by Lieut. A. H. Raveisies. In that severe fight the loss was, so far as I have learned, as follows:—

Killed: 2nd Sergeant Isaac Van Meter. Wounded: 5th Sergeant Wm. A. Ryan, in leg; Privates Robert Adams, in mouth; Wm. W. M. White, in leg, slightly.

Company A—Killed: Lieut. McGlocklin.

Company C—German Fusiliers of Mobile. Wounded: Lieut. Roler, dangerously.

Company L—Emerald Guards of Mobile. Wounded: Lieut. Nugent, severely.

Capt. W. F. Cleveland and Lieut. A. H. Raveisies, of Mobile, are unhurt and safe.

On Friday evening, 27th, our regiment went into the fight about 440 rank and file, and next evening could muster only 180 rank and file. On Monday evening our regiment went in with 180, and came out with not over ninety men. When the deeds, and daring, and fearlessness, and determined charges of the 8th Alabama Regiment in these two charges, unsupported by artillery, or their fighting at "Williamsburg" and "Seven Pines," are eclipsed, then let the daring braves who accomplished the deed wear the medal for superior bravery. The 4th, 6th, 8th, 9th, and 10th Alabama, all did well—unsurpassed. The 11th Alabama, at dark, came up in good style, and did well.

McClellan's army is routed, and a large portion of it surrendered. We have two Yankee Major-Generals—McCall, second in command to McClellan, and Reynolds; and have and are capturing Brigadier-Generals, Colonels, and Captains, "all you can't rest." The would-be Napoleon is not even Archduke Charles. We are almost certain to catch him.

The 8th Alabama Regiment was organized June 10, 1861, and numbered 1012 men. To-day, from skirmishes, battles, &c., we cannot muster over 100 men able for duty. We have done our duty to our State. Your obedient servant,

CRAWFORD BLACKWOOD,

Captain Company E, 8th Alabama Regiment.

To Hon. John Forsyth.

The following is a List of Casualties in the Sumter Rifles, in the 5th Alabama Battalion:—

Killed:—Lieut. D. H. Husted, head; Sergeant J. H. Boyle, head; Sergeant Wren, head; Sergeant E. Houston, head; Corporal Branch, head; Corporal F. Camber; Privates F. Ford, Steele, J. M. Hodges, J. Bonecastle, R. E. Harwood, bowels; R. H. Moore, bowels; J. J. Whitaker, bowels; J. Tompkins, W. Murphy.

Wounded: Capt. Vemede Grant, foot; J. R. Bradshaw, thigh; T. Bradshaw, arm broke; J. Y. Frost, spent ball; N. Little, side; B. B. Little, side; N. Hill, neck; G. W. Holloway, scalped; B. D. Nance, slight; J. Ormond, spent ball; J. Patton, breast; E. T. Ramsey, right arm; S. B. Spight, scalped; W. W. Drummond, thigh; Gilbert, in head; T. Barnes, bowels; A. Geiger, foot; M. L. Holland, jaw; A. A. Greer, back and lungs; G. N. Boyd, stomach; W. S. Hale, mouth; E. E. Hayden, slight; Carpenter, three fingers off left hand; Dunning, Clary, shoulder; Ferguson, thigh.

Missing:—Fargo, James Thompson, M. O'Connor.

The following are the Casualties in Company G, German Fusiliers, (8th Alabama Regiment) in the battle near Richmond, on June 27, 1862:—

Killed: Lieut. A. Jansen, Privates A. Schultz, J. H. Stumm Thomas Keefe, Ben. Collins, John Baskman.—Total 6 Wounded: Captain John P. Emrich (Acting Major), neck; Sergeant C. F. Wacker, arm and side; Sergeant Wm. Brown, head; Privates F. Muller, foot; H. Scharf, side; A. Kramse, shoulder; P. Remers, knee; Jos. Gratz, finger; Frank Striag-fellow, shoulder, severely; John H. Deely, head, mortally.

In the battle on Monday (June 30) the loss in the same company was as follows:—

Killed: Sergeant F. Steidl, Corporal P. Keeper, Privates H. Hackmeir, Fred. Schmidt. Wounded: Lieut. A. Kohler, severely; Sergeant George Schwartz, leg; Private John Schmidt.

We glean the following items from the Mobile Register:—

August 10.

A special despatch to the Tribune, from Grenada, says the Memphis Bulletin of the 7th, states that the Confederates have inaugurated guerilla warfare in Arkansas on an extensive scale, and mentions several brilliant exploits. On Sunday they attacked two Yankee regiments, dispersing them completely, capturing sixty waggons of provisions and over 300 stolen negroes. Twenty-seven of the latter escaped the same day. They bagged another party from Jacksonport, killing seventeen and capturing twenty waggons of provisions. Ninety men were attacked near Helena, and were nearly annihilated, only two escaping.

A serious rebellion is expected among the Mormons, which, it is feared, will result in war with the Federal Government.

August 9.

A special despatch to the Tribune of this city, dated Grenada, to-day, says:—The St. Louis Republican, of the 4th, says that the "rebel guerillas have taken complete possession of Missouri, and are daily growing into a vast army. Nearly 30,000 of them have crossed the Missouri river under Porter and Joe Thompson, clearing out the Home Guards and militia as they progress. They are raising numberless recruits for the Southern army. Six hundred have turned up at Bird's Point, threatening Cairo, where there is but a small garrison, "Governor" Gamble finds it impossible, under the circumstances, to get the militia to respond to his call, and has issued another appeal to them.

THE BATTLE OF CEDAR MOUNTAIN.

The following accounts are taken from the Richmond papers:—

(From the Examiner.)

At the Meadow Bridges, five miles north of Richmond, between the hours of 4 and 6 p.m., on Saturday, a heavy and continuous cannonade was heard in the direction of Orange

Court House. We have since learned from a trustworthy source that about the time indicated an engagement between the advanced forces of Pope and General Jackson was fought, resulting in a decided victory for us, at a point on the Orange and Alexandria Railroad, near Orange Court House.

We have as yet been unable to learn the particulars.

P.S.—Since the above was written, we have received the glorious news of a complete victory over Pope's forces, in which we have taken as prisoners one of his Brigadier-Generals and twenty-nine commissioned officers, all of whom arrived at Gordonsville last night, handcuffed.

(From the Richmond Enquirer.)

The ball was opened on Saturday morning, at Mitchell's station, on the Orange and Alexandria Railroad, by a spirited engagement between a small portion of Jackson's army and a similar force of the enemy, which resulted in the utter rout of the latter, with severe loss in killed, wounded, and prisoners. Among the prisoners were Brigadier-General Prince and some twenty-nine minor commissioned officers; the privates captured number some 330. The particulars of the engagement have not transpired. Intelligence from Gordonsville, on yesterday, informs us that fighting had commenced in earnest about that point, at an early hour, and that Jackson was making the attack, advancing upon the enemy from three different bases. The arrangements for the conflict were considered admirable, and inspiring us with entire confidence as to the success of the Confederate arms. The name of Jackson is already wreathed with undying laurels; and we wait with impatient anticipation of again uniting in the popular exultation which his deeds heretofore have always produced.

(From the Richmond Dispatch.)

The prelude to the battle of Saturday evening occurred on Friday, in Culpepper county, beyond the Rapidan River, in a skirmish between the advance of our army and a larger force of the enemy. The latter retreated with some loss in killed and wounded, and twenty-one prisoners fell into our hands, including three commissioned officers, who arrived here, by way of Lynchburg, on Sunday night. The pursuit was continued for some distance, and the Yankee forces made a stand at South-west Mountain, near Mitchell's station, about six miles beyond the Rapidan. Slight skirmishing was kept up on Saturday morning, and in the afternoon of that day, about 4 o'clock, an attack was made upon the enemy by a portion of the division of General Ewell, and a brigade under General C. S. Winder. Over 300 prisoners were captured in this engagement, including thirty commissioned officers.

One of the latter admits that a Federal division was cut to pieces while endeavoring to surround the Stonewall brigade, and the general belief is that the enemy's loss in killed and wounded is at least four times greater than ours. It was while bravely leading on the men under his command that General Winder was shot through the breast, and almost instantly killed. At one moment the fate of his brigade seemed in doubt, when his supports came up, and the enemy was driven back under an impetuous onset. On Saturday night the division of General A. P. Hill was engaged, and the whole Federal force retreated, the pursuit being kept up for a distance of some five miles. Heavy and rapid firing was heard after midnight, and the supposition is that a battle took place immediately on the Rapidan River, near the line of Fauquier county.

The prisoners were sent back to Gordonsville, whence they were transferred by railroad to Richmond, guarded by a detachment of the 1st Maryland Regiment, under Captain W. Goldsborough.

According to the statements of prisoners, the force under General Pope amounts to 40,000 men.

General C. S. Winder was a nephew of General John H. Winder, the commander of the Department of Henrico, and was probably the youngest Brigadier in the Confederate army.

BRIGADIER GENERAL PRINCE.

This officer, who was captured by our forces in the fight at South-west Mountain, on Saturday last, is an officer of the old United States' army. In the Mexican war he acted as Adjutant-General of the brigade commanded by General Sterling Price, whose confidence and esteem he possessed. When the present war broke out, Prince was a captain of dragoons at Fort Leavenworth, and afterwards became commandant of that post. In his intercourse with the people of Missouri and Kansas, he is represented to have acted with gentlemanly courtesy, and had the respect of those who opposed the policy of his Government. Such was his leniency towards the Confederates in Missouri that he incurred the suspicion and ill-will of such tyrants as Sigel, Lane, &c. These facts we obtain from an officer connected with General Prince's staff during his celebrated Missouri campaign.

ARRIVAL OF PRISONERS FROM POPE'S ARMY.

The central train that arrived at 4 o'clock yesterday morning, brought to this city 303 of Pope's Hessians, captured on Saturday, near South-west Mountain, by the advance forces of General Jackson's army. Accompanying the above were Brigadier-General H. Prince, a Yankee general, and twenty-seven commissioned officers, who, together with the men, were lodged in the Libby Prison.—Prince, for a few hours, was lodged at the Exchange Hotel. The recent proclamation declared Pope and his commissioned satellites to be without the usages of warfare, and not entitled to the privileges of ordinary prisoners of war. Orders were issued to place all of the captured officers in close confinement. At the Libby Prison they were put with the deserters and other persons to whom infamy attaches. An examination was made into the condition of the county jail, with a view to their incarceration there, but the structure was deemed unsafe. They have not been permitted to associate with the Federal officers, and appear very downcast at the prospect before them. We append a list of the officers captured at South-west Mountain, as follows:—

Capt. G. B. Halstead, Adjutant-General Augur's division; 2nd Lieut. Vealor Moses, 109th Pennsylvania; Colonel George D. Chapman, 5th Connecticut; 1st Lieut. S. J. Widvey, 3rd Wisconsin; Captain W. D. Wilkins, Assistant-Adjutant General, Williams' division; Capt. H. S. Russell, 11, 2nd Massachusetts; Capt. J. H. Vanderman, K, 66th Ohio; 2nd Lieut. Wm. Alister, 11, 28th New York; 2nd Lieut. J. Long, 11, 28th New York; 1st Lieut. J. D. Belsoloxley, D, 10th Maine; 1st Lieut. H. N. Greatrake, B, 46th Pennsylvania; 1st Lieut. M. P. Whitney, E, 5th Connecticut; Capt. P. Griffith, A, 46th Pennsylvania; 2nd Lieut. Chas. Sydnor, D, 8th U. S. Infantry; 1st Lieutenant H. C. Egbert, G, 12th U. S. Infantry; 2nd Lieut. J. D. Woods, B, 28th New York; 1st Lieut. A. A. Chinery, E, 5th Connecticut; 1st Lieut. T. R. Gorman, H, 46th Pennsylvania; 2nd Lieut. A. W. Selfridge, H, 46th Pennsylvania; 2nd Lieut. Otis Fisher, B, 8th U. S. Infantry; 2nd Lieut. Wm. M. Green, A, 102nd New York; 2nd Lieut. A. Walker, I, 3rd Maryland; Capt. R. A. Bowen, D, 28th New York; Major E. W. Canke, 28th New York; 1st Lieut. Wm. H. Kenyon, C, 28th New York; 2nd Lieut. J. D.

Ames, K, 28th New York; 2nd Lieut. Charles Doyle, D, 5th Connecticut.

POPE'S CAPTURED OFFICERS.

We understand that the officers of Pope's command, lately taken prisoners by "Stonewall" Jackson, professed never to have heard of President Davis' late proclamation with reference to the commissioned brigades of that army, and declared that they had supposed they were engaged in civilized warfare! They burn down our houses, destroy our property, insult our women, arm the contrabands against us, hang and shoot our patriotic guerillas, throw whole communities of peaceful citizens into jail to be gibbeted in case our guerillas kill any more of their bands of cut-throats and robbers, and consider all this a civilized mode of warfare. It is only when the same kind of civilization is applied to themselves that they discover their mistake. The truth is, we have borne these horrible outrages so long and so quietly that our moderation and forbearance have been attributed to fear, and to an inward conviction that we are wrongdoers and deserve all the punishment we are receiving at Yankee hands. They will now discover their mistake. An eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, and a life for a life, will be henceforth meted out to these robbers and murderers with the most scrupulous accuracy. It is true that 10,000 lives of such depraved wretches could not atone for the life of one pure, high-minded patriot; but as each of them values his existence as highly as honest men, the wholesome lesson of retribution will not be without its influence. All the atrocities and horrors that may characterize the war hereafter rest upon the heads of the invaders, who have inaugurated the system of hanging prisoners, and who have manifested in their whole conduct of the war a degree of inhumanity and barbarity which has shocked the moral sense of the world.

We trust most devoutly that old "Stonewall" may succeed in capturing the arch-fiend and savage, Pope himself. If he were not as fleet in foot as black in heart, we might anticipate a luxury, compared with which the capture of a thousand other Yankee Generals would be dull and insipid. Pope and Butler! If these two precious miscreants could only fall into Southern hands!

The officers who arrived from Gordonsville, twenty-seven in number, and who were captured by General Jackson on Saturday, will not be considered prisoners of war so long as the recent offensive and uncivilized order of General Pope remains unrevoked. They have all, General Prince included, been placed in the Libby Prison, and will in a few days be separately confined, to be tried, and finally punished as felons, should the Government of the North persist in claiming the right to murder and pillage.

(From the Examiner.)

From the best information we have been able to obtain, the battle on Saturday occurred in Culpepper county, at a point on the Orange and Alexandria Railway, six miles beyond the Rapidan river. The forces engaged were a portion, on our side, of Ewell's division, and on the part of the enemy three or more brigades, amounting to between 8000 and 10,000 men. The slaughter of the Yankees is said to have been frightful—out of all proportion to the number taken prisoners. An entire regiment, whilst charging one of our batteries, was ambuscaded and literally annihilated.

General Beauregard, who has been suffering from diptheria, is now convalescent.

THE RICHMOND MARKET.

(From the Richmond Examiner, August 2.)

We have more than once taken occasion to allude to the exorbitant prices demanded for the necessities of life in our markets, particularly the products of the soil. A gentleman who has devoted a number of years to the cultivation of these articles, furnishes us with the following startling facts as to what the products of one acre of ground are worth at the ruling rates:—"Green corn, $1 per dozen, $50 per barrel, allowing 600 ears to the barrel (eight barrels to the acre is considered a good crop, hence one acre of roasting ears in our market would be worth $400); onions, 10 cents a-piece, $15,000 per acre, allowing them to be planted in rows three by six inches, besides a large margin for walks; beets about the same; cabbage, $1 per head, $5,000 per acre, planted three feet apart; Irish potatoes, $8 to $16 per bushel—100 bushels to the acre would be worth $800 to $1,600 per acre; tomatoes $1 per dozen, allowing 100 to the hill, the hills nearly three feet apart, $40,000 per acre. At four cents per hill, one acre in tomatoes would produce $200 worth." These are really startling figures, and without making the calculation to determine their accuracy, we submit them to the public. At ordinary prices, from $200 to $300 worth of vegetables is considered a good yield per acre. Cotton planting, the most profitable species of land cultivation, does not average more than $100 to $200 per acre.

PRIVATE LETTERS.

The following extracts are from a letter written by a Southern officer of high rank to his wife. Speaking of the battle before Richmond, he says:—

We captured about $2,000,000 worth of stores and ammunition. Only think of McClellan saying he had lost one tent and one wagon. We have taken 70 guns, 100 waggons, 1200 horses, and 70,000 arms; as for tents and other things, they are too numerous to mention. You would have laughed to see the Yankees up to their necks in mud, and our dragoons hauling them out by their ears.

Ewell is with Jackson and with his glorious Maryland regiment. Are you not proud of that regiment? Just think of the little flag we brought on, and which is the only one they carry, being pierced with bullets—bloody, ragged, and almost unrecognizable, but all the more glorious—with the buck tail fastened to the staff by order of General Ewell, in commemoration of their glorious victory, and their magnificent bearing in the fight they had with the Buck Tail Regiment. Our regiment was always in the place of honour—in the rear, if retreating; in the front, if advancing. Sometimes at night it would be in the rear after a long march on a retreat; and the next morning it would be marched through the army to the front, the soldiers saying, as they passed, "Something is up—Maryland is in the front again; go on, boys, we'll be after you soon."

In another place the letter says :—

Davis is perfectly delighted with the results of the battle, and the conduct of our men. Ah! how glorious, beyond the power of words to express, they have proved themselves. I have wept over accounts of heroism, individual and general, given by eye-witnesses and participants. Indeed, the simplest and most unschooled men give the most touching recitals; and the mothers and fathers and sisters are worthy of the heroes whom they represent and emulate in their patriotic devotion. You would scarcely credit your own senses could you see their sublime endurance. I have been in the midst of mothers and sisters at a time when they knew that their dearest earthly treasures were exposed to the fearful fire whose flash illumined the city, and whose roar seemed to shake its foundations; and, beyond the evidence of pale faces and a little nervous excitement lest each ambulance freighted with the dead and dying rolling by should stop at their door, there was none of their intense suffering visible. It is inexpressibly touching to see the heartfelt gratitude when some husband, brother, or son is brought home not mortally wounded. One mother said, when she heard that her only son had fallen mortally wounded, "God's will be done! He is merciful in sparing his brother (her step son) who would have left a wife and children." Some one said, "What a pity he went against the doctor's advice." This noble mother replied, "Do not say that; I should rather it should be so, than that he should not have done what he felt to be his duty."

The following extracts are from a letter written by a gentleman in a high position in Mobile, to a friend in London :—

MOBILE, July 10.

The British war steamer Racer is expected to call off Mobile Point to-morrow, to communicate with Her British Majesty's Consul. I embrace the opportunity to write home. Our cause is doing nobly; but oh, God! at what a sacrifice of our best blood. The 3rd Alabama has covered itself with glory in fully a dozen battles, and could only muster 100 men after the last fight.

All well with us. Mobile not yet attacked. It is bristling all round with entrenchments and batteries. We never mean to surrender it.

General Bragg is just about to march, with 60,000 men (the Corinth army), towards the Tennessee River. He is after conquest and glory. He has carte blanche to strike where he will, and is baring to do something. I have the highest faith in his military abilities.

We have given the Yankees a terrible drubbing at Richmond. I suppose they will gird up their loins and come again.

Our markets are bare. Every importable commodity at enormous prices; claret, liqueurs, and Havana cigars beyond reach. But we do not care, and will smoke pipes and will eat worms rather than "humble-pie" to the detestable Northern despotism.

Vicksburg still defies the Federal navies of the sea and upper river. The Yankees cannot occupy the Mississippi for trading purposes. Bragg, Van Dorn, Breckinridge (who has developed great military talent), Price, and Hardu (the last has proved the bravest of the brave) will give the enemy great trouble in the West. Hindman is in Arkansas, making successful head against the Federal General Curtis. East Tennessee and the Cumberland Gap are guarded by Kirby Smith. In a military point of view we are doing well everywhere. "Stonewall" Jackson immortalized himself in the Shenandoah Valley, before he came and fell upon McClellan's right flank at Chickahominy.

The following is a copy of a letter from a lady in New Orleans to a friend in Liverpool :—

New Orleans, August 9.

I cannot venture to send the enclosed letter from Mrs. Ange to you, without another envelope. Several of my letters have come with a twine string run through them to fasten them inside of wearing apparel, and yours have evidently reached me in the same way. The letter will not, I hope, be out of date, as I presume you can hear but little from your friends. I have messages, but few letters. My last from sister (Mrs. Nott) of July 21, gave intimation of changes which have since occurred. General Bragg has had his army sifted and examined by surgeons, as he wished to take no man from Tripolo "who could not walk thirty miles a day." His division of the army passed through Mobile on Saturday the 2nd —, from all I can learn, to attack Buell's army at Chattanooga, then to advance on Nashville and Kentucky. Mr. II— is aid to General Bragg. My three sons under him as major, lieutenant, and private. My two brothers, brothers-in-law, my sister's son (almost an only son), Dr. Nott's valuable life and health daily exposed. Such a picture will show you what I suffer, shut up here, without the privilege of writing or hearing from them; yet thousands of women in the Confederacy are suffering as much, and have as much at stake. What wonder that every woman is engaged in the cause with every feeling of her heart, every energy of her intellect, every effort of her soul and strength. If you could form an idea of an entire population without labour, lawyers, merchants, and mechanics, you could then form some idea of the distress, destitution, and suffering in our unhappy city. The societies in aid of the poor have been closed. Volunteers' wives cannot be paid their monthly stipend; except that so far the free market, which feeds 1800 families, has been kept open. The Yankees have opened a depot for the distribution of food, but the first question asked is, "Have you taken the oath of allegiance?" Under such circumstances you will not wonder that many of that class have done so. Poor things! who can blame them?—they must feed their children. General Butler himself said to a foreigner (in reply to the question "What advance had he made"), "Advance! with such obstinate people as these—not a step. Not a respectable name has yet been signed." Mr. Reverdy Johnson was sent out to settle some of General Butler's moneyed oppressions. It suffices to say, he reversed every decision of the General's. He said, "It was very depressing to see the state of things here. There was no Union sentiments—no chance for a reunion." What a pity other minds, with equal influence and character like his, cannot be awakened to this truth. The gulf widens every day—there can be no peace, but in entire separation; you will know how much the women of New Orleans have the right to be bitter. If there were a man willing to submit to Yankee rule, he would not have the courage to go home and say so to his wife or sister.

Yes, the women have taken a firm stand, and hold it firmly. Not only the army, who have behaved outrageously, but the navy, who have done nothing offensive, are completely cut off from any mark or look of recognition. The accounts of Baton Rouge go out by this steamer, but our side is yet to be heard. Breckinridge is not wounded; has taken 2000 prisoners; was in Baton Rouge eighteen hours, long enough to load his waggons with their ammunition and provisions, and retired to prevent the gunboats from shelling the town, in which were our Confederate women and children. Why, if the town was theirs, did they bring steam-boats of their wounded down here, some of whom died on their way down.

I am kept here with my three daughters, General Butler having refused to let me leave.

When General Butler came, my cousin, Captain H—, who fought so nobly in the McClellan, at the forts, was in my house, wounded. Since his death I have tried in vain to get away.

The following extracts are from a letter written by a lady citizen of New Orleans :—

New Orleans, August 4.

Every one is afraid of our bank notes; and, in my opinion, the banks are as good as broke. Gold 35 per cent. premium. Silver 28 per cent. sterling; none of any consequence to be had. Canal Bank demanding for their own notes 37½ per cent. premium. Other bank notes, value sterling, are to be had, at 45 per cent. premium. Everything in the shape of provisions the same. Seymour English, of the Bulletin, has been sent to the forts. I cannot write fully. Weather very hot, 95 in the shade. Our latest dates from the North are July 9. No mails later than the 8th, though several steamers have arrived. I wish I could send you newspapers.

The following is from a citizen of Mobile to a friend in London :—

MOBILE, July 4.

Our city is quiet, as we all have made up our minds never to surrender if every brick is blown down. Beauregard thinks it is well fortified—it makes not much difference; there will be no more surrendering of places after the trial of our sister city, New Orleans. We feel that our city had better be destroyed than fall into the hands of a Butler. Not half of his brutality is known even now, only to those who live there, who are suffering from his cruelties. The men are in the army; so, if he cannot catch the men, he will punish the women and children; but his day has not come yet. Do you, for a moment think we will let him keep New Orleans? Wait till we whip them from our border States. Butler is busy—but he will have more to do. The Northern papers we get have so little truth in them that they give little pleasure in reading; such unfounded statements I never read! We laugh at their accounts of the battles; all our glorious victories they claim, no matter how fast they ran. Charleston will never surrender; Vicksburg will not, it will be stormed down sooner; and all our planters burn up their cotton as soon as the Yankees come near; they won't let them have sugar, molasses, or cotton. If they get a little sugar or cotton, they make a great ado about it; but by the time their gunboats are in sight, the cotton is flaming at a perfect bonfire rate. What do they do with the poor negroes? Look at that truthful account in Norfolk, look at Port Royal! Steal them, ship them off for sale, taking them from their families. Many escape and get back to their owners as soon as they can. We, the Southern Confederacy, have no more idea of giving up than we have of going to Europe in a balloon. None, none. Certainly everything is very high, but we will drink parched corn for ten years longer; we gave up our coffee and tea without a murmur; sugar is high, for our people destroy it to prevent the Yankees from getting any; molasses, too. But we have meal, meat, and flour now. If it were not that our noble young men were being sacrificed, our trouble would not be so bad. R— left for Chattanooga to-day, to be on General Leadbetter's staff.

A NORTHERN VIEW OF THE FEDERAL POSITION.

The following is an extract from a letter of a German officer, late in the Northern Army :—

New York, August 3.

On account of the bad times, I have allowed myself to be again persuaded to undertake the temporary post of recruiting officer for the army, but intend shortly to quit my position altogether, and, with wife and children, to emigrate to Canada.

Matters are now worse than had in the North, above all here in New York, where poverty and discontent have reached a point at which riots and a revolution may be daily expected. Last week, in transporting a few hundred recruits to the Potomac Army, I had an opportunity of visiting many of the camps. The soldiers, one and all, were shocking in appearance. Ragged, dirty, dead-beat, mostly totally discouraged, they were quite destitute, having lost in their flight baggage, tents, and cooking utensils—and yet they were driven to dig entrenchments, cut down wood, and do picket duty; for the enemy was still in their immediate front.

Shortly before I left, it was rumoured that the enemy was retiring, and at last the poor fellows were allowed to rest after the fatigues of the lost battles and the retreat, and to look after the requirements of their empty stomachs.

Everywhere the most extravagant prices, and the times at Yorktown, when we paid $1 per lb. for bad cheese, were outdone. Notwithstanding the greatest exertions, the commissariat was unable, for the first week, to supply more than the barest necessities, and the poor soldiers, having lost their kettles, were quite unable to prepare their food. Every one cooks as best he can, in anything he can lay his hands on, even with mere bits of broken pots. The health of the army is of course, under such circumstances, lamentable, particularly as the heat is stifling, and they have no good water. The regiments lying near the shore of the James River are the best off in this respect, for though the water is brackish it is still very much better than that which is drunk by the division in advance. The district in which the army is lying is hilly, traversed by belts of wood and swamps. The ground is for the most part stiff clay and marl, covered with a crust of black mould, 18 inches. The want of water induces the soldiers to dig their own wells, but they are unable to dig deep enough to penetrate the marl, and consequently, all the water is impregnated with particles of clay and marl in solution, proved by the white blue colour it exhibits.

All these causes, to which must be added the results of the great fatigue and hardships encountered, and the miserable treatment of the sick, have produced a state of health, or rather the want of it, in the army which it is heartrending to look at. Many a wife's husband, many a mother's son, lies under the thousands of little hillocks, which have almost obliterated the green grass for a time. The American generals are either rogues or traitors to their country, or if not, the greatest blockheads that ever walked in uniform. The call of Halleck to Washington will infuse neither confidence nor hope into the army, for if McClellan be called an entrenchment-digger, Halleck is the gravedigger, for he has not distinguished himself in anything else—and such a fellow they make commander-in-chief!

Foreign Correspondence.

NEW YORK, Aug. 23.

Again we have news of thrilling importance, involving no less than the retreat, in the most rapid manner, of the whole of Pope's army towards Aquia Creek, thereby abandoning the whole region of Culpepper and the Rapidan! Thus far the news is only known in a garbled and unsatisfactory form, for the reason that the Administration, true to its detestable instincts, withholds the real facts of the case—indeed, all facts—for up to this (Saturday) morning it has not allowed a line respecting the retreat to be published, although it took place four days ago!

What we know in substance, through a couple of correspondents, is as follows :—On the 18th, while at Cedar Mountain, Pope received a pretty strong intimation, by the driving in of his pickets, that the enemy was upon him—that their force numbered 150,000—that they intended to flank and cut up his army, and then move straight on to Maryland and Washington. They had already crossed the Rapidan by fording at three different points, and Pope, not daring to offer fight, ordered the whole army at midnight to march without delay for Culpepper. The orders were at once obeyed; but Pope anxious to save his own neck, did not wait to accompany the army, but mounted his horse and rode briskly to Culpepper, which place he reached in two hours. His army, half frantic from the suddenness of the order—the rumoured nearness of the rebels—and the flight of their "valiant" General, commenced their line of march as best they could, and succeeded in reaching Culpepper about daybreak, the enemy being hard upon them, there was no time to be lost, and Pope ordered the march to be resumed, which order was obeyed; while the march was proceeding, and when near Warrenton, it is reported that the rebels overtook a part of the Union Army, and defeated it with severe loss, including a number of heavy guns. It was in this engagement, it is said, that Colonel Coulter, of the 11th Pennsylvania was killed. The advance of the Union Army continued its march, and when last heard from was some fifteen miles distant from its starting point, and nearing Aquia Creek, with the view, doubtless of endeavouring to effect a junction with McClellan. During his flight, which, as I have stated, was most rapid,

Pope was compelled to leave his sick and wounded, with a vast amount of stores and baggage on the road, all of which fell into the hands of the Confederates.

Where the latter army now is, we know not. It occupied Culpepper on Wednesday, but since then it has probably pushed forward, and it may be, as ere this, given the whole combined Federal army battle. The Confederates are understood to be under command of Generals Jackson, Lee, Ewell, Longstreet, and (it is reported) Magruder. There will be terrible fighting when the two armies meet either of the steamers sailing to-day, should they be intercepted off Cape Race, may carry out intelligence of the result.

Another most important item is the evacuation of Fort Donelson by the Federals. No particular reason is assigned for the evacuation, though I rather suspect the rumour that the Confederates intended marching upon the fort had something to do with the retreat. The Federals console themselves for the loss of the fort, by saying that "the position is no longer of value;" but this is something that the Confederates will test by-and-bye. The capture of this fort last February must be still fresh in your memory; it fell into the hands of the Federals after a fight of three days, a loss of nearly 5000 men on both sides, and the capture of over 12,000 Confederates as prisoners. The victory, with all the laurels won by the Federals, was dearly bought; and now they have abandoned the fort altogether.

From Kentucky we hear that Somerset and Monticello have been taken by the Confederates, while Clarksville, in Tennessee, and Neostro and Carthage, in south-western Missouri, are also in their possession. So we go, victory upon victory, perching upon the banners of the South, while throughout the North the despondency is perfectly fearful.

If the Washington rumours are true, Butler's race in New Orleans is about run. Many of his acts while there have been denounced by the Hon. Reverely Johnson, one of the oldest lawyers in the country, as wholly unjustifiable, and the Government will be compelled not only to make restitution, but to apologize for his infamous conduct. The report of his recall I have no doubt is correct, as the whole city would be ruined were he to remain there three months longer. The recent advices from France are not favourably received by the Government, as it fears that sooner or later, and perhaps at an early day, the Confederacy will be recognized, and the moral weight, at least, of France be thrown in its support. The remark of the Emperor to Mr. Sidel, that "England was the only barrier in the way," if correct, shows at once that Napoleon is fully ready to take the South by the hand, and that the hesitancy of England is all that keeps him back. This is actually believed here, and hence the anxiety of the Government upon the subject, which is represented as so great that it has determined to send Mr. Weed again to England and France for the purpose of keeping an eye upon the movements of the Confederate Commissioners, and thwarting their plans if possible. As to Messrs. Adams and Dayton, the recognized ministers of the United States at England and France, they are regarded as no match at all against Messrs. Sidel and Mason, while Dayton is particularly useless, as he does not speak French at all. The Administration, therefore, feels that a more able man is required to handle the rebel Commissioners, and hence the despatch of Weed as a special Ambassador. Why it does not recall both Adams and Dayton, and appoint more competent ministers in their places, is more than I can say, unless it be that it has not more suitable men at its command.

But, in my way of thinking, neither Weed's efforts, nor the efforts of any other Northern Representative, will be able to strike down the inevitable result, for that the Confederacy will ere long be recognized by not only France, but England and all the other Powers of Europe, is as certain as that those Powers exist.

Has England or France, either one, ever contemplated, in all its fearful responsibility, the hour when there shall not be a single bale of American cotton in their manufactories, or the leading cities of Liverpool and Havre. Is it possible now to conceive the awful crisis that will then be felt? So long as a man has a shilling in his pocket, he perhaps does not imagine that he shall ever starve, and so, too, while there remains a few thousand bales of American cotton in England and France, the dreadful thought of a cotton famine will not receive that attention which will be demanded when the day of exhaustion and famine really looms up in all its ghastly proportions.

That hour will be the test of action on the part of England and France, for neither Government will be able to resist the tremendous pressure that will then be felt. With every mill closed—with millions thrown out of employ, with stagnation here, and starvation there—and a commercial crisis, such as was never before felt existing, while the whole could be relieved by the raising of the blockade, and the liberation of the two and a-half million bales of cotton now on the plantations. We shall soon see what Government is able to stem the flood.

Lord Palmerston has declared that not "at present,"—does he see any reason to change the position of neutrality? but this does not argue that he may not both see and have a reason some day, and that day will be when the cotton famine is leading its maddening desolation through all the once thriving districts of the nation.

Has the South deceived either England or France, or any other power? Has she given way one iota in her fixed and stern resolve at the commencement of the war? Has she loosed her hold from her crops of cotton, tobacco, rice, and naval stores? Does she not still hold them as with a vice, from the grasp of her invader, and would be, destroyer?

Do you think she will ever yield!

Let the noble—the self-sacrificing—the patriotic past answer.

"They behold no object save the right,
And look on death as beautiful."

No! the South has not deceived you, but the North has. Before the first sword was drawn, Seward declared at an Astor House banquet that "there would be no war, and that the present excitement would blow over in sixty days." When the flag was hauled down from Sumter, and 75,000 men were ordered out by the North, Seward extended his sixty to ninety days, and since then he has been repeating his ninety days whenever asked with respect to the termination of the war. In all this Europe was deceived.

It was also deceived in the promise of cotton. By January 1, 1862, one million bales of the previous year's crop were to be landed in Liverpool and Havre; but were they? Let the famishing operatives of Europe answer!

Again were you deceived by the announcement that the ports would be opened, and that cotton would come to market; has it come, or does it look like coming? No! a crown, a pound, laid in the lap of the needy, but martyr-like planter, does not bring it from its secure resting place, though a soft whisper of peace would hurry it all to the seaboard at one quarter the sum now offered. With peace the world will have cotton, without it it must exist the best it can. In all this, I repeat, the South has not deceived you, but the North has. It remains, therefore, for Europe to weigh the two in the balance, and make her decision accordingly.

Gold rules firmer under the Federal defeats, and classes at 16½ premium; stocks are flat, exchange is held at 28 for A 1. On Wednesday the Government ran out of funds, and was forced to obtain a loan for 3,000,000 dollars, on 7.30 notes, in Wall-street, at about 104½.

(From our Commercial Correspondent.)

NEW YORK, August 19.

The premium on gold and, consequently, that on exchange on London, has advanced. The upward movement will continue, and the rise will be rapid as soon as the importers realize on their stocks of merchandize. The foreign bankers have not yet reduced their balances; to do so would entail a heavy loss, as the money they owe to Europe was drawn for at a much lower rate of exchange than is now current. The investments of this class of persons are in stocks and promissory notes, as well as Government securities, as collateral, which pay them greater interest than they are charged in their accounts current, which are kept in sterling figures. As a general thing, they are a very heavy, stupid set of men, and have been much flattered in this country; before all is over they are likely to pay for their vanity and ignorance. It is strange that persons who have the control of so much money should not have been better informed as to the past, be capable of realizing the present, and have intellect sufficient to look into the future. New York has been a turnpike road over which the productions of the South and the surplus funds of Europe have passed, and these foreign bankers are merely the tollgate keepers. No war has ever taken place in a commercial country without bringing disaster and ruin upon the leading moneyed classes; for a time they seem to be benefited by the vast Governmental expenditure, but the end is always the same. There has been some neglect in the education of the financial monarchs of Wall-street, or they would not be willing listeners to the voice of the charmer, Mr. Chase. The collapse is imminent, and will be very sudden in its character when it does come. The new cloud of Treasury issues has not yet been "lowered upon our heads." What a shower there will be when it descends! And yet very few persons have prepared an ark of safety to meet this deluge. It is not easy to see who the fortunate Noah will be.

The speech of Mr. Lincoln to the committee of coloured gentlemen" was a got-up affair, written by Mr. Seward, in order to retain the Border States. It is, however, the only truthful expression that "Old Abe" has made; he knows very well that the Caucasian and African races cannot live on terms of equality; that Sambo is not "a man and a brother." The inhabitants of London, in 1787, were also aware of this fact when they cleared all the negroes out of their city. The Abolitionists are very much offended at the remarks of the President.

Volunteering is somewhat on the increase, but not to the extent stated by the newspapers. There will be a row on September 1, when drafting goes into operation; on that day the Federal tax-collector appears. Neither the drafts of Mr. Stanton or Mr. Chase are likely to be honoured. The Confederates have been very successful in the West, and if they have a fair run of luck in Virginia within the next week they are not unlikely so to undermine the national edifice that it will tumble to pieces, and "great will be the fall thereof."

PARIS, September 2.

(From an occasional Correspondent.)

Although the French press has been very much occupied with the movements of Garibaldi, and discussions as to the policy of the Emperor, and who represents it; yet the American question has not been lost sight of. On the contrary, it must have been perceptible to all readers of the Parisian press, that the question has recently assumed a new interest and importance in the eyes of its conductors, and is beginning to be understood in its full proportions, as effecting the destinies of both the white and the black races on both continents.

Until within the last few weeks, the mad-dog cry of "Slavery," had been sufficient to choke off all the time advocates of the South in the French press, or alarm them into apologies. But recently a bolder tone has been adopted, in consequence of the possession of more accurate knowledge of the real state of affairs, North and South. Mr. Lincoln rode the "Hobby horse," very successfully while the animal was kept in the stable; but since he has put him out to show his paces, and kicked and spurred him so unmercifully, the animal has thrown him off into the mud.

To drop metaphor, the conviction is beginning to dawn upon the French mind, as it has long since on the English, that the talk at the North about the negro has been sheer hypocrisy, as all their acts show enmity and repugnance to that unfortunate race—unfortunate, because made the footballs of a pseudo-philanthropy.

For the first time several of the leading journals, and especially the semi-official ones, have denounced and exposed this hypocrisy, and have silenced the silly slander which was raised by journals in the interest of the North—the Orleans Princes, or the Red Republicans.

The recent publication of M. de Leon's brochure, "La Verite sur les Etats Confederes," has given fresh points to slave discussions, for in that pamphlet the ground is first taken boldly that the South has nothing to apologise for in her "peculiar institution"; that she is the best friend of the African race; that the question of slavery really is not at the bottom of this quarrel; and, finally, that the negro sympathises with his Southern friend, and hates and distrusts the Yankee, as he has right good reason to do.

The French press have taken up and re-echoed these—to them, novel ideas—and the portrait of "Jefferson Davis, first President of the Confederate States," which forms the frontispiece of the publication, has won golden opinions for the South. No man can look upon that countenance, as contrasted with Abraham Lincoln, without feeling that the cause of North and South is aptly typified by its representatives.

Such things as these go a great way towards the formation of public opinion in countries where the utterances of the press are not entirely free, and where each journal speaks under some special "inspiration."

The South owes much to the writers who have laboured so diligently in the press of France and England to dissipate the clouds of falsehood which have been wafted across the Atlantic by our unscrupulous "brethren" of the North. They have borne the heat and burden of the day. At least, they should have their labours acknowledged when that work is done.

At some future time I may give you some notices of their corps, and the work they have accomplished, and are now diligently performing.

The French press now stands divided into two classes—those who, like the Opinion Nationale, the Siecle, and the Journal des Debats, are violently hostile to the South, and cling to the fallen fortunes of the North with a fidelity worthy of a better cause—who relash all the state and cold calumnies, abandoned even by the North itself; and those, which like the Constitutionnel, the Pays, and the Patrie, and the new journal La France, now boldly proclaim the cause of the South to be that of justice and right, and its success now sure and speedy.

The provincial press now commences, also, to take up the question, as seriously affecting the industry of France and the comforts of her people; and within the last few weeks the journals of Lyons, Lille, Bordeaux, and other depôts of manufacturing industry, have contained very strong articles in favour of the South.

Strong as the Emperor is in his own iron will, and the prestige of his name and popularity, so serious a step as recognition would not be taken by him without the expressed wish of his people. Hence the expressions of sympathy for the South, and appeals for its recognition as an independent State to open commercial relations with France, strengthen the resolve of the Emperor, not to allow the dead weight of England to impede his action in the cause of humanity and international law much longer.

It is well known here, that the Emperor has recently declared most distinctly and publicly to English gentlemen and members of Parliament, that he had been restrained from recognition of the Confederate States for months past by the determined opposition of Lords Palmerston and Russell, and their repeated refusals to co-operate with him in that measure. Now that the Garibaldian knot has been cut through by the sword of Victor Emmanuel, and the storm raised by that great conspirator is sighing itself to rest, Napoleon III. is again master of the situation, and when the fleet and army sent to Mexico have given him a piéd à terre on the other continent, he will be still more so.

If, then, the issue of the great battle now waging in Virginia, or perhaps already concluded, be fortunate for us, and Providence does not design to chasten us yet a little more before our final triumph, the day is not far distant when Europe, headed by its great leader, will acknowledge formally the birth of a new State in the Southern Confederacy.

PARIS, September 3.

The excitement produced by Garibaldi's rash expedition has subsided. He proclaimed to the world that he would shortly enter Rome, or die under its walls. He has not entered Rome, and he is alive, although slightly wounded. The Italian Government have shown at last that they were in earnest in their will to put down one of the most unjustifiable attempts at civil war ever attempted. It is said that Garibaldi has asked to go to America, probably with the idea of enjoying the freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of taxes, and freedom of all sorts, which Messrs. Lincoln, Stanton, Seward, and Chase have bestowed so lavishly on the United States, and of lending them a hand in their effort to subjugate half of the inhabitants of ex-Union by means of compelling the other half to fight against its will.

But the capture of Garibaldi and his followers (all mere boys), has not put an end to the controversy on Italian affairs, and it is difficult to form an opinion on its solution. The discussion between the Constitutionnel, (M. de Persigny's organ) and La France has broken out afresh. This morning, the last-named paper had the following printed conspicuously at the top of its first column:—

Next Friday, we will publish a letter addressed to the chief editor of La France, upon THE ABANDONMENT OF ROME, by M. the Viscount de La Guéronnière, Senator.

The Constitutionnel seems to ask for the evacuation of Rome by the French army, for the end of the political sovereignty of the Pope, and for Rome becoming the capital of Italy. M. de La Guéronnière will certainly advocate a different policy. Adverting to its promised answer to the Constitutionnel's arguments, La France says, "From that time, it will be no more possible to entertain any doubts upon respective opinions, and both positions shall be openly and fully defined. It will be known then that upon this question, the most serious that ever existed, there are two different lines of policy amongst the men who are equally devoted to the Emperor's Government."

The news from Mexico is very meagre. The Patrie has published an account of General Scott's campaign in Mexico, from the pen of M. de Bazancourt. The old warrior is sadly affected by regret and remorse, if I can believe reports from some of his former friends. He sees plainly now the absurdity and the wickedness of the course followed by the Washington Government, and is an earnest advocate of peace.

Little Montenegro has come out second best in its fight against the Turks. They are about patching up a treaty, which, of course, is to be very soon violated by both parties, and we shall witness a new round.

The condition of Poland is rather cloudy at present. You know that two successive attempts have recently been made on the life of Marquis Wielopolski, besides the one against the Grand Duke himself. The guilty parties have just been sentenced and executed; and we hear from Warsaw:—

An inquiry is open on the attempt at poisoning from which the Marquis Wielopolski had a narrow escape. The authorities are in hopes of discovering the perpetrators, as the poisonous substance which was used is of such a nature that only very few people could procure or employ it.

It seems that the poison was contained in a letter, written in a very small hand, so as to oblige the Marquis to bring it close to his eyes, and the poison was powerful enough to make him very ill, from merely having breathed it for an instant. There appears to be a permanent conspiracy in Warsaw for taking the life of all high officials.

In Paris there is a general migration of all persons whose means and position in life enables them to leave town for a while. You know that September is the great month of holidays in France. Then "La chane est ouverte"—all the modern Nimrods have taken the field. What a noise! What an excitement! What a display of genuine hunting outfits, of bright clean double-barrelled guns, of pretended thorough-bred curs, of vast and ingenious game-bags, many of which are very likely to be filled up at some distant game-seller's shop! A true hunter is really an agreeable companion to his wife and friends—going out before daybreak, coming back very late, starving and harassed, covered with dust and mud; generally blaming his bad luck, angry with himself and ill-tempered towards everybody; totally unfit for anything but scolding, eating, and sleeping. Sometimes he has had better luck. If you ever met him, then it would be cruel to bring back to your memory the endless stories which you had to endure. If you never were under the painful trial, beware of it, by all means.

But what shall I say of the city man, who leaves his shop or his office to go and hopelessly walk miles and miles, with no other object than to endeavour to murder a poor bird who never offended him? They forget the great precept—Since you cannot create, be loth of destroying. If these men were offered a good salary, and much less trouble, to devote themselves to some useful purpose, they would say "No" at once. But as soon as there is a chance of killing, here they are. Why?—killing dangerous animals is right, and, when attended with peril, it is a noble sport. Again, to kill those that are required for our food is quite natural, although we leave the work generally to the butcher, or to our cooks. But killing for the pleasure of killing has always awakened in my mind a sensation of disgust.

Speaking of animals, there has been a man who, for more than two years, gave to the Parisian public the exciting spectacle of his mastering, with no other power than his steady courage and cool bravery, lions, panthers, and Bengal tigers. Charles le Dompteur, pale, but with quiet determination, often said, before opening the tiger's cage, "I am going in, but I don't know at all whether I shall walk out." Charles was tall, and endowed with herculean strength; but a disease of the heart, probably the result of his terrible profession, terminated fatally with him a few days ago. He was one of the kindest, frankest, most excellent-hearted men that could be found.

Another actor, whose name stood very high at the time of romantisme échevelé, has also left the stage of life. His fame was contemporary to the great epoch when melodrama was all the rage; and he had the honour of personifying Alexandre Dumas' Anthony. An eyeglass, a poetical head of hair, a dark expression of the eyes, a satanic, general bearing, straw coloured gloves, a black coat buttoned up to the chin, a long and slender figure, rather bent forward, the face very pale—and the whole affair a living picture of fatality—such was the admired prototype in Paris twenty-five years ago. It is all over now: and some of the fast Anthonys of that time have undergone such transformation as being now great capitalists in the Credit Mobilier.

During the months of May, June, and July, the shipments of dry goods, wines, &c., to New York, from Havre, and Bordeaux, were large; they were made in order to reach there before the high tariff went into operation; but the parties interested have not yet received any remittances, their consignees writing to them that it was impossible to make sales for cash to cover the cost, and that they knew not who to trust. This looks very bad for the North. The wheat crop throughout France, Savoy, and Nice, is, as I hinted some time ago, 10 per cent. above the average, and we shall probably be able to greatly help England.

THE RETALIATORY ORDER.

(From the Richmond Enquirer, August 4.)

It appears the orders from the War Department in Washington, and of General Pope and his subaltern Steinwehr, received of our Government that immediate attention which was due to proceedings so heinous and so broad in their application. Nothing which has occurred in the practical conduct of the war has more deeply offended and aroused the indignation and resentment of our people, than the outrages which it is the object of the order from our War Department to redress.

The promptness and the resolution with which the case has been met by our excellent President, will be hailed by our people as another proof of the vigilance and fidelity with which he watches over their rights and dignity.

The subject was one which demanded a careful consideration under the lights of wisdom and the promptings of courage. It is very easy to cry out in favour of raising "the black flag;" but those who really desire it are very inconsiderate. War is terrible enough at best, and it especially does not become a people looking to the high stand for honour, and chivalry, and refinement, which we aspire to take among the nations, to add to its horrors. President Davis, therefore, expresses a very proper and sincere regret at being forced to take cognizance of conduct on the part of the enemy so utterly opposed to the dictates of humanity and to the rules of civilized war, as to demand the sternest treatment. Nothing was left, however, but to desert our fellow-citizens—the old man and the infant, the matron and the maid—and leave them exposed to all the atrocities of a plundering and murdering soldiery, licensed and even comradoed to plunder and murder under the published orders of their chief, or else to repress such barbarities by the intimidation and sting of retaliation. The discharge of this painful and solemn duty the President has not shunned. The people will sustain, nay, even applaud it; for there was no alternative but ignominy and ruin. The civilized world will justify it as absolutely forced upon us, and will fasten the blame upon our atrocious enemies, to whom it entirely belongs. The consequences of this step we are yet to see.

We trust it will bring the madmen at Washington to their senses, and that they will henceforth restrain their malice within the conventional bounds. If, however, the result should be otherwise—if, instead of redress, they should respond by new outrages—it is easy to see that quickly the rules of war will all be laid aside, and extermination become the watchword of the strife. Deploable as this would be, yet we shrink not from it if forced upon us. We will meet the foul foe on any and on all terms, resolved in no event to submit, but to wage the war till conquered peace shall crown our independence, and sanction our complete and eternal separation.

Let our people and our soldiery prepare themselves for the new order of things, and for whatever may follow. The terrors of war may increase upon us; but they will increase upon our foes in still greater degree. Our soldiers, who may soon confront the lines of Pope in battle, are, many of them, the husbands, the sons, the brothers of the gentle wives, the feeble parents, and the tender sisters, who now groan under Pope's intolerable oppression. Need any one guess how these will fight when fighting for the rescue? We imagine it hardly needed authority from the War Department to consider Pope as forfeit if he should be met by one of them! Nay, their sympathizing comrades from other sections and other States would have shared their vengeance to the full, and assisted gladly in the righteous retribution.

It will be seen that, for the present, the President has withdrawn the protection due to prisoners of war only from those who voluntarily share in Pope's enormities. The private soldier is bound by his enlistment. The commissioned officer may resign if he hates his work; by retaining his straps he becomes a party to the wickedness, and justly forfeits all claim to clemency.

We take the occasion to say that the President is also demanding redress for the outrages of the enemy in other quarters. Government (although captious critics seem not to understand it) has to act with dignity, and with certainty as to facts. To obtain these facts sometimes occasions what seems to be delay; but the people may rest in full confidence that whatever is proper to be done will be attended to by our Government with all the dispatch consistent with the nature of the duty. We have authority for saying that communications were sent to the Lincoln Government some weeks since, respecting the execution of Mumford at New Orleans, and other outrages committed by the Yankee generals; but no reply has yet been received. Another demand has recently been made in regard to them and the additional atrocities perpetrated by the Lincoln officials in different parts of the Confederate States. A short time has been given to the Federal authorities within which to reply, before orders will be issued for the execution of the measures necessary for the repression of these outrages also.

The following is an extract from a well-authenticated letter, dated Baltimore, July 31:—

The Federal atrocities in Virginia far outstrip all tales of fiction. Rape, arson, and theft seem to be the constant attendants of an army professing to fight for the Union. A recital of the horrible murders that mark its bloody track, one could suppose, would appeal the doomed of Hades.

I will cite one case which happened to a distant relative of ours last week:—Mrs. Fitzhugh, of Ravensworth, the mother of the late Captain Andrew Fitzhugh, of the navy—a lady of distinguished position, and one singularly embodying the virtues and graces of her sex, was brutally murdered in front of her house. Ravensworth, the family seat of the Fitzhughs, you know, is one of the oldest estates in Virginia; it has been in the family since the reign of Charles II., from whom it was received as a grant, and has ever been noted as a place where a profuse hospitality was dispensed by as gentle and refined a people as live.

The old lady, who was over eighty years of age, infirm and blind, leaning on the arm of her maid, was taking a little exercise in front of her mansion, when the girl suddenly cried out, "Mistress, there come the Yankees;" and in her terror ran towards the house close by, when Mrs. Fitzhugh called out to her, "Don't leave me alone with these vile Yankees;" when one of them approached, and with the butt of his gun killed her. Shortly after, her two daughters, who had been on a visit to a neighbour, returned. One of them was seized and carried to Washington a prisoner; the other, who was so appalled at seeing her mother weltering in her blood, became speechless. This one they left, with the remark, "You can bury the old hag." Is it a wonder the people cry out, "The heathen have come into thine inheritance, O Lord! Thy holy temple have they defiled; the dead bodies of thy servants have they given to be meat unto the fowls of the air, and the flesh of thy saints unto the beasts of the field."

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

OUR friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any rate, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HORTZ, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 25s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. Advertisements to be forwarded to the publisher at 102, Fleet-street.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 4, 1862.

The Federal Position in the South.

A LENGTHENED comment on the present aspect of the war in America would be superfluous. Late events are too significant to be misunderstood, and Northern ingenuity is vainly exerted to conceal the disastrous failure of the Northern invasion. To those, indeed, who have not watched the course of events, or to those who have placed any faith in the boastings and promises of the Federals, the present position of the armies of the United States, must appear all but miraculous. Where is the great army of the Potomac, that went forth to conquer, that was so surely to be in Richmond before the 4th of July? It no longer exists. The remnant of it that remained after the seven days' battle, since then terribly depleted by pestilence, has retreated from the Peninsula. A portion of it has been landed at Aquia Creek, and at the last advices the rest was waiting at Yorktown for transports to convey it to the same place. On the present occasion a retreat is not designated a grand strategic movement, but the people of New York openly rejoice at the escape of McClellan's army from a position in which it could not attack, and in which it was being daily wasted by sickness. The extent of the sufferings of that army, from the time it was established on the banks of the James River until it retreated, will never be fully known, but what is known cannot be adequately described by the most graphic pen. It is probable that McClellan would be able to effect a junction with Pope, although at the time we write we have no information that it is accomplished.

General Pope, from whom so much was expected, has done nothing but imitate General McClellan's strategy of retreat. The Battle of Cedar Mountain disorganized his plans and crippled his strength. After that affair, which he claimed as a victory, he reported that he was pursuing General Jackson, and then that pursuit was checked by the sudden rise of the Rapidan River. For what followed we are not, fortunately, altogether indebted to Northern accounts. We learn that the enemy, whom he pretended to pursue, unexpectedly renewed the attack, and with so much success that General Pope was obliged to retreat in haste, to leave behind him a large portion of his artillery and of his camp equipage, and that he even had to abandon his personal baggage, and that he was so hard pressed that he had not the brief leisure to secure his official despatches, maps, and valuable papers relating to the campaign. In a word, General Pope did not retreat, but rather, fled. He crossed the Rappahannock, and has joined the army of McClellan, or a portion of it on the north bank of that river. On the south bank are the Confederates in great force, and with powerful artillery no doubt, but not with fifteen miles of established batteries, as the Northern telegram reports. General Pope hopes to be able to hold his ground until he is reinforced; but he will have to wait some time for reinforcements. New levies are not made ready and equipped for the field in a few days. The Federals, threatened in their front by the Confederate troops lately occupied on the James River and elsewhere, and in their flank or rear by General Jackson, are obviously in a critical situation. They do not threaten Richmond, but rather seek to protect Washington. If they remain where they are a battle is imminent, but it is not unlikely that they may decline the contest, and retire on Washington. If so, or if they are defeated, the Confederate forces will be free to act in other quarters. We will not speculate on events which before this may have been decided.

Our attention has to some extent been rivetted on Virginia, but the state of affairs in other States is equally important. For example, Mr. Lincoln, in estimating the available resources of the United States, has calculated upon raising 150,000 men from Kentucky, Missouri, and Maryland; but these States are Southern, and are now declaring themselves; so that they will aid the South, and not the North; and not only does Mr. Lincoln lose these men, but he must raise additional forces in the Northern States to cope with them. Another important element is the Secession sympathy in Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. Missouri has risen, and many towns and important points are in the hands of the Confederates, and the Confederate army organized in Texas is already making its way through Arkansas to aid the Missonrians in driving out the invader. Kentucky is described by the Federals as swarming with guerilla bands; the leading citizens, both by word and deed, are confessing their allegiance to the Confederate States. Confederate forces have entered at three points; the Federal communication with Tennessee is cut off. Somerset has lately been captured, and other important possessions occupied. The Governor has resigned. In this emergency some regiments have been sent from Indiana, which, we are told, are fully equipped, and only lack discipline.

We have said that the Federal situation in Virginia is critical, and the observation may be applied with even greater justice to the situation of General Buell. Considering how the Federal army of the West has been reduced by sickness and by battle, and how little it has been reinforced, it cannot number more than 100,000 men. Unlike the army in Virginia, it is not only pressed, but surrounded. General Bragg has a large force under his command at Chattanooga, General Kirby Smith has a considerable force in East Tennessee, a large body of Confederate cavalry are in the Federal rear, and altogether not less than 150,000 Confederate troops menace General Buell. No wonder the North is anxious about the Western army.

Such is the aspect of affairs; and we are told New York is more cheerful. Judging from this, we may assume that further Confederate successes will produce boisterous hilarity.

Recognition: Europe, England, and the English Government.

SOME weeks ago the representatives of the Confederate States in London and Paris addressed to the Governments of England and France a demand for recognition. Lord Russell returned a distinct refusal. M. Thouvenel has not yet given an official reply, but it is understood that the purport of his formal answer will be that France declines to act in the matter apart from England. There can be no doubt that in returning such a reply the Emperor displays not only a high value for the English alliance, but a moderation and good sense the more honourable that they are not very easy to the ruler of a high-spirited, and somewhat wilful people. France is accustomed to take her own way, and is never willing to be controlled or guided by the policy of any foreign Power. The French people are especially jealous of any influence exercised over their Government, or any check imposed upon its action, by the necessity of deference to the wishes of England. They would have been glad to see the Confederacy recognized, and none the less if the recognition had been given by the Emperor in disregard of English remonstrances. They are not, perhaps, altogether pleased at the preponderant weight which rumour assigns to the opinion of the English Government in directing the joint policy of the two Powers towards the American belligerents. They would hardly be sorry to see that joint policy exchanged for separate and decisive action on the part of France. But the Emperor has adhered firmly and, as we think, wisely to the determination originally adopted on both sides of the Channel, and the Governments of France and England have acted throughout in concert; England, as the country most interested, probably deciding when any difference of opinion occurred, the course to be taken by both in common. With France and England combined, even Mr. Seward would not dare to quarrel, and a formal expression of their joint judgment, conveyed by such an act as the recognition of the Confederate Government, would have a powerful and wholesome influence on the opinion of the Northern people, and the conduct of the Federal Cabinet. We are not, therefore, surprised that France determined to await the consent of England. But it is not easy to understand why our Government should resist recognition. France wishes to accord it; Russia is ready to follow the lead of France. It is only the strenuous opposition of the British Cabinet which prevents it. Were that opposition once withdrawn, the formal acknowledgment of their independence by the chief Powers of Europe would instantly put the Confederate States on a level with their assailants and with all other Powers before the world. It is the Government of England alone which causes to be withheld from a people of English race and strong English sympathies the privilege to which they have established their right at the sword's point, in conflict with our most inveterate enemies. Why should this be?

The English people would eagerly welcome the acknowledgment of the Confederate States. The growth of knowledge as to the nature and origin of the quarrel, the conduct of the Federal Government, the reign of terror established in the "loyal" States, the savage brutality displayed by the invading armies towards unoffending citizens and helpless women and children, the stupid falsehoods and contemptible braggadocio of Mr. Seward and his colleagues, the wanton insults heaped upon Great Britain, have alienated the sympathies of all but a few very un-English fanatics from the Federal cause. The dignity and good sense of the Confederate Government, the splendid exploits of the Southern armies, the heroism and patience of the Southern people, have won for the South the cordial admiration and good-will of ninety-nine in every hundred Englishmen. It is generally felt that in such a matter the action of the Government must not be hindered or hastened by Parliamentary compulsion or popular agitation; and therefore the House of Commons refused to insist on immediate recognition, and the people have forbore to press it. But the tone of public opinion on the subject is too decided to be mistaken by so clear-sighted a statesman as Lord Palmerston, and it is strange that he should have so long opposed himself to the popular wish; the more strange, inasmuch as he must be perfectly aware that the interests and the feelings of England are on this point coincident. Diplomatically, we should have every reason to dread and deprecate the restoration of the Union, if that were a possible contingency. An exaggerated notion of its power, derived chiefly from its vast territorial extent, an extravagant contempt for the rights and the strength of foreign nations, and a restless aggressive temper, natural to most Americans and to all Democracies, made the Federal Government a nuisance to all the world, and especially to England. The Northern lust of territory brought them into constant collision with us; the Southern monopoly of cotton encouraged them to presume on our extreme unwillingness to quarrel with them. It is not our interest that this combination of Northern will and Southern ability to injure us should ever be renewed. It is our interest that there should exist on the Southern frontier of the United States a Power bound to us by ties of nationality and of commerce, antagonistic to them in consequence of wrongs and injuries never to be forgotten, willing and able to support us in putting down their aggressions, and curbing their insolent pretensions. Placed between Canada and the Confederacy, we may be at last relieved from the incessant annoyance we have hitherto sustained at their hands, and from the constant fear that some outrage, more intolerable than usual, would render war inevitable. Commercially, it is our interest to be on friendly terms with the South. We are dependent on Southern agriculture for the material of our staple manufacture; we shall find in Southern consumption the best market for our productions that the world affords. We can do without the trade of the North, if the North be foolish enough to attempt to maintain its preposterous tariffs. The South is necessary to us; a temporary interruption of our trade with it has wrought almost as much mischief and misery as the Irish Famine. In every respect, then, the recognition of the Confederacy is the interest of England.

But further, it is the duty of England. Numerous precedents and conclusive dicta have established the right to recognition of any Government which has satisfactorily proved its ability to maintain order at home and defend itself against aggression from without. Who denies that the Government of the Confederate States fulfils this requirement? From the Southern people it receives as implicit an obedience as France renders to Napoleon III., or England to the Government of the Queen. It is as perfectly organized a Government, as regular in its operation, as well established in its authority, as strong in the loyalty of the country, as any in the world. Against the Federal armies it has held its own; it has defeated them in several pitched battles; it has decidedly worsted them in two campaigns. All rational men in all countries are agreed that its overthrow by the invaders is an utter impossibility. Why, then, is that acknowledgment refused to it which was accorded to Italy while as yet her unity was incomplete—to Belgium when Holland was actually on the point of reducing her to obedience? Is it not the fact that justice is withheld from the Confederate States merely by the personal prejudices or Parliamentary entanglements of the Ministerial leaders, in despite of the immemorial usage, the obvious policy, and the urgent interests of Great Britain?

The war, interrupting commerce, suspending the cotton manufacture, interfering with the freedom of the seas, has been throughout an almost intolerable nuisance to commercial nations; it is fast becoming a scandal to civilized humanity. At New Orleans, General Butler insults, in the foulest manner, the whole female population of a great city, and murders in cold blood a citizen probably innocent, certainly not shown to be guilty even of the trumpery offence of which he was accused. In Alabama, General Mitchell sanctions abominations which make men's blood run cold with horror. In Tennessee, a Governor, intruded on the State by military violence, rivals the atrocities of Haynan. In Mississippi, and in the Carolinas, vain attempts are made to excite the slaves to wholesale murder, incendiarism, and pillage. Here, a Federal army is ordered to subsist by plunder, and devastates the whole country for miles along its track; there, a Federal general being surprised and killed, the Federal soldiery avenge themselves by murdering a score of persons living within a few miles of the place, as well as several wholly unconcerned inhabitants of a neighbouring city. Here, a citizen of Missouri is deliberately assassinated by the mercenaries of the Union on his own threshold and in presence of his wife; there, an aged lady has her head wantonly smashed to pieces by the clubbed muskets of a marauding soldiery. President Davis is driven at last to threaten reprisals. To suppress horrors much less revolting—horrors, too, provoked by the cruelty and treachery of the insurgent people—we interfered between the Sultan and his subjects, and not merely recognized, but assisted to establish, the Revolutionary Government of Greece. Yet now we are found perseveringly resisting that acknowledgment of the assailed country by the European Powers which is absolutely necessary if we would either discountenance the prosecution of the war or mitigate its barbarity.

The recognition of the South by Europe would bring the conduct of the war under the jurisdiction of European opinion—a tribunal for whose decisions Americans entertain a respect, in their own despite, manifested by their intense sensitiveness to European censure and their extravagant eagerness for European praise. So long as they pretend to deal with rebels, and with rebels officially treated as such by European diplomacy, they will affect to consider themselves entitled to carry on the process of punishing rebellion after their own fashion. When Europe shall have formally pronounced that they are waging war against a member of the general family of nations, they can no longer disregard the condemnation with which Europe visits their mode of carrying on that war. They will be compelled, by very shame, to fight like Europeans, and not like savages; to respect women, to abstain from wholesale pillage, to give up the pleasant pastime of murdering unarmed men. More than this—the recognition of the South will tend greatly to accelerate the termination of the war. At present Europe encourages the perseverance of the North by declining to treat the independence of the Confederate States as a fait accompli; and it can hardly be expected that the Federal Government should play the part of Sir John Cope, and blazen to the world the first formal tidings of its own defeat, and of the dissolution of the Union. England was not the first Power to acknowledge the United States; Spain was the last to recognize either the Netherlands or her revolted colonies in America. No dispossessed Government was ever found to admit its own overthrow until the outside world had first adjudicated upon the facts, and recognized the de facto independence of the dispossessors. Not until France and England have given the right hand of fellowship to the new State will the right hand now raised against it quit the hilt of the sword. Not until Europe has formally declared that she knows the cause of the North to be hopeless will the Northern minority venture to avow their own conviction of its hopelessness. To refuse recognition is, therefore, to delay peace. Further, it is to render the offer of mediation impossible. No Government will think of accepting mediation between itself and rebels; no powerful nation will admit mediation in a civil war, as the admission would involve a guarantee by the mediator of the terms of peace, carrying with it a right of subsequent interference fatal to the national independence. It is only when the rebels have become, and are acknowledged to be, a foreign Power, that foreign Powers will be allowed to interpose their good offices. It is only when the parties to a civil war are acknowledged by foreigners to be two distinct nations that they can well invite the interference of foreigners to settle the terms of separation. Not until the Confederate States are recognized by England and France will the North dream of acknowledging their independence on any terms; not till then will a tender of arbitration, as to the conditions of separation be admissible, or have the least chance of acceptance. But when recognition has once been accorded, we are not of those who believe that the North will long persist in the war; much less that it will violently resent this practical expression of disbelief in its vaunts of expected victory. Mr. Seward may write an insolent despatch; the Northern papers may indulge in harmless bluster; demagogues may make indignant speeches—but neither the Government nor the people have the least idea of quarrelling with the great Powers of Western Europe. The heavy discouragement given to the dominant faction, the support afforded to the moderate party, by such a determination on the part of England and France, would probably place substantial power in the hands of the latter, and bring about the speedy abandonment of the war. At least, it would render efficacious and practicable the offer of European mediation, which seems to afford the surest hope of peace. And it is truly marvellous that England, with an interest in the restoration of tranquillity, and in the independence of the Confederate States, far greater than that of any other Power—England, with two millions of her people doomed to want and misery by the war—should be made by her Government the one obstacle to recognition; the one European abettor of Northern obstinacy, aggression, and revenge.

Continental Money, Assignats, and "Green-backs."

From the time of the Revolutionary War to the period of Secession the financial affairs of all the American States had been conducted by the people of the North. The moneys borrowed by the Colonial Congress, and by the United States' Government, or foreign agency, for the respective States, under the Articles of Confederation and the Constitution, were negotiated at or through Philadelphia, until the expiration of the charter of the Bank of the United States in the year 1836, when New York became the fiscal depot for the whole country. The same course was pursued with State, Municipal, Railway, and other Southern bonds and stocks; and even the cotton, tobacco, and rice crops were moved forward, in a great measure, by the medium of agencies of Northern bankers at Southern ports. The people of the South made no complaint about the Northerners having charge of their financial matters; they thought it was natural that such should be the case, when the latter had the advantage of an European connection, and they well knew that there could be but a single financial centre in a league of States that were as one country to all foreign nations. Their grievances were confined principally to the imposition of protective tariffs and the meddling with their domestic concerns. The Southerners were the first people of modern times to promulgate theoretically, and adopt practically, unrestricted free trade; they have always been students of Political Economy, and although in their quiet, agricultural, patriarchal mode of life they trusted the management of their financial concerns to others, they have, since setting up for themselves under the style of the Confederate States of America, exhibited a degree of sagacity on the subject worthy of a nation of Rothschilds or Barings. Under the most trying circumstances, shut out from the world, and thrown entirely upon their own resources, their Treasury Department has been managed with skill, economy, and prudence. Unlike their late allies of the North, they have made no effort to negotiate a loan in this country, and for each emission of their paper they have provided for both principal and interest by taxation. In short, they have acted in every respect with that foresight and judgment which warrants the conclusion that their indebtedness will be promptly met upon its maturity.

The Federal Government, on the other hand, has behaved in a reckless manner in respect to its monetary concerns; while the South has followed in the footsteps of England, the North has repeated the blunders made by the colonies, and subsequently imitated by France. A reference to them at the present time may not be out of place.

Shortly after the delegates from the thirteen separate colonial charter or patent Governments met at Philadelphia to engage in a common cause to resist the enforcement of the Stamp Act of Great Britain, they found themselves involved in war—first, by the skirmish at Lexington, on April 19, 1775, followed by the Battle of Bunker's Hill, on June 17 of that year. They formed a Congress, and one of their first acts was an authorization for the issue of $2,000,000 of paper money, which was increased within twelve months to $20,000,000; and although the ardour of the people for independence was very great, the currency began to depreciate from that time; the decline in its value was, as will be shown, owing to the excess in quantity beyond what could be used by the community for the ordinary purposes of exchange. This cause affected its value only, but had no bearing upon its credit. When it depreciated and fell 75 per cent., large sales were made; many of the acknowledged Tories were tempted to purchase it, and locked it up in their chests, as a matter of speculation. The necessities of the war involved further issues; $200,000,000 were afloat in 1779, and $30 in paper money were freely given in exchange for one silver dollar. At that period Congress intervened and made the "Continental Currency" a legal tender; but doing so accomplished nothing. It simply made it the interest of every man who had debts or taxes to pay to depreciate the money; and it moreover excited the disgust and opposition of all persons who had been injured by it. Congress then passed laws regulating the price of goods, which, from the instability of the paper currency, were unjust and incapable of execution, and hence specie or barter was introduced to supply its place, and by thus diminishing the number of people among whom it circulated it sunk further in value. On March 17, 1780, the amount had increased so much, and the premium on the precious metals risen so high, that Congress resolved to call the emissions of 1777 and 1778 out of circulation, at forty for one or only two and a-half per cent.; this at once impaired the credit of all their issues; for further supplies they had to pay exorbitant prices, and the amount of these Continental "green-backs" reached $500,000,000 by May 7, 1781. So worthless had this currency become at that date, that a large body of the inhabitants of Philadelphia paraded the streets with paper dollars in their hats by way of cockades, displaying colours, with a dog tarred, and instead of the usual ornament of feathers, his back was covered with Continental money. This demonstration of disaffection, immediately under the eyes of the rulers of the revolted provinces, in solemn session at the State House assembled, was directly followed by the jailer, who refused accepting the bills in purchase of a glass of rum, and afterwards by the traders of the city, who shut up their shops, declining to sell any more goods but for gold or silver. It was declared also by the popular voice, that if the opposition to Great Britain was not in future carried on by solid money instead of paper bills, all further resistance to the mother country were in vain, and must be given up. A letter dated August 19, 1780, thus alludes to the state of financial affairs:—

Ten thousand pounds Pennsylvania currency was worth £6000 sterling; £10,000 Continental money is worth £100. The difference makes a loss of £5900 sterling, being as sixty to one. This was the exchange at Philadelphia in June last, and, as they had not then heard of Gates' defeat, it must be now lower. Actions commenced for considerable sums by creditors have been obliged to be withdrawn, or a non-suit suffered; a lawyer of eminence not opening his mouth in a trial of consequence under a fee of £1000, though the legal fee is about forty; and the debt, if recovered, being paid in Continental money, dollar for dollar, worth now but a penny, the difference between a penny and 4s. 6d. sterling, is lost to the receiver. The Congress having called in the former emissions, $40 for one, and giving that one in paper, cuts off every hope of its redemption. The freight of a hoghead of tobacco is £300, or one hoghead for the carriage of another. Instead of the creditor pursuing the debtor with an arrest, the debtor pursues the creditor with a tender of Continental money, and forces the bond out of his hand. Hence it appears what the best fortunes are reduced to; an unpleasant reflection it must be; for time, which lightens all other losses, aggravates the loss of fortune. Every day we feel it more, because we stand more in want of the conveniences we have been used to. On the other hand, new fortunes are made on the ruin of old ones. War, which keeps the spirits in motion, has diffused a taste for gaiety and dissipation. The French resident minister at Philadelphia, gives a rout twice a week to the ladies of that city, amongst whom French hairdressers, milliners, and dancers are all the ton. The Virginia jig has given place to the Cotillion and Minuet de la Cour. Congress has fallen into general contempt, for its want of credit and power; the army is absolute, and has declared it will not submit to a peace made by Congress: the people grumble, but are obliged to surrender one piece of furniture after another to pay their State taxes.

Although the "Articles of Confederation and Perpetual Union," had then been signed by all the States, Connecticut, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire were desirous of "seceding" from the Union. In Connecticut the minds of the people were so directed in that way, that if any patriot had stood forth, and appealed to those who wished to preserve their charter, and enjoy immediate peace, he would have been instantly joined by a vast majority of the colony, in a resolution to withdraw from Congress and oppose what they alleged to be the "pernicious laws by which they so often had been cheated of their property."

The disgust and impatience of the people of Massachusetts and New Hampshire were so great that they moved for instructions to the delegates in Congress to make overtures for peace with the mother country.

From that time the expenses of the war were paid principally by the individual States, who contracted an indebtedness of $21,000,000, Franklin and Laurens having succeeded in borrowing several millions of dollars in France and Prussia. These amounts were assumed by the United States' Government in 1790, and settled for by Treasury Bonds, but the "Continental Notes" have never been paid. Notwithstanding the irredeemable paper system broke down in America in 1781, it was adopted by France in 1789, in the issue of assignats, which were to be paid from the proceeds of the sales of property belonging to the clergy and those persons that had emigrated in consequence of the Revolution; this currency also kept at near par for a year. The original amount was 1,200,000,000 francs, but it was increased so much that it fell to 90 per cent., then to 60 per cent., and in 1795 it was only worth 18 per cent. On February 1, 1796, twenty francs in silver purchased at the Bourse 5330 francs in assignats. The whole country, except a few speculators, was involved in ruin and national bankruptcy ensued.

Mr. Chase's financial schemes are so similar to those just instanced, that it is surprising the people of the North do not foresee the result. Like the Continental money and assignats, his "green-backs" kept at par for many months, but since the depreciation has begun, it has been rapid, and with the augmentation in amount must continue to decline. The Confederates have acted on the opposite policy, they have only, until the present moment, made their issues a legal tender for debts due to the Government, and they are convertible into 8 per cent. stock, to pay the principal and interest of which a tax of a half per cent. has been levied on all property.

The excuse that may be offered for the colonists and the French for their bad management of money concerns, is the fact of their having been in a state of political revolution; the same apology may be presented for Mr. Chase, as no intelligent person can doubt but what the North is in a quasi insurrectionary state, Lincoln has violated the Constitution repeatedly; he has trampled upon the very framework of the Government over and over again, and has become as undeniably a tyrant as was Robespierre. He and his followers are "rebels" and traitors, and the picture of their doings would not be complete without their money affairs being arranged on a basis of treachery. Mr. Carlyle says, "Great is bankruptcy; the great bottomless gulf into which all falsehoods, public and private, do sink, disappearing; whither, from the first origin of them, they were all doomed. For Nature is true, and not a lie. No lie you can speak or act, but it will come, after longer or shorter circulation, like a bill drawn on Nature's reality, and be presented there for payment—with the answer, no effects. Pity only that it often had so long a circulation, that the original forger were so seldom he who bore the final smart of it! Lies, and the burden of evil they bring, are passed on—shifted from back to back, and from rank to rank, who, with spade and mattock, with sore heart and empty wallet, daily come in contact with reality, and can pass the cheat no further."

There has been no "rebellion" in the South. Secession was accomplished by legal means. Her internal affairs have been conducted as formerly, except the detention of the surplus produce; and the withdrawal of sovereign States can in no manner be properly called a revolution. As England has often been, the South is now involved in an expensive war, but she has made ample arrangements to pay its cost of $800,000 per day; as in the case of England also, her whole indebtedness is due to her own people. The commercial balances owing to Europe by the bankers and merchants of the Northern States, indirectly furnish the Federal Government with funds in the way of temporary loans upon its securities (?). The South has neither sought nor required facilities from abroad;

he has, at ordinary valuations, $350,000,000 worth of cotton, tobacco, rice, and naval stores awaiting shipment, and when the flood-gates of peace are once opened, the waters of commerce will rapidly flow, washing away the distress in the manufacturing districts of Europe, and restoring the paralyzed trade of the world to its usual vigour and life.

The Duration of the War.

THE termination of the war in America is an event all wise men desire, but no one who values his reputation for sound judgment will predict the date of the return of peace. To the anxious and general inquiry, "How long will the war last?" no definite reply is possible; but we may, with advantage, estimate the probable duration of the war by considering the causes that are likely to end it. These are five in number—the conquest of the South; the exhaustion of the North; the disruption of the United States; foreign intervention; or by the North becoming so convinced of the hopelessness of the struggle as to withdraw from it. Let us briefly glance at these contingencies in seriatim, and by doing so we may be able to see upon what events, and upon what policy, and upon whose responsibility, under Heaven, the issue of peace or war depends.

In addressing a European public it would be a waste of time to dilate on the impossibility of the subjugation of the Confederate States, for no person on this side of the Atlantic, not even excepting the prejudiced and heated partisans of the North, believe in it. A fortnight since, in an article entitled "The Strength of the Belligerents," we showed the respective forces were, under the circumstances, so evenly balanced as to make the Northern boast of being able to crush the South a palpable absurdity; but without going into any such calculation, the popular instinct and the common sense of Europe has perceived and determined that if the Southerners are resolved to be independent their independence cannot be conquered by the United States. Supposing that the North had the numerical superiority it boasts of—suppose its population to be homogeneous and united—suppose it to be equal in military prowess to its enemy—the conquest of the South would still be impossible. The immense area of the Confederate States renders it vulnerable to an invader, but at the same time it secures it from conquest. In the first War of Independence England found it easy to invade and take towns in a large and thinly populated country, but England could not subjugate the three million colonists, though that number included a powerful minority in favour of the old country. What, then, is the prospect of the United States conquering the Confederate States, where there are eight millions of a thoroughly united and superior race? As for the idea of exterminating the Southerners it is sufficient to remark that as the South, not only by reason of her superior strategy, but because she is fighting at home, loses far fewer men than the invader, the savage consummation so greatly desired by the mob of New York and the clergy of New England can only be attained by the simultaneous extermination of the Northerners. But we know that the North is not united; we know that it has to repress anarchy at home; we know that its citizens are fleeing from the conscription; and that in the North a portion of the able-bodied men are obliged to attend to agriculture, whilst in the South the whole of the white population is available for military purposes, because the slaves are sufficient for the farming. We know, in short, that the South, being united, is invincible; and therefore, though the war should last for twenty years, it will not be terminated by her subjugation.

The exhaustion of the North would, of course, involve the termination of hostilities, but we may learn from history how long a war may be waged, without producing utter prostration. Ere this nations have fought years after they have been pauperized, and until the entire strength of their populations have fallen in battle, or succumbed to the fell diseases indigenous to camps. It is far more probable that the disruption of the United States, the separation of the West from the North, will be the cause of the war ending; but this, we submit, is an eventuality which may be long postponed, though it cannot be ultimately averted. The overthrow of the present Government of the United States might put a period to hostilities, but experience teaches us to expect that the reign of terror will endure for some time, and that the acknowledgment of the independence of the South may, if the war is continued until the North is irretrievably ruined, be the signal for civil war in the North. The conquest of the South, we repeat, is impossible. The exhaustion of the North will be preceded by many campaigns, and the coming disruption of the United States, though very apparent and even menacing, may be long deferred.

We need not consider the subject of foreign intervention, for though it would be perfectly justifiable, and would save Europe from incalculable suffering—though it would be an act of sound policy as well as of humanity, and though it would serve the Federal States as well as the Confederate States—there does not seem any prospect of its taking place; indeed, the South does not seek for intervention; she only seeks for recognition and a de facto neutrality. She thinks that whilst she is excluded from the markets and arsenals of Europe, the United States ought not to have free access to them. She asks that “those who seek equity should do equity;” that the United States should not be allowed to so use and pervert international law as to involve the actual complicity of other nations in the attempt to trample on the independence of the South. We will not discuss the right of the South to anticipate the intervention she no longer expects; we only insist upon her right to absolute neutrality. Intervention may not be adjourned sine die; but both in North and South it is thought to be so, and, we must add, that the assumption appears to us very reasonable.

The last eventuality we have to consider is, whether the war will terminate by the North discovering the hopelessness of the contest. Hitherto every expectation of the United States has been disappointed. The war that was to have been ended in thirty or ninety days has lasted two campaigns, and is, so far as the progress of the invader is concerned, only at its commencement. The “rebellion” was to have been crushed by 75,000 men, yet 700,000 men have failed—completely failed—to accomplish the object. It was boasted the North would be victorious on every field, but the Northern armies have been terribly cut up and thoroughly beaten. It was supposed there was a large Union party in the South, but there has not been found a vestige of Union feeling; and instead thereof a bitter hatred of the North. The Northern fleets were sure to be unexceptionably victorious; and they have been signally repulsed and defeated. Many persons in the North, believing the solemn slanders of the New England clergy, thought the slaves would be an incubus on the South; but the slaves have proved themselves faithful, and have immensely strengthened the South by labouring at home whilst their masters are engaged in fighting the enemy. Some of the expenses of the war were to be paid by the seizure of cotton and other products; but all convertible property has been destroyed at the approach of the invader. Commerce was to flourish amidst the din of war; but the country is in the throes of general insolvency. Still the North perseveres. If the South can be conquered the rich possession will restore credit; the South being independent, it follows that the main source of Northern prosperity is dried up. And why should the North despair? Does not Europe, by refusing to recognize the independence of the South, declare that the Confederate States have not yet achieved independence? Recognition would do more than defeat to convince the North that its object is unattainable; whilst non-recognition encourages further efforts. Until the South is recognized by Europe, the North will not, we may almost add cannot, give up the contest. When will the South be recognized?

It depends upon England, at least for the present; and in view of this the Northern agents are whispering a well-worn argument to prevent English recognition. They suggest England has an interest in the continuance of the war; that the weaker the United States becomes the firmer is our hold on Canada, but we maintain that a weak neighbour is always troublesome, and that a strong Southern Confederacy would be a better bulwark than the weakness of the North. It is suggested that the continuance of the war will benefit India by enabling her to produce cotton for Europe. No one practically acquainted with the question believes that India can supply the European markets so as to compensate for the loss of the American supply; and consequently our cotton manufacture must be lessened until the war is over. India can only increase her growth of cotton by the stimulus of advanced prices, and dearness will diminish the consumption of cotton fabrics. Besides, the war will at last be over, and then India will have once more to compete with American prices, and will find the competition impossible, as it was in the past. But the Indian supply is altogether a delusion, and until we get American cotton our principal industry will be crippled, and our artisans will suffer from the dire curse of enforced idleness. Our prosperity demands that the commerce of America should be restored by the return of peace. The continuation of the war is fraught with disaster to England; and, at present, the continuance of the war depends upon the veto of the English Government.

The Case of the Factory Operatives.

THE misery of Lancashire grows more intense and hopeless as the days pass on. With cotton at present prices, no manufacturer can make a profit, and few can work at all but at a loss which scarcely any are able, and none are willing, to afford. Here and there a spinner of the finest goods, in whose cost of production cotton is but a minor item, and labour the chief expense, finds himself able to work on, although his raw material costs him four times as much as it is wont to cost. But the vast majority of manufacturers, whose yarn or cloth is in ordinary seasons but a little dearer than the material of which it is made, find the narrow margin out of which they had to defray wages, wear and tear of machinery, and interest of capital, absolutely gone; so absolutely gone that they could better afford to pay their hands for doing nothing than to buy cotton, and give them work to do. And, therefore, from week to week the supply of employment grows less and less, and more and more operatives are deprived of the scanty subsistence they can earn as half-timers, and reduced to utter penury and, at least, to the verge of starvation. The wretchedness of the sufferers is increased by the concentration of the trade. Nearly the whole cotton trade of England is confined to a limited district; by far the greater portion is collected in special localities—in towns and large villages which have grown up around and are wholly dependent on a number of large factories. In the whole district there is no other important trade—no occupation capable of absorbing any perceptible fraction of the mass of operatives out of work. In the special localities, it is scarcely an exaggeration to say that the whole population lives on the factories; that there is scarcely a man, woman, or child to whom cotton is not bread, or to whom the closure of the factories does not mean the deprivation of all means of livelihood. The statistics of desolation, therefore, appalling as they are, are by no means surprising. In Blackburn there are above 30,000 souls without other subsistence than they may receive from public or private charity, out of a population of 60,000. In Preston, 13,000 persons have received parochial relief. In Bromley, out of 10,000 hands, 5000 are idle, and the rest but half employed. In Stockport, out of 18,000 hands, 7000 are without work, and 8500 on short time. In Oldham—with a population of 72,000—5000 hands are unemployed (i. e., about 16,000 mouths are without food), and 10,000 are working three days a week, earning just a bare subsistence for the 32,000 souls dependent on their labour. In Manchester, which is exceptionally fortunate, out of less than 50,000 hands 12,000 are unemployed, and 13,000 working short time. In short, throughout the cotton districts, more than one-third of the people are eating the bitter bread of charity, or the stony crust of pauperism, or have no bread to eat; another third, or more, are just earning enough to keep “the wolf from the door;” without a farthing to replace the clothes that are worn out, or to provide fuel or warm clothing for the coming winter. The remainder anxiously await the day, which must come ere long, when they, too, must sink into the same abyss of misery.

How have the unemployed contrived to live, to escape actual death by hunger?—for we know that but a small proportion of their number have accepted the parish dole. We fear that some have actually perished of want. For the rest, there were but few of them who were at the beginning of the Cotton Famine absolutely without resources. Most of them had credit with the shopkeeper, which they were wont to use in seasons of pressure, and on this they lived until it was exhausted—until the shopkeeper had no longer the means, however good his will, to trust them. Then very many of them had savings; and the savings-banks can tell a tale of misery and mischief to those whose imagination is able to read the terrible truth in the dry record of arithmetical facts. Deposits have ceased to come in; withdrawals have been large and rapid. The poor man who had saved for years a small provision to secure comfort and independence to his old age, or to help his children forward in life, or to purchase the freehold of a home that he might call his own—a common and honourable object of ambition—has been compelled to spend his savings in order to keep himself and his children from beggary or the workhouse. And thus thousands have been thrown back in life, and seen the work of years undone in a few weeks; undone, never to be repaired, very probably never to be resumed. The co-operative movement had made great progress among them. There were scores of commercial and manufacturing societies, instituted and managed by working men, which had stimulated saving and facilitated thrift in working-class homes; which had created and employed a vast amount of capital belonging to working folk: societies in which the old feud between labour and capital was appeased by a new force of industrial organization, and in which a means had been found to dispense with the enormous cost of retail trade, to get rid of adulteration, and to supply the operative with well-made clothing and wholesome food, not only on better terms than had been allowed by the vendors of “shoddy” cloth and sophisticated tea, but on such conditions that the difference between the wholesale and retail price was received, in the form of a quarterly dividend, by the purchaser. We cannot here give an account of the co-operative movement; it is enough to say that it promised more than any sober man had before dared to hope from any social reform, and that the Cotton Famine threatens it with ruin. From those societies which allow the withdrawal of capital, more than they can afford to spare has been withdrawn. Shares in those which allow no such withdrawal have been sold at a fourth of their natural value to those who could afford to pay the calls which this season of pressure rendered inevitable. The prosperity of the operative class is not merely interrupted—it is, we fear, annihilated. Already Lancashire has been thrown back ten years, and has to begin almost from the beginning the work of self-elevation, which but lately seemed to have been carried successfully beyond all its worst difficulties. And with what spirit will that work be recommenced, after the terrible experience which has set at nought the efforts of prudence and mocked the lessons of economy, which has reduced the most industrious and self-denying men, in the space of a few weeks, to the level of their idlest and most thriftless comrades?

When savings and investments of every sort were gone, the operatives have been driven to the cruel necessity of selling their clothing and furniture to buy their children food. This has happened to a far greater extent than is generally supposed, especially in those localities where the suspension of trade began nearly a twelvemonth ago. We read of men and women who for months have not slept in a bed; who have sold everything in their house, every article of clothing except what they actually wore, to get bread without applying for private charity or parochial relief. And at last even this resource fails them; and they sit between bare walls, on the bare floor, and strive not to hear their children cry for the food they cannot earn and will not beg. It was time that aid should reach them, that charity should seek them out. We read of families who had not tasted food from Friday to Tuesday, and we cannot bear to let our imagination dwell on the suffering which those words reveal. We trust that the very efficient organization of the Relief Committees will make such cases of extreme and neglected misery impossible for the future; but that they have occurred suffices to show to what condition the lawless passions of a foreign Democracy have reduced the most laborious and lately most prosperous class of English artisans. It is not easy to read the accounts which are daily published of the misery of hundreds of thousands of deserving men and innocent women and children, and yet to think and write as it behoves us to do of the guilty authors of so much wretchedness.

The English public is thoroughly awake to its duty towards these victims of American ambition and British neutrality. The Government declines, on account of any interest, however important, to depart from the deliberately chosen course of national policy; the nation feels, and justly feels, that no single class should be left to bear unaided the suffering which that policy involves. If we will not fight for Lancashire, we must feed her. And great efforts are being made to do this; the more so that the British public generously understands and sympathizes with the very natural, if not very logical, distinction drawn by the sufferers between voluntary charity and legal relief. They are ready as a class to receive from the nation that aid which as individuals they are ever ready to render to one another. The operative who in sickness or misfortune has been helped by a neighbour or an employer is obliged, but not degraded; if he had been forced to accept the alms of the parish it would have been long before he could have looked employer or neighbour in the face again. As individuals in ordinary times, as a class in this season of unparalleled disaster, they shrink from pauperism with a wholesome and intense abhorrence; and hundreds of them mean, and will do, what they say when advised to apply to the parish—"We will die of hunger first." And this is especially the case with those whom industry, skill, or good conduct has raised into a somewhat higher grade than that of the ordinary operative. The overlookers, who answer to foremen of departments in other manufactures, and whose position is, as it were, intermediate between that of the manager and that of the hands, protest vehemently against the degradation which seems to threaten them. Their self-respect, their influence, their authority, would be gone for ever, if the artisans under their supervision could remind them of having once worked as fellow-paupers in the stone-yard or on the high road. They have made manful and determined efforts to save themselves and one another; but their resources are now exhausted, and it is time that the Relief Committees should take their case in hand. The resolution of these bodies to devote their means chiefly and immediately to the relief of those who have not applied to the parish has been censured in some quarters. To us it appears both wise, just, and kind. It is wise to arrest as far as possible, the conversion of the Lancashire operatives, even for a season, into paupers. It is just to attend first to the wants of those who have no other means of subsistence, and who have shown the most stubborn reluctance to accept subsistence on condition of degradation. And it is kind to spare to as many as possible the moral wretchedness which is endured by the respectable working-man who, no matter under what grievous necessity, has once betaken himself to the parish pay-table. Next to the starvation of the operatives, their pauperization is the evil to be most strenuously deprecated, and to be prevented by every possible exertion and sacrifice. Not only would it inflict untold pain and shame upon them, but by humbling their honest pride, breaking down their self-respect, and lowering the moral tone of their order, it would be a calamity to the country at large.

We differ, therefore, with those who seem inclined to sneer at the abhorrence of parochial relief evinced by men who are willing to accept of voluntary assistance. We believe that this feeling is legitimate, and should be encouraged; and we are, further, disposed to take part with the operatives in their very moderately and respectfully expressed complaints against the treatment of those who have been compelled to apply for aid from the poor-rate. They protest against being classed and made to work with "ordinary" or habitual paupers. It is neither just nor generous to say that they are paupers, and need not be squeamish about their company. They are paupers, as the schoolboy who robs an orchard for fun is a thief; and to herd them with the brutalized, degraded, worthless creatures who form the usual population of the workhouse, is as cruel and iniquitous as to condemn the amateur apple-stealer to the company of a gang of convicts. It is wantonly cruel, when they complain of labour on high-roads, or in stone-yards, or in levelling, and ask that work more suitable to their health and habits may be found for them, to taunt them with idleness, and tell them that beggars must not be choosers. Their habits of indoor work, their scanty clothing, their want of muscular vigour, unfit them for hard out-door labour, which, during the winter, will be certainly fatal to many among them; and stone-breaking destroys that delicacy of touch, which is essential to certain portions of their work, and thereby damages their future power of earning a livelihood at their own trade. Nor do we blame, though we do not altogether justify, the man who refused to sweep the streets at the bidding of the guardians, and being thereupon dismissed without relief, went home and died of want. He refused the work, not because it was hard, but because it was degrading. To men of sensitive pride, suffering from undeserved calamity, every indulgence should be shown; and if it be necessary to do what seems harsh in dealing with them, the necessity should be fairly and frankly explained. Their position is a very painful one, and it should be the endeavour of all who have to do with them, to avoid wounding feelings which are naturally sore, or exacting compliances which, justly or not, are conceived to be inconsistent with that dignity and independence which they have not forfeited by any default of their own. Poor-law officials, hardened and roughened by constant collision with vagabonds and idlers, are hardly the men to deal with such a class; and the less the Poor Law has to do with the distressed operatives of Lancashire, the better for the Poor Law, for the people, and for the credit of the country.

Mr. Smith on England and Canada.

BETWEEN the end of the Parliamentary session and St. Partridge is always a dull time for newspaper readers; but it is the busy season of the penny-a-liner. His reports are not mercilessly pared down to a mere skeleton of the facts. The paragraphist also flourishes. A great gooseberry, a shower of frogs, or suggestive scandals about distinguished personages are very acceptable. It would be a considerable boon if Sir Cresswell Cresswell would, during that period, sit from day to day to hear selected divorce cases; cases, we mean, in which the reporter remarks that the details are unfit for publication, and yet publishes them by innuendo. During that brief space the provincial newspapers contain long letters from young gentlemen who are disgusted with the folly of our statesmen, and who are ready with plans for paying off the national debt, making everybody rich and happy, and for putting an end to international discord. It is the interval between the acts, when any supernumerary who happens to appear before the curtain is sure to attract attention, and even applause from some of the audience, though his mission is merely to sweep the stage. So far as his notoriety is concerned, Mr. Goldwin Smith shewed sound discretion in publishing a letter of five columns in the Daily News on Friday last; but why he should have written this letter, which is a second edition of his letter on colonization, can only be explained by a love of seeing his name at the foot of a column of type. This may be a weakness, but it is pardonable compared to the amusing egotism that induces the Oxford professor to compare himself to Adam Smith. Besides the similarity in name, we are unable to discover any resemblance between Adam Smith, the political economist, and Mr. Goldwin Smith, the Oxford professor.

The learned gentleman says, "I am no more against colonies than I am against the Solar System." We should not have felt any alarm for the Solar System if he had been against it; and it is quite as likely that he can change the order of the planets, as that he can influence colonization. Mr. Smith tells us that "if Canada were made an independent nation, she would still be a colony of England;" and in proof of this, he informs the benighted world that "our God will be her God." This stupendous discovery is followed by an announcement that until after the visit of the Prince of Wales to America, Queen Victoria reigned over the United States. The war of 1812, the boundary disputes, the repeated threats of war, are myths. The United States has all along been loyal to the crown of England, and the Presidents of the United States have been shadows, mere representatives of the English monarch. Mr. Smith will somewhat surprise his New York clients.

The gist of Mr. Smith's argument is, that England ought to forthwith turn Canada adrift. Canada may not wish to cut the connection; but we have taught her to love it, and ought to turn her out of the empire. We have to keep 18,000 soldiers in Canada, and a fleet on the American station, and all this expense might be saved if we got rid of Canada. But we will not repeat Mr. Smith's stale arguments, which have been so often refuted. All the world knows that colonies are directly or indirectly a source of wealth to the mother country. The suggestion that we do more business with the United States now than we did before they were independent has no bearing on the question. We do more business with France, China, India, and the world at large, than we did in the last century. Will Mr. Smith point out an arrangement of the Government of Canada that is inimical to commerce? Do not the Canadians levy their own taxes, spend their own taxes, and regulate their own commerce? Did Mr. Smith ever happen to meet with the trade returns of our Australian colonies? They show that connection with England does not prevent the rapid development of commerce.

Mr. Smith hates everything English, even our own colonies, which he calls parasites. There is a sneer for the Emperor of the French, because he is our ally. We are "trembling for our own shores;" our emigrants "flee from the workhouse;" there is class-patronage in England—in Canada a class corrupted by "baronetries and the hope of subsidies." We are pauperized, we are fearfully criminal, we are suffering from feudalism; our Church is fighting for liberty. We are reminded of George IV. The House of Peers, the aristocracy, the State Church is condemned, and a host of abuse is lavished that has been uttered with much greater force by Mr. Bright. But if Mr. Smith hates England, he loves the United States—not the Confederate States, but the good, orderly, happy, generous Northern States. Love may not be blinder than hate, but in Mr. Smith's case it is more palpably absurd. The decline of England has been predicted and prophesied for a quarter of a century; but it is rather novel to hear that "hitherto, in the sunshine of commercial prosperity, we have been going merrily down hill, under the guidance of light-hearted politicians, who have scattered money with aristocratic generosity and amidst general glee." We were under the impression that commerce was the foundation of our national greatness, and that prosperity and decadence were never contemporary. What the gentleman—who is good enough not to oppose the Solar System—means, is, we presume, that in our prosperity we have become radically corrupt; we have lost all power of contending against reverses; that our loyalty, our love of order, so wonderfully manifest in Lancashire, our freedom of speech, and our personal liberty are delusions; the Church and State are tottering and must soon be overthrown. The man seems strong and healthy, yet the doctor shakes his head and pretends to perceive seeds of disease. This may be pretentious quackery; but what shall we say of the doctor who sees his patient in the agony of a life and death convulsion—sees him crushed down and bleeding in every pore, and declares that the sufferer is in an curable state of robust and promising health? Mr. Smith does this; for he cannot plead ignorance of the real state of affairs on the other side of the Atlantic. If his newspaper reading is confined to the New York Herald and the Daily News, he cannot but perceive that just now the United States is not the happiest spot on earth, and that the Republican principle he so loudly vaunts has been tried and found imperfect. Possibly Mr. Smith is perpetrating a solemn joke, and certainly only fools can think he is serious and wise.

The late United States is divided in two, and, sooner or later, will be divided into at least three nations; yet Mr. Smith espouses the Monroe doctrine; observing that we are always on the brink of a war with the United States, because by retaining possession of Canada "we stand in the path of her advancing greatness." We are at a loss to see how this happens. Canada may leave England, but Canada will never join her fortunes to the United States. Antipathy between the two peoples has been rapidly developed, and to antipathy has lately been added disgust. New nations do not generally enter into political union with nations whose political institutions have proved a failure.

The following passage is too suggestive to be summarized:—

As to emigration, for one emigrant that goes to our American dependencies seven go, in common times, to the land of independence and of unbounded enterprise and hope, in the United States. Even of those who go to Canada, many afterwards straggle across the frontier.

We happen to be in uncommon times, when people are doing their utmost to leave the United States and go to Canada. Mr. Smith says slavery "is the deep cause of all the ruin and misery now before our eyes." We can tell him—and if he thinks proper to study the statistics of America he can verify our assertion—that it was the wealth poured into the lap of the North by the Southern States that induced the large emigration to the United States; and if he were not stone blind by prejudice he would see that the North did not enter on the contest to fight against slavery, but to retain a hold on Southern wealth.

At the risk of wearying our readers, we will direct their attention to the following passages from Mr. Smith's letter. Their inopportune, at the present juncture, makes them exceedingly comic:—

In the New World monarchy has a root, and it has a use. It binds the unfranchised, ignorant, and indigent masses of the people by a tie of personal loyalty to the Constitution. In the New World monarchy has no root; and it has no use where the masses of the people are enfranchised and bound to the Constitution by property and intelligence. * * * Why should they [the people of England] desire to plant among the communities of the New World a hostile outpost of feudalism and privilege, the source of division, jealousy, and war? What reason have they to fear the sight of great commonwealths based on free reverence for equal laws, and prospering without lords or dependents? Why should they look with jealous malignity on the mighty development of the Anglo-Saxon race, emancipated from Norman bonds, over a continent which its energy and patience have made its own? * * * Old England has failed to shake off feudalism; but the founders of New England left it behind and planted a realm beyond its sway. The knell of privilege struck when they, at the foundation of their State, bound themselves in a voluntary covenant to "render due obedience to just and equal laws framed for the general good."

The New York mob, the multitude who are endeavouring to fly from the United States, are, of course, bound by property to the Constitution. In the United States there is no division, anarchy and war. A gagged press, the suspension of personal liberty, an enforced paper currency, a harsh conscription, are a few of the institutions which the English ought not to envy; and Mr. Smith may be assured they are not envied. Strange as it may appear to Mr. Smith, the English people have such taste as to prefer the rule of Queen Victoria to the rule of Mr. Lincoln, and the influence of the English aristocracy to the domination of mob-leaders. It is a very prevalent impression that England is rather more free and independent than the United States, and that the only free Republican Government in North America is that of the Confederate States. But Mr. Smith looks through a glass that makes black appear white and white black; and so he gloats over the wickedness and despotism of England, and glorifies the blessedness and liberty of the United States.

Reviews.

PRESIDENT JEFFERSON DAVIS.*

SOCIETY, like man, is a complex machine. All the parts are useful to, and are benefited by, the aggregate, and an injury done to one member is an injury done to the whole body or fraternity. The corruption and ruin of a nation with which we have no direct intercourse, has an indirect influence upon our prosperity, because it affects those nations which are associated with us politically and commercially. But with society, as with the human body, some diseases are local, and the ill effects are only partial, whilst others are organic and general. Thus it is with respect to America. She was a main artery of trade, and so the stoppage of her trade is every one's concern. Not England only, but Europe is interested in the contest, and watches it with absorbing attention. Newspapers, magazines, reviews, teem with articles on America, yet the subject is far from being exhausted, and is decidedly popular. One reason of this is the ignorance that prevailed with respect to the Southern States. Beyond knowing that they produced cotton, tobacco, and rice, we knew nothing of them, and, in default of information, the calumnies of the North were credited. It was said and believed that the Southerners were an enervated race; and to the surprise of the civilized world, it was discovered that the clergy and public men of New England had perjured themselves grossly and persistently, and that the Southerners are a race worthy their high descent, and have displayed a wonderful energy in repelling the invaders of their country. To them is due the rapid growth and prosperity of the Union. The truth is now being appreciated and understood. Our public writers are embracing every opportunity of dissipating prejudice and error. We rarely meet with a magazine that has not some reference to the war in America, and which does not, in nineteen cases out of twenty, vindicate the South from some of the absurd charges brought by Northern fanaticism and covetousness.

The current number of Blackwood contains a brief but admirably written memoir of the President of the Confederate States; and the outline of his career show great men are providentially prepared for great emergencies; and that the people of the South, in selecting their first President, displayed appreciative judgment. Mr. Jefferson Davis was born in 1808, in Kentucky, in which State his father, who had served in the Revolutionary War, settled after the American War. He was educated at home until his fifteenth year, when he entered the university at Lexington. He was not destined to remain long at this seat of learning, and in 1824 was removed to the United States' Military Academy at West Point. He passed through his military course with merit and éclat, and in 1828 was brevetted second-lieutenant of the regular army, and he served upon the northern frontier until 1833. At the termination of the Black Hawk War, he was transferred to the western frontier, and joined the first expedition against the Comanches and Pawnees. In 1835 he married a daughter of General Taylor, late President of the United States; but his wife died a few months after their marriage. Peace being established, Mr. Davis resigned his commission, and in the year 1836 retired to his estate in Mississippi, which adjoined the estates of his brother Joseph, twenty years his senior, and a gentleman of considerable attainments. Here he remained in seclusion for eight years, devoting himself to the studies which laid the foundation of his statesmanship and his masterly oratory. In 1844 he made his début in political life as candidate for election in the State of Mississippi, previous to the Presidential election in which Mr. Clay represented the Whigs, and Mr. Polk the Democratic party. Mr. Davis was chosen as Democratic elector; and his great reputation induced his fellow-citizens to choose him as their representative in Congress in 1845. After devoting a few months to studying the forms of Congress, he delivered his maiden speech in that assembly, and when it was over, Mr. John Quincy Adams, who was opposed to him in politics, remarked to his friends, "Mr. Davis is a remarkable man, a very remarkable man, gentlemen; he will make his mark, mind me!"

At the end of a year his civil career was interrupted:—

In May 1846, the United States declared war against Mexico, and the citizen-soldiers of the 1st Regiment of Mississippi Volunteers, which had been raised to reinforce General Taylor, unanimously chose Mr. Davis as their colonel. Although this distinction was unsolicited by him, and was conferred upon him when he was a thousand miles away from the regiment, he promptly conformed to the desire of his military admirers, and, resigning his seat in Congress, joined his comrades, then at New Orleans, on their way to the seat of war. The army was formed into two main divisions—one immediately under General Taylor, which operated along the Texas frontier; and the other in the South, under General Scott, which finally took possession of the capital. Colonel Davis was ordered to join the northern division, and had not long been there before, at the Battle of Monterey, on the 16th of September, 1846, he completely justified the choice his regiment had made in electing him.

The Battle of Buena Vista was fought on the 22nd and 23rd of February, 1847, and was claimed by both sides as a victory. The obstinacy of the combatants is beyond doubt; the Mexicans losing nearly 4000 men, and boasting, at the same time, that the trophies of war were theirs. Colonel Davis was thus mentioned in the Commander-in-Chief's despatch:—"The Mississippi Riflemen, under Colonel Davis, were highly conspicuous for their gallantry and steadiness, and sustained throughout the engagement the reputation of veteran troops. Brought into action against an enormously superior force, they maintained themselves for a long time unsupported, and with heavy loss, and held an important post in the field until reinforced. Colonel Davis, although severely wounded, remained in the saddle until the close of the action. His distinguished coolness and gallantry at the head of his regiment on this day entitle him to the particular notice of the Government."

The President conferred on him the rank of brigadier-general, which, however, he declined on the ground that "the President has not the power of giving rank to officers of State troops." After a month's retirement the Governor of Mississippi appointed him to a vacancy that had occurred in the United States' Senate during the recess, and when the State Legislature assembled he was unanimously elected for the term of six years. He at once took up a position as defender of the constitutional rights of the South, and when Mr. Calhoun died in 1850 became the leader of the States' Rights party. He resigned in 1851 to stand for Governor of Mississippi, when he was beaten by a small majority; but this was not due to his want of influence, but to the lateness of his canvass. In 1852 he induced his State to cast her vote for General Pierce, and therefore against General Scott, for President. Mr. President Pierce invited Colonel Davis to become War Minister, and the invitation was accepted.

The second-lieutenant of 1829 was now the Secretary of War of 1853, having been in the meantime Representative and Senator in Congress. He brought therefore to his office high qualifications, both of a civil and military character. His early education, his experience in the field, both in subordinate positions and in command, made him thoroughly acquainted with all those matters of detail which affect the well-being of the soldier; while the active part which he had taken, both in the House of Representatives and in the Senate, on military affairs, familiarized him with the proper requirements and administration of the War Office. At the time of Mr. Davis's appointment, the department over which he was called upon to preside required a firm, vigorous, and clear understanding. Acting, as he invariably did, from honest convictions, he may have incurred the anathemas of the grumblers and drones of the army, in whom he endeavoured to arouse a spirit of activity and zeal, but no voice was ever heard to assail him on the ground of self-interest or of private advantage.

The commissariat of the department during his administration was entirely remodelled, and steps were taken to supply the smallest posts with regularity, which were often situated in isolated spots scattered over this vast continent, sometimes a thousand miles away from a railroad or navigable stream. During the second year of his administration he increased the regular army by four regiments. He improved the light infantry and rifle system of tactics, and favoured the manufacture of rifled muskets and pistols, and caused extensive expeditions to be made in the western part of the continent for scientific, military, and railroad purposes.

Before the close of the Presidential term he was again elected by the Legislature of Mississippi to represent that State in the United States' Senate upon his leaving the War Department. "At mid-day, therefore, on March

* Blackwood's Edinburgh Magazine for September.

4, 1857, he stepped from that department into the Senate Chamber.

What a change had there taken place since he left his seat six years before! His great political adversaries were gone. The impassioned eloquence of Clay had been hushed for ever. The solemn accent and logical argument of Webster were never more to be heard upon earth. Little demagogues, with little names, had, in the interval, found their way into the Senate. This deplorable retrogression afforded to an observing patriot melancholy evidence that the Government of the Union was degenerating; that, in fact, it had entered the first phase of practical decadence. Dogmas, conflicting directly with the provisions of the Constitution, had been employed to make would-be grave senators out of fourth and fifth rate taproom politicians. Hopeless as might seem the effort, discouraging as were all the signs of the times, Senator Davis went to work with his usual resolution and energy, to endeavour to secure a new lease for constitutional union, and to preserve, in this manner, for the benefit of after generations, the commonwealth of the American Republic. The Federal system, while administered in the sense in which it had its origin—viz., one of the sovereign States operating for the honour and interest of all, and all operating for the honour and interest of each (as was the case under the Presidencies of Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe)—had not an enemy in the South, and Senator Davis was one of its most faithful supporters.

All his efforts were in vain. His frankness and earnestness are conspicuous in his last great speech in the Senate, from which we quote the following extract:—

We do not desire these things. We seek not the injury of any one. We seek not to disturb your prosperity. We, at least to a certain extent, have looked to our agricultural labour as that to which we prefer to adhere. We have seen, in the diversity of the occupations of the States, the bond of the Union. We have rejoiced in your prosperity. We have sent you our staples, and purchased your manufactured articles. We have used your ships for the purpose of transport and navigation. We have gloried in the extension of American commerce everywhere; have felt proud as yourselves in every achievement you made in art; on every sea that you carried your flag, in regions to which it had hitherto not been borne; and, if we must leave you, we can leave you still with the goodwill which would prefer that your prosperity should continue. If we must part, I say, we can put our relations upon that basis which will give you the advantage of a favoured trade with us, and still make the intercourse mutually beneficial to each other. If you will not, then it is an issue from which we will not shrink; for between oppression and freedom, between the maintenance of right and submission to power, we will invoke the God of Battles, and meet our fate, whatever it may be.

Mr. Jefferson Davis was surely a full-fledged man, and by his career fitted for the high office to which he was chosen. He was not only highly endowed, but his mind was highly cultivated, and his powerful judgment had been ripened by experience. He had learnt in the field the active duties of a soldier; and in the War Department he had been practised in the administration of an army. He was greatly distinguished as a Senator, and had been unremitting in his attention to his civil duties. Providence had given him periods for study, as well as opportunities for active exertion. The new Confederacy needed a soldier and a statesman, and Mr. Jefferson Davis is both the one and the other. Nor has he disappointed the expectations of his friends or the fears of his enemies:—

Cut off altogether from free communication with Europe, the South has, from the commencement of the war, been obliged to sustain a most unequal contest; but the master mind which has directed the Confederate Government during this period of trial has met and overcome difficulties which at first seemed insuperable.

And to this let us add that, from the first to last, Mr. Jefferson Davis has never allowed invasion and war to be an excuse for tyranny, but has strictly respected the liberty of the people of the Confederate States, and has manifested a profound reverence for the law and Constitution. Indeed, never before under such circumstances was a free Constitution and free laws kept so inviolable.

THE CONFEDERATE CONGRESS.

PRESIDENT DAVIS'S MESSAGE.

Congress met on the 16th of August. The following is the text of President Davis's message:—

TO THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES.

It is again our fortune to meet for devising measures necessary to the public welfare whilst our country is involved in a desolating war. The sufferings endured by some portions of the people excite the deepest solicitude of the Government; and the sympathy thus evoked has been heightened by the patriotic devotion with which these sufferings have been borne. The gallantry and good conduct of our troops—always claiming the gratitude of the country—have been further illustrated on hard fought fields, marked by exhibitions of individual prowess which can find but few parallels in ancient or modern history. Our army has not faltered in any of the various trials to which it has been subjected, and the great body of the people have continued to manifest a zeal and unanimity which not only cheer the battle-stained soldier, but gives assurance to the friends of constitutional liberty of our final triumph in the pending struggle against despotic usurpation.

The vast army which threatened the capital of the Confederacy has been defeated and driven from the lines of investment, and the enemy, repeatedly foiled in his efforts for its capture, is now seeking to raise new armies on a scale such as modern history does not record, to effect that subjugation of the South so often proclaimed as on the eve of accomplishment.

The perfidy which disregarded rights secured by compact, the madness which trampled on obligations made sacred by every consideration of honour, have been intensified by the malignity engendered by defeat. These passions have changed the character of the hostilities waged by our enemies, who are becoming daily less regardful of the usages of civilized war and the dictates of humanity. Rapine and wanton destruction of private property, war upon non-combatants, murder of captives, bloody threats to avenge the death of an invading soldiery by the slaughter of unarmed citizens, orders of banishment against peaceful farmers engaged in the cultivation of the soil, are some of the means used by our ruthless invaders to enforce the submission of a free people to a foreign sway. Confiscation bills of a character so atrocious as to insure, if executed, the utter ruin of the entire population of these States, are passed by their Congress, and approved by their Executive. The moneyed obligations of the Confederate Government are forged by citizens of the United States, and publicly advertised for sale in their cities, with a notoriety that sufficiently attests the knowledge of their Government; and its complicity in the crime is further evinced by the fact that the soldiers of the invading armies are found supplied with large quantities of these forged notes as a means of despoiling the country people, by fraud, out of such portions of their property as armed violence may fail to reach. Two, at least, of the generals of the United States are engaged, unchecked by their Government, in exciting servile insurrection, and in arming and training slaves for warfare against their masters, citizens of the Confederacy. Another has been found of instincts so brutal as to invite the violence of his soldiery against the women of a captured city.

Yet the rebuke of civilized man has failed to evoke from the authorities of the United States one mark of disapprobation of his acts, nor is there any reason to suppose that the conduct of Benjamin F. Butler has failed to secure from his Government the sanction and applause with which it is known to have been greeted by public meetings and portions of the press of the United States. To inquiries made of the Commander-in-Chief of the United States, whether the atrocious conduct of some of their military commandants met the sanction of that Government, answer has been evaded on the pretext that the inquiry was insulting; and no method remains for the suppression of these enormities but such retributive justice as it may be found possible to execute.

Retaliation in kind for many of them is impracticable; for I have had occasion to remark in a former message that under no excess of provocation could our noble-hearted defenders be driven to wreak vengeance on unarmed men, on women, or on children. But stern and exemplary punishment can and must be meted out to the murderers and felons who, disgracing the profession of arms, seek to make of public war the occasion for the commission of the most monstrous crimes.

Deeply as we regret the character of the contest into which we are about to be forced, we must accept it as an alternative which recent manifestations gives us little hope can be avoided.

The exasperation of failure has aroused the worst passions of our enemies; a large portion of their people, even of their clergymen, now engage in urging an excited populace to the extreme of ferocity, and nothing remains but to vindicate our rights and to maintain our existence by employing against our foe every energy and every resource at our disposal.

I append, for your information, a copy of the papers exhibiting the action of the Government up to the present time for the repression of the outrages committed on our people. Other measures now in progress will be submitted hereafter.

In inviting your attention to the legislation which the necessities of our condition require, those connected with the prosecution of the war command almost undivided attention.

The acts passed at your last session, intended to secure the public defence by general enrolment, and to render uniform the rules governing troops in the service, have led to some unexpected criticism that is much to be regretted.

The efficiency of the law has been thus somewhat impaired, though it is not believed that in any of the States the popular mind has withheld its sanction from either the necessity or propriety of your legislation. It is only by harmonious as well as zealous action that a Government as new as ours, ushered into existence on the very eve of a great war, and unprovided with the material necessary for conducting hostilities on so vast a scale, can fulfil its duties. Upon you, who are fully informed of the acts and purposes of the Government, and thoroughly imbued with the feelings and sentiments of the people, must reliance be placed to secure this great object. You can best devise the means for establishing that entire co-operation of the State and Confederate Governments which is essential to the well-being of both at all times, but which is now indispensable to their very existence.

And if any legislation should seem to you appropriate for adjusting differences of opinion, it will be my pleasure as well as duty to co-operate in any measure that may be devised for reconciling a just care for the public defence with a proper deference for the most scrupulous susceptibilities of the State authorities.

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury will exhibit in detail the operations of that department. It will be seen with satisfaction that the credit of the Government securities remains unimpaired, and that this credit is fully justified by the comparatively small amount of accumulated debt, notwithstanding the magnitude of our military operations. The legislation of the last session provided for the purchase of supplies with the bonds of the Government; but the preference of the people for Treasury notes has been so marked that the Legislature is recommended to authorize an increase in the issue of Treasury notes, which the public service seems to require. No grave inconvenience need be apprehended from the increased issue, as the provisions of the law by which these notes are convertible into 8 per cent. bonds form an efficient and permanent safe-guard against any serious depreciation of the currency. Your attention is also invited to the means proposed by the Secretary for facilitating the preparation of those notes, and for guarding them against forgery. It is due to our people to state that no manufacture of counterfeit notes exists within our limits, and that they are all imported from the Northern States.

The report of the Secretary of War, which is submitted, contains numerous suggestions for the legislation deemed desirable in order to add to the efficiency of the service. I invite your favourable consideration, especially to those recommendations which are intended to secure the proper execution of the conscript law, and the consolidation of companies, battalions, and regiments, when so reduced in strength as to impair that uniformity of organization which is necessary in the army, while an undue burthen is imposed on the Treasury. The necessity for some legislation for controlling military transportation on the railroads, and improving their present defective condition, forces itself upon the attention of the Government, and I trust that you will be able to devise satisfactory measures for attaining this purpose. The legislation on the subject of general officers involves the service in some difficulties, which are pointed out by the Secretary, and for which the remedy suggested by him seems appropriate. In connection with this subject, I am of opinion that prudence dictates some provision for the increase of the army in the event of emergencies not now anticipated. The very large increase of forces recently called into the field by the President of the United States may render it necessary hereafter to extend the provisions of the conscript law so as to embrace persons between the ages of 35 and 45 years. The vigour and efficiency of our present forces, their condition, and the skill and ability which distinguish their leaders, inspire the belief that no further enrolment will be necessary, but a wise foresight requires that if a necessity should be suddenly developed during the recess of Congress requiring increased forces for our defence, means should exist for calling such forces into the field, without awaiting the reassembling of the legislative department of the Government.

In the election and appointment of officers for the provisional army it was to be anticipated that mistakes would be made, and incompetent officers of all grades introduced into the service. In the absence of experience, and with no reliable guide for selection, executive appointments as well as elections have been sometimes unfortunate.

The good of the service, the interests of our country, require that some means be devised for withdrawing the commissions of officers who are incompetent for the duties required by the position, and I trust that you will find means for relieving the army of such officers by some mode more prompt and less wounding to their sensibility than the judgment of a court-martial.

Within a recent period we have effected the object so long desired of an arrangement for the exchange of prisoners, which is now being executed by delivery at the points agreed upon, and which will, it is hoped, speedily restore our brave and unfortunate countrymen to their places in the ranks of the army, from which by the fortune of war they have for a time been separated. The details of this arrangement will be communicated to you in a special report when further progress has been made in its execution.

Of other particulars concerning the operations of the War Department you will be informed by the Secretary in his report and the accompanying documents.

The report of the Secretary of the Navy embraces a statement of the operations and present condition of this branch of the public service, both afloat and ashore; the construction and equipment of armed vessels at home and abroad, the manufacture of ordnance and ordnance stores, the establishment of workshops, and the development of our resources of coal and of iron. Some legislation seems essential for securing crews for vessels. The difficulties now experienced on this point are fully stated in the Secretary's report, and I invite your attention to providing a remedy.

The report of the Postmaster-General discloses the embarrassments which resulted in the postal service, from the occupation by the enemy of the Mississippi river, and portions of the territory of the different States. The measures taken by the department for relieving these embarrassments, as far as practicable, are detailed in the report. It is a subject of congratulation that, during the ten months which ended on March 31 last, the expenses of the department were largely decreased, whilst its revenue was augmented as compared with a corresponding period ending on June 30, 1860, when the postal service for these States was conducted under the authority delegated to the United States. Sufficient time has not yet elapsed to determine whether the measures heretofore devised by Congress will accomplish the end of bringing the expenditures of the department within the limit of its own resources by March, 1 next, as required by the Constitution.

I am happy to inform you that, in spite both of blaudishments and threats, used in profusion by the agents of the Government of the United States, the Indian nations within the Confederacy have remained firm in their loyalty and steadfast in the observance of their treaty engagements with this Government. Nor has their fidelity been shaken by the fact that, owing to the vacancies in some of the offices of agents and superintendents, delay has occurred in the payments of the annuities and allowances to which they are entitled. I would advise some provision authorizing payments to be made by other officers, in the absence of those especially charged by law with this duty.

We have never-ceasing cause to be grateful for the favour with which God has protected our infant Confederacy. And it becomes us reverently to return our thanks, and humbly to ask of His bounteousness that wisdom which is needful for the performance of the high trusts with which we are charged.

JEFFERSON DAVIS.

Richmond, August 15, 1862.

THE FIGHTING FORCE OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES.

(From the Richmond Whig.)

A writer in the Mobile Register furnishes data from which a tolerably correct idea may be obtained of the fighting force of the Confederate States. His figures are derived from the United States census tables of 1840 and '50, and upon the assumption that the ratio of increase from 1850 to 1860 is as great as that from 1840 to 1860.

The census tables show that in 1850 the Slave States (14) had a white male population between the ages of fifteen and fifty as follows, in round numbers:—

Maryland.....	100,000	Louisiana.....	90,000
Virginia.....	210,000	Texas.....	40,000
North Carolina..	125,000	Arkansas.....	40,000
South Carolina..	65,000	Tennessee.....	170,000
Georgia.....	120,000	Kentucky.....	180,000
Florida.....	10,000	Missouri.....	150,000
Alabama.....	100,000
Mississippi.....	70,000		1,470,000

If these States increased as rapidly between 1850 and 1860 as they did between 1840 and 1850, they have a white male population between the ages of fifteen and fifty as follows:—

Maryland.....	130,000	Louisiana.....	145,000
Virginia.....	250,000	Texas.....	80,000
North Carolina..	145,000	Arkansas.....	70,000
South Carolina..	70,000	Tennessee.....	200,000
Georgia.....	150,000	Kentucky.....	230,000
Florida.....	20,000	Missouri.....	280,000
Alabama.....	130,000
Mississippi.....	130,000		2,030,000

Assuming the census tables to be correct, we now have, in the fourteen Southern States, upwards of two millions of white males, between the ages of fifteen and fifty, and it is idle to talk about conquering them. They are not shopkeepers, tailors, factory men, button makers, &c., turned loose upon the world, and forced to enlist from want; but they are used to handling the shot-gun and the rifle from the age of twelve.

Grant, however, that this estimate is extravagant. Let us suppose that the ages of eighteen and forty should govern as the limit. Still this would not reduce us to despair; for by no rule of calculation could our fighting forces be reduced to one million of men.

This force can be kept in the field as long as the North may assail us, and it will not interfere with our producing or agricultural population. When the present crops are gathered, the South will not again feel any want of food for man or horse. Insurrection among her black population, upon which the North counted so largely, does not exist; our slaves can be safely trusted to the management of the boys under eighteen and the old men, and abundant crops be thus secured while our fighting men are in the field.

Not so with the North. Whenever she puts anything like her military strength in the field she weakens her power to feed her people; and though her white population in 1860 was 19,000,000, against 8,700,000 whites of the South, and though she ought, therefore, to be able to send out two soldiers where we can send one, yet we question much if she can send out her one million as readily as the South can.

The prolongation of this struggle will develop more of the resources of the South than of the North.

THE AFFAIR AT MALVERN HILL.

An officer who participated in the affair at Malvern Hill has furnished us with the following particulars in reference to the occupancy of that point by the enemy, and its subsequent recovery by our forces under the command of General Longstreet.

On Tuesday morning, the 8th Georgia Regiment, Captain Lawson commanding, was moved up from New Market Heights, to relieve the 17th, then on picket duty on Malvern Hill. On the march they were met by several couriers, stating that the enemy were in large force advancing upon the Hill, and in its immediate vicinity. The reports of artillery gave evidence that a brisk engagement was going on.

When the 8th Georgia reached the base of the hill, the announcement was made by several couriers to Captain Lawson that the ammunition of our pieces was exhausted, and that the artillery at the post and the 17th were surrounded. Captain Lawson immediately dispatched a courier to the commandant of the 17th, that he had formed his regiment in line of battle at the base of the hill, and would protect their retreat, and to come off at all hazards. With artillery playing upon one flank and a cavalry charge upon the other, they left the hill, and succeeded in making good their retreat, bringing off all their pieces, and only losing one caisson, that was torn to pieces in the fight.—Some eight or nine of the 17th had previously been captured while picketing.

Three members of the artillery were killed and two wounded. Between seventy and eighty of the enemy are supposed to have been killed. About one mile from the base of the hill the 8th Georgia was overtaken by the cavalry and artillery of the enemy. So soon as it was discovered, the regiment was drawn up in line of battle, which checked the advance of the foe. The regiment then moved back into a corn field, and under cover of the corn and intervening hills, the retreat was effected with the loss of one man of the regiment, who was captured.

The regiment continued to fall back till it came within a short distance of New Market Heights. About 3 o'clock the same regiment received orders to advance again through a hick wood on the left of the river road, with a view to feel the enemy. They advanced about two miles, when their skirmishers were fired upon by the enemy, simultaneously with a charge of the enemy's cavalry upon our cavalry. Our cavalry fell back, but the regiment continued to respond to the fire of the enemy for some ten minutes, when the firing ceased. Falling back, the cavalry and infantry took position at an eligible position, about 400 yards in rear of the woods. The enemy made no further demonstration on that day, having full possession of the hill.

On Wednesday morning, at daylight, the corps of General Longstreet was moved forward, and encamped that night within half-a-mile of the hill, the day having been spent in reconnoitering. On Thursday, about 12 o'clock, the corps advanced and took possession of the hill without firing a gun, the enemy having evacuated the night before, about 12 o'clock. The number of the enemy is estimated at from 15,000 to 30,000. Several prisoners were taken, among them two sentinels, who were on the top of the house on the summit of the hill. Considerable supplies of coffee, meat, crackers, &c., were left by the enemy, indicating that they had evacuated under evident alarm.

THE PALMETTO ARTILLERY.

(From the Charleston Courier.)

One of the most splendid commands now in the service of the Confederate States, and one about which there has been the least said, is the battalion, now more properly a regiment of Light Artillery, commanded by Edward B. White, lately promoted Lieutenant-Colonel. This command embraces eight companies, in the aggregate numbering over 1100 men, mostly from the patriotic districts of Greenville, Newberry, Anderson, Darlington, Lexington, Colleton, and Richland. Among the earliest to respond to the first call for volunteers for the war, it may be considered as possessing the elements of that high and patriotic impulse which exalts its material beyond the ordinary standard of volunteers more recently enlisted. I claim in ranks men of the first class in their respective districts—farmers, mechanics, planters, and professional men of the highest and most respectable standing; and hence its discipline and hygiene is unusually proficient and gratifying. Its captains represent a class of men remarkable, and some of them were distinguished in their respected avocations or pursuits, and are themselves just examples of the kind of men they have the honour to command. The following is a list of the Staff and Company Officers of this battalion:—

Edward B. White, Lieutenant-Colonel; Octavius A. White, Surgeon; Lieutenant William B. McKee, Acting Adjutant; Captain M. R. Marshall, Quartermaster; Lieutenant J. Randolph Mordecai, Acting Commissary.

Company A.—W. H. Campbell, Captain; E. W. Earle, Senior First Lieutenant; J. F. Furman, Junior First Lieutenant; E. H. Graham, Senior Second Lieutenant; S. S. Kirby, Junior Second Lieutenant.

Company B.—John Waties, Captain; R. B. Waddell, Senior First Lieutenant; B. G. Rowland, Junior First Lieutenant; J. W. Self, Senior Second Lieutenant; Thomas Waties, Junior Second Lieutenant.

Company C.—J. F. Calpeper, Captain; J. L. Dove, Senior First Lieutenant; J. L. Moses, Junior First Lieutenant; H. J. Ham, Senior Second Lieutenant; Perry Moses, Junior Second Lieutenant.

Company D.—C. E. Kaupaux, Captain; H. Ferguson, Senior First Lieutenant; T. J. Sistrunk, Junior First Lieutenant; J. R. Horsey, Senior Second Lieutenant.

Company E.—J. D. Johnson, Captain; C. Y. Lee, Senior First Lieutenant; A. F. Calpeper, Junior First Lieutenant; W. D. Scarborough, Senior Second Lieutenant; R. M. Anderson, Junior Second Lieutenant.

Company F.—F. C. Schulz, Captain; Aug. Fludd, Senior First Lieutenant; T. G. White, Junior First Lieutenant; W. R. Fludd, Senior Second Lieutenant; W. B. McKee, Junior Second Lieutenant.

Company G.—W. L. De Pass, Captain; D. M. Rodgers, Senior First Lieutenant; A. A. Gilbert, Junior First Lieutenant; S. M. Richardson, Senior Second Lieutenant; J. R. Mordecai, Junior Second Lieutenant.

Company H.—F. H. Holtzclaw, Captain; J. R. Bowden, Senior First Lieutenant; W. C. Humphreys, Junior First Lieutenant; L. B. Nichol, Senior Second Lieutenant; D. L. Westmoreland, Junior Second Lieutenant.

The following exciting call to arms has been extensively circulated in the State of Connecticut, United States. It is indicative of the state of feeling among the people:—

Invalid Brigade.

Pour in Patriotic "Sons of Connecticut," and fill up the Ranks.

Glory, Hallelujah! Your country calls. Let'er call. Get your certificate, and join the glorious Brigade of General Debility. The first regiment of this brigade will consist of the following companies:—Company A, Sapheds and Minors; Company B, Undertakers' Zouaves; Company C, Crutch Company (in ambulances); Company D, Only Sons' Company; Company E, Peace Guards, in private carriages; Company F, Substitute Corps; Company G, Disabled Patriots; Company H, Forty-six-year olders "pet lambs;" Company I, Invited Guests (foreigners); Company K, Canadian Voltigeurs. There will be a "grand inspection" of the Corps on Saturday; every "ill that flesh is heir to" is expected to be in the ranks. The Undertakers' Zouaves will form the right of the line. A few more men wanted for this company. None but able-bodied men need apply. Each man will be armed with a pine coffin and a "certificate!" Bounty Land.—A farm 6ft. x 1, will be given to each recruit.—The Morning Herald.

ADDRESS OF GENERAL VAN DORN.

Vicksburg, July 16.

To the troops defending Vicksburg:—

Your conduct thus far, under the circumstances which surround you, has won the admiration of your countrymen. Cool and self-possessed under the concentrated fire of more than forty vessels of war and mortar boats, you have given assurances that the city entrusted to your care will not be given up to the blustering demands of cannon, nor the noisy threatenings of bombshells. Such exhibitions of fury seem but to arouse you, and to animate the tedium of camp life. You await a more formidable demonstration. Impotent in his rage, the enemy is striving to turn the current of the Mississippi from your batteries. He will fail. When he is master of the great river that flows at your feet, and which has become the eternal custodian of your names and glory, every wave that ripples by its shore will crimson with your blood, and every hill that looks down upon it will be the sepulchre of a thousand free men.

Soldiers! To have been one among the defenders of Vicksburg, will be the boast hereafter of those who shall bear your names, and a living joy by your hearthstones for ever. Continue, I beseech you, to be worthy of your country's praise and the reputation you have achieved.

The Commanding General will take pleasure, and it is his duty, in forwarding the distinguished among you to the General commanding the department, for honourable mention in general orders. It is his pride to be your commander.

The steamer Arkansas is immortal, and above his praise. She commands the admiration of the world.

By order of Major-General Earl Van Dorn.

H. M. KIMBALL.

Major and A. A. General.

THE NORTH AND THE WEST.—On the 30th of July the Hon. J. S. Carlisle addressed the Democratic State Convention at Indianapolis, Indiana, in a speech strongly denouncing the policy of the Washington Government. In conclusion he said:—"The subjugation or extermination of the South is impossible. A year ago a large Union element was there; now there is a solid sentiment for permanent dissolution; and why? Because Congress by its legislation diverts the war into an unholy and gigantic crusade against the institutions of the South. The man who said slavery and the Government were incompatible virtually pronounced the Government a failure, labelled the wisdom of its founders, and was a traitor to it. The Republican Party, now in power, and now waging the war, had so pronounced through its hostile legislation to the Constitution. If slavery and the rights of States must go down, if at the dictation of these men you surrender a constitutional right, and deny or take from a State the right to hold slaves, "how soon may you be called upon to surrender others?" They make negroes competent witnesses now in the District of Columbia. How soon will they demand that it be done in Indiana? If you again give these men your confidence, and return them to Congress, you will all be made the slaves of a centralized Government, and no one will pity or sympathize with you. The interests of the Western States are with the South. There was their grain market. You have a Northern market, the same as ever; but your corn is rotting in your granaries, and you walk on the ruins of your prosperity. The wicked men of the North and South have deprived you of your market, and these Northern men want to wage a war that will for ever deprive you of it. Freeing negroes won't make one. Free the niggers, exterminate the whites, and give the land to the Yankee Norway rats, and you'll never have a market there. Indiana is more interested than slaveowners themselves in perpetuating slavery in the South. To free 4,000,000 blacks will be to keep up taxation, increase debt, ruin property, degrade our children, and make this country a second Mexico.

PAYNE, HUNTINGDON AND
CO. NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A.,
Cotton Factors.

MOSES GREENWOOD, NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Cotton
Factor and Commission Merchant.

MCDOWELL, WITHERS, AND
CO. MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A., Commission Merchants.

GARLAND GOOD, MOBILE,
Cotton Factor and Commission Merchant.

BOYKIN AND McRAE, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

MILLER AND BATTIE, Exchange
Brokers, MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

R. AND D. G. MILLS, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
GALVESTON, TEXAS, C.S.A.

ROTCHFORD, BROWN, AND
CO. Cotton Factors, NEW ORLEANS,
LOUISIANA, C.S.A.

R. W. RAYNE, NEW ORLEANS
LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Commission Merchant, offers facilities to European Consignors of Boots and Shoes to supply the markets of Tenessee, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Alabama. Specifications furnished of goods suitable to these markets.

ANDREW LOW AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

CHARLES GREEN,
Commission Merchant, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

H. D. WEDE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

JAMES CHAPMAN,
Commission Merchant, CHARLESTON.

N. A. HARDEE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

J. W. ANDERSON AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

R. N. GOUDINE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Charleston.

REID AND STEWART, Com-
mission Merchants, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.
Represented by Andrew Stewart, J. Rumford-place,
Liverpool.

J. H. ASHBRIDGE AND CO.,
Shipping and Commission Merchants, NEW ORLEANS.

Office—No. 50, Tower-buildings West, Liverpool.
Agents—Liverpool and New Orleans Mail Steam
Navigation Company.

S. A. PLUMMER AND CO.,
Importers and Dealers in Hardware,
PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA, C.S.A.

H. O. BREWER & CO.,
MOBILE, ALABAMA,
General Commission and Shipping Merchants.

ROBINSON & OLIVER,
Commission Merchants,
NEW ORLEANS,
C.S.A.

Represented by
JOS. T. ROBINSON & CO.,
India Buildings, Water-street,
Liverpool.

JOHN FRASER & CO.,
CHARLESTON.
South Carolina.
FRASER, TRENHOLM, & CO.,
Liverpool,
Commission Merchants.

WARWICK AND BARKSDALE,
GALLIGO FLOUR MILLS.
This immense establishment of capacity to manufacture 1000 barrels of Flour per day, purely for
South American Market. RICHMOND.

JOSEPH R. ANDERSON,
TREDGAR IRON WORKS
Manufacturers of Locomotive and other Engines,
all descriptions of Machinery, Rifled Cannon, &c.
RICHMOND.

DUNLOP, MONCURE, & CO.,
General Commission Merchants,
RICHMOND.

A. G. MILWAINE, AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Tobacco, Cotton,
Grain, and other produce, PETERSBURG,
VIRGINIA.

C. W. WHITE,
Commission Merchant,
ST. THOMAS, WEST INDIES.

FRANCIS FORD, Manufacturer,
MANCHESTER: Three and Six Cord Spool
Thread, Cotton Balls, Knitting and Embroidering
Cottons. Imported by FOSTER AND MOORE,
Norfolk, Va.: F. RIMAILHO AND NEYREY,
New Orleans.

HAMILTON AND GRAHAM,
Importers, Wholesale Dealers in Dry
Goods, &c., PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA.

H. LEVY AND SON,
Commission Merchants, MOBILE.

R. D. RUSDEN, MANCHESTER,
ENGLAND, American Drills of all kinds,
Denims, Stripes, Shirtings, and all sorts of Manchester Goods.

SEARING AND CO.,
Commission Merchants,
MOBILE AND NEW ORLEANS, C.S.A.
Represented by R. G. BULLOCK, Cotton Broker, Royal Exchange, Manchester.

HARPER AND CAUGHNEY,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA. Represented by J. and A. CAUGHNEY,
Tempest Chambers, Tempest Hey, Liverpool.

THE SOUTH VINDICATED:
Being a Series of Letters written for the American Press during the Campaign for the Presidency in 1860, with a Letter to Lord Brougham on the John Brown Raid, and a Survey of the Result of the Presidential Contest, and its consequences.

BY
THE HON. JAMES WILLIAMS,
Late American Minister to Turkey.

WITH AN INTRODUCTION
BY JOHN BAKER HOPKINS.

From the Second American Edition published at Nashville, Tenn., Confederate States of America, by the Southern Methodist Publishing House.

LONDON:
LONGMAN, GREEN, LONGMAN, ROBERTS, & GREEN.

MR. WILLIAM FREEMAN,
Publisher of THE INDEX, will promptly
attend to all orders from or for the Continent of Europe and the States, Commissions for books and
goods of all kinds undertaken on moderate terms.
102, Fleet-street, London.

WORKS RECENTLY PUBLISHED
BY
WILLIAM FREEMAN,
102, FLEET STREET.

SHIFTING SCENES: and Other Poems. By J.
STANLEY BIGG. Fcap. 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.; handsomely bound, 5s.

POEMS OF TRUTH AND FANCY. By S. R.
REDMAN. Crown 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.

THE WEARMOUTH ABBOTS. (Second Edition.)
A Tale, Illustrative of Saxon Christianity. Fcap.
8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.

JESUS THE SOUL'S NEED. By C. A. PORTER.
Royal 32mo. paper, 8d.; cloth, 1s.

PROGRESS; or, The International Exhibition.
By the Rev. W. ANDERSON, Author of "Self-
made Men." Royal 32mo. paper cover, 8d.

THE FATHERS OF THE WESLEY FAMILY.
By the Rev. S. BEALY. Crown 8vo. cloth, 1s. 6d.

DECISION AND CONSISTENCY. Exemplified
and Honoured in the Life of Daniel and his Three Friends. By THOMAS COLEMAN, Author of "Two
Thousand Confessors." Fcap. 8vo. cloth, 2s. 6d.

HOW THEY GOT THERE. By the Rev. W.
BARKER. Being an Answer to "How Did They Get There?" Crown 8vo. sewed, price 2d.

PUNCH IN THE PULPIT. (Second Edition).
TO BE, OR NOT TO BE? or, Man's Present and Future Condition Considered.

JESUS, OUR ARK.
ESSAYS, CRITICAL, BIOGRAPHICAL, and MIS-
CELLANEOUS. By S. F. WILLIAMS.

London: William Freeman, 102, Fleet Street.

European and Confederate States
Advertising Agency.

THE object of this Agency is to
effect a direct trade alliance between the European and the Southern Press, through the medium of advertising. The most practicable mode
of introducing the Merchants, Manufacturers, Cap-
italists, Insurance Companies, &c., of Foreign Countries, to the Southern Trade, is by an organised,
classified, and liberal system of ADVERTISING.
Trade, like time and tide, waits for no man. The commerce of the world will not pause in ruinous inaction, but will commence its irresistible ebb and
flow the moment peace is established. One of the most dangerous, corrupting, and insidious means to be used by the North will be the medium of advertising in Southern papers. Advertising Agencies are already organised in every Northern city, and only bide their time. We must see to it that our papers are so filled with Foreign Advertisements
and the advertisements of Southern Importers, Dealers, and Manufacturers, that the North will not be left in any Southern newspaper for the advertisement of a single Yankee notion. Then will
our papers present to their readers a faithful
mirror of Dealers, Manufacturers, &c., in the Old World, and of our business men at home, and thus attach to Southern interest that mighty lever "the Press," and disrupt the tie which, by means of Northern advertising, has had so much influence in
binding the South to dependence upon its enemies.
Through the medium of a liberal advertising
patronage, our Southern editors can be maintained
against the stagnation in their business, which proceeds from interrupted or disorganised trade.

The object of this Agency is threefold:—

1st. To advertise European Merchants, Manufacturers, Hotels, Railroads, Insurance Companies, &c.,
&c., in Southern papers.

2nd. To advertise Southern business, property,
&c., in European journals.

3rd. To advertise home industry and Southern enterprise in our own papers, and thereby build up
the cities of our Confederacy, instead of those of
our enemies.

Our arrangements abroad are all completed. We now address you this preliminary Circular, to ask
you to send us duplicate copies of your paper, accompanied by a private letter (which shall be strictly confidential), stating your terms of advertising, &c.

We will soon appoint agents in each important
sea-board and inland city. Atlanta, at present, is selected for the Central Office, on account of its geographical position. We respectfully ask for this enterprise your hearty co-operation and assistance,
and guarantee, in return, strict integrity in all
business transactions.

By order of the Board of Directors,
WILLIAM H. BARNES,
SUPERINTENDENT.

Atlanta, Ga., August 21, 1861.

TO SOUTHERN AMERICAN FAMILIES IN
PARIS.

A FRENCH LADY,—living with
her mother and her daughter in a pleasant location close by the Champs-Elysees—offers the
comforts of a home and motherly care and attention, together with the advantages of the best
education and excellent music-teaching, for TWO YOUNG CHILDREN, or for a YOUNG LADY
under fifteen.

Address, MADAME DE W., care of Mr. Langer,
17, Rue de la Paix, Paris.

A. M. GAUTIER, Tailor, 229,
Rue de la Paix, Paris.

TO EAST INDIA MERCHANTS.
A GENTLEMAN, in his 30th Year,
who has had nearly 16 Years' experience in
the Manchester Yarn and Cloth Market as a SALESMAN,
also 24 Years' experience in East Indian and American Cottons, desires to go out to Bombay,
under the auspices of a first class firm, to act as their Cotton Buyer.
Address, BOX, J. 19, Post-office, Manchester.

Citizens' Mutual Insurance Company.

The Board of Trustees, have resolved to pay an interest of SIX PER CENT. in cash on the outstanding certificates of profits to the holders thereof, on their legal representatives, on and after the second Monday in February next; also, to declare a dividend of Twenty per cent. (20 per cent.) on the
net earned premiums of the Company, for the year
ending 30th November, 1861, for which certificates
will be issued on and after the second Monday in February next.

TRUSTEES.
Geo. W. West Vice-President. M. Masson.
D. Jamison. R. P. Hunt.
Ar. Millenberger. Martin Gordon, jun.
J. Leisy. Casaire Olivier.
Jas. A. White. A. Bohn.
Douglas West. N. Augustin.
Omer Gaillard.

Home Mutual Insurance Company of
New Orleans.

OFFICE—78 Camp Street,
Amount of premiums for year ending
31st December, 1861 433,725 47
Amount of Profits for year ending 31st
December, 1861 282,908 88
Amount of Assets on 31st December, 1861 1,338,306 77

The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of FIFTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent.
interest on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved
to redeem the Scrip of 1857.

Interest and redeemable Scrip, payable in cash on
and after 16th February next.

Certificates of Scrip, for the year 1861, deliverable
on and after 1st January, 1862.

A. BROTHER, President.
JAMES H. WHEELER, Secretary.

New Orleans, January 11, 1862.

Louisiana Mutual Insurance Company.

OFFICE:
Iron Building, corner Camp and Natchez Streets.
Amount of Premiums for the year ending 28th February, 1861 699,528 70
Amount of Profits for the year ending
28th February, 1861 213,759 74
Amount of Assets for the year ending
28th February, 1861 866,429 98

The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of THIRTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent.
interest on outstanding Scrip, and have ordered the redemption of Fifty per cent. of the Scrip issued
of 1859.

Interest and redeemable Scrip payable on and after the second Monday of May next.

Certificates of Scrip for the year 1861 deliverable
on and after 1st June, 1861.

CHARLES BRIGGS, President.
R. P. JANVIER, Secretary.

New Orleans, March 20, 1861.

Merchants' Mutual Insurance Com-
pany of New Orleans.

At a meeting of the Board of Directors held this
day it was resolved to declare a Scrip dividend of TWENTY PER CENT., on the net earned premiums of the last year, and also to pay Six per cent.
interest on the outstanding Scrips of the Company. Scrip Certificates to be issued on and after the first day of August next.

DIRECTORS.
Geo. Connelly. J. N. Nevins.
John Pemberton. S. O. Nelson.
P. Maspero. C. H. Slocomb.
P. Pouta. B. F. Voorheir.
G. Hildebrand. B. O. Vignaud.

Creseent Mutual Insurance Company.

OFFICE:
Corner of Camp and Commercial Place.

TWELFTH ANNUAL STATEMENT.

Amount of Premiums for ten months
ending 30th April, 1861 $31,876 11
Profits for ten months to 30th April, 1861 237,238 27
Assets 30th April, 1861 1,422,939 35

The Trustees have declared a Scrip Dividend of THIRTY PER CENT., after paying interest at the
rate of Six per cent. per annum on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved to redeem Forty per cent.
of the issue of 1858, payable as follows:—

Twenty per cent. 10th June, 1861.
Twenty per cent. 1st September, 1861.

Scrip Certificates for the year 1861 deliverable on
and after the 12th day of August next.

THOMAS A. ADAMS, President.
G. W. SPRATT, Secretary.

BRITISH AND NORTH AMERI-CAN ROYAL MAIL SHIPS.

NOTICE.

These Steamers call at CORK HARBOUR on both Outward and Homeward Passages, to receive and land Mails.

Freight by the Mail Steamers to Halifax and Boston, and to New York, £3 per ton, and 5 per cent.
primeage.

PARTIAL PARCELS.—Parcels containing samples of Goods on board will be taken free of freight by
the Mail Steamers.

Freight on other Parcels 5s. each and upwards, according to size.

Parcels for different Consignees, collected and made up in Single Packages, addressed to one party for delivery in America, for the purpose of evading
the payment of Freight, will, upon examination in America, by the Customs, be charged with the proper Freight.

Does not taken on any terms.

The British and North American Royal Mail
Steam-Parcel Company, draw the attention of Shippers and Passengers to the 32nd section of the New Merchant Shipping Act, which is as
follows:—

"No person shall be entitled to carry in any ship, or to require the master or owner of any ship to carry therein, aquarionis, oil of vitriol, gunpowder, or any other goods which, in the judgment of such master or owner, are of a dangerous nature; and
if any person carries or sends by any ship any goods of a dangerous nature, without distinctly
marking their nature on the outside of the package containing the same, or otherwise giving notice in writing to the master or owner, at or before the time of carrying or sending the same
to be shipped, he shall for every such offence incur
a penalty not exceeding £100; and the master or owner of any ship who refuses to take on board any parcels that he suspects to contain goods of
a dangerous nature, and may require them to be opened to ascertain the fact."

The Index,
A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS,
LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

Published every Thursday Evening.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

Subscriptions, Twenty-six Shillings per annum.
Stamped, Thirty Shillings per annum.

Nos. I. to XIX. NOW READY.

Office:—102, Fleet-street.

In this great metropolis, on the native soil of free speech and a free press, every interest—political
social, religious, literary, scientific, benevolent
commercial, however remote, however small the
class to which it addresses itself—has long had its recognized representative in Journalism, through
which it seeks to obtain a share of the public attention. The one solitary exception has heretofore been in the case of the Confederate States of America. Engaged in a life-and-death struggle against a vastly superior foe—hemmed in on all sides, quite as effectually by the deserts of the Far West and of Mexico, as by the enemy's armies and navies—they suffer even more from that intellectual
blockade which excludes them from communion
with the rest of mankind, than from the commercial difficulties of obtaining their much needed
supplies. The disruption of the American Union—
despite repeated warnings—started Europe without at once awakening it to a full consciousness of the reality and importance of the event. So little
had the internal politics of America entered into
the routine of European thoughts, that even now—
when the effects are undeniable and irrevocable—
the causes still remain a mystery and a riddle to by far the greater portion of the intelligent European public. When the catastrophe occurred, the Northern States had the ear of the Governments
and of the peoples; and so zealously have they
retained it, so ingeniously and persistently have
they pleaded their cause, so imperfect and dis-
torting was the medium through which alone the South's voice could be heard, that Europe may fairly be said to have listened to but one side of the quarrel. It is true that the respectable portion of the English press has treated the weaker party in
that spirit of fair play upon which every English-
man prides himself; and, as the struggle progressed, has evinced a painstaking study of a per-
plexing subject, which stands in honourable contrast to the flippancy and indecorum of American Journalism. But this has not supplied the want, so long and keenly felt, of some organ of Southern
interests and Southern opinions, to which the Statesman, the Journalist, the Merchant, and the
public at large might look for reliable intelligence
of the progress of events, and for valuable indications of the manner in which the South itself views
and weighs the importance and bearing of those
events.

"This want it is one of the principal objects of
"THE INDEX" to supply as far as possible. The measure of success which may reward the effort will necessarily depend upon the co-operation of the
friends, and of the private, as well as official, representatives of the South in Europe. This cooperation has been most generously accorded us.
There is a large amount of Southern intelligence
which reaches Europe through various private channels. Still more important information is obtained from Northern sources, which finds no
outlet through the muzzled press of those States.
Much of such valuable material has already been
placed at our disposal; and we have a reasonable
prospect of making "THE INDEX" the receptacle
and depository of all, or nearly all, that is available
in the United Kingdom and on the Continent. Our arrangements are such that our friends may rely on
this respect upon a scrupulous and sound discretion, and the inviolable sanctity of private
communications.

While we have thus frankly explained one of the principal objects of "THE INDEX" it may be necessary to state—in order to prevent a possible
misapprehension—that it is not the sole object.
Literature and General News—in fact, every ingredient of a Weekly Journal—will command our earnest attention; and it will be our unremitting
endeavour to make "THE INDEX" worthy of that
liberal patronage which is promised us in advance.
"THE INDEX" will be represented by competent Correspondents at the different capitals of the Continent, at Washington, and at Havana. It is our design, also, that "THE INDEX" should partake of
the character of a Magazine, without departing
from its proper sphere as a Review of current
events.

For the leaders and literary contributions, we shall enjoy the valuable aid of the pens of gentlemen already favourably known to the public.

The Cotton Market will monopolize much of our space, and is entrusted to handle theoretically and practically familiar with the subject and all questions bearing upon it.

It is superfluous to add that "THE INDEX" is
necessarily committed to the advocacy of the principles of Free Trade.

Subscribers will be furnished with handsome
Covers for each Half-Yearly Volume.

A full list of the original "INDEX" Subscribers
and a carefully prepared Table of Contents will accompany the concluding number of each Volume.

Subscriptions and Advertisements to be sent, and
Post-office Orders made payable to

WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102, FLEET ST., E.C.

Printed by HENRY F. MACKINTOSH, of 11,
Crown-court, Fleet-street, and Published for
the Proprietors by WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102,
Fleet-street, London E. C.—September 4, 1862.

THE INDEX

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS, LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

OFFICE:—102, FLEET STREET.

VOL. I—No. 20.]

LONDON—THURSDAY EVENING, SEPTEMBER 11, 1862.

[PRICE 6D.

CONTENTS.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK	PAGE
COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET—
Liverpool Letter.. ..	306
Manchester Letter	306
TORRACO MARKET	306
LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH—
Private Letters	306
FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE—
New York	307
Paris	307
LEADERS—
The War News	312
President Davis's Message	312
Confederate Reprisals	313
Cause of the Disruption of the Union	314
Co-operation	314
Are the Millowners to Blame	315
REVIEW—
The Discovery of America	317
LETTER TO THE EDITOR—
A Canadian View of Affairs	317
OFFICIAL REPORT OF GENERAL MORGAN'S CAMPAIGN	318
EXTRACTS FROM SOUTHERN PAPERS
ADVERTISEMENTS	320

THE LATEST INTELLIGENCE.

AMERICA.

(Per GLASGOW, via ROCHE'S POINT.)

NEW YORK, AUG 30.

The New York Times says that if England, France, and Russia would mediate on the basis of the South returning to the Union, doubtless the North would assent to any terms compatible with the national honour, and essential to the protection and preservation of Southern rights. "Mediation on the basis of Southern independence," continues the New York Times, "is open hostility."

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

On August 20 the Federals were attacked near Culpepper, and had to retreat across the river. The next day they were followed, and the advanced guard of General Sigel was defeated. The engagement was renewed on Friday, and on Saturday the Federals had to abandon the line of the Rappahannock and to retreat to Warrenton and Warrenton Junction. Here Pope was reinforced by several divisions under Generals Heintzelmann and others. The Federals remained in this position until the 26th, congratulating themselves upon having effected the retreat. The Washington Star says: "Since Saturday last nearly all firing across the Rappahannock has ceased; hardly a dozen shots a day are being fired. Most of the officers in front believe that on Saturday last Lee, Longstreet, and Jackson quietly took the back track, going somewhere, no one knows whither—ten to one to Gordonsville. The signs yesterday were that but a very small rebel force was in our front, hardly enough to keep up the appearance of an opposing force there." Indeed, it was reported that Pope had sent a force in pursuit of General Lee, but the authorities at Washington and the Federal generals were equally in the dark as to Confederate movements.

On August 26, Pope learnt the whereabouts of his enemy. The Confederates were in his rear. Two Federal regiments had been captured at Centreville and a large Confederate force was at Leesburg, preparing, so say Northern accounts, to pass into Maryland.

The Confederates, passing through Thoroughfare Gap, attacked Manassas, drove out the Federals, and captured (we give the Northern estimate, which is tolerably sure to be the reverse of exaggerated) a battery of nine guns, quartermasters' stores to the value of half a million dollars, ten locomotives, and so many of the Union forces as were not killed or wounded. "Our loss," says the New York Tribune, "has been immense in killed, wounded, and missing."

The Confederate cavalry then pushed on to Fairfax and destroyed the railroad and telegraphic communication between Pope's army and Washington. We do not wonder at the angry denunciations of the Northern press. The New York World says: "It is for the President to decide what punishment is due for this culpable and most disastrous negligence." This was written in reference to the loss of despatches and baggage resulting from the Confederate cavalry a second time riding round a Federal army without molestation, and before the Federal commander had allowed the enemy to get into his rear without opposition. As soon as Pope discerned the enemy was in his rear, and pressing on his right wing, which must have been greatly extended, he evacuated Warrenton and Warrenton Junction. According to the reports at Washington, the Federal forces fought their way to Manassas Junction, which place they reached on the 28th. We shall not attempt to follow the meagre and contradictory Northern account of the operations from the 26th until the 28th. A series of battles were fought, the results of which we may judge from the silence of the Washington Government. We now come to the second battle of Bull Run, which was fought on August 29. The following are the semi-official report published in Washington and General Pope's official report:—

Semi-official Washington despatches of the 29th inst. report that Generals Burnside and Pope have successfully cut their way through the enemy towards Manassas, and have formed a junction this side of Centreville with the army of Virginia, under General McClellan.

Headquarters, Field of Battle, Grovedown, near Gainsville, August 30.

We fought a terrific battle here yesterday with the combined forces of the enemy, which lasted with continuous fury from daylight until after dark, by which time the enemy was driven from the field, which we now occupy.

Our troops are too much exhausted to push matters, but I shall do so in the course of the morning, as soon as Fitz-John Porter's corps comes up from Manassas.

The enemy is still in our front, but badly used.

We have not less than 8000 men killed and wounded, and, from the appearance of the field, the enemy has lost two to our one. He stood strictly on the defensive, and every assault was made by ourselves.

Our troops have behaved splendidly. The battle was fought on the identical battle-field of Bull Run, which greatly increased the enthusiasm of our men.

The news has just reached me from the front that the enemy is retreating towards the mountains. I at once pushed forward a reconnoitring party to ascertain this.

We have made great captures, but I am not yet able to form an idea of their extent.

JOHN POPE, Major-General Commanding.
To Major-General Halleck,
General-in-Chief at Washington.

We do not, of course, place the slightest reliance on any despatch written by General Pope; but in the absence of authentic intelligence, it is, perhaps, worth while to enumerate its admissions. The Confederates stood on the defensive, and the day after the battle the Federal commander writes, "The enemy is still in our front, but badly used." The object of the attack was, we presume, to drive back the Confederates; the Confederates were not driven back, and, therefore, the attack failed. General Pope admits a loss of 8000 killed and wounded, and confesses his troops are "too much exhausted to push matters." These items do not look like victory. All this notoriously boasting General claims is a drawn battle—that, after a week of Confederate victories, he attacked the Confederate army, with tremendous loss, but did not drive it from his front. All that is clearly known at the latest dates was that the Confederates were still before the Federal army and the Federal capital, that General Ewell occupied the left bank of the Occoquan River in the rear of Pope, and that there were indications of the Confederates appearing on the Upper Potomac.

Meantime the Washington Government has rigidly suppressed the publication of war news, with the exception of General Pope's official despatch in reference to the second battle of Bull Run; and we may conclude that if the news had been in any respect favourable it would have been made public; but until we get Southern accounts we can only speculate on the late important movements in Virginia. It is, however, certain that the Federal army has been forced to retreat towards Washington, and that the Confederate troops were both in its front and rear.

Richmond is no longer menaced, it is now Washington and Maryland that appear to be in danger.

All the buildings in the vicinity of Fortress Monroe were ordered to be destroyed. This is evidently for the defence of the only position, with the exception of the disputed ground between the Rappahannock and the Potomac, that the Federals hold in Virginia. From Harper's Ferry it is reported that guerillas are increasing in that neighbourhood.

General Morgan defeated a Federal force near Gallatin on the 21st inst. A considerable portion of it, with General Johnson and Major Winfries, had to surrender to the Confederate general; the remainder of the Federal troops fled to Nashville. In Kentucky, Tennessee, and Missouri, there is daily fighting. At Cumberland Gap the Federals are completely surrounded, and have lately been defeated by General Morgan. A body of Federal cavalry, in the same neighbourhood, has been routed by Confederate cavalry. General Magruder is reported to have entered Kentucky with 15,000 men. We are again told that General Buell's position creates alarm in Washington.

Baton Rouge has been evacuated but not destroyed, the Federals, probably, having a wholesome dread of the retaliation that would have followed such an outrage.

To increase the troubles of the Washington Government, the Sioux, and Chippewa Indians have revolted, and it is supposed that a general Indian war has commenced.

But at home, as well as in the north-west, the Washington Government has to deal with disaffection. On August 23 a riot broke out in East New York among the recruits of the Spenola Brigade, who complained that their bounty-money had not been paid in full. Ten men were seriously wounded before peace was restored. The officers were overpowered, and had a narrow escape of losing their lives; the sergeant-major was shot. Mr. Lincoln will find that promises to pay will not satisfy soldiers who only enlist for bounty, pay, and the chance of plunder.

The Federal Government is so ill-provided with arms that it will not be able to supply the new army it is raising, and extensive orders have been received by European manufacturers.

Recruiting in the North is said to go on more briskly, but not so fast as to do away with the necessity for the conscription. It has been made an offence for persons to advertise that they procure substitutes. The Governor of Indiana has postponed the drafting until September 15—a very necessary measure in a State so disaffected to the Federal cause. It is now pretty generally understood that no troops will be obtained from Missouri and Kentucky, and, we need hardly add, no attempt will be made to enforce the conscription in those States.

President Davis has issued the following order:—

War Department, Adjutant and Inspector-General's office, Richmond, August 21.

Whereas Major-General Hunter, recently in command of the enemy's forces on the coast of South Carolina, and Brigadier-General Phelps, a military commander of the enemy in the State of Louisiana, have organized and armed negro slaves for military service against their masters, citizens of this Confederacy;

And whereas the Government of the United States has refused to answer an inquiry whether said conduct of its officers meets its sanction, and has thus left to the Government no other means of repressing said crimes and outrages than by the adoption of such measures of retaliation as shall serve to prevent their repetition;

Ordered, That Major-General Hunter and Brigadier-General Phelps be no longer held and treated as public enemies of the Confederate States, but as outlaws; and that in the event of the capture of either of them, or that of any other commissioned officer employed in drilling, organizing, or instructing slaves, with a view to their armed service in this war, he shall not be regarded as a prisoner of war, but held in close confinement for execution as a felon, at such time and place as the President may order.

By order,

S. COOPER, Adjutant and Inspector-General.

This order will have the effect of preventing Federal officers following the example of Generals Hunter and Phelps.

A war meeting was held in New York on the 27th. Very strong resolutions were passed, pledging the fortunes, lives, and honour of the citizens of New York to carry on the war. We confess we do not attach much value to the pledges. The fortune of New York is ruined, and hence the passionate vengeance of her citizens. The New York people have all along evinced a strong indisposition to risk their lives. A resolution was passed urging the President, who was unable to attend the meeting, but sent an apology, to authorize General Corcoran to raise a legion of 20,000 men. We have no doubt that Mr. Lincoln will be glad if General Corcoran can raise a legion of twice 20,000.

Mr. Charles Ingersoll, a prominent Pennsylvanian Democrat, has been arrested for making a speech at a Democratic meeting in Philadelphia, in which he declared that the North was no more advanced in the conquest of the South than at the beginning of the war, and denouncing President Lincoln's Administration as the most corrupt that ever came into power. Mr. Ingersoll obtained a Writ of Habeas Corpus, which was returnable on August 28.

In our leading columns we have dealt with Mr. Lincoln's letter to Mr. Horace Greeley. It has given serious offence to the Abolitionists.

There has been a complete exodus from Maryland; not less than 5000 citizens have left that State since the order for drafting.

It is again rumoured that General Butler is to be removed from New Orleans, and his place supplied by General Dix. General Butler is still urgently asking for reinforcements.

According to the Washington National Intelligencer, President Lincoln intends to enforce the Confiscation and Emancipation Act to the best of his ability.

A correspondent in Canada directs our attention to an article in the Montreal Advertiser, purporting to give, "by authority," the outlines of a commercial treaty, and various other important propositions, for the negotiation of which a special agent was alleged to have been deputed by the Confederate Government to Europe. The whole thing is so extravagantly absurd that it would be unworthy of our notice, had not the article in the Montreal Advertiser received an appearance of credibility by partial republication in London. The bearer of such an errand as the Canadian paper describes might well and wisely have been sped on his way by the Lincoln authorities, and been spared the hairbreadth escapes and romantic adventures which are assigned to Mr. Sanders, who is made the hero of this singular story. We have no right to concern ourselves with the purpose of Mr. Sanders' visit to Europe; but as this visit, through whose fault we know not, has become the object of some public curiosity and various misapprehensions, it may be as well to state here—and we can do so with perfect confidence—that it is made in no official capacity, and that Mr. Sanders brings no communication whatever from the Confederate Government to its Commissioners in Europe.

Mr. Mason, after a brief absence, has returned to London.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, September 10, 1862.

Our last report left the market rather unsettled in tone—high water mark had been reached, and slight symptoms were apparent that the tide had begun to ebb—still Middling Orleans could not be quoted much below 2s. 6d. per lb. On Thursday the depression became more marked, the sales only reached 1000 bales, and transactions occurred at 1½d. below the top in American cotton, and ¾d. to 1d. in Surats. On Friday the Scotia's news was to hand, but produced no effect on the market, which was, perhaps, a shade firmer, with sales of 2000 bales, and the same feeling prevailed on Saturday, with an equal business doing.

Up to this time scarcely any pressure to sell existed, as the pause in the demand was looked upon as quite temporary, and not likely to lead to any serious decline. But on Monday more anxiety was shown to effect sales, and a few transactions occurred in American cotton at fully 2d. decline, and 1d. to 1½d. in Surats.

Yesterday the "Anglo-saxon's" news was to hand, and being of a most exciting character entirely engrossed public attention for some time. A striking resemblance was remarked between the obscure accounts given of the fighting in Upper Virginia, and the first Northern version of the destructive battles before Richmond. The general impression left on the public mind was that the Federal troops had been badly cut up, and, after several days of rapid retreat, had barely been able to make a stand on their old lines at Manassas; it was thought by many that Jackson would even yet be able to drive the Federal army completely out of Virginia, and possibly to take Washington. At first the news was interpreted rather in favour of our market, as the bloody and indecisive nature of the combats was expected to embitter and intensify the struggle; but afterwards the feeling seemed to gain more favour that the frightful effusion of blood would tend to strengthen the hands of the Peace party in the North. The sales, in consequence, scarcely reached 1000 bales, and further concessions were made for cotton on the spot. Some parcels to arrive were also pressed at considerably lower prices than had yet been listened to, and sales of Fair Dhollrah early shipment were made at 16½d. Branch was also reported at 18½d; showing, in either case, 1½d. decline from the top.

In Manchester, the tone of the market was much better than here; no pressure to sell was shown, and very little concession could be obtained from the highest point. The prevailing feeling was, that the pause was quite temporary, and that a further rise in goods must take place before long. Our market to-day, however, has been more sick than before, and in a few quarters much activity has been shown to sell. American cotton has, in a few cases, been sold at 4d. decline, and there are one or two cases, though quite peculiar in character, where a much larger reduction has taken place. For Surat cotton there is scarcely any demand, and to effect sales a decline of fully 2d. must be submitted to. Vessels are now arriving pretty freely, and as 100,000 bales may still be considered about due, buyers are disinclined to operate till the market is fully supplied. In cotton to arrive low sales have also been made to-day, and transactions have taken place in Dhollrah and Omrawutta about due at 16½d., and in Branch at 18d. These low prices, however, have attracted numerous buyers, and rather higher rates are now demanded.

This sudden change in our market has taken many people very much by surprise, but it is just what might naturally be expected after so enormous an advance, still little apparent alteration has taken place in the position and prospects of the staple, and the anxiety now evinced by some holders, shows how nervously sensitive our market is at these lamiae prices. The prevailing cause of uneasiness now seems to be the idea that the next steamer may possibly bring news of the Confederates being in Washington, and it is argued by many, that so staggering a blow to the North would open the eyes of the people to the folly of this war, and so pave the way for negotiation. It is also argued that the capture of the Northern capital would produce a powerful moral effect in Europe, and lead to the speedy recognition of the South, and also effect a basis for offering mediation to the North.

It seems, however, altogether premature to reckon on the capture of Washington, and even if it were affected by a sudden coup—it is quite as reasonable to suppose that it would goad the Northern people to fiercer exertions, and hurry out the equipment of the new levies. The fairest conclusion seems to be that the recent engagements have not materially altered the political situation of America.

Much interest has been excited here, this week, by the alleged discovery of a suitable substitute for cotton. There is a strong conviction, however, that the article will not be found practically available.

Quotations, at present, are quite nominal. Middling Orleans may be put at 27d.; and Fair Dhollrah at 17½d. to 18d.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday, Sept. 9.

The immense excitement which prevailed in our yarn and cloth market during the week ending last Tuesday, was suddenly checked on Wednesday by the tameness of the Liverpool cotton report on that day, which tameness has characterized that market ever since, and produced a corresponding depression of tone in this market as regards the amount of business done, but not as regards prices which remain firm at the highest point.

Friday last, as a market day, was an extremely quiet one, no business of moment having been transacted, nevertheless, there was no weakness in quotations manifested on the part of holders of either cloth or yarn, as they felt assured that there was plenty of room for improvement in the prices of their respective staples, compared with the value of the raw material.

To-day we have to report another quiet market day, as the total amount of business has been very small. Some offers have been made by speculators for goods at a reduction of about 6d. per piece under last Tuesday's quotations, but without meeting with any success. Printing cloths are in fact higher, especially 9-8ths, 72 reed, 22 picks, 50 yards; the principal makers having advanced their pretensions 2s. per piece, bringing up the price to 3s.

Home trade yarns, up to No. 40s first cops, are held very firmly at last week's quotations, but for No. 60s first cops an advance of 1d. per lb. has been obtained, bringing the price to 3s. 2d. per lb.

Export yarns of all kinds are also firmly held, spinners and others will listen to no offers below the extreme quotations of last week.

The news by the Anglo Saxon, to day, is looked upon as favourable to cotton holders, and it is generally believed here that there will be further excitement in the Liverpool market in a few days.

TOBACCO.

There has been an active business in Maryland since the beginning of the month, at prices from 5½d. to 6½d. common and inferior quality, but dry enough for trade. This is, no doubt, speculative. Manufacturers will not use Maryland tobacco till the cold weather; but it is no doubt felt that the high price of strips makes this article now the cheapest substitute, and that the present range, say from 5½d. to 9d. is too low in proportion to cutting strips at 1s. to 16½d. per lb.

The Irish buyers have been looking about for low leaf, and quite common Western quality has been sold at 6½d. There are symptoms also of a large demand for the Continent, and altogether the tone of the market is still strengthening, and prices tending upward as the war increases in desperation, and the hope of conclusion is deferred.

LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH.

TREASURY NOTES.

The following notification respecting the payment of interest on Treasury Notes had been issued from the Confederate Treasury Department:—

Treasury Department, Richmond, August 1.

Sir,—In answer to the inquiries of the 25th ult., you can say:—

1. That the 7.30 interest notes will at any time be accepted in exchange for 8 per cent. Confederate bonds, or for any debt due to the Government, and that interest will be allowed as well as principal.

2. That I shall recommend that Congress pay annually the interest due on these notes to the respective holders thereof on January 1.

3. That the 6 per cent. call certificates cannot be issued for these interest-bearing notes, because such certificates are payable on demand in general Treasury Notes of every denomination.

4. The 7.30 notes may be issued in exchange for the 6 per cent. call certificates. Such exchange effects directly what the holder of the certificates may do indirectly by calling for payment of his certificate in current notes, and then exchanging them for interest notes.

The purpose intended by the issue of interest-bearing notes is to take them out of the general circulation. This is effected by the fact that a calculation of interest takes place at every transfer. It is not expected, therefore, that they will pass into the general deposits or circulation of the banks. In passing them from hand to hand the interest grows each day by an easy calculation of two cents on each hundred dollar note, until the end of the year, when the interest will be paid up, if Congress shall accept my recommendation.

With much respect,

C. G. MEMINGER, Secretary of Treasury.

John Boston, Esq., Depository, Savannah.

The Savannah News publishes the following sketch of General "Stonewall" Jackson:—

There you see self-command, perseverance, indomitable will, that seems neither to know nor think of any earthly obstacle, and all this without the least admixture of vanity, assumption, pride, foolhardiness, or anything of the kind. There seems a disposition to assert its pretensions, but from the quiet sense of conviction of his relative position, which sets the vexed question of self-importance at rest; a peculiarity, I would remark, of great minds. It is only the little and the frivolous who are for ever obtruding their petty vanities before the world. His face, also, expresses courage in the highest degree, and his phrenological developments indicate a vast amount of coery and activity. His forehead is broad and prominent, the occipital and scapular regions are both large and well balanced; eyes expressing a singular union of mildness, energy and concentration; cheek and nose both long and well formed. His dress is a common gray suit of faded cassimere, coat, pants, and hat—the coat slightly braided on the sleeve, just enough to be perceptible, the collar displaying the mark of a Major-General. Of his gait, it is sufficient to say that he just goes along, not a particle of the strut, the military swagger, turkey-gobbler parade, so common among officers of small rank and smaller minds. It would be a profitable study for some of our military swells to devote one hour each day to the contemplation of the magnificent plainness of "Stonewall." To military fame, which they can never hope to attain, he notes the simplicity of a child, the straightforwardness of a Western farmer. On last Sunday he was dressed as above, and bestrode as common a horse as one could find in a summer day. There may be those who would be less struck with his appearance as thus accoutred than if bedizened with lace and holding the reins of a magnificent barb caparisoned and harrowed for glorious war; but to one who had seen him, as I had, at Cold Harbour and Malvern-hill, in the rain of shell and the blaze of the death lights of the battle-field, when nothing less than a mountain would serve as a breastwork against the 36-inch shells which howled and shrieked through the sickly air, General Jackson in tatters would be the same hero as General Jackson in gilded uniform. In my simple view he is a nonpareil—he is without a peer. He has enough energy to supply a whole manufacturing district, enough military genius to stock two or three military schools of the size of West Point.

The Richmond Whig of August 23 gives the following report of the Confederate Congress:—

In the Senate on Saturday a resolution was adopted requesting the President to communicate, as soon as practicable, all official reports of engagements, the object being to give the Senate opportunity to vote resolutions of thanks to officers who have distinguished themselves. The Committee on Military Affairs reported a Bill prohibiting the employment of substitutes, except for persons skilled and actually employed in some mechanical pursuit important to the public interest, or where the person is the only white male adult on the farm or plantation having thereon not less than fifty slaves. If the substitute deserts, however, the person who employed him is to serve. The second section provides that the commanders of brigades and divisions, under certain restrictions, may detail to any farm, or plantation work by slaves, when the owner is a femme sole, a minor, or a person in the public service, one enrolled private for duty. The Bill was ordered to be printed. The residue of the Session was occupied in the discussion of Yancey's resolution to make secret Sessions of the Senate the exception rather than the rule. The resolution was rejected.

In the House a vote of thanks was tendered to Colonel Forrest for his recent victories in Tennessee. That portion of Jefferson Davis's message relating to the increase of the army was taken up and discussed. Senator Foote referred to the manner in which the Conscription Act had been passed. Its constitutionality at the time of passage was doubted, and, if the plan deliberated in it should be allowed to grow into a system, it would be subversive of State sovereignty and popular freedom. The necessity which was alleged to exist formerly for the present law no longer existed, and even that necessity was artificial, having grown out of the failure of the provisional Government to provide for expected deficiencies in the army in season. He insisted that 250,000 men could be raised by requisition upon the States sooner than in any other way, and would not awaken distrust or alarm, nor occasion any collision with State authorities. If the new law recommended by the Secretary of War should be adopted, collision with Virginia, Tennessee, and all the other States would be inevitable, as it would sweep into its vortex all the militia now or to be organized. Nothing but a military despotism could be the result. Singleton, of Mississippi, and Miles, of South Carolina, opposed Mr. Foote's views. Mr. Dargan of Alabama, contrasted the present condition of the army with the past. He thought every man should be subject to the call of the President. "We had on all sides worsted our vindictive foes. It was useless to call them names. The vilest epithet would not be sufficiently severe. Mr. Bonham, of South Carolina, was in favour of raising troops as was done when we resisted Great Britain, as we did in 1812. An extract was read by the clerk from the inaugural address of Governor Vance, of North Carolina, who was in the late engagement at Malvern-hill. In it he appeals to the people of the State to "stand by the Government until the last vestige of thralldom is driven from our shores."

THE CROPS IN VIRGINIA.

(From the Lynchburg Virginian.)

Among the many things for which we have great cause to be grateful to an overruling Providence in connection with our struggle for independence, the bountiful crops now ripening for the harvest, and already gathered, may be put down as a blessing beyond all price. The toil of the husbandman promises to be rewarded by a most abundant yield all over the South. The wheat crop, which has now been cut, is in many portions of the country unusually fine. In South-western Virginia, we hear, it was never better, if so good, and in Piedmont, Virginia, the shocks generally stand thick upon the ground. In some sections of the State we will, of course, not be able to realize the productions of the soil, on account of the occupancy of the enemy. But this will all be more than counterbalanced by the yield of lands far South which have heretofore been appropriated to cotton, but which now team with the cereals. The oat crop is regarded one of the finest which has been produced for several years, the benefits of which cannot be overestimated in times like these. From present prospects the growing crop of corn will be an unusual one. The season so far has been admirable, the rains have fallen just as they were needed, and the stalks have shot up as if by magic. In the South, where the season is early, the corn is already safe, and it is represented as being splendid. Here the critical period in the growth of corn has not yet passed, but the crop has received such an impetus that, under unfavourable circumstances, it will be apt to turn out tolerably well. The virtual giving up of cotton and tobacco this year for the grain crops throughout the South, gives us a much larger breadth of land to draw our supplies from than usual, and will insure an abundant yield of breadstuffs for the army and the people. Timid men, who have been haunted by fears of being "starved out," may dismiss their alarms and be content. The South can feed itself without drawing on the supplies of the world. It is self-sustaining and independent of the rest of mankind. Hostile fleets may hover about its ports and keep out the commerce of the world, but still its granaries will be full and plenty will abound. We may laugh to scorn the blockade, and yet fight our battles and win victories, and have plenty to eat and spare all the time. For all these favours our people cannot be sufficiently grateful. A nation's gratitude should constantly ascend to the Great Source of all blessings for His untold goodness to us. Victory over our enemies is vouchsafed to us in battle, and plenty is scattered with liberal hand throughout the land. Truly does Providence seem to smile on our cause, and cheer us onward in the noble work of winning our liberties.

PRIVATE LETTERS.

Mobile, July 10.

Dear —, I have just learnt that a bag is to be made up this evening, to go by Her Britannic Majesty's ship Rinaldo, or Racer; I don't know which; to be in Mobile Bay to-morrow morning.

— returned from Corinth and Okalona about three weeks ago, in fine health: the awful scenes she has witnessed during her stay with the army exceeds all belief; she says she never wishes to see such sights again; the letters I sent you, written by her, will give you but a faint idea of them.

— is still with his company, which left Tupela fourteen days ago to go into Tennessee, and thence to Kentucky; he is now orderly sergeant, and is eligible for first vacancy of lieutenant; all the company think much of him; he does duty without fear or favour. Mr. O— is about to leave the company, being over age. I enclose you a letter from E—; you see he writes in high spirits; he lost everything when Island No. 10 was evacuated.

You must have heard from the Northern papers that Mobile was taken long ago—it is not yet taken, nor can any armament come against it now until after frost; my own opinion is, that it cannot be taken unless at a sacrifice of human life of at least 20,000 persons; by that time I trust God will stir up the hearts of Great Britain and France to put an end to this wicked war.

I notice, both from yours and M—'s letters, that great distress prevails in England, especially in the manufacturing districts, produced principally by this war, and the want of cotton—you may take my word for it, that the planters will all burn their cotton before they let the Yankees take it; so it is of no use for any one to come here to buy cotton unless under a guarantee that it shall not be seized by the Yankees. I send you a letter from Benjamin, our Secretary of State, on the subject, and also comments by the papers on it.

You must, no doubt, have been very much surprised to notice the capture of New Orleans; it was a very mortifying thing for us, and caused a great falling of spirits, but now we begin to think it has all been for the best, considering that "Picayune Butler," has, and is, proving himself the best friend the South ever had; may he live a thousand years; his name is supposed to be worth to us at least 50,000 men.

I regret I cannot send you the list of the killed and wounded in the 3rd Alabama (Mobile) Regiment. M— would recognize a number of young men; it would be needless for me to enumerate them all, and from memory; among them are wounded, Mr. M'Wheeler's two sons—Daniel (seriously) and Josiah, Milton Boulleut (seriously), J. Holmes, Charles Wheeler, Engene Brooks, George Rae, Heory M'Coy, &c. Two of the surgeons and Mrs. Canfield's son, Morland, killed. In fact, hardly one of our old friends and companions have escaped; hardly a family but has lost a son, a brother, or father, either at Shiloh or at Richmond.

As to the state of political matters here, it amounts to this,—that if it was possible at the beginning to reconstruct the Union, now it is impossible; these two sections can never be reunited, but must for ever be two separate and distinct nationalities; this country has suffered too much and lost too many sons, brothers, fathers, and relatives, to ever think of again shaking hands with the Yankees.

Besides, have we ever lost a battle on land?—where they have been fairly met, we have always been the conquerors; no nation was ever more united than this is, and even if the war should last for twenty years, at the end of that time we shall be free. Alas! how much bloodshed, how much sorrow, and woe, and misery will there be before a peace is obtained.

Foreign Correspondence.

(From our Commercial Correspondent.)

NEW YORK, August 26.

The money-changers of Wall-street have at last taken alarm at the enormous amount of certificates of indebtedness issued by the Treasury Department, said to exceed $500,000,000. These securities (!) are in every one's hands, and have taken the place of commercial paper, which has disappeared, consequent upon a paralyzed credit. The major portion of the sales of merchandise are made for cash, the principal purchasers are contractors, who receive payment in these "promises to pay" at twelve months' date, which they pledge to the banks and discount firms as collateral against their own notes at ninety days and four months, with a margin of 20 or 25 per cent. The ordinary amount afloat of commercial paper in the adhering States is estimated at $800,000,000; the figures have now been lessened to $100,000,000; this leaves a space in the financial lab-rinth, which is being fast occupied by Mr. Chase; while he is driving the specie and bank notes from circulation by irredeemable bills as a medium of exchange, he is, at the same time, stepping into the old shoes formerly worn by the mercantile classes. In short, he is monopolizing the entire credit of the country; yet the busy bees of Wall-street are only beginning to open their eyes to the fact, which has long since been apparent to sober-thinking minds unconnected with that thoroughfare. The truth is, the pecuniary affairs, as well as the political concerns, of the Northern States have fallen under the control of a very ignorant class of men. Much as the people of the South dislike the politicians, they have equal cause to hate the moneyed interest of the North. Without the aid of the latter this wicked war would have stopped long since. What right had presidents of banks, entrusted with other people's money, for legitimate business purposes, to make the large loans to the Government a year ago, and what right have the correspondents of European houses to be giving their aid and support to this cruel strife? And it is to be expected that the Confederates will mark every man and every firm on both sides of the Atlantic that has directly or indirectly assisted in this most unjust crusade. The passive speculators, too, are almost as guilty as those who have taken an active part, because they have quietly looked on and permitted others to do what they knew to be wrong.

Much anxiety has been felt for some days past as to the state of affairs in Virginia; it is believed that the Southerners have had great successes, the intelligence concerning which has been kept back. So engrossing have matters in that locality been, that we have almost become indifferent to events in the West, where the Confederates gain ground in every direction. The first report from Baton Rouge turns out to be correct, the second, via General Butler, was false.

If the war is not brought to a close by the triumph of the Confederate arms, it will be ended by the ballots of the people in the Border States north of Mason and Dixon's line; the Administration being in a minority in New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Iowa, and possibly in New York. The voice of the New England States is "still for war." It is difficult to decide in which of those unenviable qualities, fanaticism or venality, the people of these States [most excel.

PARIS, September 10.

Garibaldi received two wounds in the affair at Aspromonte—a spent bullet slightly wounded him in his left thigh, but the other wound is far more serious. It appears that a Minié ball struck him with full force in the left foot, and entered it below the ankle, and no surgical skill has succeeded as yet in extracting it. The inflammation and the pain are very great, and it is feared that either tetanus or mortification may take place. The partizan chieftain lies, it is believed, in a precarious state.

In the meanwhile the Italian question is warmly discussed, and the fact that the Emperor has gone to Biarritz without allowing his opinion to transpire leaves the field open to conjecture. M. de la Guéronnière has proved as good as his word, and no one can entertain a doubt on the policy he advocates. In his two letters that have already appeared in the journal La France he formally declares that the new Kingdom of Italy must do without Rome; that the States of the Church cannot be taken away from the Church; that France shall remain there and protect the legitimate authority. He then goes on to state that the political equilibrium of Europe would be deranged by Victor Emmanuel possessing himself of Rome; that he would never stop before taking Venice, too, and Trieste, and the Tyrol; and that between such a Power in her rear, England in her front, and Germany all along her open eastern frontier, France could not help herself from asking some territorial advantages to guarantee her safety.

I have no doubt that your English papers will not allow this last argument to pass unnoticed; but there is, undoubtedly, a strong feeling in France in favour of defending the head of the Catholic Church against further aggression and further spoliation. It is true that the Constitutionnel has taken the ground opposite to La France in the discussion of the Italian affairs. It is true that no one knows of the Emperor's future course, and that nobody even pretends to know if the Emperor has decided on one; but notwithstanding the doubts expressed on the subject, be sure that Napoleon has determined on his policy. His strong endorsement of M. de la Guéronnière's ideas at the first rumour of Garibaldi's rising, his firm refusal of sending the slightest word to Turin which could be construed into a promise to abandon Rome, the reinforcements which continue to be sent to General de Montebello, the evident discontent of Prince Napoleon Jerome—all these are unmistakable signs that the Emperor has adopted a policy, and a decided one, too. He did not think proper to have it published but at his own time. That his will is fixed upon not abandoning Rome, the future will show.

There is, after all, a want of fairness, a bad faith that is unbearable, amongst all those who ask France to withdraw from Rome, under the pretence of respect for the principle of non-intervention. Let the Romans themselves, let the bona fide citizens of the States of the Church, decide on their Government, and you will hardly find one of them who would prefer Piedmont's rule to the kind management of the Pope. It is the intervention of Mazzini's emissaries, French, English, German, as much as Piedmontese—it is their violent handling of the quiet people of Rome—it is the overthrow of an established Government by foreign Red Republicans, that the French army opposes at Rome; and the French occupation of Rome is honestly nothing else but a barrier against foreign intervention, and foreign revolutionists. But the same people who blame the Emperor for defending Rome, are they not mostly the admirers of Lincoln's Government? They approve of the invasion of a free country by barbarous mercenaries; when the Northerners deny to the black man the right to live, to breathe his share of the air, to fill his share of the space, to be warmed by his share of the heat of the sun, or to see through his share of its light, these men praise the philanthropy of the North; when the Northerners rob and burn, and when they hang innocent citizens, and when they outrage women, these same men exonerate them from all blame, and charge the South with inhumanity. They have no sympathy for a Republic with order and liberty; they have no regard for a people fighting bravely for its independence; they want mobocracy—they love mobocracy—they sympathize with mobocracy everywhere. It is an eternal honour to the South that these men are its most bitter enemies.

The eighth and last conference at Constantinople was held without any result being attained. The proposals of the Marquis de Moustier were opposed by the Turkish, English, and Austrian Commissioners, and the conference was adjourned sine die. The latest telegrams announce another bloody conflict between the Servians and the Turks. Eastern affairs look ominous.

After all, Servia does not go even so far as to ask for independence; all it wishes now is to get rid of the Turkish garrison in the fortress of Belgrade. Is not it a disgrace that a large city should be continually under the dread of being bombarded from its own walls. "Imagine some of the large barracks which have been built in Paris during the last ten years," said a French writer some time ago, "being permanently occupied by Russian and Austrian troops. Such is the unbearable condition of Belgrade." Montenegro, subdued for a while, will soon rise up again. In Bulgaria there exist formidable fermentations. The time has come when the Eastern question ought to be settled. It not only bears injuriously upon the quiet of Europe, but it is an obstacle to progress and civilization; it leaves barren and unproductive the most fertile provinces of Europe; in a word, Turkey's rule is a nuisance. The part of Turkey is played out as regards its usefulness. At one time it was required to counterbalance Russia; the Crimean war has disposed of that. The young nations of south-eastern Europe, when free from the Turkish yoke, are strong enough to hold their own. "Everywhere in the East," to quote again the same writer, "the populations which formerly preferred the Russians to the Turks have grown stronger, have taken confidence in their own energy, have faith in their future destinies, and put their hopes, at the present day, no more in the Russians, but in themselves. They used to say 'Better the Czar than the Sultan,' but they say now, 'Better independence than the Czar.'" This new feeling has worked up a complete change in the moral and political situation of the East; and it renders necessary to-day what was not possible twenty years ago."

The confused news that the telegraph brought us this morning of the bloody fights in Virginia, are clear enough as regards the great fact that the large and boastful invading armies which threatened Richmond have been beaten away from swamp to hill, and from river to river, until they struggle now, a few miles from Washington, to cover the capital of the invaders. The three last documents emanating from these gentlemen have astonished the French public. Mr. Seward invites European emigrants to cross over to the happy land under the rule of his colleague, Mr. Stanton, and his subordinates, the Provost Marshals. The channels of peace, commerce, and industry are open to them; full wages are assured, payable in gold and silver; no one will dare to molest them under the protection of the great star-spangled banner; and if, perchance, they feel uneasy, have they not their Consuls to appeal to—their Consuls so much respected by the orderly, peaceful, good-wishers to all mankind, the officials of the great universal Yankee nation? I wonder what the British Consul, who was expelled from New York at the time of the Crimean war, would think of Mr. Seward's efforts to provide human flesh for shot and shell? But Mr. Seward's offers to emigrants are only second to Mr. Lincoln's to another class of men.

Mr. Lincoln's cool speech to the deputation of the coloured people at Washington was a hard blow to the Northern sympathizers in this country. "You have done no harm, but we loathe you; we are unkind and unjust, but it is none of my business. There is a place called Chiriqui, the most unhealthy on the globe, and I wish to send you there. This is your country, where you live honestly and industriously, but we are going to transport you where you will have a chance to work in coal mines, or starve. It is a settled affair, no use arguing; but take your time, don't be in a hurry; good morning!"

That was a stunner; but Mr. Lincoln's letter to Horace Greeley was a finisher (to use the happy style of General McClellan in his despatches). I do feel, I assure you, for these poor journalists, who were again writing yesterday that the North is fighting for the liberty of the negroes. Of course, they never would take the trouble to inquire into the matter, and their ignorance and flippancy, together with their conceit, required nothing less than Mr. Lincoln's public denial to bring conviction to them. I am in hopes now to see no more in the Parisian papers of that annoying and absurd assertion. Requiescat. But I must say this much—I never in my life came across such unchristian, immoral, and basely cruel principles, publicly avowed by the head of a nation.

KNOXVILLE IN 1780 AND 1862.

(From the Mobile Register.)

The physical geography of East Tennessee is very peculiar and intricate in its character, being marked by that extraordinary phenomena of nature which mingles the wonderful with the beautiful and sublime. It is a vast valley of an exceedingly rich agricultural nature, extending from the Cumberland Mountains on the west, to the Alleghany on the east. Its remarkable features consist in the formation of a number of parallel subordinate valleys, separated by precipitous ridges, and drained by the following rivers respectively: the Powell, Clinch, Holston, and French Broad.

The Cumberland Mountains towards the East present a sheer precipice, the very base of which rests upon Powell's Valley, one of the most fertile regions of this department. This immense ridge has several depressed indentations, the most famous and practicable of which is Cumberland Gap. Below Cumberland Gap are several other depressions in the mountains, the principal of which are Wilson's Gap, eighteen miles, and Big Creek Gap, thirty-seven miles distant from the Cumberland. Westward from this ridge a vast wilderness of mountains extends for over 120 miles towards Kentucky and Middle Tennessee. The wagon road from Cumberland Gap to Morristown, which is forty miles, runs directly across the valleys of the Powell, Clinch, and Holston Rivers. This road is the great route through which the emigrants from North Carolina first passed to Kentucky, and over which the drovers still make their way from Kentucky to the Atlantic States.

Through the centre of East Tennessee and parallel to the mountains, runs the East Tennessee and Virginia Railroad, following the valley drained by the Holston River, the largest tributary of the Tennessee, and passes through Morristown to Knoxville. The Clinch Mountain, which is about eight miles west of Morristown, is the only serious natural barrier to the advance of the enemy's columns during the season when the rivers are fordable, and consequently presents a strong strategic point. Another route from Cumberland Gap is down Powell's Valley, running along the base of the mountains to Jacksboro' and Clinton, where it crosses the Clinch River to Knoxville. This route is nearly double the distance of that above mentioned, but is by far the best for military operations.

Thus it will be seen that to advance upon us, the enemy must leave his stronghold at Cumberland Gap, which no longer became a strategic point of importance to us, and fight us on a battle ground of our own selection. Besides, the moment he leaves Cumberland Gap, where it is almost impossible to subvert an army, he loses the advantage of its defence, and therefore his present occupation of it is but of small moment.

The Tennessee River, assuming that name after the junction of the Holston and Little Tennessee—which latter flows transversely to the course of the mountainous region of North Carolina—receiving afterwards a large increase from the Clinch River, breaks its way through the Cumberland Chain at and below Chattanooga. Consequently, by a glance at the map, it will be seen that Cumberland Gap and Chattanooga are the two great transverse fissures through the continuous ridges of the Cumberland Mountains by which East Tennessee may be entered. Another route of military importance at this point is the old road from Knoxville to Nashville, passing through Kingston, which is situated at the junction of the Clinch and Tennessee Rivers, and continuing by Sparta upon the western slope of the Cumberland, passes through Pikeville, McMinnville, and Murfreesboro' to Nashville. This is sufficient to give the reader an idea of the general nature of the country of East Tennessee, as well as some of its most important points.

It is really wonderful, considering that the first settlement in East Tennessee was made so long ago as 1769, how little is known either of the geography or of the great agricultural and mineral resources of East Tennessee, and it can only be accounted for by the fact of its being shut in, as it were, by a wall of mountains. The railroad through it to Virginia has done much to develop it of late years, but it is destined in time to become the greatest and most valuable portion of the State. Its mineral wealth in iron, lead, copper, coal, &c., is enormous. There are now over 200 caves of saltpetre, or nitre, in the State, sufficient to make all the powder we can use. Besides, its means of subsistence are very great, and though it has, in a great measure, already fed a great portion of Beauregard's army, its supplies are still hardly touched. Thus it may be seen what we are to lose, if we are compelled to give up East Tennessee, while at the same time it would cut us off from our great saline works, in Virginia, near Abingdon, on which the whole South is now nearly dependent for salt, and besides, open the great gate at Chattanooga to the cotton States through Georgia.

As early as 1760, over 100 years ago, a party from Virginia, headed by a Mr. Waller, after whom the ridge of the Cumberland is called (and not Waldron, as frequently now written), crossed the mountains into Powell's Valley. That same year Daniel Boone, then twenty-six years of age, also visited the country of Watanga, and a beech tree, said to be still standing near the stage road leading from Jonesboro' to Blountsville, in the valley of Boone's Creek, bore the following inscription:—"D. Boone, called A BAR on this Tree in the YEAR 1760." In 1778 Boone attempted to take his family into Kentucky; and his wife is said to have been the first white woman who ever crossed the Cumberland range. In 1789 emigration greatly increased, and several families settled on the north side of the Holston River, above Knoxville, and Captain James White and James Connor, the same year, built a cabin on the ground where the first Presbyterian church now stands in the city of Knoxville. Near this spot a fort was built, which became the central point for emigrants, and the rendezvous for rangers and scouts, called White's Fort. The settlers became charmed with the beauties of the place, presenting an elevated parallelogram extending south, and terminating with a bold front upon the Holston; a creek of considerable size glides along its eastern, and another along its western base, from whose banks still gush forth springs of excellent water, and on which are now situated two large flour mills. As then seen, says Ramsey, the sight of the future Knoxville, was lovely in the extreme; almost entirely sheltered by the primitive forest in its rich foliage, and having an air of enchanting coolness, rural retirement and seclusion, its quiet only disturbed by the playful murmurings of rivulets, surrounded by wooded hills and sylvan slopes. The high land terminated abruptly towards the Holston, seen here and there through the tall trees, winding its way along the cane-brakes which lined its margin. Immediately opposite was the Little Island, robed in green, and almost submerged by the rushing waters. The southern, or opposite shore, presented in one place lofty hills, resting upon a perpendicular cliff—in another, rising with more gradual ascent to the ridge beyond. And so it continues to-day, with the exception of the removal of the cane-brakes and the forest trees, where now stands the ancient city, whose olden and decayed brick walls still mark the primitive houses of the place, and which gives to the town a sort of Rip Van Winkle appearance; while on the principal streets, Gay and Main, several fine modern built buildings and stores tell of the late march of improvements created by the railroads.

Knoxville, as it now appears, is built on three rolling ridges, the principal and original portion of the town being on the centre ridge, with a creek on each side, already alluded to. Over the bridge, on the east side, the ground is more rolling and picturesque; this portion of the town is called East Knoxville. On the west side, or ridge, is situated the University, and a number of fine large private residences. There is a fine market in the centre of the city, a steam flour mill, besides the two water mills, and several churches, the Catholic church being a most beautiful and unique little edifice, built of gray stone, and with its little turret at one end and cross at the other, looks so devotional. The town was first laid off by Captain White, in 1791, and named after Major-General Henry Knox, the Secretary of War, under President Washington. It was the seat of the first territorial Government under Governor Blount, and afterwards the capital of the State in 1796, and continued to be so for many years after. Kingston, Murfreesboro', and Nashville were its successors for several years, until 1817, when Knoxville regained the honour, and for the last time; the flood of emigration to the West having taken from her the sceptre.

On November 5, 1791, the first newspaper was published and edited by George Roulstone, at Rogersville, in Hawkins county, and, singularly enough, called "The Knoxville Gazette"—it being the intention of the editor to remove to Knoxville, where the seat of the Territorial Government was soon to be established. And here it was that the romantic, brave, and chivalrous John Mitchell—the only true Irish patriot of all the refugees of his day who flocked to this country for bread and protection, excepting that noble heart and powerful writer, Devin Reilly—lured by the exquisite scenery and charming situation of the place, issued "The Southern Citizen." And here, too, the black-hearted Billingsgate viper poured forth his slime—Brownlow—the lowest of all the Browns—low-down Brown, Brownlow! Will friend Mitchell forgive me for having written his name on the same paper with that of the miscreant?

There are several magnificent views of mountain scenery to be had near here, one of the grandest being from the height of the ridge on the east side of Sharp's Gap, about four miles north of this. It is a very pleasant ride, and at about one and a-half miles you pass Gray's prettily laid-off cemetery, enclosed by a fine iron railing. Near the foot of the gap flows a beautiful stream, on which is erected a powder mill. Ascending the height by a good carriage road, you arrive at a cottage house, with a pretty garden and improved grounds, the property of a Mr. Shields, now, however, in a dilapidated state, the tin having been stripped from the roof to make canteens! From this point a sublime view presents itself. To the eastward rises ridge after ridge of the Alleghenies, with their lofty peaks and indentations, extending to the Chillsawee, or Smoky Mountain of North Carolina, rolling up like the majestic deep sea waves of the ocean in a terrific storm. To the westward lies the continuous chain of the Cumberland, with their sloping summits standing out in relief against the tints of a glorious sunset sky. To the northward rises House Mountain, being in the shape of the gable end of a house, one of the chain of the Clinch Mountains, and beneath you, to the southward, lies the pretty town of Knoxville, on the winding Holston, with its turrets and spires, and variegated fields of meadow and grain, looking like the beds of some fairy garden; the whole surrounded with and enclosed by rolling ridges and knolls, clothed with velvety verdure, and making up a landscape of indescribable beauty. It is amid such scenes of grandeur and sublimity that the soul involuntarily offers up its devotion to the Deity, and whom, one may then truly say, he worships in the beauty of holiness!

In scanning the surrounding river and mountain scenery, almost as wild as in its virgin state, and still as beautiful and magnificent, and reflecting on the early scenes of the hunter-pioneers and settlers of this country, when the sound of the Indian war-whoop echoed through the mountains and along the banks of the Holston, where now stands the city of Knoxville—then but a military garrison—the reverses of our first revolutionary struggle, down to the period when Knoxville became the first seat of government and the classic land of Tennessee—and contrasting those days with the present, how changed, yet, in many respects, how similar to the present day, and what strange feelings awoke over one in their contemplation.

It was about the year 1780 that a deep gloom hung over the cause of American independence, and the confidence of its most steadfast friends was shaken. The reduction of Savannah, the capitulation of Charleston, and the loss of the entire army under General Lincoln, had depressed the hopes of the patriot Whigs, and the subsequent career of British conquest and subjugation of Georgia and South Carolina, excited serious apprehension and alarm for the eventual success of the American cause. At the earnest appeal of the patriotic Governor Rutledge, Virginia had sent forward reinforcements under Colonel Buford. His command was defeated and his men butchered by the sabres of Tarleton. At Camden a second Southern army, commanded by General Gates, was dispersed, captured, and signally defeated by Cornwallis.

Besides these disasters, there were other circumstances that aggravated the discouraging condition of American affairs. The finances of Congress were low; the paper currency had failed; its depreciation sinking rapidly; the treasuries of the States were exhausted and their credit lost; a general distress pervaded the country; subsistence and clothing for the famishing and ill-clad troops were to be procured only by impressment; and the inability of the Government, from the want of means, to carry on the war, was openly admitted. British posts were established, and garrisons kept up in the very heart of the country, and detachments from the main army were, with profane impudence, rioting through the land in an uninterrupted career of outrage, aggression, and conquest. Under the protection of these, the loyalists were encouraged to rise against their Whig countrymen, to deprade upon their property, insult their families, seek their lives, and drive them into exile upon the western waters. Estates of active partisans and others were sequestered. Instant death was denounced against those who, after taking protection, should be found in arms against the King, and other measures of the most infamous character adopted to secure the submission of the rebels.

Such was the general condition of affairs in the South, immediately after the defeat near Camden eighty-two years ago; and most remarkable to say, a perfect picture to the life as they exist to-day, with the brutal fanatical Northerner for our foe! What is there, compared to the times of 1780, to allow any one to doubt the establishing of Southern independence?

THE EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS—RETURN OF GENERALS BUCKNERS, MACKALL, AND TILGHMAN TO RICHMOND.

The correspondent of the Philadelphia Press gives the following statement:—

At dusk I departed for the vessels on which were the Confederate prisoners. There were 3013, divided between the steamers Coatzacoalas, Knickerbocker, State of Maine, Wilson Small, Catskill, and Georgia. The flag-of-truce boat, Henry Burden, followed the next day, carrying up Adjutant General Thomas, charged with the superintendence of the exchange, assisted by Captain Stevenson, of the artillery stationed at Fort Delaware. The expedition was under the command of Captain Jones, of Philadelphia; also stationed at Fort Delaware, assisted on board the different boats by Lieuts. Paul, Krouse, Stock, and others, of Fort Delaware, and Lieut. Purr, of the 11th United States' Infantry, who came down in charge of the Fort Warren prisoners. The Coatzacoalas grounded below City Point through the carelessness of a coloured pilot, and after anchoring through the night, the little fleet proceeded on Tuesday morning on its way, after the Coatzacoalas had transferred its living cargo to the Knickerbocker, and to a tugboat, which opportunely arrived. City Point had been the locality hitherto used for exchanging prisoners; but as the Confederates are now erecting fortifications there they did not wish our men to see them, and appointed Aiken's Landing, seven miles further off, for the transaction. It is there that all conferences now take place between the Confederate authorities and our own.

It was my lot to be on board the Knickerbocker, and here were the 210 Fort Warren prisoners, included among whom were the Confederate Generals Buckner, Tilghman, Mackall, Pettigrew, and Gaunt, with Commodore Barron, Captains Mitchell and Kennon, and a host of inferior officers of both navy and army. The sixty privates in this batch were chiefly educated men, and associated on terms of entire equality with their officers, occupying the same cabin and the same deck.

As a matter of trifling import, I will advert to the personal appearance of a few Confederates on the Knickerbocker. Buckner is a man of two or three-and-forty, with a dark complexion. He wore his long prematurely grey hair pushed behind his ears, and his face shaven, with the exception of the lip and chin. His dress was a plain sack and pantaloons of dark-blue cloth, a grey waistcoat, and a high grey skull-cap of indescribable shape, banded by black Scotch checks. His form is moderately thick-set. His manners are cordial and attractive. The countenance and general air of Tilghman and the Barron both bear the impress of high breeding, and both are gentlemen in the highest degree.

All spoke of the war as likely to last long, and scouted the idea of the Union being again consolidated. They inspected silently and with great interest the different gunboats that we passed, and more especially the Monitor and Galena. As a chance shot from one screamed over the hills, their excitement to catch a possible glance of their own forces in the distance was great. Each new feature on shore, as they supposed themselves within their own lines, was eagerly scanned. "There are some of our people," said one, as he saw several Union Cavalry officers approach the shore to water their horses. "No, those are Yanks," said another; "Don't you see their uniforms?" "Why didn't they land us at City Point?" said a third, "there is a railroad there to take us up." "We are fortifying around there," said a fourth. On a first view of negroes, one cried out, "Here are some intelligent contrabands!" A general laugh then ensued at this frequent term used by Northern papers.

Presently the sight offered itself of negro women, whom they knew to be slaves, and their gratulations were lively. The old south was really reached at last. On they came from their distant homes, trooping to the landing, and were received with waving of handkerchiefs and screeches of delight. Generals vied with their subordinates in these demonstrations, to which the negro women heartily responded, "Dem'a our folks; glad to see you, massa!" "Dey'r waiting for you up dar," were severally heard among their shouts of welcome; and one old woman, who led the rest, was profound in her courtesies and gesticulations. Similar novel manifestations of sentiment were expressed on other occasions of that kind that offered themselves; but on a first sight of Seceah white women, enthusiasm became boundless. There were ladies in the house of Mr. Aiken. They dang upon the blinds and waved their handkerchiefs with a will. No cheers were given in return, but screech followed upon screech, and yell upon yell. "Bless 'em! God bless 'em! I'd wave 'em my handkerchief, if it was not so dirty," said one, "but never mind, I'll give 'em my hat;" and again hats were waved and cries renewed. Soon the Landing was attained, and all descended to go on shore.

The army officers were required to leave first, in order of rank; then the navy officers and privates; afterward the privates, and finally the sailors. The absence of enthusiasm was remarkable. Not a cheer was given as their feet touched shore, nor was any welcome offered them. Not a waggon was sent from Richmond for the conveyance of officers or baggage, nor was a solitary member of the Confederate army present, beyond the exchange officer, Major Ould, and two young captains who, later in the afternoon, took a pleasure excursion to the Landing in a buggy. Every one slowly ascended to the summit of the gradually sloping bank, and either sat down or stood in groups conversing, in evident expectation of waggons. Finally, the baggage being placed in Aiken's warehouse, many privates and a few officers concluded to walk, leaving the rest fondly awaiting conveyance. These latter, in great part, set forth during the night, leaving yet a considerable number on the spot in the morning. One of them, an officer, came on board our boat, and asked for a little coffee, roundly cursing the Confederate Government for its total neglect.

By 8 o'clock all had departed—3013 in number—and an equal number of noble Union soldiers, who had arrived at 2 a.m. from Richmond, marched on board. They had received no food since breakfast on Tuesday morning, until their arrival near the Landing during the night. Rations were then sent them from our steamers, which they devoured ravenously, and received the officers who distributed them with extravagant cheers and congratulations. They complained much of the scanty fare the Confederates had given them, but looked well and hearty, notwithstanding. Their march the previous day had been through an intense heat, and several had fallen prostrate on the way. One of these was told to rise by a Confederate guard, and on expressing inability, received a blow on the head from the butt of a musket, which drew a stream of blood. Another man, in a similar situation, received a bayonet thrust, which gave him much pain. Three Confederate guards had fallen dead by sunstroke.

Our soldiers reported civil treatment during captivity, and were assured that their scanty rations were the same as those of the Confederate soldiers. One of them had seen in the memorandum book of Lieutenant Turner, the Confederate officer in charge, the names of three deserters from among our soldiers, who took the oath of allegiance to the Confederate Government. These were: C. A. Bowen, private, United States Artillery; Frank Sembler, Company A, 57th Pennsylvania, and A. G. Lawrence, Company C, 16th Massachusetts, who stated that he was a South Carolinian, and had been pressed into the Union service. As our men marched past Libby's tobacco warehouse from their prison on Bell Island, they recognized General McCall sitting at a window, who, on being cheered, said he was glad to see them going back, and bade them farewell.

Newspaper writers often speak of the wild cheering given by our returned prisoners when once they stood again beneath the Stars and Stripes. I can safely say that not a cheer was given as these men filed on board their several steamers. Their sentiment seemed absorbed by approaching dinner, as they viewed barrels of beef and onions and piles of loaves on the foredeck. When all had left shore, the battalion of ragged, confest Confederate soldiers, acting as guard, who had, during the embarkation, lounged or slept on the adjoining bank, walked off without exchanging adieus.

GENERAL "STONEWALL" JACKSON'S VICTORIES NEAR FORT REPUBLIC.

(From the Richmond Enquirer.)

We have the pleasure of presenting the following description of the late brilliant victories near Fort Republic, from the pen of one of the clearest and most dispassionate minds in the Commonwealth. The writer visited the battle-fields, and conversed with many who took part in them, and from his power of deducing the connected truth from fragmentary and varying statements, we have no hesitation in commending his narrative as historically reliable:—

THE BATTLES NEAR FORT REPUBLIC.

To the Editor of the Enquirer—

When General Jackson retreated from Winchester, after routing Banks, he managed with great address, boldness, and energy, to carry off his prisoners and spoils, and to bring off his army between the converging columns of Fremont, who approached his rear from the west with eight brigades, and Shields, who approached from the east, with four brigades. If these brigades averaged 2500 men, the force of Fremont was 20,000 men, and that of Shields 10,000 men. At Harrisonburg, Jackson left the main turnpike road of the Valley and marched towards Port Republic, the distance between these two places being about twelve miles. Port Republic is situated at the junction of South River, flowing north, and North river flowing east. Jackson could retire no further without crossing North river, which was swollen, and there was then no bridge over it except at Port Republic. The two rivers uniting at that village form the Shenandoah, which flows north, and which could not then be crossed by an army. On the east side of that stream was the army of Shields, and on the west side were the armies of Fremont and Jackson. The latter halted near North river without crossing it, and, while in that position, his rear was approached and attacked by Fremont's whole army, on the morning of Sunday, the 8th instant, and at the same time, Shields's force approached on the east side of the Shenandoah near Port Republic.

That part of Jackson's army which engaged Fremont on Sunday was commanded by General Ewell, while the rest of the army under General Jackson held Shields in check with artillery firing across the Shenandoah near Port Republic. The battle of Sunday took place about five miles from that village in the direction of Harrisonburg.

It began early in the morning and lasted all day, with occasional intervals. It was mainly an artillery fight, but now and then, here and there, the infantry became hotly engaged. The force under Fremont were much larger than that under Ewell, but the latter was strongly posted on eminences which favored the effectiveness of artillery and sheltered the infantry, while the enemy could only approach through open fields. Ewell's command was handled with remarkable skill while Fremont's generalship was indifferent. Ewell's artillery was served with admirable precision and effect, and his infantry, whenever engaged, displayed great steadiness and gallantry. The result was that, when night put an end to the contest, Fremont had been driven back between one and two miles with a loss, in killed and wounded, not less than 2000, and probably much larger, while our loss did not exceed 300, and probably not 200. The judicious selection of a position in which to receive the enemy favoured this result, but it was largely due to the superior fighting qualities of our men.

Soon after nightfall, General Jackson began to withdraw his men from this battle-field, and pass them over North river by the bridge at Port Republic, with a view to attack Shields the next morning. He left in front of Fremont a small force to amuse and detain him, and, after retiring before him to Port Republic, to burn the bridge behind them and thus to prevent Fremont from rendering any aid to Shields. All this was accomplished.

On Monday morning, Jackson passed the greater part of his army across the South river (the smallest of the streams) by means of a bridge made of planks laid on waggons placed in the river. Early in the morning a sufficient number had crossed to commence the battle, and they were led to the field between one and two miles distant, on the east bank of the Shenandoah. The enemy's force was found drawn up awaiting the attack.

The enemy's line extended from the river about half a mile across a flat bottom, free from timber, and covered with wheat, grass, &c. His left rested on the point of a low ridge coming out from the woods which skirt the bottom. On a slight elevation there, and in some small knolls in the bottom, he had his artillery, commanding the road and the wide uncovered level plain, over which Jackson's army was obliged to advance. The level and exposed ground offered scarcely any suitable positions for planting our artillery. The advantage of position belonged altogether to the enemy. The capital fault of his disposition for battle was that the battery on his extreme left was posted near the woods without any infantry in the woods to defend it. By availing himself of this circumstance, and by a brilliant manoeuvre and charge, Jackson turned the fortune of the day at a critical moment.

For some two hours the battle raged with great fury. Our infantry, at first but few, advanced with marvellous intrepidity in the face of a withering fire of artillery and musketry. At one moment the enemy advanced a section of a battery several hundred yards so as to enfilade our left wing, which already suffered terribly from the fire in front. It seemed that nothing could withstand the fury of the enemy's fire of all arms. His artillery was very fine, and was served with great effect by regiments. But other troops coming at a double-quick from Port Republic, came on to the field, and at the same time, the Louisiana brigade, under Taylor, emerged from the woods on the enemy's left. They had been sent by a considerable circuit through the woods which extend all along the battle-field between the cleared ground and the neighbouring mountain.

By a slight error of direction they came out of the woods a little too soon and found themselves almost in front of the battery, which instantly began to shower grape upon them. But, immediately rectifying their direction, they charged the battery with irresistible impetuosity, and carried it. The contest then was speedily ended. The enemy's whole line gave way, and was presently retreating in disorder, pursued by the cavalry. The pursuit was kept up about ten or twelve miles, but the fight continued all that day and the next. About 500 prisoners were taken that day, and others have been brought in daily ever since. The loss of the enemy in killed and wounded was heavy, and so was our own. Six splendid cannon were captured on the field, another was taken in the pursuit, and still another had been captured on Sunday. The force of the enemy engaged was about 6000 or 7000, and ours a little larger. Shields was not present, but his troops were commanded by General Tyler.

After the rout of the enemy had commenced the last of our troops crossed over the bridge at Port Republic, and burnt it. Fremont, cautiously following, appeared some time afterwards and drew up his army in line of battle on the heights along the west bank of the Shenandoah, from which he overlooked the field of battle. While he stood there in impotent idleness, Jackson's army, having finally disposed of Shields, moved off at leisure to Brown's Gap, and there encamped, to rest for a few days from the fatigues of a month's campaign more arduous and more successful than any month's operations of the war. The exhaustion of our men, and the interposition of a river, no longer bridged, secured Fremont from a second battle or a hasty flight. The next day he commenced his retreat down the Valley. He and Shields had set out to catch Jackson, and they caught him.

It is hoped that the judicious reader, from the circumstances which we have gathered into a connected form from various sources, will be able to discover the masterly strategy of our General, as well as the dauntless valour of our men, and the favour of a benignant Providence.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE ON THE SOUTH.

Mr. Hope, during his canvass at Stoke Upon Trent, read a letter from an eminent politician exhorting the electors not to send him (Mr. Hope) to Parliament, because of his views on the American question. Mr. Hope said:—

That letter was in something like these terms:—"Don't send to Parliament a man who distinguishes himself by his virulent and disgraceful attacks upon the American President and people—attacks which make it the duty of every enemy to oppose him." Was John Bright, the great Birmingham orator who stood by Napoleon and Lincoln, to assimilate them to the freemen of the borough of Stoke. (Hear, hear.) He (Mr. Hope) had spoken in favour of the Southern Confederacy, and would do so again. (Applause.) He was not blind to that slavery which existed in the Confederate States. He had privately to Southerners, and in his published speeches, denounced in the strongest terms that horrible system; but he maintained that in that system England, in the first place, and in the second place the Northern States—New York that mortgaged the South—New York that sent its slaves to Cuba—were responsible. He had said that owing to the necessities of the constitution which gave votes according to numbers—five slaves counting for three white men—which returned men to the House of Representatives, the trenchant action of New York was begun, and the South fell back upon self-interest. Then that system was doomed. It was not doomed by sudden emancipation, by the violence of Butler and Hunter, or the efforts of Thurlow Weed, Greeley, or Phillips, urging the black men to take vengeance upon his master—(hear, hear)—but doom lay in gradual emancipation, leading from slavery to serfdom, and from serfdom to liberty. (Hear, hear.) It was not likely to be doomed by a man like Lincoln making a preposterous proposal to the black man to take advantage of the misfortune of the Southern States, and leave home to settle on the Isthmus of Panama, because the State of Illinois had just passed a law prohibiting every black man from crossing the frontier. He sympathized with second-rate man placed in positions of responsibility, and he would treat the latter written by Mr. Lincoln with all due Christian charity—(laughter)—but when he had spread over it all the Christian charity of which he was master, he may say that, when he saw the cynical way in which Mr. Lincoln proposed to preserve slavery, the greatest curse of the human race, or emancipate the slaves, which meant massacring the whites—when he saw a third-rate lawyer from the background of Illinois hoisted up to the chief magistracy of a powerful nation making such a proclamation, he must say, in the name of everything that was great and free, and in the name of Heaven and the Christian faith itself, was it right, was it to be desired that such a nation and such a man should prosper? (Loud cheers.) He was a Southerner in sympathy before Bull's Run. Some became so when that happened; others became so at the time of the Trent affair; others when Butler issued his proclamation. Referring to the constitution of the United States, he said that in 1776 a political congress assembled of thirteen States, which threw off the allegiance to England. This was the Provisional Government, and it broke down. In 1787 the existing Government was organized. In 1781, under the title of the "Federal Union," he read, as the first article of the Constitution—"The style or title of the Confederacy shall be the United States of America." That at once did away with the quibble of the lawyers as to the words "Confederate" and "United," having some antagonistic meaning. Article 2 said, "Each State retained its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power, jurisdiction, and right which is not by this Confederation expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled." There was the sovereignty of each State distinctly laid down. That rickety old constitution broke down. The constitution of 1787 maintained the same principle, but created an Executive, a Ministry, a Government, and the Confederation stood in a substantial form before the world. The preamble to that constitution said, "We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this constitution for the United States of America." No word implying the sovereignty of the individual States was given up. (Hear, hear.) That absurd articles saying this union is perpetual was abrogated in 1787. The men of that time with Washington in the chair, were not mad enough to think that they could bind their posterity. (Hear.) The Government of 1787 was as much a confederation of sovereign States as was the Confederation of 1776 and 1781. They were only thirteen in number at that time. When the Government broke down, it took several months before those thirteen States could be induced to return to the Constitution. Now they had increased to thirty-four States, and party squabbles had taken place amongst them, until the South divided from the North. Mr. Hope then proceeded to point out the causes which led to that division, and quoted the opinion of Mr. Everett, the candidate for the vice-presidency in 1861, as to the absurdity of supposing that the Seceding States could be coerced into submission to a Government which they abhorred. The grave question now was how soon the Confederate States were to be recognised. He thought that that recognition ought to have taken place earlier. (Applause.) He expressed himself satisfied with the way in which Mr. Lindsay's motion terminated last session. If he should be in Parliament, as he expected to be, next February—(applause)—he would not lend himself to any knot of men who would adopt a course to render the question a complicated one by petitioning President Lincoln; but when the opportunity offered itself—when England might do so with safety, with dignity, and in the name of suffering Lancashire, in the name of the heroic Confederation itself, in the name of humanity—his voice should be raised for terminating the war by placing the Confederate States amongst the governments of the world. (Loud cheers.)

AS TO THE FUTURE OF THE SOUTH.

(From the Mobile Register.)

The grand prize for which the South is struggling in this deadly conflict with a powerful enemy is the right of self government. The secondary prize is that she may enjoy the full privilege and results of her intrinsic power to create wealth. That with her independence achieved, the South will enter upon a grand and unexampled career of progress, and an unprecedented existence of substantial wealth, is no Utopian dream, no bright, intoxicating fallacy, all who have pursued a common sense investigation know beyond a peradventure. The main staple of our agricultural industry will always make the world our tributary. Cotton has betrayed our too overweening confidence that it would fight our battles promptly, but we may, nevertheless, confidently trust that it will always fill our pockets. Our cotton fields are mines of wealth from which we will always dig gold by the hundred millions annually—enough to far overpay our indebtedness incurred with the outside world, and leave a grand balance to be poured into the cornucopia of the nation's accumulating wealth. It was the agriculture of the South which was the chiefest agency in bearing the whole country onward and upward in its splendid career of progress. It created the foreign commerce and sustained the navigation of the North, which through these mediums succeeded in securing the larger share of the profits of our industry, leaving us still, however, ample returns for our support and moderate increase. As an independent nation, none will share with us what justly belongs all to us, and if that could render the whole country prosperous and progressive as never a country was before, how much more will it do so when its benefits are confined to the South alone.

This war, too, is teaching us valuable lessons—at a present extravagant price, it is true, but which, in the end, may not prove so expensive. It is teaching us to subsist within ourselves. How much money we have been in the habit of paying out for the necessities of life is now taught by the extra prices we have to pay when depending upon our own resources. The bitter lesson, learned amid toil, privation, and blood, will not be lost, and in this war we shall achieve not only our political but our industrial or material independence. This latter will be of twofold value to us, for it will retain a great amount of wealth in the country and render the provision supply steady and assured amid all chances and changes; and it will tend to cripple those whom this war will leave our hereditary enemies, the people of the provision producing sections of the West as well as the whole North. With the Southern market cut off, their bacon sells at four cents per pound and their corn at ten cents per bushel—our bacon at forty cents per pound and our corn at prices as much beyond what it should. Destroy its produce market, and you sap the vital strength of the powerful West and assure a rupture between it and the Eastern States, whose high protective system will be too oppressive for the West to bear without the support of the Southern market. The disunion of the Northern and Western States will alone relieve us of the disagreeable awe with which we must recognize the power of a United North. We may not fear it, but we must dread the trouble to which it can put us, and must be in some sort deferential to its management of the affairs of the continent.

There are those, doubtless, who are apprehensive that the cost of war for our independence will be a terrible drawback on the future prosperity of the South. We set aside the truism that liberty is priceless at any imaginable cost of blood and treasure, and come down to figures, but briefly. It is feared that this war will leave the nation oppressed with such a debt as will be an effectual incubus upon its progress. Let us see: suppose that peace finds the Confederacy with a debt of $500,000,000 worth of paper out, which will be funded into 8 per cent. bonds; the interest on this public debt will be $40,000,000 per annum. To pay this interest a tax of perhaps one-third or one-half of 1 per cent. on all property considered within the term taxable property would be necessary. This would be no great burden for a nation to bear which has such intrinsic sources of wealth as ours. These national debt bonds, indeed, paying their attractive interest, would be a valuable item of national wealth, and being made taxable property themselves would pay their share of the tax for their interest. A light additional tax would regularly sink a portion, and in a few decades extinguish the whole war debt which we are incurring so cheerfully for so incalculable an object. It is to be hoped that the whole amount of these bonds will remain in the hands of our own people, and thus the money disbursed for their interest will be retained in the country. So soon as our independence is accomplished there will be an eager rush for securities so undoubted and paying an interest so munificent in the eyes of European capitalists. But possibly this national debt may become a thousand millions ere the war closed. In that case our rough estimate of tax would be doubled and it will then be a very terrible matter. The payment of the tax will become easier and easier with every year of peace and prosperity.

GENERAL BUTLER AND THE FRENCH CONSUL.

The following correspondence has passed between the French Consul and General Butler:—

French Consulate at New Orleans,

Aug. 12, 1862.

Sir,—The new order of the day, which has been published this morning, and by which you require that all and whatever arms which may be in the possession of the people of this city must be delivered up, has caused the most serious alarm among the French subjects of New Orleans.

Foreigners, sir, and particularly Frenchmen, have, notwithstanding the accusations brought against them by certain persons, sacrificed everything to maintain, during the actual conflict, the neutrality imposed upon them. When arms were delivered them by the municipal authorities, they only used them to maintain order and defend personal property, and those arms have since been almost all returned. And it now appears, according to the tenor of your order of to-day, that French subjects, as well as citizens, are required to surrender their personal arms, which could only be used in self-defence.

For some time past unmistakable signs have manifested themselves among the servile population of the city and surrounding country of their intention to break the bonds which bind them to their masters, and many persons apprehended an actual revolt. It is these signs, this prospect of finding ourselves completely unarmed, in the presence of a population from which the greatest excesses are feared, that we are above all things justly alarmed; for the result of such a state of things would fall on all alike who were left without the means of self-defence.

It is not denied that the protection of the United States' Government would be extended to them in such an event; but that protection could not be effective at all times and in all places, nor provide against those internal enemies whose unrestrained language and manners are constantly increasing, and who are but partially kept in subjugation by the conviction that their masters are armed.

I submit to you, sir, these observations with the request that you take them into consideration.

Please accept, sir, the assurances of my high esteem.

The Consul of France,

COUNT MEJAN.

Lieutenant Weitzel, U.S. Engineers, and Assistant Military Commandant of New Orleans.

Headquarters, Department of the Gulf,
New Orleans, Aug. 14.

Sir,—Your official note to Lieutenant Weitzel, Assistant Military Commandant, has been forwarded to me.

I see no just cause of complaint against the order requiring the arms of private citizens to be delivered up. It is the usual course pursued in cities similarly situated to this—even without any exterior force in the neighbourhood.

You will observe that it will not do to trust to mere professions of neutrality. Trust most of your countrymen are, in good faith, neutral; but it is unfortunately true that some of them are not. This causes the good, of necessity, to suffer for the acts of the bad.

I take leave to call your attention to the fact that the United States' forces gave every immunity to M. Bonnegras, who claimed to be the French Consul at Baton Rouge; allowed him to keep his arms, and relied upon his neutrality; but his son was taken prisoner on the battle-field, in arms against us.

You will also do me the favour to remember that very few of the French subjects here have taken the oath of neutrality, which was offered to but not required of them, by my order No. 41; although all the officers of the French Legion had, with your knowledge and assent, taken the oath to support the Constitution of the Confederate States. Thus, you see, I have no guarantee for the good faith of bad men.

I do not understand how it is that arms are altered in their effectiveness by being "personal property," nor do I see how arms which will serve for personal defence ("qui ne peuvent servir que pour leur defense personnelle") cannot be as effectually used for offensive warfare.

"Of the disquiet which you say there are signs manifesting themselves among the black population, of a desire to break their bonds which bind them to their masters ("certaines dispositions a rompre les liens qui les attachent a leurs maitres"), I have been a not inattentive observer, without wonder, because it would seem natural, when their masters had set them the example of rebellion against constituted authorities, that the negroes, being an imitative race, should do likewise.

But surely the representative of the Emperor, who does not tolerate slavery in France, does not desire his countrymen to be armed for the purpose of preventing the negroes from breaking their bonds.

Let me assure you that the protection of the United States against violence, either by negroes or white men, whether citizens or foreigners, will continue to be as perfect as it has been since our advent here, and by far more manifesting itself at all moments and everywhere ("tous les instants et partout") than any improvised citizens' organization can do.

Whenever the inhabitants of this city will, by a public and united act, show both their loyalty and neutrality, I shall be glad of their aid to keep the peace, and indeed to restore the city to them. Till that time, however, I must require the arms of all the inhabitants, black and white, to be under my control. I have the honour to be, your obedient servant,

BENJ. F. BUTLER,

Major-General Commanding.

To Count Meján, French Consul.

THE LATE MOVEMENTS IN VIRGINIA.

The Standard gives the following summary:—

It is now clear that McClellan's movements did not escape the observation of the Southern commanders; and that it was a part of the programme of the latter to permit McClellan to get his troops on shipboard without molestation. The moment Richmond was safe from an attack from the south-west the whole Confederate army appears to have been put in motion, with a view of taking Pope's forces in detail and destroying them before McClellan's troops could effect a junction with them. It was probably for the purpose of keeping Pope's army away from its supports that the Battle of Cedar Mountain was fought. The object, doubtless, was to induce the army of Virginia to follow close upon the heels of Jackson's small force on its retreat, and so bring it within reach of the main body of the Confederates. This object was only partially obtained. Pope cautiously declined to pursue Jackson across the Rapidan, and occupied himself in concentrating his forces and securing his communications with McClellan; and when the Confederates readvanced the Federal army was on the alert, and already far on its line of retreat, although subsequently overtaken and hard pressed by the Confederate artillery and cavalry. On the left bank of the Rappahannock a stand was attempted, but it failed to arrest the progress of the enemy for any time. The Federals, driven out of Rappahannock Station, fell back upon Warrenton; and in the neighbourhood of Warrenton Pope appears to have disposed the bulk of his army. But here an unexpected movement of the Confederates outflanks his right wing; and he learns that a considerable body of the enemy has got completely round into his rear, and that his railroad and telegraphic communications with Washington are cut off. It will be recollected that a week ago a division of the Southern army was said to have gone off in the direction of the Shenandoah Valley, and that an attack upon the right wing of the Federals was feared. The sudden attack upon Manassas, which has so nearly destroyed the whole Federal army, came from this force, which seems to have got as far to the north as Leesburg, and a portion of which made a dash through Thoroughfare Gap, a pass in the range of mountains west of the Blue Ridge, and fell upon Manassas Junction. Here the Federals sustained a severe reverse, and lost nine guns. Pope, on finding the enemy in his rear, marched with his whole army, strengthened by Heintzelmann's, Porter's, and Hooker's divisions of the old army of the Potomac, upon Manassas Junction. In this movement it is reported that the advance of the Confederate army was cut off from its supports, encountered by a Federal division, and routed. Finally, a great engagement takes place along the whole line on the old battle-field, the Federals being, in their turn, the assailants, in which General Pope claims the victory, the field of battle, and great captures, but admits a loss of 8000 killed and wounded, states that the enemy is still in his front, and that his troops are too exhausted to "push matters." He adds, naively enough, that "the battle was fought on the identical field of Bull Run," which "greatly increased the enthusiasm of the men." Of course the Confederates lost two to one, General Pope had heard that the army are retreating, and had pushed forward a reconnaissance to ascertain this. The general who claimed the victory of Cedar Mountain, and who captured 10,000 of Beauregard's retreating army, is not likely to issue more veracious bulletins as his difficulties become greater.

It is, of course, hopeless to attempt to throw light on the complicated accounts furnished by the telegraph. All that we know is that the two great armies are engaged along their whole lines; that by a very brilliant manoeuvre the Confederates have outflanked the Federal army; that the principal attack has taken place on the extreme right; that on more than one occasion the Federals admit a defeat, and that in the last great engagement of which any official account had been published, even according to the admissions of the authorities, nothing more than a drawn battle could be claimed. But, we repeat, for this knowledge we are indebted to the North; and as it is unreasonable to suppose that on this single occasion the North is speaking the truth, we are inclined to believe the result of the fighting has been continuously disastrous to the Federal arms. Within the week, at the latest, there will be a relief to all suspense. We shall be surprised if within that time we do not hear a very different account of the struggle. Every friend of humanity must desire that victory may have fallen to the Confederate side, and that so North and South may be spared the misery of a third campaign.

FEDERAL OUTRAGES IN ALABAMA.

The Knoxville Register thus refers to some of the earlier Federal outrages in Alabama:—

The conduct of the Federal General Mitchell, and his subordinate officers and men (the most of whom appear to be Dutch and Irish,) is of the most insolent and oppressive character. On the arrival of the Federals in Huntsville, Mitchell sent for the Mayor and told him that he must have food for his men, about 5000. Mayor Coltart replied that he would consult some of the citizens. Mitchell told him that he would give him to understand that he was master, and the food must be provided or it would be taken from the citizens. To prevent outrages on individual citizens, the Mayor provided food at municipal expense. Sundry private citizens were arrested the first day and afterwards, without knowing why they were singled out from others who were as much, or more, in "the rebel" category than themselves; and, it is presumed, they were pointed out by Tories in town. This presumption was confirmed by the fact that squads of Federals showed an extraordinary knowledge of localities, by the facility which they found their way to houses in which Confederate soldiers were, or had been staying.

Our informants report that Mitchell appears to take a malicious pleasure in petty annoyances, as well as greater outrages upon the people. If he sees half a dozen or more citizens together, he will, in the most haughty and imperious manner, cry out, "Disperse, you d—n rebels!"—knowing well that the balls and bayonets of the myrmidons who back him, give him immunity from the penalty due to his cowardly insolence, and which outraged freemen would visit upon him if they were unshackled.

The citizens of the town and country have been robbed of bacon, lard, poultry, corn, fodder, flour, groceries, horses, mules—in short, everything that will replenish the exhausted quartermaster and commissary stores. In some instances they make a pretense to remunerative owners, by giving them receipts for the property taken, specifying their own arbitrary, unremunerative prices, and telling the owners to present the receipt to the quartermaster, and when presented, the owner is required to take the oath of allegiance, and if he refuses, payment is refused. Sometimes Federal scouts will take part of a man's bacon, provender or other property, and take an inventory of the balance, and if the balance is not forthcoming when called for, the vandals will wantonly destroy almost everything that they can lay their hands on, and, perhaps, arrest the owner and hold him a prisoner for one or more days, and then release him on parole not to leave certain prison bounds.

The Confederate Marshal, General Ben. Patterson, and his family left his residence near the city on the approach of the Hessians, and they destroyed his doors, windows, piano, furniture, &c.; used his house as a privy, and carried off his corn, fodder, and everything they could make useful. They robbed the grocery store of McCredy, Patton, and Sprague of about $12,000 worth of groceries, and appropriated the house as a sutler's store. They robbed the other grocery stores in like manner, with the exception of one, Wm. H. Powers', a Yankee, and they paid him for all they got.

The Federals are greatly incensed by the citizens of the country burning bridges, cutting telegraph wires, shooting scouts and pickets, and firing into railroad trains; and prominent citizens, in every neighbourhood where such things occur, are arrested, taken to Huntsville, and imprisoned in the Court House or in Law Offices, &c., for such time as the caprice of the General, or his Provost, may direct, and then paroled. Numbers of citizens are thus treated, without any apparent reason. When our informant left, some dozen citizens of the town, and thirty odd citizens of the county, were confined. Among the prominent citizens who have thus suffered, we remember the names of Ex-Governor Clay, Ex-Governor Reuben Chapman, Dr. Thomas Fearn, George P. Bierne, and Rev. J. G. Wilson, though nearly every man of any prominence has, at some time or other, experienced this petty despotism. Ex-Governor Clay, who is over seventy years of age, and infirm, was ruthlessly taken from his plantation, in Jackson county, twenty miles from Huntsville, carried to town, confined two or three days, and released on parole to remain in the city limits, the alleged ground for this treatment being that persons had fired on a railroad train containing Federal soldiers and on a railroad-bridge guard, a few miles distant from his plantation. For the same alleged offence, however, they burnt the small village of Camden or Paint Rock, which should have sufficed to satiate their ire. The villages of Woodville and Scottsboro', in Jackson county, on the railroad, were destroyed in like manner, and Mitchell made a speech at Woodville, in which he threatened to burn every house within ten miles, if bridge burning and bush-whacking did not cease, and he would hang every bush-whacker he caught. At this announcement, a fellow in a hollow, at a safe distance, not having the fear of King Abraham or his august military representative before his eyes, called out, "The h—ll you say." The threats have been practically disregarded. Ex-Governor Chapman was taken from his residence, two miles from town, confined in town several days, and then returned home on parole, and is kept there under guard. He was an original and decided Secessionist, but his special offence was probably that General L. Pope Walker and family were his guests when Huntsville was taken.

A SOUTHERN HEROINE.

(From the Morning Herald.)

The following account of the arrest of Miss Bella Boyd, of Martinsburg, whose beauty and courage have made her the idol of Virginia, is from her own pen:—

On the evening of July 29 I was standing upon the balcony of the hotel at Front Royal, Virginia, surrounded by my young friends. We were all thinking of our dear relatives who, not many miles away, were awaiting the invaders, and ready to shed their last drop of blood in defence of our honour and our homes. We presently saw, with deep sorrow, the charge of a large body of Yankee cavalry down the street, for we felt sure they were bound upon a barbaric scouting excursion among our native hills. I retired, however, little dreaming of their cruel purposes towards myself, which were to be revealed the following morning, and that the next day would witness my own arrest as a prisoner of war.

On Wednesday morning, about 8 o'clock, my thoughts still wandering away up the valley, I noticed that the officers were gazing at me, and ere long I was informed that the Provost Marshal desired my presence in the parlour below. I found there Major Sherman, of the 12th Illinois Cavalry, and a very mysterious and vulgar looking character from Washington, who said he had an order from the Secretary of War for my immediate arrest, and wished to examine my baggage and proceed with me at once to Washington. I, of course, in the midst of an invading army, could only obey, and soon found myself in a carriage and on the road to Winchester. Front Royal being scarcely within their lines, it was deemed necessary to surround me with about 300 cavalry over the nineteen miles of road between Front Royal and Winchester. Reaching there at 5 o'clock p.m., I was taken to General White's headquarters. The general would not permit me to stay in Winchester for the night, fearing my rescue would be attempted either by citizens or a bold dash of Confederate cavalry, so that I was kept under guard at his encampment all night. About 3 o'clock on Thursday morning an alarm was given from the outposts and the minions sprang to arms, but, unfortunately for me, it was a false surprise. I was then taken under guard of about 100 cavalry to Martinsburg, my dear native home. The guard had received orders from Washington not to allow my friends even to speak to me. During an interview with Colonel Voss, who was in command of the post, I discovered that the rough common man who had me in charge was one of the military detective police. I politely requested the colonel to furnish me with some gentleman as an escort, which he promised to do. I was not permitted to visit even my own home, but detained at the depot hotel; three hirelings guarded the hall leading to the door of my room, and a strong detachment surrounded the house. At 2 o'clock we were en route for Washington. Adjutant Steele, of the 12th Illinois, having been detailed for the service, he proved to be one of the very few "gentlemen" to be found in Lincoln's army. He received orders to report with me at Secretary Stanton's, but on arriving at the Washington depot I was immediately transferred to the Yankee "Bastille" on Capitol-hill. I write this from my cell; no trial, no examination, no woman's sympathising companionship; still I am happy, for I have a clear conscience, a conviction that I have not transgressed my duty, and that if I suffer it is for the sake of my dear home and my native land. I can suffer the insult and the falsehood of the Yankee Government and the Yankee press, for I feel that I have the esteem and the sympathy of thousands upon thousands of true and noble hearts who, while I am yearning for freedom, are with their strong right arms fighting for it.

May God, in his mercy, stay the hand of oppression, and lead to victory and glory those who are fighting for our hearths and homes, for our honour, and our country. God is for the right, and victory is with Him.

I ought in justice to say that Colonel Voss, Major Sherman, and Adjutant Steele, behaved very courteously and kindly towards me in executing the orders of their Government. Their conduct was in marked contrast to that of the Washington emissary; they seemed to regret very much to see me in the position of a prisoner, and I thank them for their kindness and sympathy.

THE FORTY-SEVENTH REGIMENT G. V.—THEIR SERVICE ON JAMES ISLAND.

(From the Savannah Daily News.)

Among the many bloody engagements of this war, not one will shine in brighter characters upon the pages of the future historian, than the gallant action of the 47th Georgia with the enemy on June 10, 1862. The monument of that terrible fight can now be seen by the visitor to James Island in the woods and fields that border upon the Stono. The hail of balls and the path of fire have left their impress indelibly written upon the scene of the action. It has ever been the custom of nations to return the public thanks of the country to the brave soldiers who have distinguished themselves upon the field. The officers and soldiers of the 47th, while they mourn over the heroic dead and suffering wounded, who have freely shed their blood upon the soil of a sister State, are content with the simple consciousness which each one has in his own breast, that they have performed the whole duty of a soldier, and are now again prepared, though reduced by sickness, wounds, and death, to almost half their original number, to re-echo the language of Ireland's martyred patriot, and meet the foe once more with a sword in one hand and a torch in the other, and if forced to retire before their advancing host, raise every house, burn every blade of grass, and make the last entrenchment of liberty a hero's grave.

The condition of the regiment from the time when the troops were mustered into service, has been one of peculiar trial. Quite a number were lost to the service by sickness at Camp Davis, and while at Causton's Bluff nearly one half of the regiment were prostrated by diseases incident to camp life. The two companies of Captains Ashton and Mines were not permitted to accompany us to Carolina, though they were anxious and pleaded hard to join the regiment, and share its trials and dangers. The regiment left Georgia about the 4th of June last, with four days' rations. They went forth at the word of command, not knowing their point of destination, but ready to meet the enemy in any part of the Confederacy, and prove to the world that Georgians knew their rights, and knowing, dared maintain them. On the day after their arrival at the termini of the Charleston and Savannah railroad, the regiment was ordered to a position on James Island. For several days the troops were without tents or change of clothing, these having all been left at their last encampment near Savannah. After changing position for several days on the island, they were marched on the 10th of June to a point near the lines of the enemy.

About 4 o'clock in the evening of that day an order was received to scour the woods intervening between our lines and the gunboats of the enemy on the Stono. Not a man in the regiment or perhaps on the island among our forces knew the strength of the enemy ambuscaded or entrenched in these woods. No doubt, however, the order was issued to ascertain this important fact. Our gallant Colonel, without a moment's hesitation, obeyed the order to advance and drive back the foe. Two companies, commanded by Captains Aiken and Latimore, were deployed from the centre, and advanced with great difficulty through the dense wood, and came upon a body of the enemy near a well dug in the woods. These were fired upon and retreated quickly to their advanced column behind their first entrenchments, while our two companies marched rapidly in pursuit. The company of Captain Tippins, was thrown out on the left, and advancing to the first line of the enemy began the action. Colonel Williams, with Captain Fraser and Adjutant Williams, and two companies, Captains Cone's and W. Williams', advanced from the right and charged the enemy's centre. Lieutenant-Colonel Edwards, with the companies of Captains Phillips, Doyle, and Gormany, led the attack upon the enemy's left. The action now became general, and our forces repeatedly charging the enemy, drove them back from the breastwork and ditch behind which their first stand was made. Several of our men were wounded in this bold attack upon the advanced line of the enemy. A little beyond the first position of the enemy, and between it and their second line of defence, the woods have been purposely cleared of the undergrowth, and an open space of some seventy-five yards lay directly in front of their second line. Into this open space the gallant 47th dashed in pursuit of the foe. By this time the fight became terrible beyond all description. Here was a little band of 330 men rushing into the very jaws of death. At least three regiments of the enemy, with artillery on the right and left, poured a most destructive fire into the ranks of that daring band of volunteer soldiers, most to whom had never before seen a battle-field. Our men fell by scores under this terrible fire, and had it not been for the direct interposition of Almighty God, I do not believe that a single one would have escaped from that bloody battle-field. Besides the fire above described, the gunboats from the Stono now opened with shell upon the woods, and although the most of these passed over the heads of our men, several were severely wounded by the heavy branches of the trees cut down by the shot.

It seems scarcely credible, but yet it is true, that the 47th, not reinforced by a single company, continued to fight the enemy in the face of such an overwhelming force and under such a fire for one hour and a half. In several places they charged up to the enemy's guns and drove them back from the second line. The brave Captain Williams, of the Bulloch Guards, while charging at the head of his men, fell in the very midst of the foe, pierced by seven balls. Some of the prisoners captured in the late fight at Lamar's battery confessed that the enemy in this fight lost eighty men killed and wounded. We have no doubt that double that number fell in the close and deadly combat. Our brave commander, Colonel G. W. M. Williams, never gave the order to retreat, but with a handful of men continued the fight until darkness shut out the foe. We have strong reasons to believe that this battle, so serious and unexpected to the enemy, prevented their immediate advance upon Secessionville. At least we believe that it has taught the enemy what kind of opposition he must meet with in his march on Charleston, and taken in connection with the terrible whipping he received a few days ago at Lamar's battery, accounts for his late inaction. I do not now believe that he will again attempt to reach Charleston by land. Our defences here both by land and sea are the best I have ever seen, and the enemy may be assured that nothing awaits his advance but terrible slaughter and shameful defeat. The stern determination in every soldier's heart is to die or drive back the invader. We are fighting for our homes, and our altars, our families, our sacred rights, and a glorious name among the nations of the earth, and with the blessings of a righteous God, whose favour we continually invoke, how can such a people be conquered? Never! Southward the star of empire takes its way, it rises amid darkness, revolution and blood, but daily mounts higher and higher, and grows brighter and brighter. The eyes of all men are fixed in wonder upon its beauty, and soon it will mount to mid heaven and shine in glory over a new State that has taken its rank among the nations of the earth.

Out of about 330 men who went into the action on June 10, the 47th regiment lost fifty-four in killed and wounded. They deserve a name of honour whether they receive it or not, and should rank among the bravest troops in the army. A part of the regiment, Captain Gormany's company, were also engaged in the late battle at Lamar's battery, and we there lost Lieut. Graham, a gallant and noble soldier. The rest of the regiment were in another part of the field, ready to assist in repelling the foe.

I can safely avow that the 47th, when ordered, on every occasion have promptly occupied the post of danger both on picket and in battle, and that they have been ever ready, at a moments warning, to march against the enemy. I candidly believe, however, that the regiment now requires a short cessation from severe active duty in some healthy location. The regiment is now but a skeleton of its former self. Not one half of the men are fit for duty, and the sick list seems to increase every day. No doubt the men earnestly desire a change, but I hear no murmur from their lips. If the country can be benefited by their position here, they are willing to brave all dangers and endure all trials that their country may be free. All honour to the gallant 47th; may they be enabled to preserve in the future the brave reputation they have acquired in the past.

The above account of this regiment has been written with no special view to its publicity, but that each soldier of the regiment might procure a printed copy for his own perusal and the satisfaction of his family and friends. My own individual hope and prayer is, that He who alone can give the victory, will continue to bless our armies, and ensure to our beloved country a speedy and permanent peace, granting to our Confederacy a glorious independence that the nations may know that He alone is God, and that we may praise Him for his great deliverance in our dark day of trouble.

H. E. C.

MR. LINCOLN ON EMANCIPATION.

The President has forwarded the following letter to the Honourable Mr. Greeley, in answer to an appeal by the latter gentleman, urging the emancipation of the slaves:—

Washington, August 22.

Sir,—I have just read yours of the 19th, addressed to myself through the New York Tribune. If there be in it any statements or assumptions, I do not now and here controvert them. If there be in it any inferences which I may believe to be falsely drawn, I do not now and here argue against them. If there be perceptible in it an impatient and dictatorial tone, I waive it in deference to an old friend, whose heart I have always supposed to be right.

As to the policy I "seem to be pursuing," as you say, I have not meant to leave any one in doubt. I would save the Union. I would save it the shortest way under the Constitution. The sooner the national authority can be restored the nearer the Union will be "the Union as it was." If there be those who would not save the Union unless they could at the same time destroy slavery, I do not agree with them. My paramount object in this struggle is to save the Union, and it is not either to save or destroy slavery. If I could save the Union without freeing any slave, I would do it; and if I could save it by freeing all the slaves, I would do it; and if I could do it by freeing some and leaving others alone, I would also do that. What I do about slavery and the coloured race I do because I believe it helps to save this Union; and what I forbear, I forbear because I do not believe it would help to save the Union. I shall do less whenever I shall believe what I am doing hurts the cause, and I shall do more whenever I shall believe doing more will help the cause. I shall try to correct errors when shown to be errors, and I shall adopt new views so fast as they shall appear to be true views. I have here stated my purpose according to my view of official duty, and I intend no modification of my oft-expressed personal wish that all men, everywhere, could be free.

Yours,

A. LINCOLN.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any rate, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HOTZE, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. Advertisements to be forwarded to the publisher at 102, Fleet-street.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 11, 1862.

The War News.

"No fears, however, are entertained for the safety of Washington." Such is the latest news from New York, and it must awaken in the mind of the most careless reader strange remembrances. Not three months since the North was rejoicing in the imminent capture of the Confederate capital. We were told that the outposts of the Army of the Potomac could hear the ringing of the bells of the churches in Richmond; on August 27 the roar of Confederate artillery might have been heard from the eastward of the White House. On June 26 General McClellan wrote a despatch to his Government, in which he expressed his satisfaction at the advance he had made towards Richmond; on August 26 he had entirely evacuated the peninsula, and had landed, with the main portion of the remnant of his army, at Alexandria, near to Washington, for the purpose of effecting a junction with General Pope. It is needless to dwell on the contrasted positions. The invading armies have been driven back, and instead of attacking Richmond, are arraying for the defence of the Northern capital. We cannot conceive a more striking confession of defeat than is conveyed in the sentence—"No fears, however, are entertained for the safety of Washington."

We have not any Southern accounts of the important movements in Virginia since August 20, and the Washington Government has maintained an ominous silence, only broken by the publication of General Pope's despatch in reference to the second battle of Bull Run. The few facts that have transpired, and been reported to Europe, are so confused and contradictory that they would be utterly unintelligible, except for the light thrown on them by admitted results. Two things are, however, clear—the Confederate commanders have displayed consummate strategy, and the Northern commanders have been completely out-generalled.

It appears the capture of Pope's baggage and papers was effected by a cavalry exploit under General Stuart, identical in its features to that by which the same general made the circuit of General McClellan's army; and, as we supposed, besides the capture of the Federal commander's personal effects, a considerable booty was secured. On August 23 the Confederates forced the Federals to abandon the line of the Rappahannock, which was said to be impregnable, and General Pope retired to Warrenton Junction. There he remained for three days, uncertain of the movements of his enemy; and from the rumours that found their way into the Northern papers, evidently congratulating himself that the Confederates had drawn back. On the 26th he was startled from his repose. Whilst he had been resting at Warrenton, the Confederate forces had passed to his rear, and were between him and Washington. This was intimated to him by the Federal force being driven from Manassas Junction, with a great loss of artillery and stores, and by his communication with the Federal capital being cut off. The Confederates, still keeping possession of Manassas Junction, sent forward a force that drove the Federals from Bull Run Bridge, and the Confederate cavalry even advanced to Fairfax. As we do not charge General Pope with imbecility, we must give credit to his enemy for consummate strategy. The Federal general had been driven across the Rappahannock, had been driven from the banks of that river before he could effect a junction with the whole of McClellan's army, and whilst he was resting at Warrenton, believing, no doubt, in massing his forces, the Confederates pass to his rear, drive in his right wing, and are between him and Washington. If we needed any further proof that General Pope was surprised, we have it in the extension of the Federal lines from Warrenton to Manassas Junction; for had he conceived an attack in his rear possible he would not have suffered General Sigel's corps to have been so far from the main body.

When General Pope became aware of the position in which he had been placed, he broke up his camp at Warrenton, divided his forces into three parts, and retreated to Manassas Junction, which place, after several skirmishes, he reached on the 28th, three hours after it had been evacuated by General Jackson. Whither had the Confederate general retired? Not, we may be sure, to the north of General Pope's army. Where was the main body of the Confederates, which had passed to Pope's rear while he was resting at Warrenton? We have not information that enables us to give a definite and certain answer to this question; and yet until this point is settled we cannot fully understand the position of the contending armies at the second battle of Bull Run, which occurred on the 29th. Was the Confederate army between the Federal army and Richmond, or between the Federal army and Washington? If in the former position, how can we explain the attack of Pope before he was joined by the whole of McClellan's army? If in the latter position, it is manifest that so far from the Federals gaining any advantages, they made a vain attempt to cut through the Confederate army and reopen the communication with Washington. The official despatch of General Pope, of course, announces a victory, yet he confesses to a loss of 8000 men; that his troops were so exhausted as not to be able to follow up the advantage which it is the policy of Federal commanders to say they have gained, however badly they may have been defeated. He refers hesitatingly to the Confederate loss, and indefinitely to the capture he has made. Judging from Pope's antecedents, we may very well regard this despatch as an admission of defeat; but the very terms of it enable us to do more than surmise the truth. He says distinctly that the Confederates stood on the defensive. Now, if the attacking party did not drive his enemy from his front, there can be no question that the attack was a failure. If the Confederates did not gain a victory it was a drawn battle, which left the Federals exhausted, and the relative positions of the armies unchanged. The last advices from New York, stating that the appearance of the Confederates on the Upper Potomac was expected, is, we think, very sufficient evidence that the Federal army is menaced both in front and rear. It is far from improbable that we may shortly hear of the united armies of McClellan and Pope being established on the bank of the Potomac, or there may have been another engagement; but a single victory could not retrieve the fortunes of the invader. In the Times of yesterday it was observed that "the safety of Washington and the existence of the Federal Government still depended on the result of a battle;" but a Federal victory would still leave the invasion of Virginia one of the completest military failures on record. We will not speculate upon the probability of impending events, which are decided ere this, and of which the news is already on its way to Europe.

The report of the state of affairs in the Border States, and, indeed, in every part of the Confederacy, is as favourable to the Southern cause as the most sanguine friend could have anticipated. Every day the position of General Buell becomes more critical. The Confederate forces may be said to command Tennessee, if we except the part absolutely occupied by the Federal army. General Morgan has added to his long list of triumphs the defeat and capture of General Johnson, together with a large portion of his forces. In Arkansas, Missouri, Kentucky, and Tennessee, there is continuous fighting, and whenever we hear of a decided advantage it is on the side of the Confederates. Baton Rouge has been evacuated by the Federals, and much anxiety is felt for the safety of General Butler in New Orleans. If the picture we present of Federal affairs is gloomy, we may be sure it is not untruthfully gloomy, for, unfortunately, on this occasion we are obliged to write from the reports furnished to us by the North.

In the north-west the United States' Government has to contend with a new and formidable trouble; some Indian tribes have revolted, and it is supposed an Indian war has commenced, and if this be so, it will prove a heavy drain on Federal resources, both of men and money. In East New York there has been a mutiny in consequence of the non-payment of the soldiers. By means of enormous bounties, and the pressure of the conscription, which, by the way, has been postponed in Indiana, and practically abandoned in the Border States, some progress has been made in raising the much-needed 300,000 additional troops, and now it is discovered that there is a scarcity of arms. We are not so much surprised at this scarcity when we remember for the last few months the Federals have been abundantly supplying their enemy with arms and ammunition. New York is no longer reported as being cheerful, though the citizens get up war meetings at which resolutions are passed avowing the determination of the North to continue the contest. The diminished commerce of New York will prevent any inconvenience being experienced from the closing of the stores at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, in order to give time for volunteering and drafting. It is not unlikely that a half-holiday every day may lead to more rioting than enlisting.

We read in the New York press that Mr. Lincoln is determined to carry out the Confiscation and Emancipation Act as far as he can. Surely, under present circumstances, this is a biting jest and bitter mockery.

President Davis's Message.

MANY of our contemporaries have remarked, from time to time, on the striking contrast afforded by the State Papers and other official utterances of the Federal and Confederate Governments. The former are peculiarly offensive to English readers, accustomed to be addressed, and to see foreign Powers addressed, by the Ministers of this country in language whose gravity is almost too formal, and whose calmness incurs from critics in other nations the reproach of coldness. To us the tone of French and Italian reports and despatches seems objectionably vivacious, and their style suited rather to literary than to official compositions. But the most vivacious of French Ministers, the most violent of Italian patriots, must stand aghast at the violent language, as well as the insolent demeanour, with which the Cabinet of Mr. Lincoln addresses its subjects—we can no longer call them citizens—its enemy, and foreign nations. The most passionate and plain-spoken member of the British Parliament would hardly think of using in public, concerning the most hostile of foreign Powers, language such as that in which a notorious ex-Ambassador indulges towards England; and if he did, his audience would suppose him to be either drunk or mad. But even the frantic scoldings of Mr. Cassius Clay can hardly surprise a people used to the vituperative eloquence of a Sumner or a Lovejoy, the diplomatic ferocity of Mr. Seward, and the abusive proclamations which express at once the rage and the impotence of an incapable Government face to face with a people resolved on independence. Mr. Seward's despatches, indeed, are but translations into decent words of the frantic ribaldry of the gentleman displaced to make room for the late Secretary at War; and the Government, in its tone towards the Confederates, seems only to strive to outdo the harangues of Republican agitators, and the tirades of Abolition journals. It seems to think that fury will prove its earnestness, and that violence will pass for energy. In a word, all its utterances read like what they are—the addresses of demagogues to an excited populace, rather than the deliberate expression of the will and opinion of the Government of a great country involved in a terrible conflict. Of a similar effusion to those of the Washington Government a sarcastic statesman observed, “I hope the enemy, when he reads it, will tremble as I do.” Well, indeed, might sober observers in the United States tremble for their country and for the Federal cause when they read the marvellous despatches of the Secretary of State and the bombastic promises of instant victory with which the war was inaugurated by the President. Undersuch auspices, what could be expected but that which has actually been incurred—a long series of blunders and reverses as disgraceful as disastrous? But bluster and bombast serve their purpose. The Government speaks to Bunkum; and Bunkum cheers and seems to trust it.

The South, which has always furnished the Union with such statesmanship as the Federal Government has possessed, has the good fortune to be governed by statesmen; and their public utterances, addressed not to an ignorant rabble, but to a people terribly in earnest and thoroughly aware of the momentous nature of its great enterprise, have assured their country and the world of the genuineness and sufficiency of their statesmanship. Neither boastful extravagance nor wanton ferocity, neither unworthy panic nor undignified exultation, are to be traced in the conduct or in the language of the Confederate Government. The two Messages of President Davis—one delivered at the darkest hour of the fortunes of the Commonwealth, when Fort Donelson had fallen and Richmond seemed in danger, and one just after the defeated Army of the Potomac had fallen back, leaving tens of thousands of its dead on Virginian soil—have received the tribute of almost universal admiration from the English press; a tribute to which we need not add our mite of applause. All impartial critics have recognized in them the mind of a man worthy to guide the destinies of his country through the perils of a gigantic war and the embarrassments which beset the first steps of a newly-created State—courage that cannot be cowed by danger or disaster—candour that does not shrink from the painful avowal of errors and reverses—a spirit, even in the midst of brilliant successes, ab insolenti temperatam letitiam—a conscientious sense of duty which will not flinch from any measure, however obnoxious and unpopular, that is necessary to the public weal—a love of freedom, yielding neither to the promptings of ambition, nor to the instincts of official convenience, which has preserved in an invaded country the liberties which, on the plea of necessity, have been wrested from the invading people. If any fault has been found with the late Message, save by those who cannot think that the South can do any right or the North any wrong, it is that it speaks almost too coldly and indifferently of the glorious achievements of this summer's campaign—achievements which would have wrung an ample meed of praise from the haughtiest and most reserved of European statesmen. There is a Roman, almost a stoical, sternness in the manner in which the Confederate President accepts, as matters of course, the victories which have saved the capital; and the army might almost be disappointed did it not know how thoroughly a ruler, himself a distinguished soldier, appreciates the exploits which have signalized the soldiery of the South. Never was anything further removed from bombast or boastfulness than the language in which Mr. Davis announces triumphs which would have excited enthusiasm even in phlegmatic England, and done honour to the veteran armies of France.

Mr. Davis's temper does not fail him even when he has to speak of the wanton barbarities suffered by the districts that have been visited by the invaders, and of the unexampled outrages on the laws of civilized warfare which reflect such signal infamy on the Federal army and on the Federal Government. He speaks strongly, no doubt, but in terms of just and measured reprobation, of the crimes which have rendered a cause, bad to begin with, utterly detestable in the eyes of the civilized world. Let us recall for a moment what those crimes have been. Forgery has been the least of them. It is a trifle that the manufacture of counterfeit Confederate notes is regularly and publicly carried on in the Northern States, with the implied sanction of the Federal Administration; and that the forged notes are supplied by wholesale to the army, that the soldiers may add swindling to robbery, and defraud where they are not permitted to pillage. Yet we know that war gives no license to forgery. The army of General Pope has been ordered to subsist by plunder, and has accordingly made war on private citizens, robbing, burning, and destroying wherever its marauding bands have ventured to extend their operations. Murder has been the pastime of the Federal soldiery. In Missouri they assassinate gentlemen returning from church, on their own threshold and in sight of their families. In Virginia they smash the head of an aged lady with their musket-butts. In Tennessee they avenge the surprise and destruction of a general and his escort by hanging a score of unoffending citizens. In Louisiana they bombard a defenceless town, because their vessels of war have been fired upon by Confederate guerillas. In Alabama a ladies' school is deliberately given up to the license of a brutal soldiery. In New Orleans war is declared against unarmed men, against foreign property, and against the whole female population. And when the demand is made directly of the Federal Government whether it sanctions these atrocities, General Halleck refuses a reply. How can President Davis designate the perpetrators of these crimes but as “murderers and felons?” What else does Europe call them? And how can he deal with a systematic violation of the laws of war but by threatening condign punishment to the cowardly criminals? We regret the necessity of reprisals; but in a case like this there is no other resort. If American officers and soldiers will make war after the fashion of Taepings or Sepoys, it would be impossible, it would be criminal, to treat them as men engaged in honourable warfare.

In all that relates to the provision of necessary means for the maintenance of the war, the tone of the Message is calm and cheerful evincing full confidence in the army, in Congress, and in the country; confidence which is fully reciprocated. The Confederate army has not suffered like that of the invaders from the sword, from climate, from famine, from disease, and from desertion. There have been no routs, and the losses of an army in the field are never so great as when it has ceased to defend itself. The Confederates are fighting on their own soil, and are not wilfully sacrificed by being encamped in swamps; they have an efficient commissariat; they have been well led and carefully husbanded; and they have no traitors or halfhearted mercenaries in their ranks. It is probably, therefore, that, even without a further conscription, they will be able to hold their own against any force that the North can send into the field; but in case they should require reinforcements, the President prudently demands from Congress power to call a further force into the field. In reference to this subject a mistake, perhaps wilful, has been made by one of our contemporaries, which notoriously derives inspiration and even information, more or less veracious, from the Federal Embassy. The Message speaks of differences of opinion, and calls on Congress to take measures to secure the harmonious co-operation of the State and Central Governments; and hereon is used a shout of premature exultation over imaginary dissensions at the South. But there has been no dissension. Discussion there has been, but discussion on a point of constitutional law, not of practical action. Governor Brown, of Georgia, a gentleman full of patriotic energy, but, perhaps, tinged with a little of that disposition to theoretic cavil which sailors denounce as a “sea-lawyer,” objects to the Conscription Act as unconstitutional the Government defends it, as necessary to that provision for the security of the Confederacy which is undoubtedly within the power and duty of the President and Congress, and a correspondence, very courteous, but very lengthy, has taken place on the subject. But the State of Georgia furnishes her full contingent to the Confederate army, and neither the Governor nor any other citizen dreams of desiring that she should do otherwise. That such a discussion should arise in an invaded country proves at once the confidence of the people and the strength of the Government. What would be the fate of any man who ventured to question the constitutionality of a conscription in the North?

One other point in the Message deserves notice—the frankness, namely, with which Mr. Davis treats the difficult case of “officers incompetent for their position.” Wherever a vast army has suddenly to be created this case must be a common one; and in America the evil is aggravated by the practice of regimental election. In the Northern armies incompetence would seem to be the rule, and capacity the rare exception. And this might have been expected. Subordinate officers have been elected after a personal canvass, for their popularity, or their wealth, or any reason except that of military knowledge and experience. Superior officers have been appointed by favour, through political intrigue or backstairs influence. Election brings forward the heroes of the stump, the Corcorans and the Meaghers; executive appointment, the wire-pullers and lobby-hunters, the Bankses and the Butlers. In the South there has been very little of this kind of folly. There, the seriousness of the struggle has been understood from the first. War was not there expected to be a holiday task; and soldiers have chosen, and Government has appointed, officers with sole reference to their supposed fitness. There, men of every social grade are found in every rank of the army; dozens of officers who have no claim to rank but military capacity are found commanding thousands of privates sprung from the best and richest families in the South. But, nevertheless, mistakes have been made, as a matter of course, where some twenty-five or thirty thousand officers were to be chosen in a single year; and these mistakes Mr. Davis is anxious to rectify by some gentler means than the judgment of a court-martial. But, by some means or other, he is resolved to weed the army of officers who, from whatever cause, are unfit for command. It would be well for the unfortunate men who are marched to die by fever, famine, or the sword, under McClellan, Pope, and Buell, if any similar conscientious exercise of authority were to be hoped either from the Government or the Commander-in-Chief at Washington. And there may be European Governments which might, with advantage to their armies, imitate the wholesome strictness of the Confederate President.

Confederate Reprisals.

THREE weeks since we had occasion to dwell on the duty as well as the justice of Confederate reprisals. Their justice is, we presume, unquestionable. Neither in peace or war ought the atrocious crimes of such men as Butler, Mitchell, and Turchin to be committed with impunity. The cruel proclamation of Pope, the wholesale plundering of peaceful inhabitants, the circulation of forged Confederate notes, the infamous order of Butler, are offences that loudly call for punishment. No one will argue that the thefts, and diabolical brutality of the Northern soldiery, sanctioned as they are by the Washington Government and the Northern commanders, do not justify severe reprisals; and we imagine that the humanity of reprisals is equally manifest. President Davis does not seek for retribution in kind; in fact, he repudiates the idea of retaliation, except in the form of “stern and exemplary punishment;” and this is insisted on because “no method remains for the suppression of these enormities but such retributive justice as it may be found possible to execute.” Not to punish the crimes of the North would be to incur the guilt of encouraging them. So far from the Confederate reprisals making the war more savage in its character, they will have the opposite effect. When we last referred to this subject, we ventured to express an opinion that the order of President Davis in regard to Pope's command would have a good result, and in our succeeding issue we had to record a proclamation of General Halleck against wholesale plundering; and also that General Pope had thought it better to revoke or modify his license to plunder, and we are informed the officers in his command insisted upon his so doing. We are convinced the resolute action of the Confederate Government will further curb the brutal instincts of the Northern authorities. For retaliation upon their women and children, or even upon their soldiers, they would not so much care, but as they are to be punished in their own persons for the crimes which they instigate and for which they are responsible, they will, for the sake of their necks, try to observe the laws of civilized warfare.

Some surprise has been expressed with respect to a proposed measure of retaliation that, in our opinion, is one of the most justifiable. The proposal to which we advert is, that Federal armies incongruously composed of white and men black shall not be held entitled to the privileges of war, and that of such as may be captured, the negroes shall be returned to their masters, or publicly sold, and their commanders be hung or shot. At present the proposed Act has not even been discussed by the Confederate Congress, and therefore our contemporaries have been rather premature in condemning as a law what may never become the law of the Confederate States. Our Parliamentary experience teaches us that there is an immense difference between a Bill being laid upon the table and a Bill becoming law. But we are not advancing this in defence of the proposition we have summarized; we defend it on its own merits; and if such an Act is passed it ought to be approved by every Christian community and by every humane man.

To put this matter on the broadest issue, we will, for a moment, assume that the negro regiments of the North are raised from the free coloured population. In that case, would the Confederate Government be justified in selling the captives of such regiments to slavery, and hanging the commanders? We must bear in mind that not only is the negro of an inferior race, but his inferiority is recognized and insisted on by the United States. In the North, as well as in the South, he is denied political equality, and is not liable to be called out for military service. The former, then, cannot complain of the latter refusing to treat the negro as the equal of the white man. But the object of raising coloured regiments is atrocious. The North is not engaged in a defensive war, and even if so, it would scarcely palliate the arming of negroes; nor is there any lack of white men, if they choose to enlist, to carry on the war of invasion. It is not pretended that the United States' armies will be strengthened by the addition of negro regiments; on the contrary, it is admitted they may prove a source of weakness. The object is to incite a servile insurrection. In the North there are persons so fiendish in their malignity as to avowedly sympathize with this idea of extermination. Language is too poor to set forth the atrocity of such a scheme, but the civilized world will not gainsay the right of the Confederates to punish any and every attempt to promote it.

It is, however, well known that the negro regiments are not composed of the free coloured population of the North, but of runaway or captured slaves. It is intended, if possible, to make the negro fight against his master. Surely no Englishman can be found to approve such conduct. The proposal for England to arm the American savages during the War of Independence, and turn them against the revolted colonists, was denounced by the Earl of Chatham in a speech of scathing invective; but it would have been far less inhuman to employ savages than it is to stir up a servile war, and, by exciting the negro's passions, to reduce him to the state of savageness from which he has been raised. The illustrious orator would not have been able to find adequate terms of reprobation for such an act. Any one who can palliate the proceedings of the United States' Government participates in its infamy. Mr. Lincoln has declared he cares not for Emancipation, but only for the reconstruction of the Union. The sole purpose of the war is the maintenance of the area of the late United States, and to attain it the people of the South are to be exterminated, if they cannot be conquered. Posterity will not wonder at the retaliation of the Confederate States, but rather, that Christian nations did not protest actively against the diabolical scheme of the North.

Besides, we maintain that it is a solemn obligation of the Southern people to protect the slaves. They ought not to permit the negroes to be made the tools of the white man's lust and vengeance; and we believe the proposed law will be an efficient protection. It will not punish the negro to be restored to his master, or assigned to a new master; he is too glad to escape from the North and to return to the South, which has been his home and country. But hanging or shooting the officers of negro regiments will have a very salutary effect, and, as we think, put an end to negro enlistment, or rather, impressment. Mr. Horace Greeley will not, we may be sure, accept a commission on such terms, and he will not be able to persuade others to incur the risk from which he shrinks.

Cause of the Disruption of the Union.

ONE of the most consistent champions of Abolition has again entered the field, and his opponent in the lists is this time no less a person than the Chief of the nation—a tilt in which the President holds no very dignified position, we venture to surmise. However, there is the fact that Mr. Lincoln has broadly put upon public record his views, and, we presume, the line of policy approved by his Cabinet, with reference to slavery. Now, before we approach his peculiar treatment of it, let us, for one moment, look at the complexion the great controversy assumed on both sides of the Atlantic. We were told, not only by statesmen in the Senate and House of Representatives, but their opinion was endorsed by States and people, that slavery, being contrary to the law of God, was not to be suffered in a Christian country, and was to be put away as the unholy thing, nationally, even though the doing so would destroy the Union.

Mr. W. H. Seward and his friends have been named by themselves the "Higher Law Party," because they avowed their consciences would not allow them to obey the law of the land, as it abetted slavery condemned by such higher law; and if they had contented themselves with excluding and abolishing slavery in their own States, they would have been blameless. But, without knowledge of the country or its peculiar institutions, religious people on this side of the Atlantic have allowed themselves to be worked on by false and fraudulent misrepresentations of the social state of the slave, to overlook, in their benevolent desire for the well-being of their protégés, every consideration of law, justice, or the common weal of the nation. And to such people the idea has been pertinaciously held out by the emissaries of the Washington autocracy, that the war of the North against the South is a war for the enfranchisement of the slave. What says the Chief Officer of the North?

My paramount object in this struggle is to save the Union; and it is neither to save or destroy slavery. If I could save the Union without freeing any slave, I would do it; and if I could save by freeing all the slaves, I would do it; and if I could do by freeing some and leaving others alone, I would also do it. What I do about slavery and the coloured race I do because I believe it helps to save this Union; and what I forbear, I forbear because I do not believe it would help to save the Union.

Again, we have heard something broadly and fearlessly laid down by statesmen, whose names are enrolled in the list of those whom all parties in America were delighted to honour, about the Constitution of the United States permitting slavery, and that the law of the land, as allowed by Mr. Seward and his friends, did sanction, nay, even protect a man who so disregarded the higher law as to own such property. What says Mr. Lincoln?

As the policy I "seem to be pursuing," as you say, I have not met to leave any one in doubt. I would save the Union.

I would save it the shortest way under the Constitution. The sooner the national authority can be restored, the nearer the Union will be "the Union as it was." If there be those who would not save the Union unless they could at the same time destroy slavery, I do not agree with them.

Now, the "Union as it was," but never will be again, was a nation living under a code of laws enacted for the benefit of all who lived under its rule, and a great portion of those were slaveowners. When, therefore, on that and on other points—and they are all too well-known to require illustration here—the people of the Confederate States agreed, as they had a right to do, no longer to abide in the Constitution, what does the President mean by his declaration? He means that he and his will persist in their wicked and suicidal system of coercion. He means they will ignore the plain rights of freemen to choose their own Government; that they will murder thousands of men, and even women and children. He means they will ruin whole States of flourishing and peaceful members of their own family; throw back, for it may be centuries, the civilization and welfare of the common country by savage brutality at the hands of a ferocious and foreign horde, and wreck the destinies of the nation of which he swore to administer faithfully the laws and Constitution. For what? To restore the Union; to force back into a community they abhor eight millions of freemen with arms in their hands, and who need not be told on September 11, 1862, how to use them. The thing is an absurdity, and Mr. Lincoln knows it. There is not one single article in nature, from the mountain rock to the slenderest needle, that human art can rejoin when once sundered. "As it was," indeed! The Union as it was is gone, and in the lesson it has taught mankind has done the work for which an all-wise Providence permitted it—to show how a lust of power, insolence of control at home, and assumption regardless of law or decency abroad, has recoiled upon the people who set up their idol, and found it of clay. They dare not go back; the machine that they have set in motion, were they to dare to stop it, would crush them as the car of Juggernaut. They must go on. Neither reason, nor law, nor any human ability, can weigh aught in their counsels. They have marked themselves for destruction, and it has found them out. For some short time past a better feeling has taken possession of public men and public writers in this country. Mr. Seward, in his letter to the Paisley sympathizers, acknowledges the fact that the feeling of England is against him. Why? Because he and his men have senselessly ignored every sentiment that Englishmen hold dear. They have shut the mouth of the press, and confined in loathsome dungeons, without trial, all who dare disagree; they have boasted and threatened till Europe has become disgusted with their conduct, and cannot but rejoice in the dissolution of a union which would have jeopardized the peace of the world.

Co-operation.

LAST week, in speaking of the injuries inflicted by the American war upon the manufacturing districts of this country, we had occasion to mention the heavy losses sustained by the Lancashire co-operative societies, through the impoverishment of their members, and the consequent withdrawals of capital; losses which, it is to be feared, will prove fatal to the existence of many of these most excellent institutions, and cripple for a long time to come the progress of all except the richest, best established, and best managed among them. We take the first opportunity of recurring to the subject, because we believe that the defeat of the co-operative movement would be about the most serious blow that could be suffered by the intelligent and thrifty working-classes of the cotton districts, that it would be equivalent to a suspension of their social progress for a generation to come, and would undo the best part of the progress that has been accomplished during the lifetime of the generation now living. In our opinion, the success which Co-operation has achieved in the last eighteen years is the most hopeful feature in the industrial history of our time, and promised more for the eradication of some of the worst defects of our social organization than is to be hoped from any other of the marvellous discoveries—moral, political, and mechanical—of this self-satisfied nineteenth century. If this movement should now be crushed or beaten back, the lawless ambition of the Northern people will have inflicted on popular progress and prosperity in England the heaviest blow it has yet suffered. American Democracy will have done more to hinder the elevation of the masses, to perpetuate inequality, discontent, and ill-will among men, than has ever been effected by any reaction, aristocratic or monarchical, in any part of the world.

Some persons have a vague idea that Co-operation is a modified phase, or reproduction in a new shape, of the exploded errors of the Communists. Such a mistake is hardly excusable after men of all parties and opinions, the strictest economists and the most resolute Conservatives, have concurred in approving the principles, and applauding the progress, of the new movement. One of the earliest journals to discern and defend the merits of Co-operation was the organ of the strictest school of Political Economy; one of the most elaborate and most favourable accounts of the rise of the Rochdale societies was given by the recognized organ of the Tory party. The truth is, that the fundamental principles of Co-operation and of Communism are not merely distinct, but antagonistic. Communism seeks to destroy private property; Co-operation to do away with a proletariat and to make every labourer a small capitalist. Communism, merging individual interests in the common weal, minimises the incentive to individual exertion. Co-operation, giving to each individual the strongest possible interest in his own labour, strives to render that labour as energetic and as intelligent as human labour can be made. Historically, however, Co-operation is the child of Communism. The first English co-operators were disciples of Robert Owen. They began their work with full faith in his teachings; and in their hopes of renovating the world they were scarcely less sanguine than that most hopeful of visionaries. They differed from him in this—that while he was a dreamer they were practical labourers; that they were as teachable as he was self-willed; that they were willing to profit by experience and that he was not; and, therefore, they have unlearned in their upward progress the extravagant absurdities of their early faith; while they have worked their way to practical achievements, which, if not what they once dreamed of, are infinitely greater than could reasonably have been expected when in 1844 the first co-operative society started in business with forty members, and a capital of twenty-eight pounds.

Co-operation resembles Communism only in this—that it also is a revolt against injustice and an effort to escape from evils inherent in the actual constitution and industrial organization of society. Communism endeavoured to attain its end by attempting to revolutionize society; attempting at once too little and too much; for in order to succeed it must have revolutionized not only society but human nature; in order to provoke hostility, it did more than was required. And, accordingly, society crushed out its declared enemy; in England by the moral force of national common sense, in France by the physical force of grapeshot and bayonets. Co-operation, working in strict obedience to economical laws, avails itself of existing materials to build up in the midst of society, as actually organized, institutions which afford to their members protection against the evils of which they complain; and supercedes defective social arrangements only by the gradual substitution of others which hold their ground and prevail simply by virtue of their practical superiority. To men not accustomed to the study of economical science, the assertion of such superiority sounds like a glaring economical heresy; they are wont to regard the actual organization of the world's business—the business of production, distribution, and exchange—as something ordained by nature, and certain to establish itself wherever men are left free to order their affairs at their own pleasure. It is with great difficulty that Englishmen are brought to understand that the form of industrial organization which obtains in England is not the necessary form into which all societies advanced in civilization naturally fall; nay, that even in England its existence is but of recent date. And yet history tells us that there was a time, not many centuries ago, when the status of a journeyman, permanently working for hire—now the status of the bulk of our town population—did not exist among us; and every observant traveller knows that such is not the condition of the agricultural classes of France and Italy, or of the trading classes of the Levant, or of any great class in any Oriental country. Most Englishmen accept the existing relation between capitalist and labourer—with its concomitant mischiefs of pauperism, and overpopulation, and class-antagonism, and all the troubles to which class-antagonism gives rise—as a law of nature, against which they no more murmur than against gravitation or the succession of the seasons. Co-operation establishes a new and healthier relation. It makes the labourer partner with the capitalist, jointly interested with him in the prosperity of the concern, in its economical working, in its efficiency of production, in its profits and in its losses. It endeavours, too, to make him a capitalist; and thereby to remove the last vestige of the old antagonism. And eighteen months or two years ago, it bade fair thus to change, in the course of a generation or two, the relation between employers and employed in all trades giving occupation to a highly-skilled and intelligent class of labourers.

In another direction it had worked even more successfully. There are, no doubt, many persons who consider the enormous machinery of retail trade as a subject of pride and a source of profit to England, and would be disposed to pity a country which, like the Confederate States of America, has scarcely anything of the kind. But retail trade adds nothing to the wealth of a country; it is merely a scheme for conveying the produce of labour from the producer to the consumer; and the less capital and the less labour are thus occupied, the more will be available for that productive employment which really increases riches. Retail trade in this country employs, probably, thrice as much capital and six times as many hands as are required to do the work; and all the unnecessary means and industry thus employed is simply wasted, and receives its remuneration at the expense of producers. It is a parasitic incubus, draining the resources and diminishing the productive power of the country. We have six men, with £600, doing the work that might be done by one man with £200. These six men must live; each on his £100 must make an annual profit of £50. The one man with £200 would be satisfied with an annual profit of £100, and thus £200 a year would be saved to the customers. This saving is effected, when a co-operative society opens a store, buys at wholesale prices, and sells to its members at retail prices, distributing among them afterwards the profits made by this trade, less the salaries of servants and other working expenses. It happens that the town of Rochdale affords a noble example of both achievements of Co-operation—of what it can do in furthering production, and of what it can do in economizing and cheapening distribution. There exist in that town the first and greatest co-operative store, and the first and greatest co-operative factory in England.

The store was first established in 1844, by the Society of Equitable Pioneers—the parent Co-operative Society of England. The society had originally forty members, of whom twelve seem to have dropped off before business commenced. At first the store was only open on one or two evenings in the week, and butter, flour, and groceries, the sole commodities, were sold by the directors in person, who in turn attended gratuitously to its business. It was not until 1851 that it was open all day and every day, and that salaried salesmen and a manager were appointed. The directors still serve gratuitously, though they and all the members are, in Lancashire parlance, “nobbut working men.” The following table records the financial history of the store up to the end of 1860:—

	No. of Members.	Amount of Funds.		Business done.		Profit made.
		£	s. d.	£	s. d.	£	s. d.
1844	28	28	0 0
1845	74	181	12 5	710	6 5	32	17 6
1846	80	252	7 1½	1,146	17 1	80	16 6
1847	110	286	15 3½	1,924	13 10	72	2 10
1848	140	397	0 0	2,276	6 5½	117	16 10½
1849	399	1,193	19 1	6,611	18 0	561	3 9
1850	600	2,299	10 5	13,179	17 0	889	12 5
1851	630	2,785	0 1½	17,638	4 0	990	19 8½
1852	680	3,471	0 6	16,352	5 0	1,206	15 2½
1853	720	5,848	3 11	22,760	0 0	1,674	18 11½
1854	900	7,172	15 7	33,364	0 0	1,763	11 2½
1855	1400	11,032	12 10½	44,902	12 0	3,106	8 4
1856	1600	12,920	13 1½	63,197	10 0	3,921	13 1½
1857	1850	15,142	1 2	79,788	0 0	5,470	6 8½
1858	1950	18,160	5 4	71,689	0 0	6,284	17 4½
1859	2703	27,064	14 2	104,012	0 0	10,739	18 6½
1860	3450	37,710	9 0	152,063	0 0	15,906	9 11

The profits are divided after the following manner. The capital of the store first receives interest at the rate of 5 per cent; then 2½ per cent. of the net profits is devoted to “educational purposes”—i.e., the maintenance of the excellent library and news-room connected with the store. The remainder of the profits belong to the members of the society, in proportion to their purchases. Thus, if at a quarterly stock-taking, the amount of purchase-money received during the quarter—the “returns”—be £40,000 and the net profit £4000, a dividend is declared of 10 per cent.; and every member who has expended during the quarter £20 at the store is entitled to a dividend of £2. The store is, in fact, a purchasing agency managed by and for the profit of the customers, and they receive the difference between wholesale and retail prices, not at each purchase, but quarterly, in the form of dividend. These dividends are, in great part, left to accumulate in the hands of the society, a very large part of whose capital consists of such accumulations. There are men who have now £50, or more, to their credit in the store, who have drawn out more than they ever subscribed to its capital; their present wealth being simply the result of these accumulated dividends. The store acts as a savings bank, allowing members to draw out their money, nominally at short notice, practically without notice. While the money remains, it bears interest at the rate of 5 per cent.; and this rate on money at call is found to offer such attractions that the store has always a larger capital than it can profitably employ; indeed, it has £10,000 invested in two other co-operative societies in Rochdale. The whole of this capital is owned by working-men; the whole of it has been saved, under the influence or by the agency of the store since 1844, in a town of less than 40,000 inhabitants. Better still, the store has emancipated the working classes of Rochdale from that state of indebtedness which is almost the normal condition of the Lancashire artisan. It gives no credit; and its members, dealing only with it, have been obliged as well as assisted to get rid of their debts to the shopkeepers. It is scarcely possible to overrate the moral and material benefits which the Equitable Pioneers and their store have conferred on Rochdale.

The town boasts two other co-operative institutions—a corn mill, managed on the principles of the store, and a cotton manufacturing society. The latter had in 1856 a capital of £4000; in 1860 a capital of £70,000. It divides profits on wages and capital equally, after first paying 5 per cent. interest on the latter. That is to say, if in 1860 it made a profit of £13,500, after paying £30,000 in wages, it would first set aside £3500 as interest on capital, and then divide £10,000 at 10 per cent. on £70,000 capital, + £30,000 wages. Every shareholder of £50 would receive 50s. interest and £5 dividend. Every labourer who earned £50 in wages would receive £5 dividend. Thus sharing in the profits, the labourer's intelligence and energy are stimulated to the utmost; and the promoters of the concern believe that, from the increased application and care thus obtained, the capitalist in a co-operative factory actually receives a larger percentage on his capital than the master who monopolizes the whole profit of an ordinary mill. This may be so. But the system has not yet been tried on a sufficiently large scale, or for sufficient time, to afford practical proof of its value.

In 1860 co-operative stores and co-operative factories were springing up all over the land. We should be afraid to state the amount of capital—all belonging to operative families—that was said to have been invested in these off-shoots and imitations of the Rochdale societies. It is enough to say that every considerable town and many a hamlet in South Lancashire had its co-operative store, acting as savings bank and general shop in one; supplying its customers with sound wares and wholesome food, and employing their money, at call, in such manner as to afford them the means of rapidly acquiring a modest competence while still retaining the power, essential to working-men, of withdrawing their money at once in time of need. The Cotton Famine has interrupted the spread of the movement. It has suspended the business of the stores; it has compelled enormous withdrawals of capital; and, should it continue for another year, we fear that it will have entirely exhausted their resources, and undone the work of the last eighteen years. This is one of the manifold injuries which the working classes of Lancashire owe to the Democracy of the United States, and not, perhaps, the least of that long and terrible list.

Are the Millowners to Blame?

EVERY day increases the anxiety felt in the manufacturing districts as to the coming winter. The distressing character of the Cotton Famine is being more thoroughly and painfully appreciated. The state of affairs is bad now, it must continue to grow worse, and though the worst will be experienced in the winter, the ensuing spring will not bring relief. We need not, however, dwell upon the duration of the famine, for even if it were certain that trade would revive in next February or March, the intermediate suffering would be terrible to contemplate. We do not mean to infer that the operatives will be allowed to starve in the full meaning of that word of woe. If the present systems of succour are insufficient, others must be forthwith devised. The English pauper, in case of need, has a mortgage upon the entire wealth of the country. But let us not deceive ourselves as to the extent of the evil, or imagine that idleness and the ills that are heir to it are all the Lancashire operatives will have to endure. The parochial or special assistance will not prevent the ravages of the wolf. The men, women, and children of the working population of Lancashire will not die for want of a morsel of bread, but they will not get enough to eat. It would shame our boasted civilization if we fed our criminals as our unfortunate operatives will be fed during the next few months. We do not bring any charge against the rich. We frankly, and yet sorrowfully, admit that when a disaster is so widespread as is the Cotton Famine, the alleviation that can be afforded by the wealthiest and most benevolent community is but trifling. And should the winter be inclement, or even if it is an average winter, how will the cold strike the half-fed, half-clad people? Can we expect that, as a rule, the poor creatures will have the warmth of a fire? It is melancholy to reflect, too, that many of the comforts of home, as dear to the labourer as luxuries are to the rich, have long since been parted with for food. We grant this is a sad picture, but it is a true one, and this is not the time to hide the truth. The unhappy artisans must bear the famine as best as they may be able; and it does not become those who look on to mock their misery by underrating it. It is in vain to hope against hope. We believe, we are perfectly sure, that all will be done that can be done to aid the operatives, and their wives and children; but still, the Cotton Famine will make full churchyards, as well as inflict lasting and incalculable injury upon those who outlive the trial.

We have heartily admired the heroic patience displayed by the operatives, and which is, in our opinion, an honour to the nation. Whether rightly or wrongly, we will not essay to determine, it is now whispered that there is a limit to endurance, and that in the winter there may be manifestations of impatience. It is suggested that, with no prospect in the future, and famished by cold and hunger, some of the artisans may be impelled to assume a riotous bearing. We trust these surmises will not, in any degree, be realized; we are only stating the opinions of those who are most interested in the question; that they are pretty general, may be gathered from the attempt to find a scapegoat in the mill-owners. It is not expressly said that these gentlemen are the cause of the American war, but it is hinted that they have not done enough, not what they could and ought, to help their unfortunate hands. A more wicked and unjust charge was never preferred against any class.

We happen to know, as well as any and better than most of our contemporaries, how strenuously and generously the millowners have exerted themselves to aid the distressed. They have acted right nobly. They have kept their mills open at a heavy loss. The fiction that they have neglected their usual business to speculate in cotton is not worth refutation. The mills have been closed for lack of the raw material. It was not more the duty of the millowners of Lancashire than the duty of the merchants of London to assist the operatives. The Cotton Famine is not the result of any usual disturbance of trade, or of any failure of the cotton crop, but of the blockade of the Southern ports. The Government thinks it wise to observe that blockade, and so far from interfering to stop the war, will not so much as recognize the Confederate States. Grant, for argument's sake, this policy is sound and prudent, that it is for the benefit of the empire to suffer the heavy loss of the cotton trade, rather than run the slightest risk of offending the extreme susceptibilities of the New York mob—are the millowners to bear the burden of this Imperial necessity? They do not endorse the Government policy, and if their opinions were canvassed, a vast majority of them, at all events, would demand immediate recognition of the Confederate States, and the observance of a de facto neutrality. Instead of reprimanding the millowners for not supporting their workpeople, it seems to us they have some claim for compensation for having their mills, if not originally closed, kept closed by the exigencies of the Imperial policy. It would have been just, and not over generous, if our public writers and public men had said, "We regret the continued loss sustained by our manufacturers in consequence of the attitude of the Government; let us, at least, take heed that they are not burdened with the support of their hands."

Two reasons are given for the attack on the millowners; one is that they have made fortunes out of cotton; and the other, that they ought to have made themselves independent of the American supply. As to the first of these arguments, we would suggest that not only Lancashire, but the whole of England, has been enriched by our cotton manufacture, and that we are greatly indebted to the indomitable energy of our cotton spinners. Our manufacturers have become wealthy, but their wealth has been, to a considerable extent, invested in mills and warehouses; so that it contributes not only to the wealth of the owners, but to the commerce of the country. Taking the aggregate wealth England has derived from the manufacture of cotton fabrics, we say, advisedly, that the lion's share of it has not been enjoyed by our manufacturers. The empire has grown rich through the industry of Lancashire; and now that industry is stopped by an unavoidable calamity, let the empire repay a part of its indebtedness by freely aiding Lancashire.

Mr. Cobden hit the right nail on the head when he observed that it was the business of the spinners to spin, and not to grow cotton; yet the clamour is still continued about Manchester men not investing their money in cotton companies. We conceive that Manchester is acting very sensibly. India, for instance, is a good field for investment for many kinds of enterprise, but not for cotton cultivation, and therefore we find there is in India abundance of capital for public works, for opium, for all things that pay, but not for cotton that does not pay. The West Indies do not afford a good prospect. Will the gentlemen who are trying to get up limited liability companies for cotton culture in the West Indies explain to us how it happens, if the speculation is so good, that West India proprietors do not, to some extent, abandon sugar and take up with cotton? At present prices cotton may be profitably grown almost anywhere; but not only will present prices topple down when America re-enters the market, but the excessive dearness checks competition, and so will diminish the demand for the raw material. If India, together with other countries, could replace the American supply, it would have to do so at American prices. The cause of the low prices has been the abundance, and yet India is told that if she can produce that abundance she will get higher prices!

But suppose Political Economy is wrong, and the would-be secretaries of Cotton Companies (Limited) are right, and that our cotton lords are foolish as well as blamable, it must, nevertheless, be conceded that they are generous. Content with cotton spinning, they leave to others the profit of cotton growing. Let the great capitalists of London produce cotton, and our manufacturers will buy it. Perhaps those who urge Manchester to invest in cotton culture are not so certain of the success of the enterprise as to invest their own money. It is not altogether without precedent for men to recommend investments to others in which they have not sufficient faith to invest their own cash.

We do not fear that the effort to put enmity between the operatives and the millowners will succeed. In the last fifteen years education has made immense progress, and now, during all the suffering of the past few months, there has not been a murmur. The unhappy operatives know that their employers are not to blame. They know the blockade keeps away the cotton, and that the Government has thought proper not to do anything to put an end to the war or the blockade. It is possible when the operatives learn the truth about the war, when they discern, by the open declaration of Mr. Lincoln, that the Northern agitators have been deceiving them by describing the war as a war of Emancipation, when they find out how selfish is the North, how much the secession of the South is for the benefit of the world, and especially of England—it is possible, we say, that there may be a great uprising in Lancashire; there may be a loud cry for recognition of the South, and, by some means or other, for the cotton of the South. Not diplomatic but absolute fair play may be insisted on. If the North and West can sell their cereals for guns, let the South sell her cotton for guns. In the midst of the agitation there will not be any blame attached to the millowners, for the operatives will only represent and express the sentiments of their employers.

POSITION OF NORTH AND SOUTH.

The Times' New York correspondent thus details the relative position of the belligerents:—

The premium on gold, which was temporarily checked by the non-arrival from England of American securities ordered for immediate sale, has again begun to rise, and now stands at 16 per cent. Silver has nearly disappeared from circulation, postage stamps—too many of them old ones already used, from which the marks of transit through the post-office have been cleverly obliterated—do all the duty of a minor currency. The most valuable coins handled by the people are the one cent, of nickel, and the three-cent piece of alloyed silver. The habeas corpus is suspended. Every one's liberty is at the mercy of spies, informers, and extortioners. The will of Mr. Lincoln is law; as is that of Mr. Seward and Mr. Stanton, provided the President does not object, which he never does; and the country is de facto a pure despotism, with the mere form and semblance of a freedom that has ceased in reality to exist. New York is under martial law, the Superintendent of Police having been appointed Special Provost-Marshal, to prevent citizens from travelling or aliens from leaving the country without passports, and also to arrest all persons who by word or deed discourage enlistments, and to give men the choice of the army or Fort Lafayette. Foreign trade is almost wholly at an end, and neither the people nor the Government know what to think or what to do to make things better.

And while this, broadly stated, is the condition of the North, what is that of the South? Perilous, no doubt, but full of hope for the Southern people. Unrecognized as it is, it has succeeded in making itself a nation. Isolation from the outer world in all things except in sympathy, combined with fanaticism, intense love of country, and enormous suffering, have welded it into adamant unity. It has been baptized in fire and blood, and stands before the great commonwealth of Christendom heroic and undaunted, an object of admiration even to three-fourths of its late fellow-citizens who are in arms to resist its independence. The North offers no such spectacle. It is not a nation, and it is not united. The immigrants from Europe who added so largely to its wealth and power, refuse to fight for it. Its own people would rather do battle for it vicariously than personally. It is split up into irreconcilable factions, each clamouring for the other's blood. Fort McHenry near Baltimore, is receiving political prisoners at the rate of twenty-five per day.

Reviews.

THE DISCOVERY OF AMERICA.*

THE oft-told story of the discovery of America has not lost its freshness. As our author observes, "neither the renowned march of Alexander the Great to Asia, nor the noisy deeds of the Crusaders, nor even the destructive eruptions of Alaric or Ghengis Khan, have been so important, nor have had such consequences for humanity, as the quiet voyage of Columbus with his three small vessels across the ocean." Columbus, and those who followed in the wake of his adventures, knew not that they were engaged in the discovery of a new continent. They were instigated in this bold enterprise by the hope of reaping a harvest of wealth from India, and so fixed was this object in their thoughts that everything they saw in America seemed to them an Indian product. It is astonishing how prejudice ignores the most palpable facts. Before Columbus would set forth on his momentous voyage, he stipulated for a large share of the fabulous wealth of the land to which he was proceeding. If, during his voyage he had had a vision revealing to him the true nature and effect of his discoveries, he would have regarded it as the wildest dream that ever flashed across a distempered imagination. He was not sailing to India, but to a new world; he was not about to add to the domains of the Romish Church, but to open up a field for the development of civilization, and where Christianity, free and unfettered, was to be established and enjoyed by the descendants of European emigrants. The native races, instead of being Christianized, were to be exterminated and die out. The Spanish language and the Spanish dominion, so far from being predominant, were to succumb to the Anglo-Saxon language, and Anglo-Saxon rule. The mountains of gold and the stores of precious stones were not to be forthcoming; yet the New World was to be a treasure trove to the Old World, and contribute largely to the sustenance and clothing of mankind. All these things were to be brought to bear in an incredibly short space of time. And in less than four centuries a mighty war—a war of unsurpassed magnitude—was to rage on the new continent, paralyze the industry of Europe, and pauperize a host of European artisans. The romance of Columbus is a nothing to the reality. Just as the fruitless attempts of the alchemist to find the philosopher's stone led to many important discoveries, so the fruitless attempts of the early navigators to light upon an imaginary India, teeming with riches, brought about the discovery of America. In fact, we may almost say that it is to the fables of Indian wealth that we owe the discovery of America in the fifteenth century. With so many marvels to dilate upon, it was hardly necessary for Mr. Kohl to devote a portion of his space to speculations upon the probabilities of America being discovered by the Phenicians; speculations which seem to us to have little foundation. With most nations, their early history is necessarily more or less speculative and mystical, but we can see American history in the cradle, and we also know that before the time of Columbus the history of America is sealed from us. We do not, in the least, dispute that there were emigrants from the Old World to the New World before the fifteenth century of the Christian era; on the contrary, we think such an emigration incontestably proved by the manners, habits, and customs of the aborigines, but there is no record of any European visiting America before that period.

Mr. Kohl's work is rather an epitome than a history, but still deserves commendation for its comprehensiveness. The account of the early navigators is very well arranged, though Spanish colonization is treated too briefly to give a fair and intelligent conception of its extent and importance. Whilst we cannot but condemn the cruel manner in which the Spaniards treated the aborigines, we must also admire their enterprise and energy, and we should regard them as the pioneers of American colonization.

One of the most pleasant chapters in the work is that devoted to the English expeditions for finding out the North-west Passage. The adventures of Sir John Franklin are shortly but graphically recited; and as a favourable specimen of the author's style, as it appears in an English dress, we will quote the description of the illustrious navigator's sufferings on his first north-west voyage:—

Franklin reached with indescribable toil the extreme end of the mainland—which before him had merely been seen from two points in the far distance, by two celebrated travellers of the far company, MacKenzie and Hearne—wintered in its neighbourhood, travelled over it, discovered and explored a stretch of coast upwards of eight hundred miles long, but sought in vain for Parry, who, as I said, had in the meanwhile sunk fast in the ice one thousand miles north of him. The disasters and privations which Franklin, his scientific friends Dr. Richardson and Heed, and their other admirable companions underwent on this journey can scarcely be described in a small compass. They wandered about for months in open boats, on these inhospitable shores, struggling with storms, breakers, masses of ice, and hostile Esquimaux. When the usual preserved food of travellers in those regions, the "pemmican," as it is called (buffalo flesh, dried, scraped, and packed in leathern sacks), was come to an end, they were compelled to support themselves with difficulty on the berries and mosses which grow scantily on the rocks of the north coast. For festivals and holidays they had to wring their repasts from bears and wolves, and whatever skin and bone these savage beasts left behind them they carefully collected, dried, and pulverized between stones, and prepared their soup from such refuse. When not a bone more was to be found under the snow, they felt their own meagre bodies, and examined their clothing, to discover if yet a piece of leather or a strap remained to stew. Partly forsaken by their people, whom famine and cold were decimating, threatened by some mutinous spirits with conspiracy and murder, the little suffering band—the martyrs of science—crept over the unknown region of ice in the direction of home, constantly, even in the midst of the greatest distress, keeping their scientific aims before their eyes. Even when their fever-shaken skeleton forms were already under the hand of death, they made their astronomical, meteorological, and magnetic observations, and with their trembling, frostbitten, emaciated fingers, put them to paper. If then, in order to relieve their feeble shoulders, they at last threw almost everything aside, they still preserved their journals and reports for the government and the nation. They could at last scarcely, with their changed and ghastly voices, which sounded as if coming out of the grave, make communications to each other, or exhort each other mutually to endurance, courage, and hope. A couple of friendly Indians, heaven sent messengers, who at last came one day among these few despairing sufferers with some just-shot venison, saved and preserved for us Franklin, who was to give the world so many more disclosures still as to a part of our globe never before visited, and who, undismayed by the want and anguish already endured—like Schiller's diver—a second and a third time plunged into the cold gloom of the north to fill the goblet of science.

The concluding chapter upon the results of the discovery of America is not worthy of the rest of the book. For example, a list is given of the products of America. Potatoes, Indian corn, tobacco, are called "the most prized gifts which we have received from the American flora," and cocoa and the pine-apple are incidentally mentioned, but not one word is said of cotton, of which the enormous production is the principal pillar of modern commerce, and the main source of the wealth, not only of the Confederate States, but also of the Northern States. This omission is very singular. Mr. Kohl is a German, and we know that some of his countrymen are determined not to believe that any good thing can come from the South; but we cannot understand upon what principle the less important productions of the South are noticed, and the great staple, cotton, not referred to.

Our author's views upon the use of tobacco are peculiar. He tells us, "The Spanish and Portuguese sailors were the first to adopt the Indian custom of intoxicating themselves with the leaves of this narcotic plant." Did Mr. Kohl ever hear the reason why a certain eminent English lawyer obtained the cognomen of "Apple-pip Kelly?" The learned gentleman had to defend a prisoner charged with murder, and he contended that the murdered person died from the effects of eating apples and swallowing the pips of them, which contain, like many other articles of food, infinitesimal quantities of poison. Or did Mr. Kohl ever hear of the old lady, who, at the patriarchal age of 110 years, expressed a conviction that her constitution had been undermined by her drinking tea for a century? There is, however, a difference between the startling theories of the English advocate, and the venerable dame, and Mr. Kohl's assertion about the intoxicating influence of tobacco. Our author does not propound an absurd theory, but he makes an utterly false statement.

Tobacco smoking never did and never will intoxicate any man. In excess it may be injurious, but so is too much bread or meat injurious. Further, it is remarked:—

If we consider what a powerful influence tobacco has had upon the health and habits of men, on agriculture, on our State Governments, and on politics, we may in truth say that through this plant alone the discovery of America has produced results of a most astonishing character in all the other quarters of the globe.

Smoking has caused our habits to become in many ways less sociable, and has greatly injured family life. By men withdrawing to envelope themselves in smoke, the intercourse of the sexes became loosened. And as tobacco diminishes the appetite but increases thirst, taverns and coffee-houses, and other establishments for the sale of beer and wines, came into fashion. We have to thank the discovery of America for much of that kind of so-called sociability to be found in places of public resort. Had there been a Roman plebs after the time of Columbus, "Tabac ac circenses," and not "Panem ac circenses," would have been the cry.

We do not deny the powerful influence of tobacco, but we gratefully acknowledge it. The use of this plant is physically, and therefore morally, beneficial. So far from smoking inducing drunkenness, it checks that appalling vice, and certainly drunkenness abounded when the use of tobacco was unknown. As for smoking injuring family life, it might just as well be said that the habit of German ladies of knitting everywhere except in Church has the same ill-effect. We are not, however, seriously going to discuss this question; when it is necessary to defend the use of wheat it will be necessary to defend the use of tobacco. No amount of charlatanism will persuade mankind to give up tobacco, which is as much the gift of a beneficent Providence as is the grape-vine.

We repeat, Mr. Kohl's work is a comprehensive epitome of the history of the discovery of America, a discovery which was only made step by step. In this view we can commend these volume to our readers.

A CANADIAN VIEW OF AFFAIRS.

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

MONTREAL, August 29.

SIR,—Days, weeks, and months succeed each other; victories follow upon victories; the Grand Army of the Peninsula has been dislodged; General Pope, who proclaimed such a thing as "lines of retreat," must never be mentioned in camp unless applied to the enemy, no sooner met the foe than he commenced, and has continued ever since, retreating; mails from Europe bring us intelligence that public sentiment is unmistakably in favour of the South; everywhere we seem to be favoured, and yet the halcyon era appears as far off as ever. Why is this? What is the reason? The only solution is to be found in the immensity of the contest, in the dignified and uncompromising determination of the South, on the one part, to have justice, and nothing but that; and in the wildest popular fanaticism in the North, on the other. Add to this original disease the numerous misfortunes that have beset them for the last sixteen months—making due allowance for their national vanity having been sorely tried—and you can see why they are not prepared, like sensible men, to make the best of a bad job; especially, as a London paper truly remarks, "Their leaders are afraid to have peace, for in that moment they are liable to be arraigned as criminals and defaulters;" as the former, for having persistently violated the Constitution by which they were to be guided; and as the latter, for having plundered the people they had sworn to protect.

They commenced this contest laughing at the very idea of the South pretending to resist them; thirty days was the original limit, sixty, then ninety, and so on to the present moment; now they find themselves bankrupt both in money and honour; the first they cannot escape unless they conquer; the latter they have lost, both in the field and in the Cabinet, by allowing the Government to sanction private and public acts that would have disgraced the civilization of even a ruder age. Abroad they find themselves daily losing ground, notwithstanding the efforts of Bishop Hughes, Thurlow Weed, and other social ambassadors; and at home they must find their position humiliating, in spite of the bombastic eloquence of their journalists. It is with regret we learn that the distinguished prelate above mentioned has so far forgot his sacerdotal character as in these critical times to use his pulpit for the promulgation of political opinion. Up to the last few Sundays the Catholic Church has been free from any interference in State matters of the Republic, but that prestige has been sadly blighted by the prominent part taken by the Prelate of New York within the last few months. G. N. Sanders left this city by the last steamer for England; his arrival, hair-breadth escapes on his journey from Richmond; and the nature of his reported despatches, which were published in one of the Montreal papers, created no little stir among the Southerners sojourning here. But for the publicity which has been given to them, and the absence of any denial, their genuineness would not have received credence; but if, as I strongly doubt, they are genuine, that publicity is all the more to be regretted. The travelling between the States and Canada has ceased almost entirely for the present, owing to the strict passport system now enforced; occasionally some fortunate individual presents himself as having eluded the vigilance of the police. Near Niagara several difficulties have occurred, such as the firing into pleasure-boats filled with Canadians by United States' sentries; and one case in particular is mentioned by a Buffalo paper, where some United States' soldiers carried off a deserter from Waterloo, Canada West, vi et armis. As the Government has strictly prohibited any news of the Virginia army to be published, it is impossible to get any information except through private sources; and amongst the most startling items is, that Pope had been surprised at an important point, and all his despatches, maps, and plans of the campaign arranged between Halleck, McClellan, and himself, captured. That the war is likely to be made offensive on the parof the South, instead of defensive, I think is now the general impression here; and those who are deeply interested in the success of the great cause impatiently expect to hear that the Confederate flag waves over the good old State of Maryland. God grant it may be soon.

* A Popular History of the Discovery of America, from Columbus to Franklin. By J. G. KOHL. Translated from the German by Major R. L. NOEL. London: Chapman and Hall.

AUGUSTA.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF GENERAL JOHN H. MORGAN'S OPERATIONS IN KENTUCKY.

Headquarters, Morgan's Command,
Knoxville, Tennessee, July 30.

To Major-General E. Kirby Smith, Commanding Department of East Tennessee:—

General:—I have the honour to report that upon the day of the engagement at Tomkinsville, a full report of which I have already sent you, I moved my command—consisting of my own regiment, the Georgia regiment of Partizan Rangers, commanded by Colonel A. A. Hunt, and Major Gano's Texas squadron, to which was attached two companies of Tennessee cavalry—in the direction of Glasgow, which place I reached at 12 o'clock that night.

There were but few troops in the town, who fled at our approach. The commissary stores, clothing, &c., together with a large supply of medical stores, found in Glasgow, were burned, and the guns were distributed among my command—about 200 of whom were unarmed when I left Knoxville.

From Glasgow I proceeded along the main Lexington road to Barren River, halting for a time near Cave City—any object being to induce the belief that I intended destroying the railroad bridge between Bowling Green and Woodsonville. I caused wires, connecting with a portable battery that I carried with me, to be attached to the telegraph line near Texas Cave, and intercepted a number of despatches.

At Barren River I detached three companies under Captain Jack Allan, to move forward rapidly and destroy Salt River Bridge, that the troops along the line of railroad might be prevented from returning to Louisville.

On the following morning I moved on towards Lebanon, distant thirty-five miles from Barren River. At 11 o'clock at night I reached the bridge over Rolling Fork, six miles from Lebanon. The enemy had received information of my approach from their spies, and my advance guard was fired upon at the bridge. After a short fight the force at the bridge was dispersed, and the planks, which had been torn up, having been replaced, the command moved forward to Lebanon. About two miles from the town a skirmish took place between two companies that I caused to dismount and deploy, and a force of the enemy posted upon the road, which was soon ended by its dispersion and capture. Lieut.-Col. A. Y. Johnson, commanding the troops in town, surrendered, and I entered the place. The prisoners taken, in number about sixty-five, were paroled.

I took immediate possession of the telegraph and intercepted a despatch to Colonel Johnson, informing him that Colonel Owen, with the 60th Indiana Regiment, had been sent to his assistance; so I at once despatched a company of Texan Rangers, under Major Gano, to destroy the railroad bridge on the Lebanon Branch, which he successfully accomplished in time to prevent the arrival of the troops. I burned two long buildings full of commissary stores, consisting of upwards of 500 sacks of coffee, and a large amount of all other supplies in bulk, marked for the army at Cumberland Gap. I also destroyed a very large amount of clothing, boots, &c. I burned the hospital buildings, which appeared to have been recently erected and fitted up, together with about thirty-five waggons and fifty-three new ambulances. I found in the place a large store of medicines, 5000 stand of arms with accoutrements, about 2000 sabres, and an immense quantity of ammunition, shell, &c. I distributed the best arms among my command, and loaded one wagon with them, to be given to the recruits that I expected to join me. I also loaded one wagon with ammunition. The remainder of the arms, ammunition, and the hospital and medical stores I destroyed.

While in Lebanon, I ascertained, from telegraphic despatches that I intercepted, that the force which had been started from Lebanon Junction to reinforce Lieut.-Col. Johnson, had met and driven back the force under Capt. Jack Allan, killing one of his men, and preventing him from accomplishing the purpose for which he had been detailed.

I proceeded from Lebanon on the following day through Springfield to Macksville, at which point I was attacked by Home Guards. Two of my men were taken prisoners, and one severely wounded. I remained at Macksville that night to recover the prisoners, which I did early the next morning. I then left for Harrodsburg, capturing a Federal captain and lieutenant on the road; reached Harrodsburg at half-past 12 o'clock, and found that the Home Guard of all that portion of country had fled to Lexington. A force was also stationed on the bridge where the Lexington road crossed the Kentucky River. My reception at this place was very encouraging. The whole population appeared to turn out and vie with each other as to who should show us most attention.

I left Harrodsburg at 6 o'clock the same evening, and moved to Lawrenceburg, twenty miles distant, threatening Frankfort in order to draw off the troops from Georgetown; remained there until the return of my courier from Frankfort, who brought the information that there was a force in Frankfort of two or three thousand men, consisting of Home Guards collected from the adjacent counties, and a few regular troops.

From Lawrenceburg I proceeded to Shryke's Ferry, on the Kentucky River, raised the boat, which had been sunken, and crossed that evening, reaching Versailles at 7 o'clock. I found this place abandoned by its defenders, who had fled to Lexington; remained there that night, and on the next morning marched toward Georgetown. While at Versailles I took about 300 Government horses and mules.

I passed through Midway on the road to Georgetown, and was informed, just before reaching the place, that a train from Frankfort was nearly due, with two regiments of Federals. I tore up the track and posted a howitzer to command it, and formed my command along the line of the road; but the train was warned of our presence, and returned to Frankfort. Having taken possession of the telegraph office, I intercepted a despatch asking if the road was clear, and if it would be safe to start the train from Lexington. I replied to send the train, and made preparations to receive it; but it was also turned back and escaped.

I reached Georgetown, twelve miles from Lexington, that evening. Just before entering the town I was informed that a small force of Home Guards had mustered to oppose us. I sent them word to surrender their arms, and they should not be molested, but they fled. The people of Georgetown also welcomed us with gladness, and provided my troops with everything they needed. I remained at Georgetown two days, during which time I sent out a company under Captain McMillan to destroy the track between Midway and Lexington, and Midway and Frankfort, and to blow up the stone bridge on that road, which he successfully accomplished. Hearing that a company of Home Guards were encamped at Stamping Ground, thirteen miles distant, I despatched a company under Captain Hamilton to break up the encampment, burn the tents and stores, and destroy the guns. This was also accomplished—Captain Hamilton taking fifteen prisoners and all their guns, and destroying a large amount of medical and commissary supplies. I also, while at Georgetown, sent Captain Castleman, with his company, to destroy the railroad bridges between Paris and Lexington, and report to me at Winchester. This was done.

Determining to move on Paris, with a view of returning, and hearing that the place was being rapidly reinforced from Cynthiana, I deemed it of great importance to cut off the communication from that place, while I drew off the troops that were already there, by a feint on Lexington. I therefore despatched a portion of two companies towards Lexington, with instructions to drive the pickets to the very entrance of the city, while I moved the command towards Cynthiana. When I arrived within three miles of the place I learned that it was defended by a considerable force of infantry, cavalry, and artillery. I despatched the Texas squadron, under Major Gano, to enter the town on the right, and the Georgia regiment to cross the river and get into the rear, while I moved my own regiment, with the artillery under the command of Lieut. J. E. Harris, down the Georgetown pike. A severe engagement took place, which lasted about an hour and a half, before the enemy were driven into the town and compelled to surrender. I took 420 prisoners, including about seventy Home Guards. I regret to have to mention the loss of eight of my men in killed and twenty-nine wounded. The enemy's loss was ninety-four killed and wounded, according to their own account. Their excess in killed and wounded is remarkable, as they fought us from behind stone fences and fired at us from buildings as we charged through the town. We captured a very fine 12-pounder brass piece of artillery, together with a large number of small arms, and about 300 Government horses. The arms and Government stores were burned, and as many of the horses as we could bring with us were kept. I found a very large supply of commissary and medical stores, tents, guns, and ammunition at this place, which I destroyed. The paroled prisoners were sent under an escort to Falmouth, where they took the train for Cincinnati.

I proceeded next morning towards Paris, and was met on the road by a bearer of a flag of truce, offering the unconditional surrender of the place. I reached Paris at 4 o'clock, remained there that night, and started toward Winchester next morning. As my command was filing out of Paris, on the Winchester pike, I discovered a large force of Federals coming towards the town from the direction of Lexington. They immediately counter-marched, supposing, no doubt, that my intention was to get into the rear. This enabled me to bring off my entire command without molestation, with the exception of two of my pickets, who were probably surprised. I reached Winchester that day at 12 o'clock, and remained until 4 o'clock, when I proceeded towards Richmond. At Winchester I found a number of arms, which were destroyed.

I arrived at Richmond at 12 o'clock that night, and remained until the next afternoon, when I proceeded to Crab Orchard. I had determined to make a stand at Richmond and await reinforcements, as the whole people appeared ready to rise and join me, but I received information that large bodies of cavalry under General Clay Smith, and Colonels Wolsford, Metcalf, Mundy, and Wynkoop, were endeavouring to surround me at this place. So I moved on to Crab Orchard. There I attached my portable battery to the telegraph leading from Stanford to Louisville, and learned the exact position of the enemy's forces, and directed my movements accordingly.

Leaving Crab Orchard at 12 o'clock I arrived at Somerset, distant twenty-eight miles, at sundown. I took possession of the telegraph, and countermanded all the previous orders that had been given by General Boyle to intercept me, and remained in perfect security all night. I found a very large supply of commissary stores, clothing, blankets, shoes, hats, &c., at this place, which were destroyed. I also found the arms that had been taken from General Zollicoffer, together with large quantities of shell and ammunition, all of which were destroyed. I also burned at this place, and Crab Orchard, about 130 Government waggons.

From Somerset I proceeded to Monticello, and from thence to between Livingston and Sparta, where my command is now encamped.

I left Knoxville on the 4th day of this month with about 900 men, and returned to Livingston on the 28th instant with nearly 1200, having been absent just twenty-four days, during which time I travelled over a thousand miles, captured seventeen towns, destroyed all the Government supplies and arms in them, dispersed about 1500 Home Guards, and paroled nearly 1200 regular troops. I lost, in killed, wounded, and missing, of the number that I carried into Kentucky, about ninety.

I take great pleasure in testifying to the gallant bravery and efficiency of my whole command. There were individual instances of daring so conspicuous that I must beg the privilege of referring to them. Private Moore, of Louisiana, a member of Company A. of my regiment, particularly distinguished himself in leading a charge at Cynthiana, which had an important effect in winning the battle. The reports of the regimental commanders, which are enclosed, are respectfully referred to for further instances of individual bravery and efficiency. I feel indebted to all my aids for the promptness with which my orders were executed, and particularly to Colonel St. Leger Grenfell, for the assistance which his experience afforded me. All of which is respectfully submitted.

JOHN H. MORGAN,

Acting Brigadier-General, C.S.A.

R. A. Alston, A.A.G.

THE FEDERAL BASTILLES.

(From the letter of the Times' New York Correspondent.)

Neither of these twin Bastilles (and it is a pity that the great name of such a champion of liberty as General Lafayette should be desecrated by bestowal upon the ugly prison in New York Harbor) is so hermetically sealed against the world as to prevent a cry of anguish from being heard outside. One young man, son of a former Governor of Maryland, lies in Fort Lafayette in solitary confinement and in chains; and not even his mother is allowed to see him. His offence was the endeavour, in the disguise of a woman, to cut adrift a Federal gunboat in the York River; a great crime, no doubt, in the eyes of his captors, and one that may deserve death; but that surely does not deserve the punishment of life in chains, darkness, and total seclusion from the face of man? The complaint of another unfortunate, transferred from Fort Lafayette to Fort Warren, has reached me—I need not say how—and the story, which is based on official documents in my possession, I forward, to tell as briefly as is consistent with clearness. It may suffice to afford the people of England some little idea of the despotism which this country is for the present content to endure without social convulsion. On the 13th of September, 1861, Mr. W. H. Winder, a gentleman of Philadelphia, was arrested at his own house by telegraphic order from the Hon. Simon Cameron, then Minister of War, and conveyed first to Fort Lafayette and subsequently to Fort Warren. Immediately on his arrest, for which no charge was assigned, his office, desks, chests, boxes, &c., were broken open, and all his manuscripts and papers, a collection of thirty years, were turned over and ransacked, in the hope or under the pretext of finding treasonable matter. Garbled extracts from some of these, which perverted his real meaning for want of the context, were published in the Philadelphia newspapers. "The sanctity of my private correspondence," says Mr. Winder, "was violated and malignantly calumniated by the publication of pretended contents of letters, thus seized. Other parties were also grievously slandered by statements of falsely alleged contents, and I was debarred from all opportunity of contradicting the infamous publications. Even portraits that had been for twenty years in my possession were misrepresented to slander me."

Mr. Winder being entirely ignorant of the causes of his arrest, and having been informed through the newspapers, like everybody else, that the Secretary of State would listen to any complaints coming directly from a prisoner, but that he would not only pay no attention to any applications made by paid counsel on a prisoner's behalf, but that he would treat them as prejudicial to the case, and an aggravation of the offence—wrote to Mr. Seward on December 5, requesting to know the names of his accusers, on what charge he was confined, and permission to go to Washington to meet it, whatever it might be. Mr. Seward replied by offering him his release if he would take the oath of allegiance. Mr. Winder declined on the ground that his doing so would lead to the inference that he had been guilty of some crime or offence unspecified, and that he had been pardoned on promise of better behaviour for the future. Mr. Seward, on a subsequent occasion, renewed the offer; but Mr. Winder's objection, being radical, applied to all tests or conditions which might be supposed to admit that he had done anything inconsistent with the character of a true American and a loyal citizen, and he declined the second time. Thus the matter rested for five months, until February 22, 1862, when Mr. Winder wrote to Mr. Cameron, setting forth that he had been five months in prison without process or form of law; that if any charge of crime were to be brought against him he was ready to meet it, and that if there were none he demanded his unconditional release. Mr. Cameron being in no hurry to reply, Mr. Winder wrote to him again on March 15, and received the following answer:—

"Lochiel, March 24, 1862.

"Sir,—You surprise me by saying in your letter of the 15th inst., received to-day, that it was by my order you were taken from Philadelphia to Fort Lafayette and placed in confinement, &c. I knew nothing of your arrest until I saw the fact stated in the newspapers, and, being at the time closely engaged in the discharge of my official duties, neglected to inquire into the case, presuming, however, that it was done by order of the State Department, which had charge of such cases as I presumed yours to be.

"Very respectfully,

"SIMON CAMERON.

"W. H. Winder, Esq."

To this document Mr. Winder replied as follows:—

"Fort Warren, March 30.

"Sir,—I have to thank you for your prompt reply to my request for information as to the cause which induced you to issue an order for my transfer to Fort Lafayette. Your letter confirms me in my supposition that your name had been used, without your knowledge, or inadvertently signed to a paper without heeding its contents. It was obtained somehow through the District Attorney. I give you a copy of the document by authority of which Colonel Burke took charge of me, and placed me in Fort Lafayette:—

"Philadelphia, Sept. 13.

"Dear Sir,—Permit me to introduce to you my deputy, Mr. Starkey, who carries with him Mr. Winder, to be delivered to your custody per order of the Secretary of War.

"Very respectfully your obedient servant,

"WM. MILLWARD, United States' Marshal.

"To Lieutenant-Colonel Martin Burke, Commanding at Fort Hamilton."

"I am, Sir, yours very respectfully,"

"W. H. WINDER.

"To the Hon. Simon Cameron, Lochiel, near Harrisburg."

On the afternoon of the same day, Mr. Winder wrote a second letter to Mr. Cameron, enclosing him a copy of the telegraphic despatch purporting to be signed by himself and addressed to Mr. Coffey, the District Attorney at Philadelphia, ordering his arrest and transference to Fort Lafayette. Mr. Cameron promptly replied in the following terms:—

"Lochiel, April 2, 1862.

"Sir,—I have enclosed your letter of the 31st, received to-day, to the Secretary of State, and disavowed all knowledge of your arrest, with a request for your release, if you have been held by my direction.

"Very respectfully,

"SIMON CAMERON.

"To Mr. W. H. Winder."

Mr. Seward refused to order the release unless upon the previous terms of taking the oath of allegiance, and transferred the case to General Dix and Judge Pierpont, the Commissioners appointed by the War Department for the examination of political prisoners. From these gentlemen Mr. Winder learnt for the first time that his offence was "his correspondence with various parties and his writings for the newspapers," and by them he was promised to be set at liberty on parole and on taking the oath of allegiance. Mr. Winder denied that his correspondence or writings were treasonable, disloyal, or illegal; demanded, if they were thought so by the Government, to be brought to trial in due form and course of law, that he might have an opportunity of defending himself, and declined to take the oath as a necessary preliminary to his demand for justice. His correspondence with the Commissioners is dated in the beginning of May last, since which time more than three months have elapsed. He is still in Fort Warren a close prisoner.

Mr. Winder's case is but one of hundreds, but the state of public security and political morality which it discloses might well make Americans reflect on the unhappy position of their once great and free Republic. They may not be aware of it themselves, but the Northern people have already lost their own liberties in the futile attempt to destroy those of their Southern brethren—and, worse than all, perhaps, to people who love the "almighty dollar" so much, they have not lost their liberties gratis, but have already incurred debts to the extent of a thousand millions of dollars by the process, and will incur as much more in another twelve months, unless they recoune the idea of subjugation, and come to terms with a people whom they never can subdue.

TELEGRAPHIC STRATEGY.

(From the Augusta (Ga.) Southern Confederacy.)

KNOXVILLE, July 30.

Captain R. A. Alston, A.A.G.—On July 10 General Morgan, with myself and a body guard of fifteen men, arrived at a point half a mile below Horse Cave, on the Louisville and Nashville Railroad, where I took down the telegraph wire and connected my pocket instrument, for the purpose of taking off all dispatches as they passed through. Owing to a heavy storm prevailing south the atmospheric electricity prevented me from communicating with Bowling Green or Nashville. The first I heard was Louisville calling Bowling Green. I immediately put on my ground wire southward, noticing particularly at the same time what change it would make in the circuit. It did make it stronger; but the storm mentioned affecting telegraphs more or less, Louisville did not suspect anything wrong, and I answered for Bowling Green, when I received the following message:—

"Louisville, July 10, 1862.

"TO S. D. BROWN, BOWLING GREEN.

"You and Colonel Houghton move together. I fear the force of Colonel H. is too small to venture to Glasgow. The whole force should move together, as the enemy are mounted. We cannot venture to leave the road too far, as they may pass round and ruin it.

"J. T. BOYLE,
"Brigadier General Commanding."

I returned the usual signal, "O. K.," after receiving the message.

Louisville immediately called Nashville; and I answered for Nashville, receiving business for two hours. This business was mostly of a private nature, and I took no copies. It could be plainly perceived from the tenor of the messages that Morgan was in the country, and all orders to send money or valuables by railroad were countermanded, as they supposed. Little did the operator at Louisville think all his work would have to be repeated the next day. Louisville also sent the news of the day, and thus we were furnished with New York and Washington dates of that day. During the whole of this time it was raining heavily, and my situation was anything but an agreeable one—sitting in the mud with my feet in the water up to my knees. At 11 o'clock p.m., the General being satisfied that we had drained Louisville of news, concluded to close for the night, and gave me the following message, dating and signing:—

"Nashville, July 10, 1862.

"TO HENRY DENT, PROVOST MARSHAL OF LOUISVILLE.

"General Forrest, commanding a brigade, attacked Murfreesboro', routing our forces, and is now moving on Nashville. Morgan is reported to be between Scottsville and Gallatin, and will act in concert with Forrest, it is believed.

"Inform the general commanding.

"STANLEY MATTHEWS, Provost Marshal."

I am not aware that General Morgan claims to be a prophet, or the son of a prophet; but Forrest did attack Murfreesboro', and rout the enemy.

On arriving at Lebanon, July 12, I accompanied the advance guard into town, and took possession of the telegraph office immediately. This, as you know, was at half-past 3 a.m. I adjusted the instrument and examined the circuit. No other operator on the line appeared to be on hand thus early. I then examined all the despatches of the day previous. Among them I found the following:—

"Lebanon, July 11, 1862.

"General J. T. Boyle, Louisville, Kentucky:—

"I have positive information that there are 400 marauders in the twenty miles of this place, on the old Lexington-road, approaching Lebanon. Send reinforcements immediately.

"A. Y. JOHNSON, Lieut.-Colonel Commanding."

At half-past 7 an operator signing "Z" commenced calling "B," which I had ascertained by the books in the office was the signal for the Lebanon office. I answered the call, when the following conversation between "Z" and myself ensued:—

"To Lebanon.—What news? Any more skirmishing after your last message?"

"To Z.—No. We drove what little cavalry there was away."

"To B.—Has the train arrived yet?"

"To Z.—No. About how many troops on train?"

"To B.—Five hundred and how Indiana, commanded by Colonel Owens."

My curiosity being excited as to what station Z was, and to ascertain without creating any suspicion, I adopted the following plan:—

"To Z.—A gentleman here in the office bets me the segars you cannot spell the name of your station correctly."

"To B.—Take the bet. L-e-b-a-n-o-n 'J-u-n-c-t-i-o-n."

Is this not right? How do you think I would spell it?"

"To Z.—He gives it up. He thought you would put two b's to Lebanon."

"To B.—Ha! ha! ha! He is a green one."

"To Z.—Yes; that's so."

"To B.—What time did the train with soldiers pass, Z?"

"To Z.—8.30 last night."

"To B.—Very singular where the train is."

"To Z.—Yes, it is. Let me know when it arrives."

At 8.20 Lebanon Junction called me up and said:—

"To B.—The train has returned. They had a fight with the rebels at New Hope. The commanding officer awaits orders here."

"To Z.—Give us the particulars of the fight. Colonel Johnson is anxious to know all about it."

"To B.—Here is Moore's message to General Boyle."

"Lebanon Junction, July 12, 1862.

"TO GENERAL J. T. BOYLE, LOUISVILLE.

"At 11 o'clock last night, at New Hope Station, part of my command encountered a force of rebel cavalry posted on the county road one half-mile south of the railroad. After a brisk fire of musketry for twenty minutes the enemy was routed and fled. Skirmishers were sent out in different directions, but were unable to find the enemy. At 3 this morning, apprehending that an effort might be made to destroy the bridges in our rear, we moved down to New Haven and remained until after daylight, when the train went back to the scene of the skirmish. A Mr. Foreman, of Owen County, was found mortally wounded. He reported the rebel force at 550, under command of Captain Jack Allen, and that they had fallen back towards Greensburg. One horse was killed and three captured. The books of the company were found in the field. Blood was found at different places, showing that the enemy was severely punished. No casualties on our side. Here with a train awaiting orders."

"O. F. MOORE, Commanding."

We arrived at Midway, between Frankfort and Lexington, on the Louisville and Lexington Railroad about 10 o'clock a.m., the next day.

On commencing operations at this place I discovered that there were two wires on the line along this railroad. One was what we term a "through wire," running direct from Lexington to Frankfort, and not entering any of the way offices. I found that all military messages were sent over that wire. As it did not enter Midway office I ordered it to be cut, thus forcing Lexington on to the wire that did run through the office.

I tested the line, and found that by applying my ground-wire it made no difference with the circuit; and as Lexington was headquarters, I cut Frankfort off. Midway was called. I answered and received the following:—

"Lexington, July 15, 1862.

"TO J. W. WOOLUMS, OPERATOR, MIDWAY.

"Will there be any danger in coming to Midway? Is everything right?"

"TAYLOR, Conductor."

I inquired of my prisoner (the operator) if he knew a man of the name of Taylor. He said that Taylor was conductor. I immediately gave Taylor the following reply:—

"Midway, July 15, 1862.

"TO TAYLOR, LEXINGTON.

"All right; come on. No signs of any rebels here."

"WOOLUMS."

We arrived at Georgetown at about the setting of the sun. I went to the telegraph office, found it locked, and inquired for the operator, who was pointed out to me in the street. I hailed him, and demanded admission into his office. He very courteously showed me in. Discovering that his instruments had been removed, I asked where they were. He said he had sent them to Lexington. I asked him what time he had Lexington last. He said, "Nine o'clock, and since that time the line had been down." I remarked that it must be an extraordinary line to be in working condition when it was down, as I heard him sending messages to Lexington when I was at Midway at 1 o'clock. This was a stunner; he had nothing to say. I immediately tested the line by applying the ends of the wires to my tongue, and found the line "O. K." I said nothing to him, but called for a guard of two men to take care of Mr. Smith until I got ready to leave town. I did not interrupt the lines till after tea, when I put in my own instruments, and after listening an hour or two to the Yankees talking, I opened the conversation as follows, signing myself "Federal Operator":—

"To Lexington.—Keep mum. I am in the office, reading by the sound of my magnet, in the dark. I crawled in when no one saw me. Morgan's men are here, camped on Dr. Gano's place."

"To Georgetown.—Keep cool; don't be discovered. About how many rebels are there?"

"LEXINGTON."

"To Lexington.—I don't know; I did not notice. As Morgan's operator was asking me about my instruments I told him I sent them to Lexington. He said, 'D—n the luck,' and went out."

"GEORGETOWN."

"To Georgetown.—Be on hand, and keep us posted."

"LEXINGTON."

"To Lexington.—I will do so. Tell General Ward I'll stay up all night if he wishes."

"GEORGETOWN."

"To Georgetown.—Mr. Fuller wishes to know if the rebels are there."

"CINCINNATI."

"To Cincinnati.—Yes, Morgan's men are here."

"GEORGETOWN."

"To Georgetown.—How can you be in the office and not be arrested?"

"CINCINNATI."

"To Cincinnati.—Oh, I am in the dark, and am reading by the sound of the magnet."

"GEORGETOWN."

This settled Cincinnati. Question after question was asked me about the rebels, and I answered to suit myself.

We arrived at Somerset. I took charge of the office. I ascertained from citizens that it had been closed three weeks, up to the very hour that our advance guard arrived in town. It was just opened by the operator from London, who came to work the instruments for the purpose of catching Morgan; but, unfortunately for Uncle Sam, the operator, and all concerned, he had no time to either send or receive a message; but he had it in fine working condition for me. I had been in the office for some time when Stanford called Somerset and said:—

"I have just returned from Crab Orchard, where I have been to fix the line. The rebels tore it down. I left there at 8 o'clock. The 9th Pennsylvania Cavalry had not then arrived. What time did you get in from London?"

"STANFORD."

"To Stanford.—Just arrived, and got my office working finely."

"SOMERSET."

"To Somerset.—Any signs of Morgan yet; he left Crab Orchard at 11.30 to-day."

"STANFORD."

"To Stanford.—No signs of him as yet."

"SOMERSET."

"To Somerset.—For fear they may take you by surprise, I would suggest we have a private signal. What say you?"

"STANFORD."

"To Stanford.—Good. Before signing, we will make the figure 7."

"SOMERSET."

This was mutually agreed upon.

I asked when Woolford would be at Somerset. He said Woolford had telegraphed Boyle that his force was green and insufficient to attack Morgan.

Seeing there was no use of my losing a night's rest, I told Stanford I would retire, that I had made arrangements with the pickets to wake me up in case Morgan came in. The operator at Lebanon Junction urged me to sit up, but I declined, on the ground of being unwell. This did not satisfy him, but after arguing with him for some time, I retired.

July 22.—Opened the office at 7 o'clock a.m.; informed the Stanford operator that Morgan had not yet arrived; made inquiries about different things; and, after everything in the town belonging to the United States was destroyed, the general gave me a few messages to send—one to Prentice, one to General Boyle, and one to Duolap. They are hereto annexed.

I then telegraphed home, informing my relatives of my whereabouts, what I was doing, &c. I then transmitted the general's despatches, as follows:—

"Somerset, July 22, 1862.

"GEORGE D. PRENTICE, LOUISVILLE.

"Good morning, George D. I am quietly watching the complete destruction of all Uncle Sam's property in this little burgh. I regret exceedingly that this is the last that comes under my supervision on this route. I expect in a short time to pay you a visit, and wish to know if you will be at home. All well in Dixie."

"JOHN H. MORGAN, Commanding Brigade."

"GENERAL J. T. BOYLE, LOUISVILLE.

"Good morning, Jerry. This telegraph is a great institution. You should destroy it, as it keeps you too well posted. My friend, Ellsworth, has all your despatches since the 10th of July on file. Do you wish copies?"

"JOHN H. MORGAN, Commanding Brigade."

"HON. GEORGE W. DUNLAP, WASHINGTON CITY.

"Just completed my tour through Kentucky—captured seventeen cities, destroyed millions of dollars' worth of United States' property; passed through your county, but regret not seeing you. We paroled 1500 rebel prisoners."

"Your old friend,

"JOHN H. MORGAN, Commanding Brigade."

[The foregoing despatches were well calculated to dumbfound these Yankee dignitaries, who no doubt were half-inclined to pronounce them some spiritual freak; but for concentrated audacity the following is unequalled.—EDS. CONFED.]—

"GENERAL ORDER.—No. 1.

"Head-quarters, Telegraph Department of Kentucky, Confederate States of America.

"Georgetown, Kentucky, July 16, 1862.

"When an operator is positively informed that the enemy is marching on his station, he will immediately proceed to destroy the telegraph instruments and all materials in his charge. Such instances of carelessness as were exhibited on the part of the operators at Lebanon, Midway, and Georgetown, will be severely dealt with."

"By order of

"G. A. ELLSWORTH, General Military Superintendent C. S. Telegraph Department."

SIBLEY'S CAMPAIGN IN NEW MEXICO.

The campaign of Colonel Sibley in New Mexico is very remarkable. Nothing has occurred in this war which surpasses it in heroic enterprise and brilliant success. The remoteness of Colonel Sibley's theatre of operations is all that has prevented the achievements of his command from receiving their due share of public attention. Our correspondent justly styles him the "Stonewall" Jackson of the West, and that is praise enough for any man. We cannot forbear from once more giving the brief summary of Sibley's remarkable campaign. In November last he left San Antonio, with a small army of Texans, to conquer the United States' territory of New Mexico. His march was one of the most wonderful and successful in modern times—1300 miles over a comparative desert, often making fifty miles without water, his men living for fifteen days on beef, and enduring hardships such as few men but Texans could survive. He defeated in two pitched battles three times his own number of the best troops in the United States' army (more than half the number being old United States' regulars), marched 300 miles into the enemy's country, and planted the Confederate flag over the capital of the enemy's conquered territory. The flag was made of a captured United States' flag, it was raised upon a Federal flag-staff, a salute was fired by batteries of captured United States' guns, and "Dixie" played by a captured United States' band.

Our correspondent adds that when Colonel Sibley entered the territory of New Mexico, although in the 25th parallel, and winter fast coming on, he destroyed every tent in his army. He did not permit himself to be encumbered by any long train of baggage waggons. His officers carried no trunks or mess-chests. They slept where night found them, whipped the enemy wherever he showed himself, and have never seen a shovel or a pick since they opened the campaign. The startling order of the heroic band is to attack the enemy at all times; and, in this way, they have taken every battery the United States had in New Mexico. We reublish these particulars as an act of justice to the glorious Texans of Sibley's command, and to their noble commander, of whom it is praise enough to say that he is worthy to be the commander of such men. Colonel Henry Sibley is a native of Louisiana; graduated at West Point in 1836, distinguished himself in the Mexican war, for which he was twice brevetted; and at the time of Secession was one of the first to resign and come to the rescue of his native South.—Richmond Dispatch.

INVASION OF CANADIAN SOIL BY AMERICAN OFFICIALS.—

The following is taken from a Quebec journal received by the late mail:—"Our Western exchanges bring us news of invasions of Canadian soil by American officials, as well as of other outrages growing out of the unsettled state of affairs on the south side of the frontier line. Among the latter may be mentioned the firing on a boat carrying a number of English soldiers, in uniform, attended by their wives. This indignity took place near Niagara, at a spot where the river so narrows that a rifle shot will carry across, and some American soldiers were the perpetrators. Finding the bullets whistling around them, and one man, a sergeant, receiving a wound in the leg, the Englishmen made at once for the American shore, demanding an explanation of such an extraordinary proceeding. The culprits pleaded that they imagined it was a party disguised attempting to elude the draft, and there the matter at present seems to rest. Again, near Windsor, an American citizen, whether deserter or refugee does not seem clear, was forcibly abducted from Canadian soil. And in still another instance, a band of armed Federalist crossed the river and violently carried off a person who had already been once rescued by a superior force of Canadians, who resisted such an outrage on our soil and our laws."

PAYNE, HUNTINGDON AND CO., NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Cotton
Factor and Commission Merchant.

MOSES GREENWOOD, NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Cotton
Factor and Commission Merchant.

MCDOWELL, WITHERS, AND CO., MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A., Commission Merchants.

GARLAND GOOD, MOBILE,
Cotton Factor and Commission Merchant.

BOYKIN AND McRAE, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

MILLER AND BATTIE, Exchange
Brokers, MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

R. AND D. G. MILLS, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
GALVESTON, TEXAS, C.S.A.

ROTCHFORD, BROWN, AND
CO., Cotton Factors, NEW ORLEANS,
LOUISIANA, C.S.A.

R. W. RAYNE, NEW ORLEANS
LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Commission Merchant, offers facilities to European Consignors of Boots and Shoes to supply the markets of Tennessee, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Alabama. Specifications furnished of goods suitable to these markets.

ANDREW LOW AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

CHARLES GREEN,
Commission Merchant, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

H. D. WEED AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

JAMES CHAPMAN,
Commission Merchant, CHARLESTON.

N. A. HARDEE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

J. W. ANDERSON AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

R. N. GOURDINE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Charleston.

REID AND STEWART, Com-
mission Merchants, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.
Represented by Andrew Stewart, 1, Runford-place,
Liverpool.

J. H. ASHBRIDGE AND CO.,
Shipping and Commission Merchants, NEW ORLEANS.
Office—No. 80, Tower-buildings West, Liverpool.
Agents—Liverpool and New Orleans Mail Steam
Navigation Company.

S. A. PLUMMER AND CO.,
Importers and Dealers in Hardware,
PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA, C.S.A.

H. O. BREWER & CO.,
MOBILE, ALABAMA,
General Commission and Shipping Merchants.

ROBINSON & OLIVER,
Commission Merchants,
NEW ORLEANS,
C.S.A.
Represented by
JOS. T. ROBINSON & CO.,
India Buildings, Water-street,
Liverpool.

JOHN FRASER & CO.,
CHARLESTON,
South Carolina.
FRASER, TRENHOLM, & CO.,
Liverpool,
Commission Merchants.

WARWICK AND BARKSDALE,
GALLEGO FLOUR MILLS.
This immense establishment of capacity to manufacture 1000 barrels of Flour per day, partly for South American Market. RICHMOND.

JOSEPH R. ANDERSON,
TREDEGAR IRON WORKS
Manufacturers of Locomotive and other Engines,
all descriptions of Machinery, Rifled Cannon, &c.,
RICHMOND.

DUNLOP, MONCURE, & CO.,
General Commission Merchants,
RICHMOND.

A. G. MILLWAINE, AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Tobacco, Cotton,
Grain, and other produce, PETERSBURG,
VIRGINIA.

C. W. WHITE,
Commission Merchant,
ST. THOMAS, WEST INDIES.

FRANCIS FORD, Manufacturer,
MANCHESTER: Three and Six Cord Spool
Thread, Cotton Balls, Knitting and Embroidering
Cottons. Imported by FOSTER AND MOORE,
Norfolk, Va.; F. RIMAILHO AND NETLEY,
New Orleans.

HAMILTON AND GRAHAM,
Importers, Wholesale Dealers in Dry
Goods, &c., PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA.

H. LEVY AND SON,
Commission Merchants, MOBILE.

R. D. RUSDEN, MANCHESTER,
ENGLAND, American Drills of all kinds,
Denims, Stripes, Shirtings, and all sorts of Manchester Goods.

SEARING AND CO.,
Commission Merchants,
MOBILE AND NEW ORLEANS, C.S.A.
Represented by R. G. BENSLEY, Cotton Broker,
Byron's-court, Royal-exchange, Manchester.

On Friday next, the 19th inst., in 1 vol. 8vo.

THE SOUTH VINDICATED:

Being a Series of Letters written for the American Press during the canvass for the Presidency
1860, with a Letter to Lord Brougham on the John Brown Raid, and a Survey of the Result of the Presidential Contest, and its consequences.

BY
THE HON. JAMES WILLIAMS,
Late American Minister to Turkey.

WITH AN INTRODUCTION
BY JOHN BAKER HOPKINS.

LONDON:
LONGMAN, GREEN, LONGMAN, ROBERTS, & GREEN.

HARPER AND CAUGHEY,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA. Represented by J. and A. CAUGHEY,
Tempest Chambers, Tempest Hey, Liverpool.

MR. WILLIAM FREEMAN,
Publisher of THE INDEX, will promptly
attend to all orders from or for the Continent of Europe and the States. Commissions for books and
goods of all kinds undertaken on moderate terms.
102, Fleet-street, London.

WORKS RECENTLY PUBLISHED
BY
WILLIAM FREEMAN,
102, FLEET STREET.

SHIFTING SCENES: and Other Poems. By J.
STANTAN BIGG. Fcap. 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.; hand-
somer bound, 5s.

POEMS OF TRUTH AND FANCY. By S. R.
BENDMAN. Crown 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.

THE WEARMOUTH ABBOTS. (Second Edition.)
A Tale, Illustrative of Saxon Christianity. Fcap.
8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.

JESUS THE SOUL'S NEED. By C. A. PORTER.
Royal 32mo. paper, 8d.; cloth, 1s.

PROGRESS; or, The International Exhibition.
By the Rev. W. ANDERSON, Author of "Self-
made Men." Royal 32mo. paper cover, 8d.

THE FATHERS OF THE WESLEY FAMILY.
By the Rev. S. HEALE. Crown 8vo. cloth, 1s. 6d.

DECISION AND CONSISTENCY. Exemplified
and Honoured in the Life of Daniel and his Three Friends. By THOMAS COLEMAN, Author of "Two
Thousand Confessors." Fcap. 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.

HOW THEY GOT THERE. By the Rev. W.
BARKER. Being an Answer to "How Did They Get There?" Crown 8vo. sewed, price 3d.

PUNCH IN THE PULPIT. (Second Edition).
TO BE, OR NOT TO BE? or, Man's Present and Future Condition Considered.

JESUS, OUR KING. By S. P. WILLIAMS.
ESSAYS, CRITICAL, BIOGRAPHICAL, and MIS-CELLANEOUS. By S. P. WILLIAMS.

London: William Freeman, 102, Fleet Street.

European and Confederate States
Advertising Agency.

THE object of this Agency is to
effect a direct trade alliance between the European and the Southern Press, through the medium of advertising. The most practicable mode
of introducing the Merchants, Manufacturers, Cap-
italists, Insurance Companies, &c., of Foreign Countries, to the Southern Trade, is by an organised,
classified, and liberal system of advertising.
Trade, like time and tide, waits for no man. The commerce of the world will not pause in ruinous inaction, but will commence its irresistible ebb and
flow the moment peace is established. One of the most dangerous, corrupting, and insidious means to be used by the North will be the medium of advertising in Southern papers. Advertising Agencies
are already organised in every Northern city, and only bide their time. We must see to it that our papers are so filled with Foreign Advertisements
and the advertisements of Southern Importers,
Dealers, and Manufacturers, that there will not be space left in any Southern newspaper for the advertisement of a single Yankee notion. Then will our papers present to their readers a faithful
mirror of Dealers, Manufacturers, &c., in the Old World, and of our business men at home, and thus attach to Southern interest that mighty lever "the Press," and disrupt the tie which, by means of Northern advertising, has had so much influence in
binding the South to dependence upon its enemies.
Through the medium of a liberal advertising
patronage, our Southern editors can be maintained
against the stagnation in their business, which proceeds from interrupted or disorganised trade.

The object of this Agency is threefold:—
1st. To advertise European Merchants, Manufacturers, Hotels, Railroads, Insurance Companies, &c.,
&c., in Southern papers.
2nd. To advertise Southern business, property,
&c., in European journals.
3rd. To advertise home industry and Southern enterprise in our own papers, and thereby build up
the cities of our Confederacy, instead of those of
our enemies.

Our arrangements abroad are all completed. We now address you this preliminary Circular, to ask
you to send us duplicate copies of your paper, accompanied by a private letter (which shall be strictly confidential), stating your terms of advertising, &c.

We will soon appoint agents in each important
sea-board and inland city. Atlanta, at present, is selected for the Central Office, on account of its geographical position. We respectfully ask for this enterprise your hearty co-operation and assistance,
and guarantee, in return, strict integrity in all
business transactions.

By order of the Board of Directors,
WILLIAM H. BARNES,
SUPERINTENDENT.

Atlanta, Ga., August 24, 1861.

TO SOUTHERN AMERICAN FAMILIES IN
PARIS.

A FRENCH LADY,—living with
her mother and her daughter in a pleasant
location close by the Champs-Élysées—offers the
comforts of a home and motherly care and attention, together with the advantages of the best
education and excellent music-teaching, for TWO YOUNG CHILDREN, or for a YOUNG LADY
under fifteen.

Address, MADAME DE W., care of Mr. Largier,
17, Rue de la Paix, Paris.

A. M. GAUTIER, Tailor, 229,
Regent Street, London (and 20, Rue de la
Chaussée d'Antin in Paris).

TO EAST INDIA MERCHANTS.

A GENTLEMAN, in his 30th Year,
who has had nearly 16 Years' experience in
the Manchester Yarn and Cloth Markets as a SALESMAN,
also 24 Years' experience in East Indian and
American Cottons, desires to go out to Bombay,
under the auspices of a first class firm, to act as their Cotton buyer.

Address, BOX, J. 19, Post-office, Manchester.

Citizens' Mutual Insurance Company.
The Board of Trustees, have resolved to pay an interest of SIX PER CENT. in cash on the outstanding certificates of profits to the holders thereof,
or their legal representatives, on and after the
second Monday in February next; also, to declare a dividend of Twenty per cent. (20 per cent.) on the
net earned premiums of the Company, for the year
ending 30th November, 1861, for which certificates
will be issued on and after the second Monday in February next.

TRUSTEES.
Geo. W. West Vice-
President.
D. Jamison.
Ar. Miltenberger.
J. Leisy.
Jas. A. White.
Douglas West.
M. Masson.
R. P. Hunt.
Martin Gordon, jun.
Cesaire Olivier.
A. Bohu.
Numa Augustin.
Omer Gaillard.

Home Mutual Insurance Company of
New Orleans.

OFFICE:—78, Camp Street,
Amount of premium for year ending
31st December, 1861..... 433,725 47
Amount of Profits for year ending 31st
December, 1861..... 232,908 88
Amount of Assets on 31st December, 1861..... 1,338,306 77
The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of FIFTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent.
interest on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved
to redeem the Scrip of 1857.
Interest and redeemable Scrip, payable in cash on
and after 10th February next.
Certificates of Scrip, for the year 1861, deliverable
on and after 15th March, 1862.

Louisiana Mutual Insurance Company.

OFFICE:
Iron Building, corner Camp and Natchez Streets.
Amount of Premiums for the year cutting 25th February, 1861..... 699,528 70
Amount of Profits for the year ending
25th February, 1861..... 213,759 74
Amount of Assets for the year ending
25th February, 1861..... 866,420 98
The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of THIRTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent.
interest on outstanding Scrip, and have ordered
the redemption of Fifty per cent. of the Scrip Issue
of 1859.
Interest and redeemable Scrip payable on and after the second Monday of May next.
Certificates of Scrip for the year 1861 deliverable
on and after 1st June, 1861.
CHARLES BRIGGS, President.
R. F. JANVIER, Secretary.
New Orleans, March 20, 1861.

Merchants' Mutual Insurance Company of New Orleans.

At a meeting of the Board of Directors held this
day it was resolved to declare a Scrip dividend of TWENTY PER CENT., on the net earned premiums of the last year, and also to pay Six per cent.
interest on the outstanding Scrips of the Company. Scrip Certificates to be issued on and after the first day of August next.

DIRECTORS.
Geo. Connolly.
John Pemberton.
P. Maspero.
P. Poutz.
C. Homel.
G. Miltenberger.
J. N. Nevins.
S. O. Nelson.
C. H. Slocomb.
B. F. Voorheir.
B. O. Vignaud.

Crescent Mutual Insurance Company.

OFFICE:
Corner of Camp and Commercial Place.

TWELFTH ANNUAL STATEMENT.

Amount of Premiums for ten months
ending 30th April, 1861..... $31,876 14
Profits for ten months to 30th April,
1861..... 237,238 27
Assets, 30th April, 1861..... 1,442,269 05
The Trustees have declared a Scrip Dividend of THIRTY PER CENT., after paying interest at the
rate of Six per cent. per annum on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved to redeem Forty per cent.
of the issue of 1858, payable as follows:—
Twenty per cent. 10th June, 1861.
Twenty per cent. 9th September, 1861.
Scrip Certificates for the year 1861, deliverable on
and after the 12th day of August next.
THOMAS A. ADAMS, President.
G. W. SPRATT, Secretary.

BRITISH AND NORTH AMERI-CAN ROYAL MAIL-SHIPS.

NOTICE.
These Steamers call at CORK HARBOUR on both Outward and Homeward Passages, to receive and land Mails.

Freight by the Mail Steamers to Halifax and Boston, and to New York, £3 per ton, and 5 per cent.
primeage.

PARTIAL PARCELS.—Parcels containing samples of Goods on board will be taken free of freight by
the Mail Steamers.

Freight on other Parcels 5s. each and upwards, according to size.

Parcels for different Consignees, collected and made up in Single Packages, addressed to one party for delivery in America, for the purpose of evading
the payment of Freight, will, upon examination in America, by the Customs, be charged with the proper Freight.

Dogs not taken on any terms.

The British and North American Royal Mail
Steam-Packet Company, draw the attention of Shippers and Passengers to the 32nd section of the New Merchant Shipping Act, which is as
follows:—

"No person shall be entitled to carry in any ship, or to require the master or owner of any ship to carry therein, aquaforts, oil of vitriol, gunpowder, or any other goods which, in the judgment of such master or owner, are of a dangerous nature; and
if any person carries or sends by any ship any goods of a dangerous nature, without distinctly
marking their nature on the outside of the package containing the same, or otherwise giving notice in writing to the master or owner, at or before the time of carrying or sending the same
to be shipped, he shall for every such offence incur
a penalty not exceeding £100; and the master or owner of any ship who refuse to take on board any parcels that he suspects to contain goods of
a dangerous nature, and may require them to be opened to ascertain the fact,

The Index,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS,
LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

Published every Thursday Evening.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

Subscriptions, Twenty-six Shillings per annum.
Stamped, Thirty Shillings per annum.

Nos. I. to XX. NOW READY.

Office:—102, Fleet-street.

In this great metropolis, on the native soil of free speech and a free press, every interest—political
social, religious, literary, scientific, benevolent
commercial, however remote, however small the
class to which it addresses itself—has long had its recognized representative in Journalism, through
which it seeks to obtain a share of the public attention. The one solitary exception has heretofore been in the case of the Confederate States of America. Engaged in a life-and-death struggle against a vastly superior foe—hemmed in on all sides, quite as effectually by the deserts of the Far West and of Mexico, as by the enemy's armies and navies—they suffer even more from that intellectual
blockade which excludes them from communion
with the rest of mankind, than from the commercial difficulties of obtaining their much needed
supplies. The disruption of the American Union—
despite repeated warnings—startled Europe without at once awakening it to a full consciousness of the reality and importance of the event. So little
had the internal politics of America entered into
the routine of European thoughts, that even now—when the effects are undeniable and irrevocable—the causes still remain a mystery and a riddle to by far the greater portion of the intelligent European public. When the catastrophe occurred, the Northern States had the ear of the Governments
and of the peoples; and so zealously have they
retained it, so ingeniously and persistently have
they pleaded their cause, so imperfect and dis-
torting was the medium through which alone the South's voice could be heard, that Europe may fairly be said to have listened to but one side of the quarrel. It is true that the respectable portion of the English press has treated the weaker party in
that spirit of fair play upon which every English-
man prides himself; and as the struggle progressed, has evinced a painstaking study of a per-
plexing subject, which stands in honourable contrast to the slipshod and indecorous of American Journalism. But this has not supplied the want, so long and keenly felt, of some organ of Southern interests and Southern opinions, to which the Statesman, the Journalist, the Merchant, and the
public at large might look for reliable intelligence
of the progress of events, and for valuable indications of the manner in which the South itself views
and weighs the importance and bearing of those
events.

This want it is one of the principal objects of
"THE INDEX" to supply as far as possible. The measure of success which may reward the effort will necessarily depend upon the co-operation of the
friends, and of the private, as well as official, representatives of the South in Europe. This cooperation has been most generously accorded us.
There is a large amount of Southern intelligence
which reaches Europe through various private channels. Still more important information is obtained from Northern sources, which finds no
outlet through the muzzled press of those States.
Much of such valuable material has already been
placed at our disposal; and we have a reasonable
prospect of making "THE INDEX" the receptacle
and depository of all, or nearly all, that is available
in the United Kingdom and on the Continent. Our arrangements are such that our friends may rely on
this respect upon a scrupulous and sound discretion, and the inviolable sanctity of private
communications.

While we have thus frankly explained one of the principal objects of "THE INDEX," it may be necessary to state—in order to prevent a possible
misapprehension—that it is not the sole object.
Literature and General News—in fact, every ingredient of a Weekly Journal—will command our earnest attention; and it will be our unremitting
endeavour to make "THE INDEX" worthy of that
liberal patronage which is promised us in advance.
"THE INDEX" will be represented by competent
Correspondents at the different capitals of the Continent, at Washington, and at Havannah. It is our design, also, that "THE INDEX" should partake of
the character of a Magazine, without departing
from its proper sphere as a Review of current
events.

For the leaders and literary contributions, we shall enjoy the valuable aid of the pens of gentlemen already favourably known to the public.

The Cotton Market will monopolize much of our
space, and is entrusted to hands theoretically and
practically familiar with the subject and all questions bearing upon it.

It is superfluous to add that "THE INDEX" is
necessarily committed to the advocacy of the principles of Free Trade.

Subscribers will be furnished with handsome
Covers for each Half-Yearly Volume.

A full list of the original "INDEX" Subscribers
and a carefully prepared Table of Contents will accompany the concluding number of each Volume.

Subscriptions and Advertisements to be sent, and
Post-office Orders made payable to

WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102, FLEET ST., E.C.

Printed by HENRY F. MACKINTOSH, of 11,
Crown-court, Fleet-street; and Published for
the Proprietors by WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102,
Fleet-street, London E.C.—September 11, 1862.

THE INDEX

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS, LITERATURE, AND NEWS.
OFFICE:—102, FLEET STREET.

Vol. I—No. 21.] LONDON—THURSDAY EVENING, SEPTEMBER 18, 1862. [PRICE 6D.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK
America	321
England	322
Europe	323
COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET—
Liverpool Letter.. .. .	323
Manchester Letter	324
LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH—
Private Letters	324
FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE—
New York	325
Paris	325
LEADERS—
The End of the Campaign in Virginia	328
"The Fortune of War"	329
A Long War	329
The Wheat Trade of Great Britain, France, and America	330
Mediation: A Northern Notion	331
American Indians	332
Editorial	333
REVIEWS—
Washington Irving	333
Short Notices	334
MR. LEECH'S SKETCHES	334
LETTER TO THE EDITOR—
Northern Angling for Sympathy	335
EXTRACTS FROM SOUTHERN PAPERS
ADVERTISEMENTS	336

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

Whilst no one denies the good fortune that has attended the Confederate arms, it must also be conceded that what has been crowned by such signal success is not a few isolated enterprises, but a most elaborate and detailed plan of campaign. An unskilful chess-player may, if pitted against a novice, win a game brilliantly by a few dashing moves, suggested by the weak points of his adversary, but to win a game by a series of preconcerted moves—moves so arranged as to provide against the contingent moves of the adversary—is evidence of the highest skill, and is worthy of admiration. In this sense the Confederates, though reverently acknowledging the favour of Heaven, may proudly say that they owe nothing to luck, in the general acceptance of that term. Their enemy has not been in any respect so badly generaled as some persons suppose; and this suggestion is from New York, and made for the purpose of inducing the Northern people to believe that all may be well if there is a change of generals. Hence Scott, McClellan, Pope, Halleck, Corcoran, Mitchell, and Fremont are by turns the popular favourites. The strategy of the Confederates not only confounds and misleads the Federal commanders, but it prevents lookers-on from appreciating it until the game is played out. It was a matter of astonishment in this country that General McClellan should have been allowed to escape from the Peninsula, and more than one military critic of repute asserted that the Southern generals had lost a splendid opportunity, but the wisdom of letting the remnant of the Army of the Potomac escape from one trap to a position equally unfavourable for offensive operations, whilst the main body of the Confederate army made an attack upon the army of Pope is now apparent. We now know that the movements were as well calculated as they were bold. The operations that drove McClellan from before Richmond were a seven days' battle, and the operations that have caused the Federal evacuation of Virginia, and have led to the invasion, or rather armed entrance, into Maryland, extended over a period of three weeks, and terminated on August 30. In our last issue we brought down the history of the war in Virginia until August 29, when Pope fought what he called a battle, but which was, in fact, only a part of a battle. It will be remembered that Pope, forced from his position on the Rappahannock, retired to Warrenton, and there busied himself in massing his forces, keeping a look-out in his front, and not suspecting the appearance of the enemy in his rear. His right wing was considered so safe that it was at a considerable distance from the main body, and so little supported that it took Pope two days to come up to the place that had been occupied by its outposts. As usual, the Confederates chose the weakest point for their attack. When the Federal commander first heard of the affair at Manassas Junction, he thought it was a mere raid of a small body of the enemy, and it is much to his credit that he was quickly undeceived. A large Confederate army had passed to his rear, and from this army about 30,000 had been detached, placed under the command of General Jackson, and were marched, without any baggage but ammunition, and an indispensable supply of food, through Thoroughfare Gap. We do not think General Pope is to be blamed for not calculating on such a brilliant and dashing movement; and when he observed it he did his best to defeat it. He moved the whole of his force forward towards Washington, for the purpose, mainly, of re-establishing and securing his communication with the capital, determined, at the same time, to give the Confederates battle. This he did on August 29. The Federals were, as General Pope says in his despatch, the attacking party, and they seem to have made a most determined effort to defeat Jackson and drive him back before he could receive supports. The Confederates stood their ground, and at night the contending armies occupied the position they had before the fight. Thus Pope, who claimed a victory, was so far completely foiled. He had the advantage in numbers, and yet there was his enemy in the same threatening attitude. There is every reason to suppose that General Pope did not exaggerate his losses on that day when he set them down at 8000. An attacking army repulsed again and again must, inevitably, suffer greatly. It has to suffer a double loss—whilst it is advancing and when it is withdrawing.

General Pope, in his despatch, admits that his troops were too much exhausted to do anything, and we think it likely he imagined his enemy in the same plight, or he would not have asserted that the Confederates had fallen back, and "that he had sent troops in pursuit." We need hardly observe that the last statement was an utter falsehood, and we only refer to it as evidence that Pope expected some interval of rest after his day of fighting. But during the night of the 29th, General Lee came up with his forces, and effected a junction with General Jackson. Of the precise number of men brought by General Lee we have no information, and it is useless to speculate, but we may be sure it was very considerable. Simultaneously—that is, during the night or early in the morning of the 29th—General Pope had been reinforced, and, possibly, being unaware the Confederates had been also reinforced, the attack was renewed by the Federal Generals Heintzelmann and Porter. They were repulsed by the Confederate infantry, and as they retreated the Confederate artillery opened upon them with shell and shot. General McDowell advanced to support the Federal centre, and the battle became general. The division under McDowell and Sigel were, we are told, "enveloped by the Confederates on the left, and were assailed at all points." For the second time General McDowell saw his troops retreating in disorder across Bull Run. But the battle was not yet over. Sigel made a desperate effort to retrieve the fortunes of the day, and the Federals, generally, fought with great resolution. At 5 o'clock in the afternoon

Pope had brought up all his reserves, and perceiving that further resistance was useless, gave the order for retreat, and fell back on Centreville. The dead were left unburied, and the dying and wounded were deserted, and could expect no immediate succour from the Confederates. We may hereafter hear accounts of the sufferings of the wounded on that bloody field, but no account will adequately describe them. The retreat, in fact, resolved itself into a rout, and the Centreville-road was filled with "artillery, infantry, cavalry, and waggons in confusion falling back to the rear."

Such is a brief outline of a battle that has been called the Waterloo of the war. With regard to the Federal losses there is ominous silence; but there can be little doubt that the battle was as bloody as it was hotly contested. The Federals have had to pay a fearful price for their determined resistance. The only reference made to the slaughter in the Northern accounts is the brief announcement that "Alexandria is filled with the dead and dying." We will not discuss the conduct of the Federal commanders, further than this, that it seems to us the censures pronounced upon General McClellan by the press and people of the North are unfounded. It was, we conceive, impossible for him to send reinforcements to Pope, even if he had them at his disposal, and further, he occupied a position which to have greatly weakened would have exposed Washington to some danger. Besides, the troops under General McClellan, demoralized by continual defeat, in great part weakened by disease, and no longer well furnished with the equipments and ammunition of war, were not in a fit state to be sent against an enemy flushed with victory.

General Pope was not allowed to rest at Centreville; his supplies were cut off by the Confederates, and on September 2 the Federal army abandoned Centreville, and retired behind the fortifications of Washington. It appears that previous to this movement General Banks had effected a junction with Pope.

An engagement occurred on the 1st inst. between Kearney's brigade and the Confederate cavalry under Colonel Stuart, near Fairfax Court-house, in which the Federal Generals Kearney and Stevens were killed. Winchester has been evacuated, as well as Aquia Creek, which last place had been occupied by General Burnside, after he had left Fredericksburg. The Federal flotilla has left the James River, and proceeded up the Potomac, after an attack on City Point. In short, the Federal army occupies precisely the same position around Washington which it held before the departure for the Peninsula, and the invading forces have been driven out of Virginia.

The events that followed the battle of August 30 took place too near the capital—are too near and too prominent—to be disguised, and, therefore, the last telegram from New York frankly admits the completeness of the disaster. It says, "the defeat of the Federal armies at Bull Run and Centreville was complete," and that "the Confederates captured large quantities of ammunition, stores, and artillery." We do not know the amount of the Confederate booty, but from the admissions made from time to time by the North, we may be sure it is enormous, and that from their enemies the Confederates have obtained ample stores of the materiel of war. But even the Confederate booty does not include the entire loss of the Federals, for at Manassas, Fredericksburg, at Aquia Creek, and at other abandoned places, immense quantities of stores were destroyed. With regard to the capture of prisoners, it seems that the Confederates immediately paroled the privates, only retaining the officers.

According to the latest accounts General McClellan was in command of the defences of the capital, and was entrenched on Arlington Heights for the defence of Washington. It would seem, from the Confederate movements, at which we can only glance, having to rely on meagre Federal accounts, and which are always inaccurate as to Confederate movements, that it will have to abandon Arlington Heights, or remain in a state of inactivity.

The Confederates, under the command of General Lee, are said to be at Warrenton. A force has crossed the Potomac at Point of Rocks, and occupied Frederick City, Maryland. The Marylanders have given an enthusiastic reception to the Confederate forces. The Confederate commander has declared his intention to respect and protect all private property.

The occupation of Frederick City cuts off the reinforcements for the Federal troops at Martinsburg and Harper's Ferry.

Amongst the many items of intelligence in reference to Virginia is this:—

The Confederate ram Merrimac No. 2 has been seen below Fort Darling, going in the direction of Newport. Arrangements have been made to receive her.

It would be impossible in a summary of news to give any idea of the panic and confusion that have been induced by these events. General Pope, the late idol of the North, who was sent for from the West to repair the Federal fortunes in Virginia, has been relieved from the command of the Army of Virginia and appointed to a command in the north-west. General Halleck, it is said, will immediately replace Mr. Stanton. The War Committee in New York have passed a resolution, recommending that Generals Fremont and Mitchell be authorized to raise 50,000 men each, and, also, that if President Lincoln will not sanction this proposition, that it shall be acted on without his concurrence. The New York mob clamours for a change in the Cabinet. The Federal Generals are charged with treason. All is confusion and disorder. The Abolitionists demand a decree of emancipation. The Government is beset with angry recommendations, none of which possess the merit of being practically useful. Great fears are entertained for the safety of Washington, and every day there are rumours of Mr. Lincoln and his Cabinet preparing to go over to New York. The Governors of Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island, are holding council at Providence. In every direction there is a manifestation of distrust and disagreement. General Halleck has offended the officers of the New York City Militia by refusing to call them out, on the plea that they have previously refused to remain "when the danger was more imminent." General Halleck does not inform us when he considers the Federal cause was in greater danger.

In other quarters there is nothing to encourage or sustain the North. The report that General Buell had captured 7000 prisoners we need hardly tell our readers proves false, because by this time no one credits Federal reports of large captures. General Buell has ordered the evacuation of Nashville, and is preparing for an attack at Chattanooga. The Federals have evacuated Frankfort, Kentucky, and the Legislature has removed to Louisville. The Federals have also evacuated Lexington, and are preparing to evacuate Cynthiana. Martial law has been proclaimed in Cincinnati, Covington, and Newport. At Louisville the Union citizens are removing their property, under the impression that that place will shortly be occupied by the Confederates. The greatest excitement prevails in Missouri; in which State the Federal authorities are unable to resist the Confederate progress. The Provost Marshal of St. Louis has closed the Old Merchants' Exchange on account of the disloyalty of the members.

As we announced in our last number, Baton Rouge has been evacuated.

It is rumoured that Generals Van Dorn and Breckinridge threaten New Orleans. If that city is attacked, General Butler will have to defend himself from enemies within as well as without.

The Governor of Indiana has called out all citizens between 19 and 45 years of age.

The agitation in Pennsylvania is increasing, and the Governor of that State has issued a proclamation calling upon the people to form volunteer bands.

The order for drafting has not been practically carried out in any of the Northern States.

In the Confederate Congress resolutions have been introduced in favour of an aggressive war.

At New York gold was 19 per cent. premium.

ENGLAND.

The distress in Lancashire makes fearful progress, and the sufferings of the people are extreme. In most of the Unions, within the afflicted district, there has been this week a large increase of paupers, amounting, in fourteen Unions, to 3870.

More mills are closing, which formerly worked short time, and the operatives are reduced from poverty to destitution. Mills that were working full time come down to two or three days a week, and each such case reduces, perhaps, a hundred families from comfort to indigence. In Wigan, the whole of the hands are out of work, and the distress is consequently appalling. Other places are almost as wretchedly situated. Stockport, with a population of 54,000, of whom nearly 19,000 are mill hands, had 8,000 idle, and 8,000 working two and a half days a week. Nearly 6500 persons are receiving parish pay, and above 10,000 are aided by the Relief Committee. The Times' special reporter—who may probably be trusted in regard to facts falling under his own actual observation, though he is utterly ignorant of the real circumstances of the factory districts, and though his comments display a wonderful combination of perversity and malice—draws a terrible picture of the condition of the population of Stockport. That town is, in fact, little more than a gigantic factory village, too near Manchester to have any general trade; and the stoppage of its mills entails utter destitution on nearly the whole of the inhabitants. It must not be forgotten that the ruin of the operatives ruins all that portion of the lower middle class who live upon them; that for every twenty hands out of work, there is probably some tradesman or other person dependent on operative custom, whose business is all but annihilated, and who can no longer keep his head above water. Rents are unpaid; and the owners of cottage property, many of whom are comparatively poor men, are reduced to great extremity. Few of them are cruel enough to resort to distress or ejection; and after all, what is the use of a distress were the defaulting tenant's furniture has already been sold for bread—or of an ejection, where no new tenant would be more solvent than the present one? The landlords, tradesmen, and higher class of mechanics, overlookers, and so forth, do the best they can. Some of the latter often starve in silence; a good many of the lower sort of operatives have taken to begging in the streets. Almost all the sufferers have utterly exhausted their own resources, and are wholly dependent on the aid they receive, either from the Relief Committees or from the parish. Now and then some one member of a numerous family earns one, two, or even three shillings a week, but even in these cases their condition is pitiable, as the dispensers of relief, naturally and justly, endeavour to reserve their aid for the worst sufferers, and take into account, in the distribution of their funds, the other incomings of applicants for their assistance. The average income of families employed two days a week, or not employed at all—that is, of two-thirds of the factory population—does not reach 2½d. a day per head. Those who have not more can barely exist; those who have less are actually starving.

The Manchester Central Relief Committee, of which the Earl of Ellesmere is chairman, has addressed a very remarkable circular letter to the Boards of Guardians of the suffering district. They begin by admitting the independence, of which those local magnates are so jealous, and disclaiming all pretensions to dictate to them. They allow the extreme difficulty of the task imposed upon the Unions, no less than that of feeding, clothing, lodging, and employing a population out of work. They admit that the burden of supporting the poor falls very heavily upon those ratepayers who are still solvent. An average collection of 2s. in the pound would suffice, with the present scale of relief, for the expenditure on the existing amount of pauperism. But, in the first place, the existing amount of pauperism is sure to be largely increased. Secondly, a collection of 2s. in the pound on the rateable value of a parish, when half that value is in the hands of insolvent occupiers, means a rate of 4s. on those who can pay; thirdly, and on this point the committee especially insist, the present scale of the relief granted by the Unions is far too low. It averages 1s. 2d. per head per week—a sum barely sufficient to support life—and leaving no means of replacing worn-out clothes, paying rent, or providing fuel in winter. The Relief Committees very properly refuse to allow their funds to be made the means of eking out a niggardly parish allowance, and so encouraging the miserly spirit of the poor law authorities. Nothing has yet transpired as to the temper in which this remonstrance is regarded by those to whom it is addressed.

Another correspondence has taken place on the subject of the relief funds. There are two chief collections: that made at the Mansion House, under the auspices of the Lord Mayor, and administered by a committee of merchants, and that inaugurated at Bridgewater House, the London residence of Lord Ellesmere, by the Earl of Derby, and other great Lancashire proprietors, and generally supported by the aristocracy. With great good sense the latter fund has been handed over by the gentlemen of the Bridgewater House Committee to a Central Relief Committee formed at Manchester, and consisting of gentlemen thoroughly acquainted with the condition of the manufacturing districts. It was suggested that the Lord Mayor's committee should do likewise; but they were jealous of their dignity and influence, and refused. As they can know very little about the local circumstances of the various districts, it is probable a priori that their funds are distributed with much less judgment than those entrusted to the Manchester committee, and that much mischief and still more waste will result from their want of special knowledge, and their unwillingness to delegate their functions to those who possess such knowledge. The Economist, whose articles on the cotton question and its corollaries are written by some one evidently possessing an internal personal acquaintance with Lancashire and its manufactures, declares that great harm has been done by the injudicious and indiscriminate use of their funds by ill-informed distributors; and intimates that while the most respectable and most afflicted wait and starve till charity seeks out and relieves them, the clamorous and shameless often receive far more than their just share of the bounty intended by the givers for the relief of real, terrible, and wholly unmerited distress.

We are told that the Mansion House committee has already distributed more than £27,000. New subscriptions come in every day. The last mail from Australia brings a report of a public meeting held at Sydney, in which upwards of £2000 were subscribed, before the assemblage broke up, for the relief of the suffering operatives "at home." A subscription of like amount was raised at a meeting in Birmingham.

The Stoke election has afforded some amusement to lookers-on. The Government candidate, Mr. H. R. Grenfell, accused the Conservative, Mr. Beresford Hope, of employing, and indeed of paying, Mr. Sergeant Shee, the candidate of the Radicals, to divide what is called the Liberal party in the borough. Mr. Hope, in the strongest terms consistent with courtesy, denied the disgraceful charge, and called upon Mr. Grenfell to retract. The Whig nominee declined retraction, and declared that he did not see anything so very disgraceful in the charge; it was less disreputable "than any of the grosser forms of corruption." The correspondence has been published in the Times and other papers; and has done much harm to Mr. Grenfell, whose notions of what is fair and honourable in electioneering are as peculiar as General Pope's ideas of legitimate warfare. It is generally felt that Mr. Hope's conduct is as eminently honourable and gentlemanly as that of his opponent is the reverse. Mr. Bright has written a letter denouncing Mr. Hope's "virulent attacks on the American President and people" and sympathy with the South as reasons which ought to ensure his rejection by "every enemy of despotism." As Mr. Hope pertinently asks, on what ground does Mr. Bright pretend to dictate to the electors of Stoke; and how can the enemies of despotism have any sympathy with the "American" President, or any respect for the people who endure his yoke?

The ravages of the small-pox (varila ovina) among the sheep in some parts of Wiltshire have at last obliged the Government to take steps to limit, as far as possible, the progress of the disease. Sir George Grey has issued a circular letter, calling the attention of justices and borough authorities to the powers conferred on them by law, of appointing persons to inspect all sales of sheep or lambs, and to seize all diseased animals offered for sale. And an Order in Council directs, first, that no animals shall be removed from or taken through certain infected parishes; secondly, that all animals dying of the disease shall at once be buried in quicklime; thirdly, that all sheds in which such animals have been penned, and all vehicles in which they have been conveyed, shall be subjected to a disinfecting process; and finally, that all persons who shall detect the presence of the disease in the flocks shall give notice of the fact to the police authorities. The Order is to remain in force for three months. The dispute about inoculation continues, and parties seem very evenly divided on the subject.

The annual meeting of the North-west Bucks Agricultural Association was held at Buckingham on the 17th. Mr. Disraeli was present, and his speech of course forms the chief feature in the reports. He defended the practice of giving prizes to labourers for good conduct and length of service under the same master, and congratulated the county of Bucks on the great progress made of late years in agriculture, and in the improvement of the dwellings of the people. As controversial politics are excluded from such meetings, the Conservative leader was of course precluded from saying anything concerning the views of his party in reference to the American war. He remarked, however, that wars partaking of the nature of civil war were generally long, and congratulated England on that ancestral wisdom which had secured to her a better Constitution than that of America. It may be remarked, by the way, that America has not had the choice of such a Constitution as ours. Circumstances made monarchy impossible and federalism inevitable. Mr. Hubbard, member for the borough, was more outspoken. He did not think that the American war would be of long duration. The North had neither means, nor money, nor munitions of war; and the United States were not like Switzerland. In such countries as the latter, might be carried on without money, because every man was a soldier, ready to fight in defence of home and hearth. That was not the case in the Northern States of America. There a great proportion of the troops were imported Germans and Irish; and such soldiers would not fight for shipplaster. They must be paid. We could not but admire the ability and capacity for self-government exhibited by the Southern States, and while we had carefully avoided any interference in the quarrel, when the proper time should arrive this country would not but be glad to hail the opportunity of recognizing the independence of the Southern States of America.

The Stoke election has afforded some amusement to lookers-on. The Government candidate, Mr. H. R. Grenfell, accused the Conservative, Mr. Beresford Hope, of employing, and, indeed, of paying, Mr. Sergeant Shee, the candidate of the Radicals, to divide what is called the Liberal party in the borough. Mr. Hope, in the strongest terms consistent with courtesy, denied the disgraceful charge, and called upon Mr. Grenfell to retract. The Whig nominee declined retraction, and declared that he did not see anything so very disgraceful in the charge; it was less disreputable "than any of the grosser forms of corruption." The correspondence has been published in the Times and other papers, and has done much harm to Mr. Grenfell, whose notions of what is fair and honourable in electioneering are as peculiar as General Pope's ideas of legitimate warfare. It is generally felt that Mr. Hope's conduct is as eminently honourable and gentlemanly as that of his opponent is the reverse.

At a meeting held at Hanley, within the limits of the parliamentary borough, Mr. Shee very indignantly rebuked the insolence of Mr. Grenfell, and spoke in severe terms of his refusal to retract his charge. The Whig candidate was present, and made a lame attempt to defend himself. But when it became evident that he would neither apologize nor explain, he was hooted down by the audience.

Mr. Bright has written a letter denouncing Mr. Hope's "virulent attacks on the American President and people" and sympathy with the South as reasons which ought to ensure his rejection by "every enemy of despotism." As Mr. Hope pertinently asks, on what ground does Mr. Bright pretend to dictate to the electors of Stoke; and how can the enemies of despotism have any sympathy with the "American" President, or any respect for the people who endure his yoke?

EUROPE.

FRANCE.—The chief topic of interest in the French news is the controversy which, since the capture of Garibaldi, has been carried on between the new journal La France and the Liberal press concerning the occupation of Rome and the possible consummation of Italian unity. La France derives its chief importance from the fact that its editor, M. de la Guérinière, was formerly the nominal author of certain pamphlets universally ascribed to the pen of the Emperor himself. There is, however, no reason to suppose that he is at present the Imperial speaking-trumpet, though he probably endeavours to take up the line of argument which he imagines to be acceptable to his former master. He proposes to dissolve the Italian Kingdom, and establish in its place a Federation of three monarchical States, with a military, naval, customs, diplomatic, and judicial union. The thing seems impossible, and little resembles the clear, practical schemes of Napoleon III. It is probably the offspring of M. de la Guérinière's own brain, suggested, perhaps, by some ministerial hint, maladroitly understood. The Sicéle is very contemptuous; the more moderate Constitutionnel reminds the ex-Imperial scribe, very pointedly, that France has recognized the Italian Kingdom; the Catholic Monde is as abusive, from a different standpoint, as its Liberal contemporaries; and La France has had very decidedly the worst of it.

It is rumoured, however, that M. Ratazzi's demands for the evacuation of Rome have met with no very favourable reception from the Emperor. Well-informed men say that the latter is pledged to the protection of Rome during the life of the present Pope. This may or may not be true; in any case it very probably represents what will happen. The vacancy of the chair of St. Peter would afford an opportunity of honourably abandoning Rome to the Italians, which cannot be hoped for while that chair is occupied by a man like Pius IX., too obstinate to yield to reason, and far too much revered to be abandoned to the argument of force.

ITALY.—The official accounts of the battle of Aspromonte—si riva est ubi tu pulsas, ego vapulo—have been published. The report of Colonel Pallavicino, the officer in command of the force by which Garibaldi was taken, is short and not offensive in its tone. It makes no mention of any formal summons to surrender as preceding the attack; and we may therefore presume that none was made, until the Garibaldians gave the signal to cease firing. It is quite clear that Garibaldi never contemplated an open encounter with the Italian troops. He was guilty of the madness of intending to assail the French army at Rome with an undisciplined horde of half-armed volunteers; not of the crime of meditating civil war or treason against his Sovereign. General Cialdini's report contains one phrase which, if taken literally, must ensure him the execration of Italy and the condemnation of the civilized world. He speaks of the intention of himself and his subordinates to "meet and destroy" the conqueror of the Two Sicilies. It is true that the General is an old personal enemy of Garibaldi, and is reported to be of a stern and vindictive temper; but we can hardly suspect him of really intending the death of the man who placed the Italian crown on his master's head.

It is also said, on authority, that General Cialdini has expressed himself opposed to an amnesty. Whether this be true or not, we cannot say. The same thing has been said of the Emperor, of whom it is not likely to be true. Napoleon III. was never charged, even by his worst enemies, with personal vindictiveness; he cannot be suspected of bearing malice against Garibaldi, and he is not at all likely to have given to the Italian Government advice which, if followed, could only lead to a new revolution, and the probable renewal of Austrian supremacy. We hope that in both cases the rumour of influence brought to bear on the King's Government in opposition to its own interests, and to the universal feeling of Europe, is entirely unfounded.

The facts of the engagement, so far as they can be learned from the accounts given on either side, appear to be as follows:—Finding the Garibaldians drawn up in order of battle, Pallavicino ordered the troops to attack at once. Garibaldi, passing along the front of his line, and ordering his men not to fire, received two shot wounds, and was carried to from the place. On his fall, and that of his son Menotti, the volunteers lost both heart and temper—or rather, the majority lost heart and gave way, while the veterans of the campaigns of 1859 and 1860 lost their self-control, and fired in spite of orders. They were almost immediately overpowered, and made a signal to cease firing. Garibaldi probably was unaware of this; and when an officer of Pallavicino's staff, armed and without a flag of truce, summoned him to surrender, he perhaps drew his revolver, and certainly ordered the messenger to be disarmed. His friends, making him aware of the actual position of affairs, calmed his excitement, and he requested an interview with the commander of the Royal troops. Pallavicino came; and after some conversation, in which he probably conceded more than he intended, and less than Garibaldi supposed, the latter surrendered, expecting to be placed on board an English vessel. On finding that he was to be detained a prisoner, he complained of a breach of faith, which provoked an indignant disclaimer by his captor of any pledge to the contrary.

The General's wounds were so alarming, according to a report received by his English friends, that they thought it necessary to send off to his aid Mr. Partridge, a Professor of King's College, and a surgeon of the highest eminence.

Mr. Partridge has written to those who sent him from Turin. He says:—

Lord Palmerston has telegraphed to our Ambassador to use his influence with the Ministry here to obtain permission for me to see Garibaldi, so that I hope to have the order tomorrow, and to be at Spezia on Tuesday at latest. Meanwhile, reports seem to show that at least Garibaldi is not worse. The wound is said to discharge freely, the bone to be "exfoliating"—that is, the injured part of the bone is in process of being cast off, and may then be removed. This is a slow affair, but is not dangerous. The ball is still in the wound, it is supposed. I shall telegraph as soon as I have seen Garibaldi. My great object will be, when I obtain permission to see Garibaldi, to do so in such a way as not to offend the doctors who are in attendance upon him, so as not to throw them into opposition to any measure I may have to propose.

Many of the General's Italian friends, hearing that he was ill-lodged and ill-attended, have not hesitated to affirm that Signor Ratazzi, dreading the inconvenient revelations which his prisoner might make, if so disposed, desired his death. This is, no doubt, an unjust and unfounded ebullition of the frantic grief of devoted partisans. Nevertheless, the friends of Italy will be glad to be assured that the Minister has not acted in a way which encourages such suspicions, and that the treatment of the heroic captive has been worthy of his merits, and of the chivalric character of the Re Galantuomo.

Some weeks ago an Englishman, a Mr. James Bishop, was arrested by Italian gendarmes at on the charge, or rather on suspicion, of being an agent of the reactionary conspiracy carried on for and fomented by the ex-King of Naples. Nothing appeared at that time to justify the suspicion. He was, nevertheless, maltreated by his captors, carried to Naples, and there detained in prison. He has just been tried by jury. The evidence against him was the possession of a sealed letter, in which one reactionary agent spoke of him to another as a man to be trusted—of a document enumerating the force of the reactionary party—of a printed pamphlet by General Ulloa, abusing Lord Palmerston—of a letter asking the Prince Torella, a liberal loyalist under the old regime, his intentions in regard to a Bourbonist reaction, written by Bishop—of a letter from Rome, in which mention is made of men sent there by Bishop, who were starving—and of a telegram which mentions that a notorious insurgent had reported that he had met an Englishman, who seems to have been the accused, at the house of the Duchess of Montecalvo. The only evidence of guilt in all this is the letter to Prince Torella; the other papers—as the suspicious letter was sealed—might have been in the possession of any man curious about Neapolitan affairs, acquainted with men of all parties, and prejudiced in favour of Francis II. Bishop declares the letter to Prince Torella to have been prompted by mere curiosity. An English jury would probably have acquitted him; the Neapolitan, in obedience to orders, found him guilty, and, if legally wrong, we do not doubt that his conviction was substantially just. His case closely resembles that of the engineers of the Cagliari. There was no proof that they were accomplices of Pisacane; but the probabilities were certainly strong against them. Lord Malmesbury extorted their liberation. Mr. Bishop has been sentenced to ten years' hard labour—according to English ideas, a brutal punishment for a political offence. But it is not likely that Lord Russell will interfere on his behalf, though, if the Italian Government be well advised, it will pardon him on his promise to quit the country, and not meddle for the future in Italian politics. We have no respect for these troublesome meddlers in general, or for this offender in particular; but we must admit that he has been hardly treated.

It is satisfactory to learn that the state of siege in Naples has enabled the Government to break up the Camorristi—a gang of organized robbers, bullies, and murderers, bound by masonic ties, who have long exercised in Naples a tyranny resembling that of the Unionists in Sheffield, or the Riband Societies in Ireland.

SERBIA.—It is said that a number of the National Guard and militia have refused to serve any longer; that the former dispersed, and the latter exacted a promise that they should be disbanded within ten days. This argues that the people are becoming tired of a quarrel begun on their part with exactly that "enthusiasm which makes men run away." It is difficult to conceive a quarrel more causeless or less likely to receive steady support from the bulk of an ignorant population. The Porte is suzerain of Serbia, and it has the right to garrison certain Servian fortresses. With the internal government of the country it interferes less than England with that of Canada. But the presence of a Moslem garrison in Belgrade afforded an opportunity to the clergy and to other ambitious and turbulent men to stir up the theological passions of the populace, and hound them on to attack the Turks. The garrison, after repulsing their assaults, retaliated by bombarding the city. This barbarous act gave to the Servian authorities ambitious of independence, and dreaming of a great Danubian Federation, an excuse to appeal to Europe and to prepare for war. But the ambition of the Prince and his advisers can hardly animate the population at large, and their military resources are not likely to avail them in a contest with the whole force of the Turkish empire, if they should be left to themselves. Europe, however, is too apprehensive of the dissolution of Turkey to leave events to take their course; and peace will probably be patched up by foreign intervention. No one wishes to see the horrors of the Greek Revolution re-enacted in Servia; and diplomatists, knowing that the Turkish Christians are even more unfit for freedom than their Moslem masters for empire, prefer continually to prop up the rottenness of the existing system, rather than to let it be broken up in the midst of crimes and cruelties that would disgust civilization and disgrace humanity.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, September 17, 1862.

Our last report left the cotton market very sick in tone, with much anxiety on the part of some holders to sell.

On Thursday the tone of the market greatly improved, the low prices quoted for American brought in speculation, and the sales reached 4000 bales, including 1500 American, at 1½d. to 2d. above the depressed sales of the day previous; a large business was done in Surats to arrive on the basis of 17d. for Fair Dhollerah, or ½d. over the prices of Wednesday. On Friday the market was very strong, with sales of 5000 bales, at a further advance of 1d. in American and ½d. in Surats, with a very extensive business doing to arrive at ½d. and ¾d. advance. The first arrival from New Orleans was reported to day, consisting of 1200 bales. On Saturday the market opened with a very strong feeling, speculators operating freely, and the sales resulted in 7000 bales at a further advance, in both American and Surats. Middling Orleans in the afternoon worth 28½d. to 29d. per lb.

Great excitement prevailed throughout the day on 'Change, as batch after batch of the Europa's news came to hand; and it was not till after the business of the day was over, that the full extent of the Federal disasters became apparent. After several days of terrific fighting and awful carnage on either side, the Federals had been driven from every position in Northern Virginia, and obliged to take refuge within their intrenchments at Washington. Victory had also crowned the arms of the Confederates in the West, and it seemed probable that ere long the entire slave-holding States would be lost to the North.

On Monday the market was dull, with sales of 3000 bales, and the extreme prices of Saturday were not obtainable.

A feeling is entertained by some that the late crushing defeats sustained by the North may do something towards paving the way for peace. On Tuesday there was an utter absence of demand, and the sales only reached 1000 bales. The Manchester Market was also very dull, but moderately steady, and little giving away in price.

To-day our market has been extremely flat, with an utter absence of demand and some pressure to sell; the total business does not reach 1000 bales, and under these circumstances it is almost impossible to give quotations; the nearest approximation we can make is, for Middling Orleans 27d., and for Fair Dhollerah and Omrawatta 17½d. to 18d. per lb. The City of Washington's news to hand to-day report little fresh from the seat of war. Jackson was thought to be in considerable force in Maryland, but his movements were so well conducted that little definitely was known of his position.

As to the immediate future of our market, it seems probable that this period of inaction may be protracted a little longer, and in our present sensitive state, a large import of East India cotton occurring simultaneously with revived rumours of European mediation in America would produce a smart decline.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday, September 16.

The principal feature in our yarn and cloth market during the past week has been a similar tameness on the part of buyers, combined with firmness on the part of holders, which characterized the business of the preceding week.

The Liverpool market having evinced a very depressed tone for some days past, seems to have damped that spirit of speculation in this market which was manifested by all classes of buyers as long as the upward tendency in the price of the raw material continued; but notwithstanding the check sustained by cotton, yarns and cloth of the best qualities continue to be held firmly for extreme rates, weakness being shown only on the part of speculators holding second-class and inferior makes. Makers of goods are the firmest holders, knowing well that at present production is reduced to a very small scale, and that there is no probability of any one who has run his machinery dry commencing again until he can see a decent profit at the end of it, of which there is no prospect at present.

The firms in this town who supply country drapers complain of the paucity of orders sent them for grey and white calicoes, knowing, at the same time, that no stocks are held by their clients; in fact, their travellers inform them that it is a very rare thing to see an uncut piece on the shopkeeper's shelf, their stock consisting of odds and ends.

It is reported here that one of the principal manufacturers in a neighbouring town, casually overhearing one of his female employees grumbling at the high price she had had to pay for a small quantity of calico, asked to see the cloth, and immediately sent out one of his men to buy up all the uncut pieces in the drapers' shops in that town, as he could sell them to the home trade houses here to a profit. His men returned in a few hours with six pieces, being the stock held by all the drapers in his town, containing about 60,000 inhabitants.

To-day our market has been extremely quiet, very little business having been transacted. Quotations remain nominally the same as last week, and, as before stated, weakness is only shown by holders of inferior qualities.

LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH.

General Butler had issued the following order relative to arming negroes, a subject which has been much agitated in New Orleans, and caused the resignation of General Phelps:—

Headquarters, Department of the Gulf,
New Orleans, August 22, 1862.

Whereas, on the 23rd day of April, in the year 1861, at a public meeting of the free coloured population of the city of New Orleans, a military organization, known as the "Native Guards" (coloured) had its existence, which military organization was duly and legally enrolled as a part of the militia of the State, its officers being commissioned by Thomas O. Moore, Governor and Commander-in-Chief of the militia of the State of Louisiana;

And whereas such military organization elicited praise and respect, and was complimented in General Orders for its patriotism and loyalty, and was ordered to continue during the war;

Now, therefore, the Commanding General, believing that a large portion of this militia force of the State of Louisiana are willing to take service in the volunteer forces of the United States, and be enrolled and organized to "defend their homes from ruthless invaders;" to protect their wives and children and kindred from wrong and outrage; to shield their property from being seized by bad men, and to defend the flag of their native country as their fathers did under Jackson at Chalmette against Pakenham and his myrmidons, carrying the black flag "beauty and booty;"

Appreciating their motives, relying upon their "well-known loyalty and patriotism," and with "praise and respect" for these brave men—it is ordered that all the members of the "Native Guards" aforesaid, and all other free coloured citizens recognized by the first and late Governor and authorities of the State of Louisiana as a portion of the militia of the State who shall enlist in the volunteer service of the United States, shall be duly organized by the appointment of proper officers, and accepted, paid, equipped, armed, and rationed as are other volunteer troops of the United States, subject to the approval of the President of the United States. All such persons are required at once to report themselves at the Touro Charity Building, Front Levee-street, New Orleans, where proper officers will muster them into the service of the United States.

By command of Major-General BUTLER.
R. S. Davis, Captain and A. A. A. G.

PRIVATE LETTERS.

The following extracts from letters, just received by a gentleman now in London, from a distinguished relative and member of the late Provisional Congress of the Confederate States, may prove interesting to our readers:—

Richmond, August 16, 1862.

The destruction of property in our State, with the slaves removed, is immense. None of my servants have gone off, but "Gleacor," (alluding to his farm in Western Virginia), has been, and is yet, I fear, occupied by the enemy.

Our city I consider safe. A battle is expected daily in the vicinity of Culpepper Court-house. A brilliant success there would relieve our State permanently, and I expect it confidently. Lee is in command, with a large and adequate force, I am sure. In a late affair, with a small force comparatively, wherein some of Pope's best troops were engaged, we gained a signal advantage.

You are, doubtless, familiar with the events of the war, and learn them as quickly as Yankee meadacity will permit. I feel assured that the crisis is past, with or without intervention. The war is conducted with insane ferocity—the fury of the enemy betrays their desperation. Humanity demands of England and France that they interpose. I hope my friend M— will illustrate his mission by leading the former in the right direction.

I write in haste, my dear J—, and with my prayers for your happiness. I am, as always, &c.

Richmond, August 14, 1862.

I have just heard of a safe opportunity to send you a few lines. I would like to write you more in detail, but I have marching orders at present, and my time is, therefore, limited.

Of course, by this time you have received the true version of the Chickahominy campaign—how General Lee defeated and, nearly destroyed McClellan's army. We had a hard fight, because we had to take the Yankees behind breastworks for twelve or fourteen miles. We lost many valuable officers and men, but the enemy's loss far exceeded ours. And this was the "Grand Army" whose mission was to take Richmond. We ran him to James River, and there left him, cowering under the protection of his gunboats. Poor McClellan's sun has set, and Halleck and Pope are the rising luminaries now. I don't think they will be luminous long. General Lee left this morning to take command of the army in front of Pope, who is in the neighbourhood of Culpepper Court-house, and soon poor Pope's sun will set, as the "Young Napoleon's" has done. Pope has, it is said, 80,000 men; Lee has, I presume, from 60,000 to 70,000.

"Stonewall" had a fight on the 9th ult., with a part of Pope's army, and defeated him badly, taking many officers and men. This is but the muttering of the storm soon to burst forth. I am in Lee's army, and leave to-morrow for Gordonsville, to resume my position as medical director of a division.

We are expecting daily to hear of a battle between General Bragg and the Yankee Buell in the neighbourhood of Nashville. Van Dorn has command of the department of Louisiana and Mississippi.

In Western Virginia the enemy has only small marauding parties, our own small force there being under command of General Loring.

I don't think that any of our particular friends have been killed in battle. Dr. Crenshaw has been very ill, but is now getting well. He has charge of a hospital in town. David Watson is in the field as surgeon, but I have not seen him since last fall. Davidson Penn was slightly wounded about two months ago, but is now well and in the field, with the rank of colonel. Bradfate and Clarence Warwick were killed in one of the engagements before Richmond.

I have endeavoured to give you a cursory, and, I know, most imperfect sketch of affairs as they stand at present.

I don't think our cause has ever looked so bright as it does now. Our army was never so large, and certainly never so effective. "Forward," I believe, is henceforth the word, and it would not at all surprise me to find myself in Baltimore in less than two months.

The following is an extract from a letter written by a friend in New Orleans to a commercial house in Liverpool:—

New Orleans, August 29th, 1862.

If at some future period our city should again resume its position amongst the commercial markets of the world, and the long interrupted course of trade again flow in its natural and proper channel, we hope that you may have an opportunity of making use of our services which we hereby tender you. In the meantime we trust that a few remarks about the actual state of things here may be acceptable to you, as hardly any information reaches Europe now except through the magnifying glass of Northern writers, who by long practice have acquired a talent for falsifying affairs at the South, and deluding the Northern people, which is really astonishing.

When the Federals troops marched into this city it was proclaimed all over the North that the vast trade of the Mississippi Valley was once more open to the world, and the occupation of a city was magnified into the surrender of the whole State. So complete was the deception that even the Liverpool cotton market experienced a decline, and people on your side began to look forward with more hope for a supply of our great staple. How far these prophecies have been realized you are aware of by this time. It is true the Federal generals hold complete sway over this hapless city, but they have no power outside of their pickets or beyond the range of their gunboats, whilst the population in the interior is more bitter and hostile than ever. The governors of Louisiana and Mississippi have issued their proclamations forbidding all intercourse with the enemy, and so strictly has this been adhered to that no cotton has reached this place, except a few remnants that escaped destruction or were shipped from neighbouring plantations under the cover of gunboats. The people in the cotton-growing States, say Mississippi, Alabama, and Arkansas, which principally supplied our city with their staple, are, if possible, even more bitter and fierce than those of Louisiana, and will rather sacrifice everything than let their property fall into the possession of their enemies. This is written with a full and personal knowledge of the feeling in the interior. It is therefore idle to talk of a cotton market here, or to express an opinion about the probable resumption of business as long as the Northerners are bent upon the hopeless task of enjugating the free born people of the South, now banded together man, woman, and child, fighting for their birthright "self-government." It is difficult to form an opinion about the quantity of cotton in the interior, the estimates of destruction by fire, varying from 50,000 to 250,000 bales. As regards the new crop, it is generally believed that only one-fourth of the usual quantity has been planted. The people in the interior seem to have made up their minds, that the war will last for many years yet, and begin to look within their own boundaries for the production of such necessities of life, which they formerly imported from the west and east.

You will perceive from the above that we are nearly as completely blockaded by land as we formerly were by sea.

The consumption of all import articles is, therefore, confined to this city, which is best shown by the fact, that salt is dull here at $1 per sack.

The only trade that has been done here lately has been the shipping of the stock of sugar in our city, and such lots as could be got from neighbouring plantations.

But this business is now approaching its end. There are but few plantations left from which sugar can be shipped without risk to the owner. Hardly any boat comes down the river which does not show signs of having been fired into by guerrillas. We have under our control a crop of sugar on the river, not fifty miles from the city, which we dare not bring down for fear of exposing the life and property of the planter, and we could buy to day a crop of sugar on the river at 4 cents., to take it at the sugar house, which is worth here 9 cents.; but we cannot make use of this offer. The North has been sending us large quantities of flour, provisions, &c., and prices of these articles have in consequence materially declined.

Indian corn $1 12½ cents. As the only article in which returns can be made for these shipments is sugar, the price of this article has advanced considerably lately, and we quote to day—fair 8½ cents, fully fair to prime 9 cents, choice 9½ cents.

We quote to-day, flour, $8 to $12—according to quality; mess pork, $18 to $19.

Freights have been very high, but are now depressed by the falling off of sugar, and numerous arrivals of vessels. Rates for sugar to New York have declined from $18 to 20¢ per hds. to $10, and will soon be lower still. Foreign vessels are in demand to take off the stock of tobacco principally held by foreign shippers.

A Bremen ship, the Antioette, is loading for Antwerp, at $80, and an American ship was taken to day at $20 per hhd., f.o.b., for France. Everybody is anxious to get his property off, fearing either confiscation by the Federals, or an attack on the city by the Confederates.

Our Exchange market may be said to be in utter confusion. Our currency consists of the notes of our Banks, part of which have sent off their specie, and have no basis for their circulation.

People here won't take to Federal treasury notes, however much the authorities try to bring them into circulation. We quote to-day—London, 60d. s. 142½ to 145; New York sight 120 per cent. premium.

Hoping that we may have the pleasure of addressing you again in better times.

The following is from a most undoubtedly reliable source:—

"Ye people of New Orleans shall either have the United States or you shall have San Domingo. I give you your choice. I have only to go to the Custom House, and hold up my finger, and you will all have your throats cut." Such were the words which General Butler addressed to a well-known citizen of New Orleans, who replied, "I know it, General Butler, and I come to you to obtain a pass to leave at once." "No one shall leave this place; I shall keep you all here." A bribe of $150 to one of the officers procured the permit to embark, and enabled the applicant to escape. In view of the approaching end, the Northern officers try to scrape together what plunder they can, and use every means to incite the poor negroes against their masters, thus preparing a mine which they mean to spring when they shall be compelled to leave.

The following is from a letter of a highly respectable New Orleans firm addressed to a Liverpool merchant :
New Orleans, July 24.

A Mississippi planter, who had about 250 bales of cotton stored upon a sugar plantation below the city, had entrusted the same for disposal to a factorage house at New Orleans.

After it was in their possession they were enjoined by General Butler, through the Provost Marshal (Capt. French) not to sell, ship, or otherwise dispose of the said cotton.

The planter, requiring money, was advised by the authorities to sell his cotton to Major Butler, the general's brother, at 25 cents per lb., the market value being at the time 35 cents, and if he would not do so the cotton could not be moved.

Foreign Correspondence.

(From our Commercial Correspondent.)

NEW YORK, September 2.

Although the accustomed system of mendacity was kept up by the War Department in reference to the series of battles in Virginia, ending on Friday, the 29th ultimo, the Federal reverse was so decisive the following day that it could not be obscured from public view; and we now know that the Northern army has met with very disastrous defeats, and is almost driven from "Old Virginia Shore." It is highly probable that the Confederates will invade Pennsylvania, and give the inhabitants of that State a taste of war, by breaking up the railroad connection with the West, and destroying the communication of the iron and coal regions with Philadelphia and New York; which would deprive all the Northern States of fuel, stop the foundries and workshops from making material of war, and render the Government steamers of no more avail than old-fashioned sailing craft—in fact, not so useful, as they are constructed to carry but little canvass. Such a course would make our Quaker neighbours cry for peace. Indeed, recent events have shown that there is considerable secession element in Pennsylvania; and it is doubtful whether that old democratic State would have furnished so many troops but for the influence of ex-Secretary Cameron and Governor Curtis, both of whom are charged with being largely interested in contracts.

It is a matter of surprise to the uninitiated that United States Stocks and Bonds have not declined, but the truth is that only a comparatively small amount is held in Wall-street, except as collateral security; the quotations for months past being based upon the operations of the bulls and bears. Mr. Chase is much behind hand in his payments to the troops, as well as contractors; to the latter class of creditors he invariably pays in "certificates of indebtedness" at twelve months date, which are pledged by them to bankers and money-dealers, against their own notes at four months, with a margin of twenty-five per cent. So long, therefore, as these "promises to pay" are renewed, the securities at their back cannot be pressed upon the market; but, as there is an end to all things, the contractors, who are, or who were, men of straw, may find their ill-gotten gains swept from them some fine morning. Let the moneyed men, many of whom are largely indebted to Europe, attempt to realize, and the contents of their portfolios will prove a "baseless fabric of a vision." The stupidity of the money-lenders has been most astounding; whilst they have had no confidence in subscribing to Federal loans, they have absolutely thus furnished the sinews of war. New York will suffer more than any other part of the North, as Wall-street endorses all the remaining sections. Gold and Exchange are again on the rise, and will soon touch figures that will entail heavy losses on persons remitting to your side of the Atlantic.

(From an occasional Correspondent.)

NEW YORK, August 30, 1862.

The news is again of the most thrilling character, but so buried in wild rumours, that it is hard to get at the exact truth.

What we do know is, that early this week the Confederates got into Pope's rear, turned his right flank, cut him off from all communication with Washington, and consequently his supplies, marched upon and captured Manassas, Centreville, Dranesville, Vienna, and Fairfax, and planted their pickets within six miles of Washington.

This portion of the army was said to be under Jackson, while another portion, under Lee, had passed through Thoroughfare Gap, with a view of crossing the Potomac into Maryland.

That there has been an attempt to recover the important ground captured by the Confederates in the early part of the week, and to arrest them in their rapid march upon Maryland and the capital, appears quite certain, and that Manassas has been re-occupied by a portion of the Federal army, is probably correct; but that the Confederates have sustained any material reverse, I do not believe. On the contrary, they are now in as strong a position as their warmest friends could desire, and if the next forty-eight hours does not develop an important victory by their arms, I shall be much mistaken.

It is a singular fact that indirect contradiction to much, if not all, the bombastic accounts of the successes by Pope; the Tribune, under date of Washington 29th, one day later than the date of Pope's despatch, publishes the following:—"The enemy advanced their lines several miles last night (28th), driving our pickets before them. They burned the bridge at Fairfax, and took Falls Church (but a few miles from Alexandria), which they hold with cavalry and infantry this morning (29th).

"Jackson is in command, and an escaped prisoner reports that the General slept at Falls Church last night (28th).

"The rebels destroyed everything (millions of property), at Manassas.

"Burnside is removing the Government property from Aquia Creek, in anticipation of an attack.

"That portion of McClellan's army which joined Pope, is without supplies of any kind.

"Later.—All the evidence is accumulative as to the point of the advance of the rebel army in strength, and their purpose first to break every means of communication between the capital and Pope, then to march straight on the capital. Every bridge on the railway is destroyed—they hold every strategic point in the centre, and they are beyond all question within the mountains with their whole army."

To reconcile this entirely contradictory statement with that of Pope's "successes," is more than I am capable of doing, and I, therefore, give it as I find it. Either of to-day's steamers, if overhauled at Cape Race, will, probably, convey to you far more definite intelligence than we at present have.

The letter of Lord Russell, in reply to Mr. Seward, has not been very favourably received here, either by the press or public. The Herald speaks of it as "not the letter of an honest neutral, but of an enemy whose neutrality is the neutrality of compulsion." The Times winds up its article by saying, "the soul of honour is eaten out of the aristocratic classes in England," and other journals have each their respective flings. Indeed, not one has undertaken to speak favourably upon the letter.

Enlisting still drags heavily, despite the liberal inducements offered. In some three or four states there is a prospect of all the men being raised without a resort to drafting; but cords of money have been spent to obtain these men, as the credit of the State, in avoiding a draft, has been regarded as of more value than a few hundred thousands spent in buying the men up. The State of Maine, for instance, would always consider it an honour in after times to have it said that drafting was never found necessary; and yet, to my mind, this filling up of the ranks with bought men is less creditable to the State as would be the procuring of them by draft. They are certainly not voluntary enlistments, nor did patriotism induce them to take up arms, hence, I cannot see what real credit a state can claim that has filled its quota of troops with money—certainly no claim to patriotism.

The rivalry between the States is, nevertheless, great, and money is rolled out like water. In one State, however, there have been districts wherein the residents have refused to contribute a farthing towards the purchase of volunteers, but this has not caused them to escape being bled, for, in these cases, the dominant party (of course, Republican) in country or town, has held a meeting and voted to levy a direct tax upon every resident in proportion to his means! A resident with property valued at $20,000 is assessed with a tax of $100, and larger amounts in proportion. To be sure there is no law to warrant such a despotic proceeding, but Northerners seem to live now-a-days without law—and merely to be plucked as formerly and not to pluck. So far as the Government is concerned, it acts very strangely with regard to the draft. The original order of the War Department announced that it would commence in all the States on September 1st. Since then, however, the time has been extended in Maine, Indiana, and Pennsylvania, until the middle of the month, while to the other States this extension has been refused!

There is naturally very serious complaint at such manifest unfairness, for if one State is entitled to postpone, the others assuredly have the same right. The act, however, is like many others of the administration, past finding out.

In Indiana, too, the Governor has taken it upon himself to announce that any person conscientiously opposed to bearing arms, need not go to the war, providing said person shall pay an equivalent for exemption. In no other State is such a privilege allowed, and yet it is winked at in Indiana by the administration at Washington, although in direct violation of the original order of the War department!

We had another out-of-door War meeting on Wednesday, at which the usual amount of eloquence was expended. The result of the meeting, however, like those that have preceded it, will be nothing. Of course there were resolutions, and one admonished England, France, or any other Power, that an act of intervention on their part would be met by a declaration of war.

The appropriations of the last Congress, mainly for war purposes, have just been footed up, and are found to reach $894,000,000. That Congress did not adjourn a moment too soon.

Gold, in consequence of the unfavourable news from the army, is up, while Government shares are flat.

(From another Correspondent.)

NEW YORK, August 30.

The same difficulty of getting any reliable information still prevails. All newspaper men are excluded from the Federal armies, and soldiers' correspondence forbidden. We manage, however, to obtain intelligence, although it is unfavourable to the Federal arms. The Confederates are now known to be across the Rappahannock in large force, and they now occupy Manassas, and nearly all the positions which they held, last winter previous to their evacuation. There has been considerable fighting throughout the week, with decided advantage to the Confederates. The latter have captured an immense amount of stores at Manassas, by valuation of United States officers, not less than $500,000 worth, but supposed to be still more. As the position of the Union forces is not known, but it is very clear that the Confederates have got in their rear, cutting off their communications with Washington. The latest news now received announces that portions of the Confederates have reached Burke's station, a point only fourteen miles from Alexandria. This movement of the Confederates is excessively bold, and they are in peril, as the Union force are on both their flanks, and in their rear and front. They are almost surrounded by Federal armies, but the genius that has devised the boldness of this movement has probably fully estimated all the danger and the means of meeting it. We must, therefore, under the present position of the contending armies, have a very great battle within a few days.

The proximity of the Confederate forces to Washington has not caused the usual panic and alarm, because it is generally believed that they will make no attempt to take it, but it may be that the cry of "wolf" has been raised so often, that now, when the "wolf" has really come, it will carry off the sheep. A few days may decide many things.

From the West we have nothing of importance. Communication with Nashville and other points is entirely suspended, and we only hear occasionally. We know that military movements, mainly offensive on the part of the Confederates, are progressing, and we hear of nothing scarcely except Federal reverses. The most important of these was the surrender of an entire command under General Johnson at Gallatin. I am prepared to hear at any moment that Nashville has been reoccupied by the Confederates, and that Buell's army has been captured at Huntsville. I think the latter position is exceedingly critical.

The Federal forces are mainly under the command of Pope. McClellan's army has been broken up into various corps, and he is himself without any virtual command at this time. He was at Alexandria at the last accounts having been to Washington. Without actually displacing him, the Government has thus relieved him from his command. This has been done quietly, as the susceptibilities of the public might have been wounded by a bold announcement. Pope, who was the hero of an hour, has fallen into disgrace with the public.

PARIS, September 17.

It was on the Mediterranean that the French began to have steamships, and one of the few advantages which we reaped from the occupation of Algiers was that of some enterprising Marseilles people starting our first steam-packet companies. We afterwards competed successfully with the English and the Austrian Lloyd for the steam navigation of the East. Our next step was the establishment of the fine steamships of the Messageries Impériales to Brazil; and I have heard some of the officers and administrators of your own Peninsula and Oriental Steamship Company frankly admit that these vessels could not be surpassed in any way; after an inspection, which these gentlemen had come to perform at Bordeaux by orders from their company. The Tampico, just arrived at St. Nazaire, from Mexico, is the pioneer of a new line; and I hope that so soon as peace is proclaimed in America, the first line of steamships between Europe and New Orleans will be established at a French port.

The news from Mexico is of little interest. The Government of Juárez seemed less inclined to a warlike policy, and the little French army was in the same position, safe from attack, and having no other work than to keep open its communications with the sea. But it seems that the corps d'expédition is to be larger than was expected. It is believed that General Forey's command will be reinforced to the amount of 60,000 men. That would be more than the requisite strength of a French army to occupy Mexico and avenge the reverse suffered at Puebla. One positive fact is the insertion in the Moniteur of an Imperial decree, giving to the general in command authority to grant commissions in the troops under him, up to the rank of major. It is further said that the Emperor's designs embrace a vast range, part of which is, of course, recognition of the Southern Confederacy, but another feature is the formation between North and South America of a Power essentially French in its organization. The number of troops sailed from Toulon was 19,000 men; from Cherbourg, 15,000. More troops have orders to embark within a short time, and added to those already in Martinique, or having sailed from there to Vera Cruz, and to the small navy at Orizaba, the total figure appears nearly double to that giving by La Patrie. That paper stated in its yesterday evening's issue, that the whole of General Forey's army would not number more than 30,000 men. My opinion is that the higher figure of 60,000 men is nearer to the truth.

Two North American ships, who tried to run the blockade of the Mexican ports, have been captured near Tampico by some of our cruisers. On the other hand, the Federals have seized a French merchant vessel, whose captain had not complied with some of Butler's arbitrary orders. Moreover, the French Government has ascertained that 30,000 muskets and a large sum of money had been received by Juárez from California, through the direct action of the Government at Washington. All these causes of complaint are not calculated to alter the Emperor's mind, which has been from the beginning in favour of the South.

The Indépendance Belge, a paper whose course on American affairs was always most despicable, had the following in its Paris correspondence of the 15th:—

"Conciliation would become possible, if on the other side of the Atlantic the heat of passions had begun to cool, as it has now done between Southern and Northern Americans in Paris. They begin to visit each other, to talk and argue coolly, and what is better, they begin to express common wishes that a useless and ruinous war should cease."

The Indépendance Belge just gives a false statement, as usual. There can be, and there is, but one feeling amongst the citizens of the Confederate States in Paris. If any North American has got honesty enough to blame and avowedly denounce Messrs. Lincoln, Seward, and Co., and is prepared to resist their tyranny to the full extent of his power, should the occasion present itself to him, then he may be entitled to a certain amount of respect, and looked upon as a subject of a foreign country who has not personally deserved any hostile feeling. But no supporter of Lincoln's policy has any chance of being treated kindly by a single Southerner, and any man who does not loathe the Butlers, Pops, Mitchells, Farragut, and tutti quanti, is considered an accomplice, and had better keep out of the way of the friends of their victims.

Another remarkable article on the American question has appeared in La France, from the pen of M. J. Cohen, under the head of "The part of the Western States in the American crisis." The writer, who so ably proved some time ago that the modern law of nations clearly entitled the Southern States to immediate recognition, and who remarks in his yesterday's article, "Nous avons démontré nous-mêmes que l'heure était venue de reconnaître la Confédération du Sud," has now for his object to inquire how both nations could find at home an influence strong enough to put an end to that calamitous war. He believes that the Western States could do so. Their origin, their manners, their opinions, their pursuits, their interests, are different from those of

New England and New York. Everybody can perceive at a glance that the West has nothing to gain by defending the egotistic interest of the Yankees, but that it has everything to lose. All those who are not ignorant of the way the questions of the navigation of the Rhine and the Danube have been settled can understand that it would be easier still to ensure the free navigation of the Mississippi. It is not enough that the West should protest, as it now does, against these unheard of taxes and unlawful conscription; they must take their own cause in hand, boldly set it apart from that of New England, offer their mediation between the North and the South, and settle the basis of an equitable arrangement; and if their voice in favour of peace is not listened to, they must loudly proclaim their neutrality.

"The Western States appear to us to have the important part to perform in the solution of the American crisis. If they hesitate the war will continue to be waged, and to bring more and more suffering on themselves and on the whole world. If, on the contrary, they understand their strength and know how to use it, they will render the greatest of services to themselves, to America, to Europe, to civilization."

"Such a solution of a crisis, hitherto without a parallel in the history of mankind, seems to us not only possible; but, having the fairest chance of success; it would suit especially those who, either rightly or wrongly, believe that an American question ought to be solved only by the agency of Americans."

Enfin, it is rumoured that recent despatches received in Paris from the English Cabinet show a far more ready tendency towards recognition. You have, doubtless, noticed that your grand paper, the Times itself, squarely states that England alone has, up to this time, prevented the Emperor's Government recognizing the Confederacy. Nobody could be found to deny that the succession of Southern victories since the battle of Fair Oaks have rendered almost impossible any further postponement, and I have no doubt that the formal step will be taken as soon as the Emperor returns from Biarritz.

There are no more Parisians in Paris, except the people whose pursuits do not allow them to leave, but, en revanche, there is plenty of foreigners. Victor Hugo's "Les Misérables" are entirely out now; half-a-dozen minor plumitifs have published answers to his book. Jules Janin is preparing a history of the French Revolution, which excites, before-hand, great curiosity. La France has politely begun a series of sketches of living great men, by M. Baudet's essay on Henry Temple, Lord Palmerston.

I would like to be enlightened on one point. I read in the papers, a few days ago,—“The Prince of Wales, the Prince and Princess of Denmark, with their suite, visited yesterday the battle-field of Waterloo.” And I saw a very interesting leader in your Daily Telegraph on the philosophical impressions that must have come to the mind of the future King of England in treading over that once bloody soil in company with the future amiable partner of his throne; but I read again, two days later:—

“We stated, through mistake, that the Prince of Wales had paid a visit recently to the battle-field and village of Waterloo. The Prince has not visited that spot.”

Now, I am puzzled to know whether the Prince has been there or not, and whether the talented editor of the Telegraph has discredited with such warmth on an event which has never taken place. If the Belgium papers are not smart enough to find it out, you English people ought surely to be capable to know whether the Prince of Wales has been to Waterloo, or not.

Garibaldi's condition is said to be slightly improved. The Pungolo of Milan says that “Twelve ladies, all young and very fair, have left Milan for Turin, in order to obtain permission to go to Spezzia and act as nurses to Garibaldi.” It appears that, after much hesitation, the Italian Government has decided on letting the ordinary courts of justice try the recent outbreak. That course leaves the door open to amnesty, even should a condemnation take place.

Marshal Count de Castellane is dead.

An interesting little feature of French national spirit took place last week in a village of Normandy, and it shows that our people have not lost the memory of some of our ancestors, who were the pioneers of Europe in discovering and settling numerous portions of North America. Pierre Belain, sieur d'Estambuc, planted the flag of France in the West Indies, in the beginning of the 17th century. A monument to his memory has been placed in the church of the village of Allouville, his native place, near Yvetot; and Baron de Lareinty, whose grandfather was with Belain, and who is the delegate of the West Indies to the Corps Législatif, has presided over a most interesting religious and patriotic ceremony, on the occasion. The generosity of Mr. de Lareinty had provided for the expenses of the monument as well as of the fête. Such demonstrations not only show the strength of the ties between France and what provinces she still owns in America, but at the same time tighten between her people on both sides the Atlantic the bonds of friendship and common patriotic feeling.

THE LINCOLN GOVERNMENT.

(From the Daily Telegraph.)

Never, in the whole history of the American people, has their position been so hopelessly disastrous as it is at the present moment. We allude, of course, only to the North; but we make no exception in point of time. Brilliant in comparison was the prospect when a few statesmen first raised their voices against the illegal encroachment of Royal power within the bounds of the American colonies; when but a few more clear-headed, strong-souled patriots, banded together to withstand King George and all his might; when Washington sat down with a feigned army before Boston, waiting for the working of time as his trusted ally; when the young Republic braved the naval force of England, and asserted something like equality on the salt highway. At none of these epochs did the star of the Union shine with less power; for it was effulgent with the light of virtue, and it prevailed. At every period of the history of the republic, when it has been a conquering State, its leading men have coolly and bravely confronted the existing facts of the day; they have endeavoured to do their duty by clearly ascertaining the perils and forces which they had to encounter; and, thus instructed, they have mustered sufficient strength on their own side, have laid down an intelligent plan of action, and have won their way to their purpose at the close. It has happened, most usually, that at such periods of her history the American Union has been under the administration of those who belong to what was called the Democratic party, but which really represent the genius of the American people. For, by a peculiarity not unparalleled in other countries, the opposite section—that which was predisposed to centralising authority—was less American than foreign in its ideas; and it has been less American than foreign in the amount of misfortune which has habitually attended it. At the present day, however, almost as if blinded by some stern and chastising decree of Providence, the Democratic party, whether through bewilderment, delusion, or epidemic insanity—for almost any such notion is more probable than plain cowardice—has laid aside its wonted inside, and has committed at the calamitous policy adopted by Mr. Lincoln and his accomplices in Washington. These are the men who have destroyed the Union, not the “rebels” of the South. It is Seward, Lincoln, and their followers who have torn the Constitution to pieces, not Jefferson Davis and his coadjutors; for he remembered the Southern States simply desired to withdraw from the old federation, asking to take nothing with them, dictating no change, arresting no citizens, confiscating no property, and altering no fundamental statutes of the State by a direct breach of the law embodied in their text. These things have been done, not by the Secessionists, but by the official “Unionists.” We acquit them of all intentional high treason; every outrage which they have perpetrated upon the Federal compact was meant to promote their military success, by some oblique expedient, some trick, some dodge. Thus they have attempted to abolish the first guarantee of individual liberty by suspending the Habeas Corpus Act, though they have not dared to carry it to its fullest extent, for they have released Charles Ingersoll rather than meet his writ in a court of law. They have altered the Constitution, partly in truckling to the Abolitionists, whose moral and material strength they desired to use for their military purposes. They have tampered with the laws of negro slavery for the same purpose, and to alarm the South if not to excite wholesale incendiarism. Reversing every principle of a democracy, they have concealed from their fellow-citizens all that they have been doing, their acts as well as their fears; and now, when absolute defeat has driven them back upon the metropolis, where they are hemmed in by the enemy, they are systematically endeavouring to deceive the whole country, in order that they and their faction may not be disturbed in a miserable occupation of office.

We will not stop to cull from the papers the detailed proofs of what we have just stated, respecting the deliberate and universal policy of deception; for our readers must be satisfied of the fact. The time-serving organs of the Government have hailed the partial fight of the 29th, the “second great battle of Bull Run,” as “the crowning Union victory of the war.” Even when the intelligence of the 30th had reached New York, we find them asserting “the prospect” to be “better and better.” “The result of Saturday's battle,” says one reporter, “should not be regarded as a defeat, as the contending parties held their respective positions on the battle-field at dark.” Even after the “cannonade had been heard at Washington,” there is the same insensate perseverance, with hints of splendid victories. At a meeting in Brooklyn, the Honourable Mr. B. Stanton undertook to tell the people “their duty, freely and without disguise,” and he boldly advocated two grand coups d'état. He advised, first, that “if slavery stood in their way,” they should “blot out the whole concern;” “drive the whole thing into the Gulf of Mexico or Central America;” and secondly, that, if necessary, they should “put half the people into Fort Lafayette to save the ‘country.’” On the strength of such energetic courses, he announced that if the President could only have 50,000 additional troops, with the matériel that he already had, they would be able to take Richmond in “fifty days,” or the men would deserve to be court-martialed, and have their names stricken from the army roll. Such is the language employed, not exceptionally by a wild talker here and there, but generally by the class of men who are active in promoting the interests and objects of the Government. That all of them, from President Lincoln downwards, honestly desire to triumph, there cannot be the slightest doubt; that they are exerting themselves in a manner which acquits them of indifference, indolence, or even “indecision,” in the vulgar sense of the word, no one can suspect—except a host of their deceived and disappointed countrymen. The amount of their honest zeal and earnest endeavour is, by a curious fate, only additional evidence to the political dishonesty, their personal incompetency, and their involuntary treason. They—representatives of a factions minority, charged with great national duties—have tried to evade the chastisement destined for failure by being all things to all men; and thus, in the very presence of civil war, they have pampered and encouraged faction, till each separate clique is reviling and threatening it as if it were a perverse and idle slave; the Executive, degraded when most it should have been exalted, and the Union mocked by moral anarchy among its professed champions. To accept duties so onerous and momentous, at the very crisis, as they say themselves, of a nation's life, without possessing the personal capacity to fulfil those duties, is a form of treason as fatal as it is burlesque, since it sacrifices the State to the egotism of incompetency. And that they are incompetent they have themselves recorded in those characters of blood and fire which relate their country's ruin. They now proclaim, as the excuse for failure, that they are short of food supplies, of arms, of men—of all the essentials of war.

Have they not had the means? Of what are the American citizens made, that the question we have just asked is not thundered forth from every city that remains to the Union? They are not like Englishmen—or French—or Italians. Never has there been a Government which has had, within two years, such enormous funds as those entrusted to Mr. Lincoln and his colleagues; and what has been done with all the money? It was given them to muster, equip, and feed the soldiers; but the soldiers, we are told, are unarmed and starving. When were such immense armies mustered? With reinforcements, they are boasting that they shall have 100,000 men to defend Washington; where are all the rest? Killed, or captured, or deserted? Have the materials of war been handed over to the enemy, and the men to death or chance? Somewhere there has been such waste that the world has never yet seen or dreamed of; but is the object of the sacrifice attained? Is even Washington preserved for the Union? No; its Government sits trembling in the great buildings which adorn the High-street of that gigantic village, listening to the guns of "rebels" as they draw nearer, and waiting to receive the fearful news that "Stonewall" Jackson has come! Are we anticipating too fast? Certainly our calculations are not more rapid than the events of the last fortnight, or the forebodings of the Americans themselves; for at one of their most recent meetings, a loudly-applauded orator declared that if the enemy should cross the Potomac, "there was another river that rebellion would never cross—it would never send its hordes over the Susquehanna." Not long since, it was the Rapidan that was "impenetrable;" then "the Rappahannock had been secured;" next, Pope had retired to defend the Potomac; and now, the Susquehanna is added to the list of these daily falsified prophecies. It is not we who say it, but the members of that party which clings to the possession of "power," though conscious of its own impotency, it cajoles the citizens of the republic into being ruined rather than mortify a wretched faction by the direct exercise of its own common sense.

GENERAL BUTLER'S METHOD OF DISARMING THE PEOPLE OF NEW ORLEANS.

The National Advocate (New Orleans) contains the following general order, by which it will be seen General Butler offers considerable rewards to servants who may betray their masters; for certainly he does not expect to get any information from citizens:—

Headquarters, Department of the Gulf,
New Orleans, August 16, 1862.

General Order No. 60.

Ordered, That after Tuesday, 19th inst., there be paid for information, leading to the discovery of weapons not held under a written permit from the United States' authorities, but retained and concealed by the keepers thereof, the sums following:—

For each serviceable Gun, Musket, and Rifle ..	$10
" Revolver	7
" Pistol	5
" Sabre or Officer's Sword	5
" Dirk Dagger	3
" Bowie Knife, Sword Can	3

Said arms to be confiscated, and the keeper so concealing them to be punished by imprisonment.

This crime being an overt act of rebellion against the authority of the United States, whether by a citizen or an alien, works a forfeiture of the property of the offender, and, therefore, every slave giving information that shall discover the concealed arms of his or her master shall be held to be emancipated.

II.—As the United States' authorities have disarmed the inhabitants of the parish of Orleans, and as some fearful citizens seem to think it necessary that they should have arms to protect themselves from violence, it is ordered,

That hereafter the offences of robbery by violence or aggravated assault that ought to be repelled by the use of deadly weapons, burglaries, rapes, and murders, whether committed by blacks or whites, will be, on conviction, punished by death.

By order of Major-General Butler.

R. S. DAVIS, Captain and A. A. A. G.

THE COTTON SUPPLY.

(From the Mobile Register.)

The following letter was addressed by the Hon. J. P. Benjamin, Secretary of State, to C. G. Baylor, Esq.:—

Confederate States of America,
Department of State, Richmond, Va., May, 16.

Sir,—In answer to your communication of this morning, I have the honour to state that this Government has no desire to destroy any cotton belonging to neutrals, but, on the contrary, is willing to extend to it full protection while in its power, provided the like protection can be made effective when the cotton may fall into the possession of the enemy. The past conduct of the Government of the United States, and the passive attitude of neutral nations, whose rights have been violated by the United States, have satisfied us that if cotton belonging to neutrals be allowed to fall into the hands of the enemy it will be seized and appropriated by them, regardless of neutral rights, and that neutral powers will fail to afford any protection to the rights of their subjects when thus violated.

If, however, as you suggest any official assurance shall be formally communicated by the Government of any neutral nation, to this nation, of a nature to satisfy us, that cotton belonging to the subjects of such neutral nations shall be effectually protected against seizure and appropriation by the enemy, if allowed to fall into his possession, this Government will have no hesitation in issuing instructions, to refrain from the destruction of such cotton, even when exposed to seizure by the enemy. I am, your obedient servant,

J. P. BENJAMIN,
Secretary of State.

To C. G. Baylor, Esq.

Taken in all its bearings, this is perhaps the most important State paper which has yet emanated from the Department of Foreign Affairs, and has, we understand, been duly communicated to the diplomatic corps at Washington, and ere this is fully known in Europe. We propose to outline the more important features of this decision of our Cabinet as they involve the political, commercial, and financial interests of the Confederate Government and the Southern people.

The position of Mr. Benjamin is in exact accordance with the spirit of the Paris treaty of 1856, so far as the commercial rights of neutrals are concerned. Mr. Cobden, in his late communication to the Chamber of Commerce of Manchester, England, has, as our readers are aware, fully elaborated this subject. Mr. Benjamin's letter commits the Confederate Government to the great principle of commercial freedom and civilization laid down at Paris, and thus takes the Southern question out of the narrow and limited position which it has heretofore occupied in Europe. By doing so, our Secretary of State has very wisely given the great Powers a basis of intervention, which enables them to act, not upon an American issue, but in the interest of all nations. That the action will be speedy and decisive, we do not for a moment doubt. The question of recognition and armed intervention is no longer an American question.

As the foremost champion of the commercial rights of neutrals during war, we make allies of England, France, Spain, Prussia, Belgium, and Holland, and the other manufacturing and commercial States, as against the blind hate and inordinate greed of the mobocratic North. Butler has most opportunely raised the issue for us in a manner very offensive to foreign nations, and the protest of the British, French, and Greek consuls at New Orleans will serve to accelerate the action of the great Powers. The cotton question has reached its crisis abroad. Seward's silly boast that he would furnish a cotton supply by conquest, has been dissipated by the action of our people in the Mississippi valley. The South now stands before the world with her capacity for political independence again gloriously vindicated on the battle-field before Richmond, and antagonizes the commercial barbarism of the North with open ports, free trade, and the commercial rights of neutrals.

Commercially, Mr. Benjamin's letter is of the first consequence to our people. The position of our Government is practically an insurance of the crop against war risk, and secures thereby an immediate convertibility of the staple. Indeed, large quantities of cotton have already changed hands on this basis, and prices are rapidly advancing. With the sale of the crop for neutral account for future delivery, the life blood of prosperity is again poured along the various channels of future trade and industry. The sale of the cotton crop enables all parties to meet their obligations, strengthens private and public credit, and stimulates enterprise.

Nor are the financial consequences the least important part of the conversion of the crop. The cotton must be paid for, and no man at all acquainted with the necessities of England and France but must realize the significant fact that London and Paris cannot possibly pay for our cotton crop in specie. It must be paid for, therefore, to an enormous amount, in goods. This necessity involves open ports as a consequence; because, without unrestricted imports and exports, the heavy debit of Europe cannot be cancelled. The exchange transactions involved in this transfer of the cotton crop for neutral account, will, as a matter of course, be made independently of New York. In fact, a new financial channel, deep and broad, is cut as it were at one blow. The basis of the financial and commercial independence of the Confederate States is securely laid if our own merchants will do their duty.—Direct importation and exportation should follow the flow and channel of direct exchanges.

CIVIL LIBERTY IN AMERICA.

The Times' New York correspondent, under date of September 1, observes:—

While this war of blood is raging in the South and the South-West, and in most of the Border States, it is not unprofitable to turn from the horrors of the battlefield to contemplate that other war, of a different description, which is raging through the North—a war of the Government struggling for its existence, and which it not only wages against the South, but against its own citizens and every principle of liberty on which the Republic was based. The Government, weak one day, and strong the next, sees "treason" everywhere, and runs blindly against it to crush it if possible, and, if not, to punish it. Jestling Pilate asked what was "Truth?" The Northern people, who are in no jesting mood, nor likely to be for many years, are seriously asking their Government what is "Treason?" Every day the offence increases, yet none of the smart lawyers in the Cabinet seem to be able to define it. It is treason to discourage enlistments. It is treason in a journeyman painter to say that Mr. Lincoln is a "humbug," but it is not treason in a highly accomplished orator and profound thinker to say that the President is a "tortoise"—a man without a backbone, and utterly incompetent. It is treason to say that Stonewall Jackson is a far better general than Pope or Halleck. It is treason to say that the Government is corrupt, and the public debt oppressive. It is treason to say that the habeas corpus ought not to be suspended. But it is not treason to say that "the Union is a league with death and a covenant with Hell;" that slavery ought to be abolished in South Carolina, without the consent of the people of that State; and that union, merely for the sake of union, is preferable to liberty of speech and action—preferable to unobtainableness, preferable to prosperity, public and private, preferable to every social blessing for which men have been accustomed to strive since the dawn of civilization. But among all the charges of treason upon which people have been lately torn from their homes and business and consigned to the horrors of police dungeons, or the more dignified miseries of Forts Lafayette or Warren, by the authority of the Government, the one upon which a working mechanic named Marx was arrested in this city last Saturday is the most surprising. If the Society of Friends in England is not aroused to sufficient activity to memorialize the Government for his release, or to send a deputation to Washington to remonstrate with Mr. Lincoln, all that can be said is that peace in Russia and peace in America are not equally dear to the followers of George Fox, or the believers in John Bright. Marx was employed in a shot and shell manufactory, and being, of course, quite familiar with the deadly nature of the articles he compounded and constructed, exclaimed to a comrade as he saw a squad of line fellows, in their new uniforms, marching down Broadway, the drums beating, the star-spangled banner floating proudly over their heads, &c., and the admiring women and little boys surveying the 'brave spectacle,' "There goes another lot of d— fools to be shot." He was overheard by a policeman, arrested for treason, carried before the Provost Marshal, and by that awful functionary detained in prison till Mr. Stanton or Mr. Seward shall decide his future fate. Marx scorned to deny his words, but added, more in explanation than in vindication, that he only spoke the common opinion of the shop. Bating the oath, which Mr. Bright would probably not employ, there was nothing in the poor workman's opinion, backed as it was by his professional experience, that that eminent statesman would not have approved, and which he did not frequently express when his country was engaged in the Russian war. It is to be hoped, if this little incident reach his ears, and if his views upon war, the military art, and the construction of shot and shell remain unchanged, that he will admit that it is safer to say in England that a soldier and profane recruit is a fool than to say so either with or without a profane past participate in America.

But the President only punishes his political adversaries. His friends are allowed to say what they please. Besides, he avows himself to be both a Disunionist and a revolutionist, and cannot well punish his friends for agreeing with him. The right of any State to hold slaves is part of the Union and the Constitution, which Mr. Lincoln has sworn to uphold. Were a majority of the people of New York and Pennsylvania, legally convened for the purpose, to decree that slavery should be re-established in those States, Mr. Lincoln would have no right to interpose or object, but would be bound by his oath to respect the decision and enforce it. But in his letter to Mr. Horace Greeley, he says: "If I could save the Union by destroying the rights of all the States, I would do it; and if I could save it by destroying the rights of some, and leaving others alone, I would also do that." Had a Democratic leader made such a declaration with respect to the undoubted rights of any Northern State, or declared that for the sake of the Union he would extend slavery as readily as he would abolish it, there can be little doubt that he would not be allowed a second opportunity to say or write such "treason," but that he would be safely caged in Fort Lafayette at a day's notice, to consort with hundreds of similar unfortunates who pine in that prison on charges of which they do not know the nature, which may be utterly unfounded, or which have been preferred against them in secret by persons whose names they are not permitted to discover.

THE SEVEN DAYS' BATTLE.

The following is General Lee's order issued immediately after the Chickahominy battles:—

(Order No. 75.)

Richmond, July 9.

On Thursday, June 26, the powerful and thoroughly equipped army of the enemy was entrenched in works, vast in extent and most formidable in character, within sight of our capital. To-day, the remains of that confident and threatening host lie on the banks of the James River, thirty miles from Richmond, seeking to recover, under the protection of his gunboats from the effects of disastrous defeats. The battle, beginning on the afternoon of June 26, above Mechanicsville, continued until the night of July 1, with only such intervals as were necessary to pursue and overtake the flying foe. His strong entrenchments and obstinate resistance were overcome, and our army swept resistlessly down the north side of the Chickahominy, until it reached the rear of the enemy, and broke his communication with the York River, capturing or causing the destruction of many valuable stores, and by the decisive battle of Friday forcing the enemy from his line of powerful fortifications on the south side of the Chickahominy, and driving him to a precipitate retreat. Our victorious army pursued as rapidly as the obstructions placed by the enemy in his rear would permit, three times overtaking his flying column, and as often driving him with slaughter from the field, leaving his numerous dead and wounded in our hands in every conflict. The immediate fruits of our success are the relief of Richmond from a state of siege, the rout of the great army that so long menaced its safety, many thousand prisoners, including officers of high rank, the capture or destruction of stores to the value of millions, and the acquisition of thousands of arms, and fifty-one pieces of superior artillery. The service rendered to the country in this short but eventful period can scarcely be estimated, and the General commanding cannot adequately express his admiration of the courage, endurance, and soldierly conduct of the officers and men engaged. Those brilliant results have cost us many brave men; but, while we mourn the loss of our gallant dead, let us not forget that they died in defence of their country's freedom, and have linked their memory with an event that will live for ever in the hearts of a grateful people. Soldiers, your country will thank you for the heroic conduct worthy of men engaged in a cause so just and sacred, and deserving a nation's gratitude and praise.

R. H. CHILTON, A.A.G.

By command of General Lee.

RESISTING THE DRAFT.

Father Purcell, R. C. priest in Cincinnati, has published a letter to his flock, in which, after proving them for threatening to resist the draft, he promises them the destruction of England, and the conquest of Canada as rewards for enlisting:—

We heard it said, that some Irish citizens in the interior of the State, misled by cunning politicians and other persons, have declared that they would resist the draft. We do not believe it. There must be some mistake in this. We are engaged in a war which may be said to be an Irish war—because it is a war of slaveholders against white labour. It is an Irish war, because it is every day reducing the power of England, destroying her trade, filling her cities with paupers, and threatening her with irreparable ruin.

We have captured already her best iron-built mercantile navy, and she dare not declare war. The capture of Canada will soon follow—it must follow as a necessity, and England can do nothing. And it is said that Irishmen will oppose a draft to save our country from destruction, and put us under the feet of the British and cotton aristocracy! Are you better than other men, that you assume the right to oppose the draft? Are you better than the American fathers and mothers and the Irish fathers and mothers whose brave sons have fallen on the battle-field in defence of your rights? When you talk of resisting the draft, if it should come, you make yourself not only ridiculous but criminal; and it is to save my Catholic brethren from being placed in such a very false position that this article has been written. It refers, fortunately, to very few, but it ought to be applicable to no one.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any rate, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HOTZE, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. Advertisements to be forwarded to the publisher at 102, Fleet-street.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 18, 1862.

The End of the Campaign in Virginia.

On the 2nd of the present month the contending armies in Virginia were in the same positions they occupied before the Federal hosts went forward to capture the Confederate capital. The invasion of Virginia is at an end, and one great act of the drama is complete. The battle that was fought on the 30th of August, though in itself all important, was only a part of the Confederate plan of campaign, which has been carried out with unswerving resolution, and with the most signal success. Now that we know the results of the operations of the Southern army we can understand and appreciate the strategy of its commanders.

In order to comprehend the three weeks' operations which have resulted in forcing the Federal armies to shelter themselves behind the fortifications of Washington, we must glance at the movements that have taken place since the seven days' battle on the Chickahominy. When the telegraph wires informed us that M'Clellan's position on the banks of the James River was good for defence, but bad for advance or retreat, we had a very correct view of the state of affairs. M'Clellan could not advance, he could not retreat without encountering a formidable opposition, and yet every day that he remained in the peninsula his forces were weakened by disease, and demoralized by inactivity. Meantime, the Federals endeavoured to make a diversion in favour of the Army of the Potomac by the movements of the army under the command of General Pope, but this attempt signally failed, for the forces under Generals Jackson and Ewell were able to keep Pope's army in check. At length, when General Halleck assumed the office of Commander-in-Chief of the United States' armies, it was determined that the forces under General M'Clellan should evacuate the peninsula. Instead of opposing or harassing the Federal retreat, the Confederate commanders directed their attention against the so-called Army of Virginia. Their object was to defeat Pope before the junction with M'Clellan could be effected, and this object has been attained. Whilst the Federal forces were divided, the Confederate forces, being disengaged from their watching M'Clellan's army, were massed against General Pope. The last-named general, after sustaining a partial defeat at Cedar Mountain, was pressed by the enemy, and took up a position on the bank of the Rappahannock, calculating, no doubt, upon the Confederate forces being partially engaged in following the retreating army of M'Clellan. General Pope anticipated being joined by M'Clellan's army at Aquia Creek, and this junction was looked upon as so certain, that it was semi-officially announced in Washington that as soon as the two armies were united General Halleck would take the command. But whilst the bulk of M'Clellan's army was being embarked at Yorktown, Pope was hard pressed, and finally established himself at Warrenton, extending his right wing as far as Manassas, so that it might be ready to co-operate with M'Clellan, who, since the abandonment of the position on the Rappahannock, was to land at Alexandria, instead of Aquia Creek. At Warrenton, General Pope concentrated his forces, strongly fortified himself from any attack on his front, kept a careful look-out in that direction, and announced that the Confederates had disappeared. He did not contemplate any danger in his rear, though the successful cavalry exploit of General Stuart, which resulted in the capture of his personal baggage, might well have warned him to be unusually vigilant against surprise. Whilst he was resting at Warrenton the Confederate army passed to his rear, and this was done so secretly, that the first intimation Pope had of it was finding his communication with Washington cut off. On August 26 the Federals were driven from Manassas, and the Federal stores captured by a force under General Jackson, which had been detached from the main body of the Federal army, and had marched without any other impedimenta than the indispensable ammunition and food. This march of General Jackson is one of the most daring feats in the history of war; not daring in the sense that he encountered any foolhardy risk of being defeated, but in the boldness of its conception. When Manassas was taken, it was supposed that the attacking force was a mere flying column, and a Federal corps was despatched to drive it back. General Pope, however, seems to have lighted on the truth, and acting on his inspiration or information, he judiciously resolved to leave Warrenton, and, if possible, come up with General Jackson before he could be reinforced by the main body of the Confederate army. General Pope divided his army into three parts, and on the 28th of August met his enemy, and some skirmishing ensued. The next day General Pope attacked the force under General Jackson. The Federal commander was veracious when he wrote in his despatch that the Confederates stood on the defensive. Pope knew well how much depended upon the success of his assault; it was renewed again and again, until, according to his own confession, 8000 of his troops had fallen in the deadly conflict, and yet when night closed in the Confederates were still in his front. They had fallen back during the fight for two miles, and had regained half their ground before it was over. On the eve of that day's fighting, or early the next morning, General Pope claimed a victory. He admitted his own troops were too exhausted to follow up the advantage he had gained; but he was little aware that the battle of the 29th was only the prelude of a greater and decisive battle that was to take place on the 30th, or he would never have ventured on the statement that the Confederates were retreating to the mountains, and he had despatched a corps of his army in pursuit. On the night of the 29th, or, it may be, at the early morning of the 30th, both the contending armies were reinforced. General Pope was joined by Generals Heintzelmann and Porter, and General Lee had come up to the support of General Jackson. The Federal commander was probably unconscious that, instead of a division, the main body of the Confederate army was in his front; and the fresh forces under Heintzelmann and Porter assaulted the Confederate lines, were repulsed by infantry, and as they retired were literally mowed down by Confederate artillery. Generals McDowell and Sigel brought up their divisions to support the Federal centre. McDowell's forces were the first to retreat, while those under the command of General Sigel displayed greater resolution and endurance. The second battle of Bull Run was a hotly contested combat; but at 5 o'clock in the afternoon General Pope had brought up all his reserves, and as he could no longer maintain his ground, had to give the order for retreat. The retrograde movement on Centreville, though somewhat protected by that portion of the Federal forces which constituted the right wing, was a disastrous rout, the road being blocked up with infantry, cavalry, and waggons, in inextricable confusion. The dead, the dying, and the wounded, were left upon the field. What the losses were on that day we have no means of estimating, but we may conclude that they were very great from the ominous silence of the Federal commander. All we are told about this part of the affair is, that some days later "Alexandria was filled with the dead and the dying."

We do not pretend to offer any criticisms upon a battle so vast in its proportions and so momentous in its consequences, until we are furnished with reliable information as to its details; but judging from the facts before us, we think that the Federal commander does not deserve the censures that have been passed upon his conduct by the New York press, and that, if he is to be condemned for allowing the Confederate army to pass secretly to his rear, he did his best on the day of the battle. Nor do we think that General M'Clellan is to be blamed for not sending forward reinforcements. The remnant of the Army of the Potomac, demoralized by defeat and retreat, weakened by sickness, and probably lacking many necessary supplies, was not in a fit state to be launched against a victorious foe. It was not a strong, well-equipped army that the Confederates allowed to retreat unmolested from the Peninsula. And even if M'Clellan had regiments ready for immediate service, it must be remembered that at Alexandria he occupied an outpost of the defences of Washington, and he was bound to think of the safety of the capital; but we shall probably find that, even if he had the will, General M'Clellan had not the means of aiding General Pope in the hour of need.

The results of this great battle, as far as the Federal occupation of Virginia is concerned, may be very briefly summed up. General Pope, who had been joined at Centreville by General Banks, found that position untenable, and retreated behind the fortifications of Washington. General Buraside evacuated Fredericksburg, retired to Aquia Creek, then evacuated Aquia Creek, and also retired behind the fortifications of the Federal capital. At length, a junction of the five Northern armies was effected, but in a place and manner most dispiriting and disastrous to the Federals.

Besides their loss in men, the Federals have lost enormously in matériel of war; according to their own accounts, the Confederate captures have been of immense value, and to these must be added the quantities of stores and ammunition destroyed at the various places which they have evacuated.

The immediate result, then, of the battle of August 30 was the retreat of the Federal armies from Virginia, and we may say of the entire Federal forces, for even the gunboat fleet under Captain Wilks, after destroying a few buildings in the neighbourhood of City Point, left the James River and proceeded up the Potomac.

The Northern accounts say that the Confederate forces have invaded Maryland; the word "invaded" is surely out of place, for the Southern army has been received with demonstrations of hearty welcome by the citizens of that State. The Confederates have occupied Frederick City, and are advancing to Hagerstown. They have cut off the Federal communication with Harper's Ferry and Martinsburg. We will not presume to divine the future movements of the Confederates, but if, as reported in the North, they intend to carry the war into Pennsylvania, their progress is not likely to be checked by the volunteer regiments raised by the Governor of that State; and in Pennsylvania the Confederate forces will be able to do serious damage. If they should get to Harrisburg, they will have the command of the line of railroad that communicates with the Western States, of the Cumberland Valley Railroad, and of the Northern Central Railroad, and be able to cut off the supplies, both of men and food; or, by moving in a westerly direction towards the mountains, they may be able to destroy the railroad communication with the West, by blowing up the tunnels; or, if they should proceed eastward in Pennsylvania and get to Philadelphia, they could cut off the water communication of that city with Schuylkill, and completely paralyze its commerce. These may be called speculations upon possibilities; our object in suggesting them is to show that the prospect of the invasion of Pennsylvania justly makes the North anxious; and if the Confederates determine upon a war of aggression they may be able to inflict incalculable injury upon the foe.

In Kentucky the Federals have been defeated at every point. The Legislature of that State has retreated to Louisville, and even that place is not considered secure, for we hear of preparations being made for leaving it. General Buell has ordered the evacuation of Nashville, and is himself at Chattanooga, daily expecting to be attacked. The Federal dominion in Missouri is only co-extensive with the ground occupied by Federal troops. At St. Louis, the Provost-Marshal has closed the Old Merchants' Exchange, because of the disloyalty of the members. In short, it must now be evident to the North that its hold on the Border States is only that of military tenure. At New Orleans General Butler is preparing to defend himself against a threatened attack by the Confederate forces under Generals Breckinridge and Van Dorn.

Such is the aspect of the war, and it has caused the greatest excitement throughout the Northern States. The crisis in the North can only be met by unanimity, but instead of union, there is nothing but discord. Some blame the Cabinet, others the generals; and Mr. Lincoln finds it difficult to maintain his authority. Peace may be far off, but it is not impossible the continuation of the contest may involve the overthrow of the present Administration, if not the dissolution of the present United States.

"The Fortune of War."

THE abuse of words is in few instances more glaring than in the current application of this much repeated phrase. That war is full of strange vicissitudes, that the bravest may fail, and that failure implies not necessarily crime, is as true of war as it is of peaceful life, and so far the usual acceptation of the phrase is correct. But when it is made to signify, as it too often does, that war is simply a game of chance, in which generalship and brute force give an advantage, though no certainty of success, to the player, we must insist upon a higher conception of the terrible scourge with which Providence, in His wisdom, has in all ages afflicted mankind. We do not mean alone that the Ruler of our destinies directs the issues of war as He does all things, for no man above an atheist would care to deny this. In human parlance, the ordinary conception of the "fortune of war," to which we refer, holds good with ordinary wars. Where national contests, not affecting the national life, are voided by arms by each nation's trained and professional champions, the issue seems to man's narrow-sighted vision a question of generalship and brute force, largely blended with hazard. Nor can it be asserted that in such contests the right always succeeds and the wrong succumbs, no more than in individual life the good always prosper and the wicked fail. In national as in individual undertakings it would be a loose morality which accepted success as a sufficient plea of justification; but where nations are arrayed against each other, man against man, woman against woman, where a whole people becomes an army, and a whole country a camp, it does appear to us that the appeal to the Supreme Tribunal is more solemn, the decision more direct, and, in other words, that we obtain a nearer glimpse of the workings of Divine Justice.

Let us not be misunderstood. In remote ages the gage of battle was the last and approved resort of justice between individuals, as still with us between nations. Though we moderns denounce the practice as barbarous, we do not deny that a devout religious sentiment gave rise to and sanctioned it. He that was thrice armed with a just quarrel felt himself under a special protection, and his antagonist's arm was unnerved by the thought that a higher Power than the man before him was his adversary. Something analogous seems to us to be the position of a nation suddenly called upon to defend, not merely a point of honour or pride, but its very life. The professional soldier will fight equally well for any, or even without, cause; but the man torn from his home and family, and peaceful pursuits, needs the impulse of a stern sense of duty and a deep conviction to convert him suddenly into the hero of a battle-field. A nation can scarcely be wrong of which every member is instantaneously animated and actuated by the same impulse; for error, however fanatically clung to, has not the same potency upon the human mind as truth. Such a nation would not only be unanimous, brave, devoted, and persevering, but it would instinctively discern and select its highest individual intelligences, and assign to them their proper places among its leaders. As no one requires to be deceived, truth would stamp with dignity and energy the conduct of such a nation. It would be patient in adversity and temperate in prosperity, and, therefore, it would triumph. Study, on the other hand, the interior organization of a nation engaged in an enterprise which either it knows to be wrong, or in which it errs unconsciously. If it is unanimous, it is so only in appearance, because, since error affects variously various minds and truth alone is uniform in its action, that unanimity can arise only from a temporary union of widely differing interests, motives, or passions—a union which can withstand the test of neither adverse nor prosperous fortune. In such a nation there would first be indecision of purpose, then some party or faction more violent and obstinate in error than the rest would gain the mastery, and would become, at first from distrust of the others, and afterwards from the necessity of self-preservation, a tyrant over the whole. Party interests, not the instinct of the nation, would dictate the choice of leaders and direct the public policy. Falsehood and intrigue are always the natural adjuncts of tyranny, and these would poison every fibre of the body politic. Such a nation could not permanently succeed, and must, sooner or later, learn its error from the disastrous consequences it has entailed.

We have roughly, but we think not unfairly, sketched the two nations now involved in deadly strife on the other side of the Atlantic. One of them in entering upon that strife invoked the right of might; the other humbly relied upon the Lord of Hosts. The one made its victories the theme of self-glorious exultation, and the occasion for cruel resolves; the other received its first great success on bended knees, and never since forgot to whom it owed its thanks. Shall we be accused of irreverence if we say that God has judged between the two nations, and that right, not might, has triumphed?

A Long War.

SUCH is now the relative position of the American belligerents that it would scarcely excite a feeling of surprise in this country were the next steamer to bring us the intelligence that Washington had been evacuated, or that a Confederate army had made its triumphant entry into Baltimore amid the waving of a thousand Secession flags drawn from the hiding-places of many a long expecting household. Would this end the war? We believe not. It is, on the contrary, our firm conviction that the northward march of the Confederate armies would have upon the mind and temper of the Northern people precisely the effect which the opponents of recognition ascribe to foreign intervention in any form whatever.

We have often shown that the opponents of recognition are wrong, that the moral influence of Europe is still potent to end this war without resorting to armed compulsion, and that the exertion of this moral influence could not and would not be regarded by the North as threatening or endangering its own independence. Very different is it when actual invasion of their soil by the dreaded "rebels" shall make the war in the eye of every Northern man one of self-defence. In vain that the South understands its own interests and objects too well to dream of conquest, and limits its most sanguine ambition to the deliverance of Maryland and Missouri. Strategic necessity would compel its generals to the temporary occupation of places beyond the confines of these States. In vain that the first measure consequent upon such occupation would assuredly be a sincere disclaimer of any desire of conquest, or attempt at permanent subjugation. In vain that the discipline of the Southern armies, so exemplary in the trials of adversity, would not fail in the hour of triumph on an enemy's soil. The miserable faction which calls itself the Government of the United States, and which sees in peace its certain overthrow, would improve the occasion to secure for itself a new lease of power. The press, a veteran in the warfare of falsehood and slander, now that it could no longer invent victories, would invent atrocities ascribed to the conqueror, for the belief of which the Northern mind is only too well prepared by thirty years of persistent misrepresentation, by the animosity of a ferocious war, and still more by the conscious fear of retributive justice. Those men of the North who recently showed symptoms of summoning up the courage they so lamentably lacked in earlier periods—these Girondists of the revolution through which the North, not the South, is passing—would be silenced, as were their prototypes in the tragedy of 1793. Let it not be said that means and men would then fail the North. The French Republic was never so formidable an antagonist than when the Place de la Concorde flowed with the best blood of the land. We repeat, that in no conceivable emergency will the South drive the Northern people to a war of self-defence. But the Northern people will so regard it, and months, perhaps years, of bloodshed will be needed to undeceive them. While the delusion lasts they will fight like Anglo-Saxons, for the genuine American element will then, and only then, be roused, and the men who shirked the conscription which was to send them to the slaughter-pens of a foreign country will need no coercion when they believe themselves to be defending their homesteads, wives, and little ones.

We, therefore, unlike most of our contemporaries, look forward to a long war—a war, in fact, which has no other period to its duration than the patience of the European Powers, for the resources of the combatants will not be exhausted sooner. As for the present we shall probably stand almost alone in this opinion, we may remind our readers that amid the vicissitudes which have marked the war during our as yet brief existence, we have never ventured upon rash predictions; we have never overestimated or underrated the strength or prospects of success of either of the contending parties, and we have never misled any one in regard to their relative positions. As we have endeavoured to allay causeless alarms, so would we now prevent unfounded hopes. The conquest of the North by the South is as impossible as the conquest of the South by the North. Such a conquest we know the South will not attempt. So soon as it has secured the freedom of Maryland and Missouri, it will pause, though it were in the high tide of triumphant fortune. But the motive for this pause the North will not soon learn to understand. Wherever the Confederate armies will refrain from advancing, there the North will consider them as repulsed. The Susquehanna, instead of the Potomac, may separate the rival hosts, but the war will still go on—on a lesser scale, perhaps, but with not less injury to the world's prosperity. The North, wedded to its delusions, firmly believes that it has not yet tried its last weapon, the most formidable of all. It, or rather the mad faction to whom it has blindly entrusted its destinies, will next proclaim the emancipation of the slaves. The greatest trial, then, according to European ideas, still awaits the South. She is prepared for it, and confronts it with the same serene confidence in the issue with which she did battle for her political life. This is the last proof she has to give, and she is ready to give it, that she is not the criminal before God and man which her traducers for a generation back have represented her. Instead of the accursed persecutor of an inferior race she will appear before the world as its truest benefactor; and as her white sons and daughters have immolated themselves in her defence, so her black children, of a younger intellectual growth, will trustingly cling to her for protection from false friends, and no parricidal hand will be raised against the common mother.

A long war! To mankind, wearied and sickened with this horrible tragedy, these are sad words. They are sad to the South, to which every battle costs what is dearer than treasure—the youths on whom rest the promises of the future. But are they not sadder still to the North, to which the future holds out no promises, to which even victory itself can no longer bring the hoped-for success? Are they not sad, also, to Lancashire, which is no actor in this blood-drenched stage, and cannot even intoxicate itself with its maddening excitement. To the South alone the bitter cup is not without sweetening compensations. The South alone has heretofore gained by the war, the South alone has yet to gain by it. By the war the South has learned much, and more than it has learned it has taught its despisers. There are still those who prefer to believe in the miraculous transformation of a people divided between luxurious drones and marauding vagabonds into a nation of heroic race, rather than confess that their life-long opinions were prejudices; but there are none who now refuse to the much calumniated people their tribute of admiration for qualities which, whether innate or acquired, entitle the possessors to the world's esteem and to the favour of the Ruler of all. The South is practically recognized as a member of the family of nations, for throughout Christendom she is known as a nation geographically, morally, and historically distinct for all time to come, and the business of the Foreign Office as regards her is reduced to a mere formality. These are great gains, and the war, instead of diminishing, can only add to them. Besides, the odds are turned in her favour. The enterprize which she began without resources she now continues with resources superior to those of her antagonist. Her ordnance and quartermasters' stores are swelling with the spoils of many battle-fields, and what she does not obtain from the enemy she is now able to supply herself. It required eight months to launch the first "Merri-mac;" half that time afterwards sufficed to replace her by nearly a score of others. A year ago a gentleman, admitted to the workshops of the celebrated Tredagar Works at Richmond, was struck with the machinery for a gigantic powder mill then in process of casting. "Why," said he to his conductor, a personal friend of President Davis, "do you undertake such works in a moment of such critical emergency? It will take twelve months before this mill can give you powder. Why not rather make it by hand, or in any other more expeditious manner?" "We do all that," was the reply, "but the President expects a long war, and is preparing for it." The incident serves as an illustration of a thousand facts. There was neither sulphur nor saltpetre when the war broke out. The pyrites of a copper mine, in Alabama afford the one, and a mine of natural saltpetre discovered in South Carolina yields an abundant supply of the latter. Muskets as good as any that can be purchased in Europe are made by the Harper's Ferry machinery, removed in the earlier stages of the first campaign, and in vigorous operation in a safe place in Virginia. Every gunsmith rifles fowling-pieces, and every foundry casts cannon. There is not, and never can be, a lack of meat and bread, and soldiers and civilians are clad in homespun by the cloth factories of Georgia, North Carolina, and other States. It may be said, without figure of speech, that the Confederate resources are just developing, when those of the Federals are becoming exhausted.

It cannot, therefore, be from ill-will to the South or friendship to the North, that recognition, which alone can end the war, is longer withheld. The South, never clamorous to obtain it and patient under its refusal, will probably make no second demand without previous invitation. But if Mr. Seward were an able diplomatist, or if that cold mind were capable of an inspiration of patriotism by which it might rise over selfish considerations, he would lose no time in opening secret negotiations with those Powers who alone, by timely interference, could save the wreck of his unfortunate country.

The Wheat Trade of Great Britain, France, and America.

THE course of the business in wheat for the past two years is without a parallel in the history of commerce. Under the benign influence of Free Trade the extraordinary wants of Western Europe have been supplied at moderate prices. The usual annual importations from all places into Great Britain and Ireland, of flour and wheat, are equivalent to a little under 5,000,000 quarters, but the bad harvest of 1860 necessitated a draft from other countries of 10,000,000 quarters, and the short crops of 1861, with the 1,000,000 quarters exported to the continent early in the season, have demanded about 9,000,000 quarters to be brought from abroad; this latter quantity would have been much increased but for the economy in consumption in the manufacturing districts, and the smaller stocks than usual held by the middle men that furnish those neighbourhoods. We begin the commercial year with a less amount of old wheat on hand than ever before; the harvest of 1862, however, owing to the additional breadth of land sown with that grain, will, no doubt, be over an average; the drain from other countries, for the year ending August 31, 1863, will therefore probably not exceed the usual quantity, 5,000,000 quarters. The annual consumption of these islands is 22,500,000 quarters, with 3,000,000 quarters taken for seed, making 25,500,000 quarters; the usual production is 20,500,000 quarters, leaving 5,000,000 quarters to be received from other sources. In addition to wheat, the importations of Indian corn are generally about 500,000 quarters, but they reached 3,000,000 quarters last year. The population of the United Kingdom is 30,000,000.

Prior to the year 1775, each one of the three divisions of the United Kingdom produced more grain of every kind than was required for its people, oftentimes exporting to foreign parts. After that date a reverse current set in, and the consumption outstripped the quantity grown. The annual deficiency up to 1825 was about 50,000 quarters wheat; in 1835, 750,000 quarters; in 1845, 2,500,000 bushels; in 1851, it had reached 5,000,000 quarters. The average production per acre is twenty-five bushels.

The wheat crops of France, including Savoy and Nice, average 37,000,000 quarters, of which 6,000,000 quarters is retained for seed, 29,500,000 quarters consumed, and 1,500,000 exported. The harvest of last year, however, was deficient, 6,000,000 quarters being brought from other parts. The growth of this season is said to be much larger than usual, and it is expected that there will be a surplus of 3,000,000 quarters. The cultivation of wheat in recent years has much increased; in 1850, 14,700,000 acres were occupied with that grain; in 1862, 18,000,000 acres. The average production is seventeen bushels to the acre.

France is the largest bread-consuming country in the world; her population is about 37,000,000; besides wheat she requires 10,000,000 quarters of rye, which is mostly produced from her own soil; also considerable quantities of maize; chestnuts, too, are an important article of food, it is said that 2,000,000 of her inhabitants subsist upon them.

In ordinary years the exportation of wheat from all the American States does not much exceed 1,000,000 quarters, sometimes not over 150,000 quarters; the exceptions have been for the period ending August 31, 1847, when 3,000,000 quarters were shipped; for that closing in 1854, 2,000,000; in 1856, 2,750,000; in 1857, 2,250,000; in 1858, 2,000,000; in 1861, 5,000,000; and in 1862, 6,000,000 quarters. The vast surplus production on these occasions can readily be accounted for. For several years prior to the expiration of the Charter of the Bank of the United States in 1836, there had been great speculations in America, so much so that the people in the West had become consumers instead of producers; the consequence was that agricultural pursuits were neglected to such an extent that large importations of grain were made from the Mediterranean in that year to supply the deficiency. The panic of 1837 caused the people to return to their regular occupations as farmers, which enabled the States to meet the slight European demand for cereals that existed in 1839, and was the means of causing an accumulation of wheat for the year 1847, which helped to balance the short crop here in 1846, known as the Irish famine year. With the exception of a moderate business in 1853 and 1854, the wheat trade with America was very trifling; its production being very little beyond the consumption. None of the Northern Atlantic States grew enough for their own wants, and their populations had to be supplied by Virginia and the West. The Russian war intervening, cut off the usual supplies from that quarter, and America was called upon for an increased quantity in 1856, at high prices, which stimulated large shipments the following year, with disastrous results, peace having restored the commerce with the north of Europe. The extravagant quotations of 1856, caused much speculation in the West, and gave a fabulous value to land; people rushed to the new States by thousands, and wheat fell from $2½ to 80 cents a bushel; cities that were constructed upon paper were swept from the map; railways partially completed were left unfinished; and the bubble burst in 1857. Large tracts of country were thus opened to the husbandman, who was then joined by the speculators, that were obliged to resume their calling of tillers of the soil, and hence the very large crops of 1860, and the full crops of 1861; the exports against the former year being 5,000,000 quarters, while those of the latter were greater by 1,000,000 quarters, in consequence of the withdrawal of the Southern States, the grain coming eastward instead of going southward, the people of the Cotton States having ceased to be purchasers. Although the shipments of wheat for the two seasons, closing August 31, 1861, and 1862, have been so large, they have yielded little profit to the farmer; prices have not been high, and the gross proceeds at the seaboard were eaten up by the heavy expense of inland transportation, commissions, &c. No inducement has, therefore, been offered for a continuance of such extensive cultivation. In fact, the land is being worn out, no manures are used, and as the agriculturist moves farther west to break virgin soil, he is subjected to increased expense in getting his supplies from, and his produce to, market. So the limit of production has not only been reached, but the increased price of labour, caused by the scarcity of hands, is another obstacle to the planting of large crops. It must be borne in mind, too, that the winters in the north-west, where the grain is principally produced, are so severe, that the seed is committed to the ground in the spring, and not in the autumn, as in most countries. The seasons of 1860 and 1861 happened to be unusually early. The harvest of 1862, as far as known, is not as large as its two immediate predecessors, and with low quotations on this side of the Atlantic, it cannot be moved forward to the shipping points.

The commerce in breadstuffs between the American States and the West Indian and South American ports, has been carried on with flour made from wheat grown in the Southern States of Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, Tennessee, Kentucky, and Missouri, on account of the superiority of the grain; in fact, the large cities on the Atlantic have for the same reason also been fed by the product of these States.

The average number of quarters of wheat grown in all the American States is computed at 28,000,000, of which 5,000,000 are retained for seed, leaving 21,000,000 quarters for consumption, (13,000,000 quarters in the North, and 8,000,000 quarters in the South), and 2,000,000 quarters for exportation. The average production per acre does not exceed thirteen bushels.

In the rural districts of America, Indian corn is a leading staple of food; so is rye; the exportations of the former are very large, while those of the latter are occasionally of considerable moment. The joint population of the North and South is 30,000,000.

It will thus be seen that the United States, unlike Russia, is not naturally a grain-exporting country, and that the business in wheat, the past two years, has been an exception and not a rule; that the boast of the Northerners that "England cannot get on without our bread-stuffs," is most idle in its character, every intelligent corn-merchant being aware that Northern Europe has at all times an almost inexhaustible supply of cereals, which can be brought to these shores, should the price be high enough to pay for the inland transportation.

The grain crops in the South this year are very much greater than formerly, in consequence of the hands being employed in that description of agriculture, instead of cotton, tobacco, and sugar. Indeed, it is estimated that the Confederates have now two full years supply; if so, they will, on a cessation of hostilities, be enabled to export 8,000,000 quarters of wheat, a larger quantity than has ever been shipped from America. This surplus produce can be forwarded to the ports much more cheaply by their natural water communications, than can that of the West, which is subjected to the enormous expense, consequent upon artificial means of transportation.

In order to give an idea of the production of food in the Confederate States, the following has been compiled from the last census:—

The little State of South Carolina produces five-sixths of the rice crop of America, and more wheat than all the New England States together. She grows as much Indian corn as New York, and more than all the New England States. In 1860, her production of corn was 20,000,000 bushels. Her potato, bean, and pea crops are very large, usually exceeding by 1,000,000 bushels that of Maine. She raises more peas and beans by 180,000 bushels than all the Northern States together, New York alone excepted; more beef cattle than Pennsylvania by 1740, and almost as many as all the New England States together; more sheep than Iowa and Wisconsin by 10,699, more hogs than New York by 17,254, more hogs than Pennsylvania by 25,137, and 86,000 more than all the New England States, and New Jersey, Michigan, and Wisconsin together. She produces 10,000 more horses and mules than Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island combined. Virginia and North Carolina furnish 241,000 bushels of wheat more than the great wheat-growing State of New York. Virginia, North Carolina, and Tennessee grow 115,471,593 bushels of wheat, a quantity exceeding by 300,000 bushels the aggregate production of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, New Jersey, Connecticut, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Vermont, and Maine. Tennessee alone produces 16,506 more hogs than all the six New England States, along with New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Iowa, and Michigan; for that State produces 3,104,010 hogs, while the eleven above-mentioned Northern States produce but 3,087,504. The whole number of hogs raised in 1860 was 30,316,608, of which the slaveholding States furnished 20,770,730, or more than two-thirds of the entire quantity. The Cotton States produced in 1860, more beef cattle than the six New England States, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, New Jersey, Indiana, Michigan, and Wisconsin together. In that year the Southern States furnished 20,770,730, or more cattle than all the non-slave-holding States, and 260,000 more horses and mules. The crops of Indian corn in the Southern States are generally twice as large as those in the West, and one third greater than the quantity grown in the whole region of the North and West. There is now stored in the State of Louisiana, according to Federal authority, enough sugar to supply all the States for a year.

In the minds of Europeans the South, commercially, has hitherto been associated only with its cotton, tobacco, rice, naval stores, &c., while it should really have been regarded as the great agricultural portion of the United States. Its grain-raising advantages, particularly for winter wheat, are unsurpassed; possessed of a climate which keeps the meadows always green, and obviates the necessity of providing hay for winter keep in any considerable quantity, there is, practically, no limit to its live-stock-producing power. This same equability of climate is moreover assisted by a steadiness of the most skilled agricultural labour in the world, and hence the great regularity in the increase of the growth of all its productions. The Southerners are not constantly changing their occupations, as has been the habit of the Northerners; but they have ever exhibited the same persevering energy in all their civil affairs that they have shown in their military movements since the struggle against Northern tyranny commenced. A people that is always being led off by speculations, and not content with legitimate employment, is like a man who frequently changes his business—he gains no real wealth—this applies to the North. A nation that pursues the even tenor of its way undisturbed by the visionary schemes of the hour, is comparable to a good merchant, who, although he may be considered somewhat "slow," in the end is sure to reap a success—this applies to the South.

It has been a mistake to suppose that the Confederate States were dependent upon the North or the West for food; not over one-seventh part of the land is employed in the cultivation of the leading staples—cotton, tobacco, sugar, and rice. No country has such self-sustaining power, as has been proved by the experience of the last eighteen months, and no country is capable of giving such benefits to other nations, as will be proved when its ports are opened to the free commerce of the world.

Mediation: a Northern Notion.

WHEN the Northern States first entered on the war, which was in thirty, sixty, or ninety days to crush out rebellion, and restore to the Union the humbled, penitent, and conquered South, much prospective indignation was lavished on foreign Powers whose subjects had dared to express an opinion on the probable issue of the quarrel, or whose ambassadors had been instructed to notify to the Federal Government that their respective sovereigns had a policy, and had determined on a line of conduct, in reference to the "unhappy contest" which had broken out. "What have France and England to do with the matter? We are putting down sedition and riot, not making war; and our domestic troubles are no concern of theirs." Mr. Seward threatened unheard-of pains and penalties against any country which should dare to interfere. Time made it evident—first, that the Confederate States were in very fact a belligerent Power, and that the United States' Government was not suppressing insurrection, but waging a desperate war upon a nation determined to be independent; and, secondly, that there was not the slightest chance that the "rebellion" would be crushed, and that the war might very possibly continue for years, an intolerable affliction to Europe, and a fearful scourge to America. Then first was heard in Europe the whisper of mediation, which awakened at once a burst of frenzied indignation from the Northern press, pulpits, and platforms. "Mediation between rebels and their Government! What would England have said had we offered to mediate when she was engaged in crushing the Indian mutiny or the rebellion of Smith O'Brien?" The parallel excited some laughter on this side of the water, but it was admitted as proof of the inveterate persistence of the North in its original view of the Southern rebellion, and of the hostility with which any foreign intervention, no matter for what purpose, or in what direction, would be received, at least by the dominant faction there. It was not—so it seemed—merely that a mediator would probably pronounce in favour of separation; it was that the offer of mediation between a lawful Government and its rebellious subjects was an insult to the former. A series of defeats, impending bankruptcy, a threatened conscription, have lowered the haughty tone of the ruling party in the Northern States. And the New York Times the organ of the sober and respectable section of the Republicans, and one of the few New York journals that Englishmen can read without a feeling of contempt and disgust, now ventures to hint that mediation might not be wholly unacceptable. Of course, it must be mediation on Northern terms; the South to lay down its arms, and be received back into the Union, with adequate guarantees for the security of the individual States against Federal encroachment, or unauthorized aggression. To hint at any other issue would consign the editor of the Times to Fort Lafayette, and condemn his journal to suspension. But it is something that a respectable American journal should dare to admit that the case of the North is so bad that it would welcome European interference in what it has hitherto treated as a purely domestic quarrel; that it should almost invite that mediation between the United States and "their rebels" which, while McClellan's army still occupied its camp before Richmond, was scouted as an insult and an impossibility.

The present mood of the party represented by the New York Times is certainly more rational than that which lasted as long as the onward march of the invading armies. Mediation between sovereigns and rebels, though a task which few prudent Governments would care, in general, to undertake, is neither unreasonable nor unprecedented. Where subjects make a demand not inconsistent with subjection, and sovereigns are content to make concessions which will not impair their sovereignty, it is possible for a third party to mediate with good effect between them; especially if the mediator possess either the cordial goodwill of both, or a strength to which both must inevitably submit. Of such a kind was the interference of England, while Murat reigned at Naples, between the Bourbon king and his Sicilian subjects. A precedent still more distinct and important is afforded by the intervention of the Four Powers—France declining to act—in the war between the Porte and Pacha of Egypt. But in neither case was there a claim of independence on the one hand, set up against a claim of sovereignty on the other. Where the conflict is of this nature; where the pretensions of the belligerents are totally and fundamentally irreconcilable, mediation is practically impossible. Interventions in such cases there have been in abundance. England interfered between Spain and the Netherlands. France interfered between England and the American colonies, and gave to the latter the liberty which they had failed to win for themselves. Austria interfered to restore dispossessed princes in Italy; Russia crushed the nascent independence of Hungary. On the other hand, the interference of the great Powers wrested Belgium from Holland, and Greece from Turkey. But we believe that in no case did any Power ever attempt to mediate between unrecognized rebels and a claimant of sovereignty, where the rebels pretended to absolute independence. To render such mediation possible, one party or the other must be prepared to forego the very object of the war. When exhaustion or defeat has brought one party to this point, a mediator may very well be called in to settle minor differences and arrange satisfactory terms of peace. But it is simply ridiculous for a Power claiming sovereignty over provinces in revolt to talk of mediation. If it cannot reconquer its lost dominions, they must be relinquished; if they are to be retained, they must be recovered by force. Between a nation resolved on freedom and a Power obstinately bent on conquest, the sword only can decide. The opinion of the civilized world has long since settled the duty of foreign nations in such a case; to interfere only when the sword has clearly decided the main issue of the war, and the contest is prolonged from the desperation of the conquered, or the savage ferocity of the would-be conqueror, without hope of finally changing the judgment which has been already passed by the God of Battles; and then to interfere either to obtain for the vanquished terms on which they may reasonably submit, or to compel the baffled aggressor to desist from a hopeless enterprise. If the South had taken up arms to obtain a modification of the Constitution, or any other political object, either party might reasonably invite the mediation of Europe; but as the South is fighting to obtain, and the North to prevent, its independence, such mediation can only be invoked by the North on the ground that, being ready to concede that point, it desires the aid of impartial Powers to arrange the conditions of the compact; by the South only after confession of defeat, in order to obtain terms, or after the clear manifestation of its power to maintain its independence, in order to close a contest perfectly useless, exhausting to the belligerents, and scandalous to humanity. If, despairing of conquest, the aggressor asks the intervention of Europe, he must be prepared to abandon his aggression. Europe will not conquer the South for the Federal Government; and if she mediates at all, must mediate to arrange a peaceable separation.

Mediation, perhaps, does not imply recognition; for, as we have said, European Powers have mediated to make terms for subjects with their admitted sovereign. But in a quarrel like the present, mediation involves recognition; and the mediators would never dream of acting on any other supposition. England could never assist in reimposing a hated government on a people which has proved its right to liberty by its prowess in the field; Democratic and Imperial France must respect the plebiscitum which destroyed the Union, as she respects those which installed the Empire and united Italy. Again, the mediators will look at the position of affairs from an independent standpoint, and not through Northern eyes. And what is the political and military situation which they would be compelled to perceive? Is the North mistress of the field? Is the South vanquished, ready to make peace on any terms which will not make her subsequent fate absolutely intolerable? The grand army of the Federalists is driven back upon the Potomac; their army in the West is surrounded and kept in forced inaction; their very capital is in danger; after eighteen months of preparation and of war they are in a worse position than on the day when they first invaded Virginia. Is this a time to dictate terms? To declare that mediation on the basis of separation would be an act of hostility? To demand that Europe shall give them what they have proved themselves unable to take? The South, again, is not only victorious, but resolute. Without mediation, she might at any time have returned to the Union on her own terms. In her darkest hour, even after the fall of Fort Donelson, even when her capital was beleaguered, New Orleans lost, and Charleston threatened, she disdained the idea of reunion. How would she receive the proposal now, whether tendered by the North or by Europe? And would it not be a mockery of mediation to offer to a nation victorious in its own cause the self-same terms which, if every one of its cities were in the enemy's hands, if every one of its armies had been beaten in the field, if every one of its States were occupied by an overwhelming force, would be willingly granted by the conquerors for the sake of peace? It is absurd to say that mediation on the basis of separation would be hostility to the North, because on that basis, sooner or later, the North must treat. But it may reasonably be held that to offer to negotiate a re-union would be an affront, if not an act of enmity to the South, which none of the great Powers could sanction. The Confederate States are de facto independent; independence is the one object for which they are fighting, and they could not be asked to resign that object unless the fortune of war had rendered its attainment hopeless.

But though the proposition of the New York Times is simply absurd, the fact that such a proposition has been made is itself significant. When a Power waging a war of aggression thinks of appealing to mediation, it is pretty clear that the tide has turned against it, and that invasion is likely, in the invader's opinion, to be not merely repelled, but retaliated. When a Government claiming to be engaged in suppressing rebellion so completely fails that its own warm friends begin to talk of welcoming foreign intervention, it is plain that the final triumph of the "rebellion" is anticipated. A change has evidently come over the spirit of those Northern dreams which were lately filled with visions of victory, glory, and dominion. May it not be possible that ere long that large section of the Northern people to whom peace, and mediation as the best means of peace, would be welcome on almost any terms, will find courage to make their wishes heard above the noisy clamours of fanaticism, the cant of pretentious patriotism, and the discordant cries of self-seeking ambition. Once heard, we doubt not that their voice will prevail; for we believe it to be the voice of the majority, as we know it to be the voice of common-sense, of reason, and of justice.

American Indians.

THERE is more in a name than modern philosophy dreams of. It is true the rose, if called "the onion flower," would smell quite as sweet, but those who knew the onion and not the rose, save from report, would be apt to think that with regard to fragrance, the one was like unto the other. Even with those who were acquainted with the Queen of Flowers, as well as with the savoury vegetable, the confusion of nomenclature would, to some extent, produce confusion of ideas. The rose, called by a less sweet name, would seem to smell less sweet; for if Locke had lived in the nineteenth century, he would not have had occasion to modify his declaration as to no man being free from prejudice. The blunder of Columbus and his contemporaries and successors with respect to the geography of America has led to considerable misapprehension. We are wiser than our forefathers, but though we are aware that the native American tribes are not Indians, they are popularly supposed to be people of an Oriental type; whereas, in their manners, customs, and physical traits, they are unique. We do not here enter into the question of ethnological classification, but simply refer to practical distinctiveness. The American Indians are not only, like most savages, fond of war, but they are peculiarly hardy, daring, and enduring warriors. Thus the people of the Confederate States will be glad to learn from President Davis that his Government is on friendly terms with the Indians; and the people of the United States have ample cause for uneasiness, when, in their present position, they are told that some of the tribes have revolted, and that it is supposed a general Indian war has commenced. In England a Maori insurrection, or even an Indian war, does not disturb the public tranquillity, for our colonies and our Eastern Empire are distant; but the colonies and uncivilized dominions of America are in her midst.

In 1776 there were about seventy recognized native tribes, and not one of these has become extinct. In 1837, when the small-pox attacked the Indians—one of the most fearful visitations that ever afflicted a people—the Mandans were reduced from 1600 to thirty-one persons, and the survivors were captured by their enemies and sold into slavery; yet the Mandan tribe has survived, though its numbers are insignificant. Clanship, which was in Scotland, and is in China, the foundation of Government, and which is, indeed, under various forms and denominations in all countries, the primary source and strength of the social compact, is a ruling passion with the American aborigines. But, besides the tribal bond, there is a political organization of defined propositions, and constituted for the performance of specific functions. The seventy tribes were divided into groups and confederacies, and these associations have proved lasting, because they were not the fruit of political intrigue or accident, but the natural result of similarity of race, concurrence of interest, and general fitness for union. Deportation and other events have scattered the various confederacies, yet the old unions are not dissolved. If any tribe enters into war, its confederates, distant as well as near, embrace the first opportunity of rendering assistance. Thus hostility with one tribe involves war with several tribes. The form of government of the American Indians has been very little changed by contact with Europeans, and may be described as patriarchal and republican. As is usual with savage nations, old age is peculiarly venerated, not so much from natural instinct, as that where experience is the only educator, wisdom, if it exists at all, is associated with length of years. The old men of their tribes rule by virtue of their seniority, and they also form the confederate council. This council, though only assembled upon the emergency of war, is a perpetual institution.

In 1776 there were three, or at most, four, groups or confederacies; a fifth—the Shoshonee or Snakes—has been added by the territorial extension of the United States. These groups are variously designated. Sometimes European names, such as the Mohawks and Delawares, are employed. Different writers name the groups after different tribes. In a return made in 1847 to Congress of the number of Indians within the settled territory of the United States, they were designated as Iroquois, Algonquin, Dakota, and Appalachian. At present there are about 20,000 to 25,000 Indians within the settled States and territory of the late United States; or what are officially called tax-paying Indians; and the total Indian population is estimated at not less than 400,000.

It was soon discovered that Europeans and Indians could not live together. The political fusion of diametrically opposed races is a chimera. The United States tried the experiment, and, of course, failed. There was no security for white people whilst the native Indians were their immediate neighbours. Two courses were open to the United States—they could either exterminate the natives, or bribe them to loyalty. The first plan was not only cruel but costly, and, therefore, the second was adopted. Several tribes, including the Choctaws, Cherokees, Creeks, and Chickasaws, were induced to emigrate to a considerable distance beyond the then frontier of the settled and even explored territory of the States, upon agreements to receive certain annual bounties or annuities. Similar treaties have been made with tribes who have not been deported, but whom extension of dominion has brought the United States into contact. An annual bounty is cheaper than an Indian war, and, let us add, more just and humane. These bounties, which are paid in money and kind, are represented by $2,251,000 invested in stock, and $5,273,000 on which Congress stipulates to pay interest. These bounties, which have been more than compensated by the sale of Indian lands, are only an item in the charges of the American Indian Administration.

The Department of the Interior in the United States might have more appropriately been called the Department of the Exterior, since the main business thereof is to manage the Indian bureau. The Indians are, both in theory and practice, placed in a very anomalous position with regard to the United States. They are supposed to owe fealty to a Federation, in the Government of which they are in no way represented. The claim of sovereignty over the Indians is no doubt valid and indisputable, but it is in opposition to the letter of the Constitution of the United States; for the rule is that even the territories have a voice, though not a vote. Again the lands inhabited by the Indians were a portion of the United States' domains, yet commissioners were sent by the Washington Government to the Indian tribes, whose functions were nearly analogous to those of ministers accredited to foreign Powers. The total cost of the Indian Department in 1851, an exceptionally favourable year, was, including the annuities, $2,420,722. This is a serious outlay, when we consider that the trading relation of the Indians is of little value, and the then small aggregate Government expenditure of the United States. But even this sum does not embrace the whole cost of the Indian Department.

The ambassadors or commissioners have not been able to insure peace. The bounties have been made dependent upon the observance of treaties, yet war with the Indians has been chronic. Before the dispute with one tribe could be adjusted, another was in revolt, though the outbreaks were at some periods far more important than at others. The army of the United States was mainly needed for operations against the Indians, and therefore a considerable share of the Federal military expenditure should have been charged to the Indian account. We do not mean merely when war was actively raging on the frontier, as in the case of the Seminole revolt; but at all times, because a standing army was the only possible guarantee for the safety of the country from Indian incursions. The causes of this continual hostility are, the jealousy with which the Indian beholds the advance of the white man, the natural inclination of the savage for warfare, and the hope of extorting larger annuities; for with the American Indians, as with all other nations, a bought peace is a hollow truce. The money given encourages hostilities, by holding out a certain prize for obstinately contested warfare. We are not preferring any charge against the United States. The expedient of annuities, though not thoroughly efficient, was nevertheless vastly better than extermination; and the Washington Government, until lately, has rigidly observed the terms of the treaties, and even construed them liberally.

Upon the dissolution of the late Union and the establishment of the Confederate States, the allegiance or friendship of the Indians was divided between the two Governments. We have no means of exactly defining the numbers that have ranged themselves on either side. All the slaveholding Indians have gone to the South, besides several non-slaveholding tribes. It is here worthy of remark, that though some of the Indians own slaves, it has been found utterly impossible to reduce the Indians themselves to a state of slavery. President Davis has succeeded in maintaining friendly relations with the Confederate States' tribes, but we need hardly add, the only thing he requires of them is that they observe a strict neutrality and not take any part in the war. The tribes adhering to the United States, so far from being neutral, have revolted, and a general Indian war has commenced, or is imminent. The alleged reason of the outbreak is the non-payment of the annuities, and if this complaint is well founded, it shows the careless and imprudent administration of Mr. Lincoln's Cabinet; for whatever had gone unpaid, the Indian annuities, especially at this crisis should have been discharged. Possibly the allegation is false, and the motives of the insurrection are the same as usual. The most menacing feature in the affair is the simultaneous revolt of the Sioux and Chippewa tribes, who are hereditary and bitter enemies. If the immemorial hate of the savage is forgotten, or, at least, laid dormant for the sake of attacking the common foe, the United States will have to encounter an Indian revolt of unprecedented proportions.

The expense of these Indian wars is larger than may be supposed. The Seminole war cost $25,000,000, or about £6,000,000; yet the Seminole war would be small compared to a war with the Sioux, Chippewas, and their kindred and confederate tribes. The number of Indians at present in revolt against the United States is about 55,000 souls. The fighting element in the Indian population is far above the average. Every man capable of bearing arms is a warrior, and the pursuits of peace are never allowed to hinder the prosecution of war. Out of 55,000 it is a moderate estimate to say that there are 7000 warriors. But what of 7000 warriors? What is it more than a corps d'armée? If the 7000 warriors would mass together, and meet the United States' army on the open field, the affair would not be so very menacing. The carnage would be great, but the Indians, outnumbered and outgeneraled, would inevitably be annihilated. It happens, however, that the Indians will not mass themselves together, but conduct their wars in a manner that greatly multiplies their aggressive power, and makes it extremely difficult to decimate, much less annihilate them. The United States' officers who have been engaged in Indian warfare all testify to this; but that the Indian warfare is so perpetual is very striking proof of its formidable character. It is well known that the Indians who fought for the English in the first War of Independence were a source of great trouble and danger to the colonists; yet it is stated by James Maddison that not more than 770 Indians were on the English side. We need not dwell on the significance of this fact.

We have no desire, and it is needless, to exaggerate the last but not the least of the difficulties with which the United States has to contend. As this war rolls on, the clouds and darkness become more gloomy and intense. It is already a terrible, heart-sickening record, but who can predict the horrors that will intervene between now and the era of peace? The Indian in his wigwam sniffs the carnage from afar, and hastens to take part in the fray. The Federal commanders and authorities have endeavoured to transform the docile negro into a savage, and turn him against his master, and meantime the Indian war-whoop proclaims savage warfare against the United States. The Northern press and the fanatics and clergy of New England have gloated over the prospect of Southern desolation; but it seems as though their own borders are to be desolated, and that their impious curses are coming home to roost.

THE Northern hatred of the negro is daily increasing. What would have been the sufferings of the coloured race if it had become subject to Federal rule, may be gathered from the following, and which is not a solitary instance of such cruelty:—

"On Sunday morning, the 24th inst.," says the correspondent of the New York Express, "within ten yards of King-street, Alexandria, while hundreds of Union soldiers were in the neighbourhood, a cold-blooded villain, out of sheer hatred to the negroes, deliberately aimed a shot at one who happened to be passing. The ball passed clear through the man's head, instantly killing him. I was near by at the time, but noticed that the event created no particular remark. There lay the body on the side walk, a purple stream running to the gutter, and a small crowd looking on. No effort was made to arrest the murderer, though a man present said he knew who he was, but he would be — if he told anybody. A moment afterwards," continues the same writer, "an infuriated crowd pursued an aged negro up King-street, his daughter following, shrieking 'Murder! Save my father!' The fate of the old man might have been hard had not the Provost Guard arrived in time to prevent further violence. An officer rode up at the time and asked me what the matter was. Telling him of the murder just below, he said, 'Oh, that's nothing. I saw two dead niggers a few blocks lower down.' This may or may not have been so, but I have no doubt of its truth. On Sunday the darkies kept pretty well out of sight. What the original cause of the trouble was, or whether any trouble existed, could not be ascertained. Certainly, there was no justification for such cold-blooded murder. That soldiers do not like the blacks is patent to any one who has been in the army. Whether they are to be allowed such limits to their hate, or not, probably the military authorities of Alexandria can tell us."

Reviews.

WASHINGTON IRVING.*

PETS, whether young or old, bipeds or quadrupeds, even when intrinsically valuable, are generally nuisances; and what makes the matter worse is, that pets are often spoiled and always injured by excessive fondling. Look at my lady's lap-dog, daintily fed and treated by the six-foot lackey with apparent solicitude and deference; what a snappish, discontented creature it is. Fatness and a well-trimmed coat do not produce happiness. It is evident that the lowly, roughly-used street cur has no reason to envy my lady's pet. We need not refer to spoiled children, since they are denounced by everybody, except their doting mammas, and are, it is well known, as miserable as youth and freedom from the world's cares will let them be. Or take the case of the pet parson, of the unmarried curate, for whom spinsters of uncertain ages esteem it a privilege to work slippers and braces. These "gifted" successors of the fishermen of Galilee are a dead weight in society. They may always be distinguished at evening parties and elsewhere by the manifestation of an uneasy sense of their own importance. Many a stalwart and promising soldier of the Cross has, from the system of petting, degenerated into a foppish nonentity. But of all pets the most tiresome are literary pets. We trust the race is dying out, and that the petty vanity of ruling at pic-nics, and being lionized in drawing rooms, is no longer associated with genius, or the showy talents that are so designated. Who can read the life of "Tom" Moore without a sentiment of regret, mingled with a feeling of disgust, at the way in which his powers were wasted in social frivolities, and how his domestic happiness was destroyed and his manliness and self-respect lost by fulsome adulation? If Byron had not been a pet, can there be any doubt that he would have left behind him nobler and more enduring monuments of his genius? With regard to Washington Irving, we do not mean to say that he was spoiled, as Moore and Byron were, but it is clear, we think, that he did not pass through the fiery ordeal unscathed, and that he would, perhaps, have done more for his own fame and for mankind, if noble lords and ladies had not treated him as a fashionable and season pet. Not that this feeling is the peculiar vice of the English aristocracy; it has been practised by the mobocracy of New York and New England to a marvellous extent. And this partly explains the coldness and ill-will with which European writers on the manners and customs of the late United States have referred to the South. In the North they were the idols of the hour; but in the South they met with no lionizing, and construed the different conduct to be a sign of want of due appreciation of their abilities.

Washington Irving, it must be admitted, had a substantial and deserved success in this country. He not only obtained a high price for his works, but Murray offered him "£1000 a year to conduct a monthly magazine, and to pay liberally besides for any original articles he might insert; offers 100 guineas an article for contributions for the Quarterly Review." The proposal to conduct the magazine was refused, because he would not bind himself to fix his residence out of America, and in this Mr. Irving displayed highly creditable patriotism, but his refusal to contribute to the Quarterly does not appear so well founded. "As for the Review itself (the Quarterly), it has always been so hostile to our country, I cannot drive a pen in its service." Mr. Irving was, of course, not asked to write a line that could be offensive to the United States, and it occurs to us that he might have done good service to his country by contributing to the unfriendly Review; had he lived to this time he would have confessed that the Quarterly's criticisms were equally faithful and severe.

This is still more curious, as afterwards he contributed two articles—one on the "Conquest of Granada," and one to help a literary fund. These articles, we are expressly told, were gratuitous; but if the Quarterly might be written for gratuitously, there could be no impropriety in giving paid contributions.

It may seem, at the first glance, somewhat curious that a thoroughly English publisher should have offered the editorship of a magazine to an American author, but Washington Irving, both in style and ideas, was an English writer. He did not cultivate "the American language" and literary bunkum. And this remark applies not only to him, but to all American authors of reputation. The American author has the same models before him as the English author, and as much right to reverence Shakspeare, Milton, and the English classics as we have. Unfortunately for the United States, a new species of literature has been in vogue for many years. The masses have been fed with the most unwholesome mental food. It is impossible to give an adequate conception of the reading of the million. Harper's Magazine and periodicals of that kind, not content with pirating the works of English authors, have produced several new novels of a grossly demoralizing character. Seductions, murders, and wholesale bigamies [are the mild incidents of these novels. A free press, where a mob is dominant, may do incalculable harm. We do not advocate the Lincolnite despotism, but rather point out the need of a law somewhat similar to that useful Act of the late Lord Campbell, which, without restraining the liberty of the press, makes the production of a certain species of immoral publications criminal.

This second volume of Washington Irving's life abounds with anecdotes, some grave, some gay, and all told with considerable spirit. By being appointed Secretary Legation, and especially by being Charge d'Affs, at the Court of St. James's, he had an opportunity of seeing very much of men and manners, for at the age of his official responsibility (1831) there was much excitement in Europe, and in England the question of form began to assume a menacing aspect. He sketches William the Fourth:—

"The King keeps all London agog; nothing but sights, and piques, and reviews. He is determined that it shall be merry in England once more. Yesterday morning there was a solid review in St. James's Park, at which all the world was present. Then a royal breakfast at the Duke of Wellington, attended by the dignitaries of the court and several of the foreign ministers, Mr. McLane among the number. In the afternoon there was held a chapter of the order of the Garter, for the installation of the King of Württemberg. Then a grand dinner at the palace, at which Mr. and Mrs. McLane "assisted." Mr. McLane and the King became so thick that some of the corps diplomatique showed symptoms of jealousy. The King took to him especially when he found he had begun the world by being a midshipman. The King and Mrs. McLane also had some pleasant discourse. In the evening there was a brilliant dress ball at the Duke of Wellington's, at which I was present. The King was there in great spirits, notwithstanding the busy day he had been through. He spoke to everybody right and left in the most affable manner, and I observe he has an easy and natural way of wiping his nose with the back of his forefinger, which I fancy is a relic of his old middie habits. Upon the whole, however, he seems in a most happy mood, and disposed to make every one happy about him, and if he keeps on as he is going, without getting too far out of his depth, he will make the most popular king that ever sat on the English throne.

* The Life and Letters of Washington Irving. Edited by his Nephew, Pierre M. Irving. Vol. II. London: Richard Bentley.

It seems that thirty years ago Lord Palmerston was noted for his pleasantness. The King, in course of conversation, Alluded to Lord Palmerston, who was present, and said he believed we found him a very pleasant man to transact business with. I assented to the observation fully, but added that we might testify in the same way to the members of His Majesty's Government generally.

What business the United States' Minister could have had with all the members of the King's Government we cannot conceive, but Mr. Irving's answer was quite as sensible as His Majesty's question. Mr. Randolph, who was accredited to Russia, must have been, as Irving calls him, "a rare bird." Mr. Pierce Irving tells the following capital story:—

Randolph, however "well informed on points of etiquette," had his own notions about doing things, and I have heard Mr. Irving give an amusing account of his presentation at court in London, as it came under his own notice. Mr. McLane and Mr. Irving called for him in a carriage, and they found him prepared to accompany them with black coat, and shoes small clothes, with knee buckles, white stockings, and stockings with gold buckles, a sword, and a little clack hat. They looked wonderingly at his dress, so likely with his odd figure to attract observation. He pointed to his gold buckles. "No sham about them. Randall and Bridge, by—!" To some observation as to the propriety of his dress, "I wear no man's livery, by—!" "But," said Mr. Irving, "the object of a court costume is to avoid awkwardness and challenge; there is a convenience in it, and, at all events, you don't want a sword."—"Oh now, Irving, as to a sword, you need not pretend to teach me about that; my father wore a sword before me, by—!" Mr. Irving explained that the sword belonged to a different costume, but was out of place in that dress. This seemed to strike Randolph, and he unbuckled his sword afterwards, and left it in the carriage. As he was about to enter the antechamber, where the foreign ministers are in waiting, he was, as Mr. Irving had feared, stopped by the usher. Mr. Irving immediately explained who he was, and he was permitted to pass. "There now, Randolph," said he, "you see one of the inconveniences of being out of costume." In the antechamber, the foreign ministers eyed him curiously. Admitted to the presence-chamber, he preceded Mr. Irving, made his bow to royalty in his turn, and then passed before other members of the Royal family. As he went by the Duke of Sussex, the latter beckoned Mr. Irving; "Irving," said he, with his thumb reversed over his right shoulder, and moving it significantly up and down, half suppressing a laugh at the same time "who's your friend, Hokey Pokey?" Mr. Irving, jealous for the honour of his country, replied with emphasis, "That, sir, is John Randolph, United States' Minister at Russia, and one of the most distinguished orators of the United States." Some time afterwards, Mr. Irving was dining with the Duke of Sussex, and he inquired after McLane, who had returned to his own country; then, pursuing his inquiries, he added, with a significant smile, "and how is our friend Hokey Pokey?"

The present volume concludes with Mr. Irving's return to America. He was cordially received, and, amongst other honours, was invited to a banquet in his native city. In the course of his speech in return for his health being drunk, he said:—

I come from gloomier climes to one of brilliant sunshine and inspiring prosperity. I come from countries opening with doubt and danger, where the rich man trembles and the poor man frowns—where all repine at the present and dread the future. I come from thence to a country where life is life and animation, where I hear on every side the sound of exultation; where every one speaks of the past with triumph, the present with delight, the future with growing and confident anticipation.

How changed is the aspect of America! Yet, when the words were spoken, just thirty years ago, he causes were at work which ultimately brought about the dissolution of the Union—but a dissolution that could not have involved ruin had it not been for the attempt of the North to conquer the South.

SHORT NOTICES.

The Autobiography of the Emperor Charles the Fifth, lately discovered in the Portuguese Language, by Baron Kervyn Lettenhove. The English Translation by Leonard Francis Simpson. (Longman and Co.)

Reminiscences of the Life and Character of Count Camille de la Rive. Translated from the French by Edward Gifford. (Longman and Co.)

Memoir of a Chequered Life in both Hemispheres. By Charles Shelton. (Bentley.)

Adventures of Baron Wenceslas Wratislaw, of Mitrowitz: at the same in the Turkish Metropolis Constantinople, experienced his Captivity, and after his happy Return to his Country devoted to writing in the Year of Our Lord 1599. Literally translated from the original Bohemian, by A. H. Wratislaw, M.A. (Grand Dair)

Canada and the Crimea, or Sketches of a Soldier's Life, from the Journals and Correspondence of the late Major Ranken, F.R.S. Edited by his Brother, W. Bayne Ranken. (Longman and Co.)

Memoirs of John Venning, Esq., with numerous Notices from Manuscripts relative to the Imperial Family of Russia. By J. S. Henderson. (Knight and Son.)

LONGFELLOW in that pretty string of commonplaces which he calls "The Psalm of Life," says we are reminded by the lives of great men that—

"We can make our lives sublime,
And departing, leave behind us
Footprints on the sand of Time."

Whether this be true or not, it is certain that every man, from the king upon his throne to Soyer the cook, and Blondin the acrobat, can render himself immediately or posthumously ridiculous, notorious, or infamous, as the case may be, by writing his life or causing it to be written by some friend who glories in toadyism. A great craving to know the private lives of public men is not indicative of a healthy tone of mind, but is the sign of a puerile curiosity; yet the rage for autobiography is still less excusable. Of what value is self-testimony? Granting when men sit down to write their own lives they wish to write fairly, is it possible they can see themselves as others see them, or know themselves as they are known? An autobiography may be light and amusing reading, but so far as it relates to the subject thereof, it no more deserves credence than a novel.

As for people keeping a diary without any view to its future publication, we have some doubts—we speak of an elaborate diary; for if it is not intended to be given to the world, we cannot understand the motive of the labour; but admitting there is no expectation of "rushing into print," the record is coloured by that innate vanity that makes each one in his heart of hearts think himself in some respects better than his neighbours. We are not inclined to dispute the genuineness of the autobiography of Charles the Fifth, for the external and internal evidence of its authenticity is very strong, but it does not influence our opinion as to the character of that monarch. He left it behind him as a vindication of his Catholicism, and this vindication includes the admission of his hypocrisy to Protestantism. Is it not possible that the imperial hypocrite was as false in his writings as in his acts? The only use the historical student can make of this volume is to accept those facts that are supported by collateral evidence, and to reject the rest. So that it does not add to our stock of knowledge, unless we are to believe the testimony of one who thought statesmanship and duty involved continual deception.

M. de la Rive is a kind of friend from whom great men may pray to be delivered. In his book the Count Cavour is ridiculously caricatured. M. de la Rive is such a hot-headed partizan that he is not contented with saying his idol's faults tend to virtue's side, but he declares his foibles to be absolute virtues. Cavour was too illustrious to deserve such treatment, and it is a comfort to reflect that when the passions evoked by the struggle in which he was engaged have died out his life will be fairly portrayed.

It is pretty well agreed that whether auricular confession is good or bad for the penitent, it does not improve the confessor. No one is better for listening to tales of corruption. In a "Chequered Life" we have a work that is sure to prove attractive to a large class of readers. It professes to be the history of a man who, from his youth upwards, has been a spendthrift and a heartless deceiver; and who, when he can no longer corrupt in propria persona, does what he can to injure his fellow-creatures by the publication of an insidious and immoral novel. We say novel advisedly; for though Mr. Shelton may have been capable of doing all the harm he parades, we may be quite sure he would not write his life without exaggerating his vicious triumphs. It is, moreover, pretty sure that the deceiver was sometimes deceived. We have a suspicion that on more than one occasion, when he was rejoicing at having brought some of his many female victims to ruin, the supposed victims were enjoying a quiet laugh at his expense, at having so cleverly beguiled and robbed him. The best part of the book is that which describes his adventures out of England.

The last three works in our list are, though in different degree, deserving of commendation. The adventures of Baron Wratislaw give an admirably graphic account of the Turkish Empire at the end of the sixteenth century. The narrative of the sufferings of the Ambassador and his suite is simple and pathetic. The experience of the late Major Ranken in Canada and the Crimea is instructive, as well as pleasantly told. The record of Mr. Venning, who was a merchant in St. Petersburg, deals mainly with the benevolent objects in which he was engaged, and gives some interesting anecdotes about the Russian Court.

MR. LEECH'S SKETCHES.

Probably the most entertaining exhibition in London, both for the Englishman and the foreigner, is the gallery of Mr. Leech's pictures, in the Egyptian Hall, Piccadilly. They tell their story so well, there is so much genial humour, such a nice discrimination of character, and, with all this, such a kindly and gentle handling of the wonderful powers of satire the artist undoubtedly possesses, that the lessons he conveys on the foibles of the day provoke only a good-natured smile—laugh we should rather say—for it is impossible to look at these admirable drawings without a good hearty laugh. We were glad to see the subscription book for the engravings, of a selected portion of them, is well filled, and as they have been entrusted to good hands, we have no doubt all parties will be well satisfied. Painter and engraver, with the well-earned profits of the speculation, and the buyers with an inexhaustible supply of fun and amusement for a leisure hour, or a wet day. Where all are so excellent it is almost invidious to point out especial favourites, but the delineation of the agony of the elderly gentleman, irritated by a blue bottle, seems to us to unite all the excellences of the artist's inimitable style with very great powers of drawing. A severe critic might object to the eccentricities of the details—the top pane of glass broken, and such minor extravagances; but the whole design is so charmingly carried out, that one is ashamed to be severe in smaller matters. Again, the old coachman's futile endeavour to stop Miss Ellen's frolic on Joey, by taking him off the hard road, is a splendid piece of drawing, independently of the exquisite fun of the action.

What can be more carefully drawn than the boatman's legs appearing as continuations of the fair damsel's voluminous crinoline, crossing the perilous plank from the bathing machine, or Annt Fanny, in spectacles, peeping round the corner at the lay figures she takes, from their red coats, to be soldiers on the beach. His boys, too, are thorough English boys, such as one never sees outside the shores of Great Britain—even the sturdy little wretch whose agonized face gives the most expressive and ludicrous lie to the bathing woman's cry. "Bless his dear heart, I know'd he'd take to it kindly," to the fierce young Briton proclaiming to Collins, "he is going to take a header." He has a wonderful eye for a horse, too, from the broenck-pl-ek hack to the lordly hunter, and the swinging gallop is as free and even careless as the well-adjusted seat of the Leicestershire sportsman is the height of Melton Mowbray dandyism. In fact, we may say of Leech, "nihil tetigit quod non ornavit," and the man who has the chance and misses it of seeing these sketches deserves to eat thistles to the end of his days.

NORTHERN ANGLING FOR SYMPATHY.

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

SIR.—It is an old and trite saying that "a man may tell a lie so often that he comes in time conscientiously to believe it true," and we suppose some such feeling must have actuated the reverend gentlemen who, at the Sunday School Convocation lately in London, expressed their belief that the Northerners had carried on their suicidal war with the one idea to abolish slavery. We last week called attention to the President's remarkable exposition of his views on the subject; but even that, plain as language could make it, has failed to convey any meaning which the sense of the words can bear to the understanding of the enthusiasts who ventured to become the mouthpieces of the North at that meeting.

The Rev. J. H. Vincent, of Illinois, from what he had learned of President Lincoln, knew that he was opposed to slavery; and though the telegram that had been referred to was susceptible of two readings, he would explain the one which he thought was meant. President Lincoln states "he is emphatically for union, and that he would retain or destroy slavery, either wholly or in part, if Union could be obtained by either means." His meaning was, that he was prepared to abolish slavery at once, or he would retain it for the present, having destroyed the political character of slavery, and leave it for time to work slavery out.

The Rev. J. Graham, in a lengthened address, said that all along his sympathies had been with the North. He believed that they had been animated with the one desire to abolish slavery, and he trusted the result would prove it to be so.

The Rev. Dr. Waddington went at some length into the history of slavery, and gave it as his most deliberate opinion that the only cause of the war was slavery, and that the North was true to its principles.

Is it possible that these men are really honest in the convictions they express? Can they seriously misconstrue every fact and every argument which shows that the idea they boldly announce is a barefaced lie, cunningly devised to humbug the honest Briton? In vain.

Mr. Daniel Pratt contended the North would not be right until they looked upon their coloured brethren as equal in every respect with themselves. Such certainly was not the case at present. In America there was a system of negro-tickets. He assured them that such was the case. The President only recently called about him a number of black men, and asked them what they required, and ultimately recommended them to leave the country, in order that he might avoid a difficulty. He had always avowed that he would sacrifice the question of slavery to preserve the Union. That was not the principle which England could sympathize with. Let them boldly state that at all risks they would abolish slavery, and this country would then assist and pray for them.

But what are we to think of the statements of the other advocates of British sympathy with the Yankee war against the independence of the South.

The Rev. Dr. McClintock, of New York, said that some three years ago the only point of dispute between England and America was the cause of slavery; and now that America was willing to declare the abolition of slavery, England held aloof from her. There was no reason why they should not have the sympathy of England, for during the Indian mutiny England had the sympathy of America. He had been told that, if the States were separated, it would be for the benefit of the world, for they would be two large military powers, and would not be able to attack other nations. If the separation took place, what would be the result? The South would take Mexico, and would also include a great deal of the territory on the south of the Mississippi, and there would be a field for slavery. If that separation took place, they would both be great naval and military powers; they would keep up great armies and navies to protect themselves from each other; but whatever might be their own feelings towards one another, they would both be willing at any moment to join together to fight against England or France.

Mr. Albert Woodruff, of Brooklyn, proceeded to detail what he deemed to be the first cause of the estrangement between the Northern and the Southern States of America. There were in America two parties—the republicans and the democrats. The republicans, when they were in the majority, said that they would not allow the increase of slavery in the South, but that they would not interfere with their rights as secured by their Constitution. The democrats joined with the South, and they declared that they would import slaves without hindrance. Upon this the contending parties took issue, and President Lincoln was elected. They felt that they had a right to expect the sympathy of England when they took up that ground. He was not now speaking politically, but on the ground of Christian brotherhood. The first act that the Northern States performed was to abolish slavery in Columbia. They also offered rewards to the States that would gradually abolish slavery, and had in their hands $800,000,000 to distribute to those States that would carry out these views. The Government had done much for the abolition of slavery, and had done what no other country had done in this cause—they had taken a notorious slave-trader and had hung him for that crime, and they had, therefore, a right to claim and expect the sympathy and moral support of England. The entire object of the war was the abolition of slavery and the freedom of the world.

There is no one single proposition brought forward by these gentlemen that ought not at once to be contradicted flatly, as not only untrue, but the very contrary of honesty and truth. Is America "willing to declare the abolition of slavery?" Had England "the sympathy of America during the Indian mutiny?" Would both North and South be "willing at any moment to join together to fight England and France?" Dr. McClinton knows better in every respect. And whence does Mr. Woodruff draw the information he vouchsafed that the republicans "would not interfere with rights secured by the Constitution;" and "democrats declare they would import slaves without hindrance." Where does he find "this as the issue on which Lincoln was elected?" Again, was abolition of slavery in Columbia "the first act of the Northern States?" and when were "$800,000,000 offered to the States to abolish slavery gradually?" This audacity of unfounded assertion is properly capped by his calling British sympathy for the judicial murder of that wretched drunken captain, whose execution, with all its horrible tragi-comic adjuncts, filled all Europe with disgust. Really one feels ashamed of being betrayed into notice of such barefaced falsehoods; but the fact that clergymen can, at this date, stand up on a public platform in London, and state in uncontradicted facts and arguments so undeniably contrary to the voice of history, and the knowledge and experience of every man who has even read the newspapers, shows that there are still people here whom nothing but the disgrace of being exposed will turn from their mischievous and wicked delusions. It has often been pointed out, the use that is being made by the unscrupulous promoters of this war of aggression, of the religious sentiment of this country—a sentiment which deserves all the honour and all the respect which the feelings of honest and honourable men can accord. We do not hesitate to attach most, if not all, the moral superiority of Englishmen to this firm conviction of religious principle. But when such a sentiment is allowed to pander to such a cause as now seeks to ally itself, it ceases to be even respectable, and it is the duty of every honest man to denounce it. Every day shows the utter fallacy of any sympathy with the negro in the North. The wholesale and uncontrolled murders of the negroes by drunken brawlers, recorded in the very latest accounts of the Times correspondent, are but the natural development in a time of unbridled licence of the feeling which has induced State Legislatures absolutely to forbid the residence of negroes within their borders; and all individuals, irrespective of rank or station, to refuse to ride in the same carriage, to sit on the same seat, or receive a plate or a cup from a negro's hand. The negro whom these men dare to assert has been the cause of this war between brethren, and for whose sake alone the North has expended millions of treasure and thousands of lives, I am quite aware that argument is useless with such minds, but it is a duty to protest against the semblance of believing that Englishmen can listen with patience to such advocates of the most monstrous despotism which has been seen since the Committee of Public Safety in 1793, and which it was reserved for an unbridled and rampant republican party again to show to an astonished generation.

AN ENGLISH SYMPATHIZER.

THE FIGHT AT BATON ROUGE.

(From the Grenada Appeal, Aug. 11.)

Camp on Comite River,
Thursday, Aug. 7.

On Sunday, the 3rd inst., General Breckenridge advised General Van Dorn that he would be prepared to attack Baton Rouge at daylight the following morning. General Van Dorn replied that the Arkansas would not reach a position where she could participate in the fight until Tuesday morning. It was then definitely determined that the attack should be made at daylight on the morning of the 5th, the ram Arkansas, of whose steady and uninterrupted progress down the river we had been constantly advised, co-operating with the troops.

At 10 o'clock on Monday night, August 4, the troops, about 2400 in all, advanced from their camp on Comite River. The men were in the finest spirits, and confident of accomplishing their purpose before breakfast time. The march of ten miles over a smooth sandy road, between well cultivated plantations, was conducted with quiet and order.

General Clark's division occupied the right, and that of General Raggles the left. The advance was made in four lines, that of the left over a rough country, across ditches, through sugar cane, over fences—a very fatiguing and exhausting march. It was ten minutes to 5 o'clock when we first brushed the enemy. They were in good position, under cover, and opened out upon our advance with considerable precision and effect. It was, however, but the work of a moment to dislodge them. Like so many coveys of partridges, they started up and flew rapidly before our advancing columns, the boys giving vent to exulting cheers, as with fixed bayonets they followed the retreating Yankees. The morning was quite foggy, and a heavy mist hung over the entire landscape, rendering it difficult to plant our batteries so as not to operate either upon one or the other of our wings. Our lines were then converging towards a common centre, the enemy fleeing towards his camps. But it was not without loss that we thus drove them in. They sought every possible covert place, and, rallying, gave a peppery salute to our men. Their batteries were also admirably handled, and belched forth devastating columns of canister, grape, shrapnel, shell, and solid shot. One by one, however, they were forced to give back. Limber up and to the rear march was the constant order, and had it not been obeyed all their guns would have fallen into our possession. As it was, the 4th Louisiana charged a battery twice, each time at considerable loss, and were finally forced to lose their trophy, their commander, Col. Allen, falling, shot through both legs. This somewhat demoralized the regiment, which had already been distinguished for its good conduct. Captain Hughes, commanding the 22nd Mississippi, fell dead while leading a charge; Colonel Boyd, of the Louisiana battalion, was severely wounded in the arm; the gallant 31st Mississippi, while charging ahead, lost its colours; but the battle flag was immediately grasped by a lieutenant, who, bearing it aloft, was shot down, and a third man seizing it, received a death wound. But onward went the left. General Raggles was conspicuous for daring, and his aide, Col. Charles Jones, of Louisiana, while delivering an order, was struck down by a shell and seriously wounded. Our troops were now in the camps, and though tempting enough, none stopped to pillage. The 3rd, 6th, and 7th Kentucky regiments were going ahead like a hurricane. Nothing could stop their fearful and determined progress. The more obstinate the resistance, the fiercer their onsets. Overwhelming as were the odds against them, they pressed forward, mostly at a "charge bayonet," yelling like madmen. Colonel A. P. Thompson, of Paducah, fell, wounded severely through the neck, and Adj. R. B. L. Soery was wounded dangerously. Other officers went down, but the men marched on.

While the left was thus forcing the enemy into town, the right wing, under General Charles Clark, did not lag behind. General Breckenridge was himself with this division, and his presence had a magical effect upon the men. There was no danger he did not share with them. His tall form seemed ubiquitous—here, there, everywhere, where there was peril, where there was an enemy to drive or a position to gain. Of the gallantry and noble bearing of his young son Cabell I should not speak were it not that he is as modest as he is meritorious—a worthy scion of a noble stock. General Breckenridge led personally several charges, and towards the close of the action, coming up to the Fourth and Fifth Kentucky, who had fallen back utterly exhausted, he drew his sword, and with one appealing look said, in his clear, musical tones, "My men, charge!" This charge is described to us by an officer who participated, as one of the most signal and effective acts of the battle. The men rushed forward in no particular order, firing at and pursuing the enemy with a determination that could not be thwarted, driving them further than they had yet been driven.

We had already driven the enemy one and a half miles from the position where he was first encountered. We had seized all his camps, and forced him through the suburbs of the town. Then came the last charge, and right nobly did our exhausted soldiers discharge their duty. Way-worn, covered with dust and consumed by the heat of battle, the gallant boys plunged headlong into the fight, and before them fled the Yankees. In vain did they bring up their reserves. We drove them all in quite to the river completely under protection of their gunboats, many of them taking to the water.

It was then that General Breckenridge ordered a recall. He had received a message that it would be impossible for the Arkansas to participate then in the engagement, but that by 2 o'clock she could take a part. Slowly and with reluctance our troops fell back, although exposed to the heavy firing of the gunboats. About one mile and a half from town they were halted, and the poor, wearied, jaded fellows threw themselves upon the ground to rest.

It was at this last charge that General Clark had his hip badly shattered, and at his own request he was conveyed to a house in town. Captain Yeager, his aid, remained with him, and both were afterwards made prisoners. Throughout the whole engagement General Clark's conduct was notable for its intrepid daring. He could have been easily removed, but he knew that the wound was a fatal one, and preferred remaining behind.

Upon the fall back, General Breckenridge ordered the various camps and stores of the enemy to be destroyed. This was accordingly done, and a vast amount of property was burned. There were huge piles of pork, beef, bacon, flour, whisky, molasses, and sugar, quantities of clothing, at which our troops looked wistfully, all given to the flames. The encampments were those of the Maine, Vermont, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Michigan, and Indiana Regiments.

General Breckenridge entrusted the delicate and important duty of holding the field to Captain John A. Buckner, his adjutant-general. This officer, who had, during the morning, rendered himself a conspicuous target for the enemy, remained behind with a battery and seventy-five men. With this small force he maintained his position until near sundown, when the whole army was withdrawn.

A TRIBUTE TO THE SOUTH.

(From the Times.)

The people of the Confederate States have made themselves famous. If the renown of brilliant courage, stern devotion to a cause, and military achievements almost without a parallel can compensate men for the toil and privations of the hour, then the countrymen of Lee and Jackson may be consoled amid their sufferings. From all parts of Europe, from their enemies as well as their friends, from those who condemn their acts as well as those who sympathize with them, comes the tribute of admiration. When the history of this war is written, the admiration will doubtless become deeper and stronger, for the veil which has covered the South will be drawn away and disclose a picture of patriotism, of unanimous self-sacrifice, of wise and firm administration, which we can now only see indistinctly. The details of that extraordinary national effort which has led to the repulse and almost to the destruction of an invading force of more than half a million men will then become known to the world, and, whatever may be the fate of the new nationality or its subsequent claims to the respect of mankind, it will assuredly begin its career with a reputation for genius and valour which the most famous nations may covet. Within a period of eighteen months a scattered population, hitherto living exclusively by agriculture, and accustomed to trust for every product of art and manufactures to the North, has been turned into a self-sufficing State, able to raise an immense army, and conduct what is now an offensive war. But a year ago it was the boast of the Federals, and those who echoed them, that the Southerners could not make a gun barrel or a cart wheel,—indeed, hardly a screw or a teapenny-nail, and the conclusion drawn from this alleged incompetence was that a people so ignorant and helpless must soon fall before the superior genius of the North. And the assertion was not far from the truth, though the reasoning based on it has been so conspicuously refuted by events. When this struggle began, the Southern people were in many things indolent and unenterprising. They had been accustomed to lean on others in a manner which gave some excuse to the confidence of the Federals in their own superiority. They had so long relied on their one staple, and looked upon English cotton-spinners and New York merchants as their tributaries, that they could hardly have appeared even to themselves capable of organizing the military and political system which is now in force. Courage we all knew they possessed, and those who were best informed believed that, with the spirit they showed, the conquest of their country was impossible. But certainly the placing in the field of complete armies, with full military equipment, and capable of driving the enemy before them in a campaign hardly equalled since the days of the First Napoleon, was an achievement which was not expected even by those who gave most credit to their energy and to their latent intelligence.

But how has this great display of popular strength been called forth? The answer is plain. Nothing but necessity could have made the Confederates what they are. Nothing but the knowledge that they must fight for themselves, work for themselves, manufacture for themselves, and, in short, depend entirely on their own untried brains and sinews, could have roused the Southern people. Their energy and inventiveness have been those of a race cut off from the world and threatened with ruin by a hated foe. The South has been a kind of national Crusoe. The Confederates have found themselves face to face not only with the wilderness, but with an enemy from whose hands only a desperate effort could deliver them. From their own soil they must obtain everything which the smuggler or the blockade-breaker could not introduce. They must, in the hour of a gigantic invasion, turn their hands to new industries, or perish politically for ever. They must either substitute corn for cotton, make rifles, cannon, shells, gunpowder, waggons, and every warlike store, or see their States become a subject territory of the North, and their own families driven from their lands to make way for German and Irish mercenaries. The consequence has been another verification of the saying that men do not know what they can do till they try. The Southerners have done wonders, far more than we expected—evidently far more than they expected themselves. These men, who were represented as too wild for discipline, have become the most patient of soldiers, and are moved by their generals with the precision of the chessboard. This people, accustomed to pleasure and indulgence, has endured privations unknown in modern times, and, while taunted by its enemies with ignorance of useful arts, has exhibited in its iron-plated vessels the only original conception of the war.

We do not repeat these things for the mere purpose of sounding the praises of the South. It is rather with a view of showing how wise was the policy of the British Ministry and nation when they declined to interfere prematurely in the strife. It may truly be said that the Confederates owe their present successes to our "masterly inactivity." It is because England, and, through her persuasion, France also, determined that the Southerners should fight out their own quarrel, that they have fought it out with such unexampled heroism. They owe it to us that their whole population has risen to defend the soil, that they have abandoned every pursuit which does not conduce to the success of the war, and that their stern unanimity contrasts so strongly with the divided counsels and smouldering discontent of the North. It cannot be denied that there was a time when the Confederates had less confidence in themselves and looked to foreign nations a great deal more than was dignified or safe. The belief that England could never allow a cotton crop to be diverted from her shores was universal, and formed a dangerous obstacle to self exertion. The alliance of England and France was, probably, looked upon as certain by most Southern politicians during the early days of Secession, and we may fairly believe that the necessity of such an alliance was admitted by the leaders, and formed a chief element in their calculations. The disappointment of the South at our resolute inactivity was, no doubt, bitter; but it is greatly to the credit of the people that the feeling was only disappointment, and not despair. Whatever the Southerners may have thought and felt, and however they may have expressed themselves in private, neither the Government nor Congress, nor any public body, allowed any signs of anger or fear to escape them. Seeing that help from without was not to be expected, they set to work with one mind and will to fight their own battle, and the result is before the world.

PAYNE, HUNTINGDON AND
CO., NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A.,
Cotton Factors.

MOSES GREENWOOD, NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Cotton
Factor and Commission Merchant.

MCDOWELL, WITHERS, AND CO., MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A., Com-
mission Merchants.

GARLAND GOOD, MOBILE,
Cotton Factor and Commission Merchant.

BOYKIN AND McRAE, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

MILLER AND BATIE, Exchange
Brokers, MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

R. AND D. G. MILLS, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
GALVESTON, TEXAS, C.S.A.

ROTCHFORD, BROWN, AND
CO., Cotton Factors, NEW ORLEANS,
LOUISIANA, C.S.A.

R. W. RAYNE, NEW ORLEANS
LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Commission Merchant, offers facilities to European Consignors of Boots and Shoes to supply the markets of Tennessee, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Alabama. Specifications furnished of goods suitable to these markets.

ANDREW LOW AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

CHARLES GREEN,
Commission Merchant, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

H. D. WEDE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

JAMES CHAPMAN,
Commission Merchant, CHARLESTON.

N. A. HARDEE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

J. W. ANDERSON AND CO.
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

R. N. GOURDINE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Charleston.

RED AND STEWART, Com-
mission Merchants, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.
Represented by Andrew Stewart, 1, Ramford-place,
Liverpool.

J. H. ASHBRIDGE AND CO.,
Shipping and Commission Merchants, NEW ORLEANS.
Office—No. 80, Tower-buildings West, Liverpool.
Agents—Liverpool and New Orleans Mail Steam
Navigation Company.

S. A. PLUMMER AND CO.,
Importers and Dealers in Hardware,
PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA, C.S.A.

H. O. BREWER & CO.,
MOBILE, ALABAMA,
General Commission and Shipping Merchants.

ROBINSON & OLIVER,
Commission Merchants,
NEW ORLEANS,
C.S.A.
Represented by
JOS. T. ROBINSON & CO.,
India Buildings, Water-street,
Liverpool.

JOHN FRASER & CO.,
CHARLESTON,
South Carolina.
FRASER, TRENHOLM, & CO.,
Liverpool,
Commission Merchants.

WARWICK AND BARKSDALE,
GALLEGO FLOUR MILLS.
This immense establishment of capacity to manufacture 1000 barrels of Flour per day, purely for
South American Market. RICHMOND.

JOSEPH R. ANDERSON,
TREDGAR IRON WORKS
Manufacturers of Locomotive and other Engines,
all descriptions of Machinery, Rifled Cannon, &c.,
RICHMOND.

DUNLOP, MONCURE, & CO.,
General Commission Merchants,
RICHMOND.

A. G. MILWAINE, AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Tobacco, Cotton,
Grain, and other produce, PETERSBURG,
VIRGINIA.

C. W. WHITE,
Commission Merchant,
ST. THOMAS, WEST INDIES.

FRANCIS FORD, Manufacturer,
MANCHESTER: Three and Six Cord Spool
Thread, Cotton Balls, Knitting and Embroidering
Cottons. Imported by FOSTER AND MOORE,
Norfolk, Va.; P. RIMAILHO AND NEYREY,
New Orleans.

HAMILTON AND GRAHAM,
Importers, Wholesale Dealers in Dry
Goods, &c., PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA.

H. LEVY AND SON,
Commission Merchants, MOBILE.

R. D. RUSDEN, MANCHESTER,
ENGLAND, American Drills of all kinds,
Denims, Stripes, Shirtings, and all sorts of Manchester Goods.

SEARING AND CO.,
Commission Merchants,
MOBILE and NEW ORLEANS, C.S.A.
Represented by R. G. BLESLEY, Cotton Broker, by Royal-court, Royal-exchange, Manchester.

On Friday next, the 10th inst., in 1 vol. 8vo.
THE SOUTH VINDICATED:

Being a Series of Letters written for the American Press during the Canvass for the Presidency in 1860, with a Letter to Lord Brougham on the John Brown Raid, and a Survey of the Result of the Presidential Contest, and its consequences.

BY
THE HON. JAMES WILLIAMS,
Late American Minister to Turkey.

WITH AN INTRODUCTION
BY JOHN BAKER HOPKINS.

LONDON:
LONGMAN, GREEN, LONGMAN, ROBERTS, & GREEN.

HARPER AND CAUGHEY,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA. Represented by J. and A. CAUGHEY,
Tempest Chambers, Tempest Hey, Liverpool.

MR. WILLIAM FREEMAN,
Publisher of THE INDEX, will promptly
attend to all orders from or for the Continent of Europe and the States. Commissions for books and
goods of all kinds undertaken on moderate terms.
102, Fleet-street, London.

WORKS RECENTLY PUBLISHED
BY

WILLIAM FREEMAN,
102, FLEET STREET.

SHIFTING SCENES: and Other Poems. By J.
STANLEY BISS. Fcap. 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.; hand-somerly bound, 5s.

POEMS OF TRUTH AND FANCY. By S. R.
REDNAP. Crown 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.

THE WEARMOOUTH ABBOTS. (Second Edition).
A Tale, Illustrative of Saxon Christianity. Fcap.
8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.

JESUS THE SOUL'S NEED. By C. A. PORTER.
Royal 32mo. paper, 8d.; cloth, 1s.

PROGRESS; or, The International Exhibition.
By the Rev. W. ANDERSON, Author of "Self-
made Men." Royal 32mo. paper cover, 3d.

THE FATHERS OF THE WESLEY FAMILY.
By the Rev. S. BEALE. Crown 8vo. cloth, 1s. 6d.

DECISION AND CONSISTENCY. Exemplified
and Honoured in the Life of Daniel and his Three Friends. By THOMAS COLEMAN, Author of "Two
Thousand Confessors." Fcap. 8vo. cloth, 2s. 6d.

HOW THEY GOT THERE. By Rev. W.
BARKER. Being an Answer to "How Did They Get There?" Crown 8vo. sewed, price 2d.

PUNCH IN THE PULPIT. (Second Edition).
TO BE, OR NOT TO BE? or, Man's Present and Future Condition Considered.

JESUS, OUR ARMY. (Second Edition).
ESSAYS, CRITICAL, BIOGRAPHICAL, AND MIS-CELLANEOUS. By S. F. WILLIAMS.

London: William Freeman, 102, Fleet Street.

European and Confederate States
Advertising Agency.

THE object of this Agency is to
effect a direct trade alliance between the European and the Southern Press, through the medium of advertising. The most practicable mode
of introducing the Merchants, Manufacturers, Capitalists, Insurance Companies, &c., of Foreign Countries, to the Southern Trade, is by an organised,
classified, and liberal system of ADVERTISING.
Trade, like time and the trade for the man. The commerce of the world will not pause in ruinous inaction, but will commence its irresistible ebb and
flow the moment peace is established. One of the most dangerous, corrupting, and insidious means to be used by the North will be the medium of advertising in Southern papers. Advertising Agencies
are already organised in every Northern city, and only bide their time. We must see to it that our papers are so filled with Foreign Advertisements
and the advertisements of Southern Importers,
Dealers, and Manufacturers, that there will not be
space left in any Southern newspaper for the advertisement of a single Yankee notion. Then will
our papers present to their readers a faithful
mirror of Dealers, Manufacturers, &c., in the Old World, and of our business men at home, and thus attach to Southern interest that mighty lever "the Press," and disrupt the tie which, by means of Northern advertising, has had so much influence in
binding the South to dependence upon its enemies.
Through the medium of a liberal advertising
trade, our Southern Editors can be maintained against the stagnation in their business, which proceeds from interrupted or disorganised trade.

The object of this Agency is threefold:—
1st. To advertise European Merchants, Manufacturers, Hotels, Railroads, Insurance Companies, &c.,
&c., in Southern papers.
2nd. To advertise Southern business, property,
&c., in European journals.
3rd. To advertise home industry and Southern enterprise in our own papers, and thereby build up
the cities of our Confederacy, instead of those of
our enemies.

Our arrangements abroad are all completed. We now address you to the necessary Circular, to ask you to send us duplicate copies of your paper, accompanied by a private letter (which shall be strictly confidential), stating your terms of advertising, &c.

We will soon appoint agents in each important
sea-board and inland city. Atlanta, at present, is selected for the Central Office, on account of its geographical position. We must see to it that our enterprise your hearty co-operation and assistance,
and guarantee, in return, strict integrity in all
business transactions.

By order of the Board of Directors,
WILLIAM H. BARNES,
SUPERINTENDENT.

Atlanta, Ga., August 24, 1861.

TO SOUTHERN AMERICAN FAMILIES IN
PARIS.

A FRENCH LADY,—living with
her mother and her daughter in a pleasant
location close by the Champs-Élysées—offers the
comforts of a home and motherly care and attention, together with the advantages of the best
education and excellent music-teaching, for TWO YOUNG CHILDREN, or for a YOUNG LADY
under fifteen.

Address, MADAME DE W., care of Mr. Largier,
17, Rue de la Paix, Paris.

A. M. GAUTIER, Tailor, 229,
Regent Street, London (and 20, Rue de la
Chausée d'Antin in Paris).

TO EAST INDIA MERCHANTS.
A GENTLEMAN, in his 30th Year,
who has had nearly 10 Years' experience in
the Manchester Yarn and Cloth Market as a SALESMAN,
also 24 Years' experience in East Indian and
American Cottons, desires to go out to Bombay,
under the auspices of a first class firm, to act as their Cotton buyer.
Address, BOX, J. 19, Post-office, Manchester.

Citizens' Mutual Insurance Company.
The Board of Trustees, have resolved to pay an interest of SIX PER CENT. in cash on the outstanding certificates of profits to the holders thereof,
or their legal representatives, on and after the
second Monday in February next; also, to declare a dividend of Twenty per cent. (20 per cent.) on the
net earned premiums of the Company, for the year
ending 30th November, 1861, for which certificates
will be issued on and after the second Monday in February next.

TRUSTEES.
Geo. W. West Vice-President.
Dr. Jamison.
A. Miltenberger.
J. Leisy.
Jas. A. White.
Douglas West.
M. Masson.
R. P. Hunt.
Martin Gordon, juv.
Cesaire Olivier.
A. Bobn.
Numa Angustin.
Omer Gaillard.

Home Mutual Insurance Company of
New Orleans.

OFFICE.—78, Camp Street.
Amount of premiums for year ending
31st December, 1861..... 433,725 47
Amount of Profits for year ending 31st
December, 1861..... 282,903 68
Amount of Assets on 31st December,
1861..... 1,338,306 77
The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of
FIFTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent.
interest on all outstanding Scrip, and have ordered
to redeem the Scrip of 1861.
Interest and redeemable Scrip, payable in cash on
and after 10th February next.
Certificates of Scrip, for the year 1861, deliverable
on and after 15th March, 1862.
A. BROTHUR, President.
JAMES H. WEBER, Secretary.
New Orleans, January 11, 1862.

Louisiana Mutual Insurance Company.

OFFICE:
Iron Building, corner Camp and Natchez Streets.
Amount of premiums for the year ending 25th February, 1861..... 699,528 70
Amount of Profits for the year ending
25th February, 1861..... 213,759 74
Amount of Assets for the year ending
25th February, 1861..... 866,420 98
The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of
FIFTY PER CENT., after paying six per cent.
interest on all outstanding Scrip, and have ordered the redemption of Fifty per cent. of the Scrip issue
of 1861.
Interest and redeemable Scrip payable on and after the second Monday of May next.
Certificates of Scrip for the year 1861 deliverable
on and after 1st June 1861.
R. P. JANVIER, President.
New Orleans, March 20, 1861.

Merchants' Mutual Insurance Com-
pany of New Orleans.

At a meeting of the Board of Directors held this day it was resolved to declare a Scrip dividend of TWENTY PER CENT., on the net earned premiums of the last year, and also to pay Six per cent.
interest on the outstanding Scrips of the Company. Scrip Certificates to be issued on and after the first day of August next.

DIRECTORS.
Geo. Connelly.
John Pemberton.
P. Maspero.
P. Poutz.
C. Honold.
G. Miltenberger.
J. N. Nevins.
S. O. Nelson.
C. H. Scomb.
B. P. Voorhier.
B. O. Vignaud.

Crescent Mutual Insurance Company.

OFFICE:
Corner of Camp and Commercial Place.

TWELFTH ANNUAL STATEMENT.

Amount of Premiums for ten months
ending 30th April, 1861..... 531,876 14
Profits for ten months to 30th April,
1861..... 237,238 27
Assets, 30th April, 1861..... 1,442,359 35
The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of
THIRTY PER CENT., after paying interest at the
rate of Six per cent. per annum on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved to redeem Forty per cent.
of the issue of 1861, payable as follows:—
Twenty per cent. 10th June, 1861.
Twenty per cent. 10th September, 1861.
Scrip Certificates for the year 1861, deliverable on
and after the 12th day of August next.
THOMAS A. ADAMS, President.
G. W. SPRAIT, Secretary.

BRITISH AND NORTH AMERI-CAN ROYAL MAIL-SHIPS.

NOTICE.

These Steamers call at CORK HARBOUR on both Sundays and Homeward Passages, to receive and land Mails.

Freight by the Mail Steamers to Halifax and Boston, and to New York, £3 per ton, and 6 per cent.
primage.

PARTIAL PARCELS.—Parcels containing samples of Goods to be taken free of freight by
the Mail Steamers.

Freight on other Parcels 5s. each and upwards, according to size.

Parcels for different Consignees, collected and made up in Single Packages, addressed to one party for delivery in America, for the purpose of evading
the payment of Freight, will, upon examination in America, by the Customs, be charged with the proper Freight.

Dogs not taken on any terms.

The British and North American Royal Mail
Steam-Packet Company, draw the attention of Shippers and Passengers to the 32nd section of the New Merchant Shipping Act, which is as
follows:—

"No person shall be entitled to carry in any ship,
or to require the master or owner of any ship to carry therein, aquavit, oil of vitriol, gunpowder, or any other goods which, in the judgment of such master or owner, are of a dangerous nature; and if any person shall so carry on board any ship any goods of a dangerous nature, without distinctly
marking their nature on the outside of the package containing the same, or otherwise giving notice in writing to the master or owner, at or before the time of carrying or sending the same
to be shipped, he shall for every such offence incur
a penalty not exceeding £100; and the master or owner of any ship who shall refuse to take on board any parcels that he suspects to contain goods of
a dangerous nature, and may require them to be opened to ascertain the fact,

The Index,
A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS.
LITERATURE, AND NEWS.
Published every Thursday Evening.
PRICE SIXPENCE.
Subscriptions, Twenty-six Shillings per annum.
Stamped, Thirty Shillings per annum.
Nos. I. to XXI. NOW READY.
Office:—102, Fleet-street.

In this great metropolis, on the native soil of free speech and a free press, every interest—political social, religious, literary, scientific, benevolent
commercial, however remote, however small the
class to which it addresses itself—has long had its recognized representative in Journalism, through
which it seeks to obtain a share of the public attention. The one solitary exception has heretofore been in the case of the Confederate States of America. Enrolled in a life-and-death struggle against a vastly superior foe—hemmed in on all sides, quite as effectually by the deserts of the Far West and of Mexico, as by the enemy's armies and navies—they suffer even more from that intellectual
blockade which excludes them from communion
with the rest of mankind, than from the commercial difficulties of obtaining their much needed
supplies. The disruption of the American Union—
despite repeated warnings—startled Europe without at once awakening it to a full consciousness of the reality and importance of the event. So little had the internal politics of America entered into
the routine of European thoughts, that even now—
when the effects are undeniable and irrevocable—
the causes still remain a mystery and a riddle to be by the greater portion of the intelligent European public. When the catastrophe occurred, the Northern States had the ear of the Governments
and of the peoples; and so zealously have they retained it, so ingeniously and persistently have
they pleaded their cause, so imperfect and dis-
torting was the medium through which alone the South's voice could be heard, that Europe may fairly be said to have listened to but one side of the quarrel. It is true that the respectable portion of the English press has treated the weaker party in
that spirit of fair play upon which every English-
man prides himself; and, as the struggle progressed, has evinced a painstaking study of a perplexing subject, which stands in honourable contrast to the slipshod and indecorum of American Journalism. But this has not supplied the want, so long and keenly felt, of some organ of Southern interests and Southern opinions, to which the Statesman, the Journalist, the Merchant, and the
public at large might look for reliable intelligence
of the progress of events, and for valuable indications of the manner in which the South itself views
and weighs the importance and bearing of those
events.

This want it is one of the principal objects of
"THE INDEX" to supply as far as possible. The measure of success which may reward the effort will necessarily depend upon the co-operation of the friends, and of the private, as well as official, representatives of the South in Europe. This cooperation has been most generously accorded us.
There is a large amount of Southern intelligence
which reaches Europe through various private channels. Still more important information is obtained from Northern sources, which finds no
outlet through the muzzled press of those States.
Much of such valuable material has already been
placed at our disposal; and we have a reasonable
prospect of making "THE INDEX" the receptacle
and depository of all, or nearly all, that is available
in the United Kingdom and on the Continent. Our arrangements are such that our friends may rely on
this respect upon a scrupulous and sound discretion, and the inviolable sanctity of private
communications.

While we have thus frankly explained one of the principal objects of "THE INDEX," it may be necessary to state—in order to prevent a possible
misapprehension—that it is not the sole object.
Literature and General News—in fact, every ingredient of a Weekly Journal—will command our earnest attention; and it will be our unremitting
endeavour to make "THE INDEX" worthy of that
liberal patronage which is promised us in advance.
"THE INDEX" will be represented by competent Correspondents at the different capitals of the Continent, at Washington, and at Havannah. It is our design, also, that "THE INDEX" should partake of
the character of a Magazine, without departing
from its proper sphere as a Review of current
events.

For the leaders and literary contributions, we shall enjoy the valuable aid of the peys of gentlemen already favourably known to the public.

The Cotton Market will monopolize much of our
space, and is entrusted to hands theoretically and
practically familiar with the subject and all questions bearing upon it.

It is superfluous to add that "THE INDEX" is
necessarily committed to the advocacy of the principles of Free Trade.

Subscribers will be furnished with handsome
Covers for each Half-Yearly Volume.

A full list of the original "INDEX" Subscribers
and a carefully prepared Table of Contents will accompany the concluding number of each Volume.

Subscriptions and Advertisements to be sent, and
Post-office Orders made payable to

WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102, FLEET ST., E.C.

Printed by HENRY F. MACKINTOSH, of 11,
Fleet-court, Fleet-street; and Published for the Proprietors by WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102,
Fleet-street, London E. C.—September 18, 1862.

THE INDEX

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS, LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

OFFICE:—102, FLEET STREET.

VOL. I—No. 22.]

LONDON—THURSDAY EVENING, SEPTEMBER 25, 1862.

[PRICE 6D.

CONTENTS.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK	PAGE
America	337
England	338
Europe	339
COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET—
Liverpool Letter	340
Manchester Letter	340
TOBACCO MARKET	340
LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH—
Private Letter	340
FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE—
New York	341
Paris	341
LEADERS—
What Constitutes the "South?"	344
The Confederate States' Navy	344
India and the Cotton Supply	345
National Thanksgiving	346
"Mason and Dixon's Line"	346
Editorial	348
THREE MONTHS IN THE CONFEDERATE ARMY ..
My Messmates	348
Soldiers' Duties	348
REVIEWS—
A Southern Statement	349
Short Notices	350
ADVERTISEMENTS	352

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

The American Mail, thirty-six hours overdue, had not arrived up to the moment of going to press.

THE advance of the Confederates into Maryland caused immense excitement in the North, which was not allayed by the amusing fiction put forth, that "General Sigel's division could have prevented the Confederates crossing the Potomac, but the Federal policy favoured the Confederates entering Maryland, for strategic reasons." To say nothing about General Sigel's division being too much weakened by defeat, this excuse is untenable, because it is evident, even to the most gullible Northerner, that the raising of Maryland—an event sure to follow the presence of the Southern army—could not possibly strengthen the Federal position. In whatever direction the Confederates operate it is manifest they will interrupt the communication between the capital and the West, and, if they carry the war into Pennsylvania, will be able to inflict an immense amount of damage. In Maryland they are deliverers, not conquerors, and private property is quite as safe, if not much safer, than under Federal rule. Mr. Lincoln and his adherents perceived that they could not impose upon the public with such a transparent "strategic sham," and so they announced that General McClellan had gone forth to meet the enemy, leaving General Banks in command of the defences of Washington.

The indignation of the mob has been stilled to some extent by the punishment of unsuccessful generals, and the resignation of Mr. Stanton, who is succeeded by General Halleck. The immediate cause of Mr. Stanton's leaving office was the re-appointment of General McClellan; and without entering into the question of the military ability of the Young Napoleon, it must be confessed that he has proved a complete failure. We will not predict his future fortune. He may redeem his laurels; but, judging from the past, the case does not seem very hopeful, and the late Secretary of War had some ground for his objection. If General McClellan has ability, he is singularly unfortunate, and ill-luck in a Commander is a crime. If he is not marvellously unlucky, he is devoid of ability, and an incompetent commander is not desirable. One recommendation General McClellan has that ought to have excused a series of failures in Mr. Stanton's eyes, as it will do in General Halleck's estimation—he has written despatches which for daring and unscrupulous falsehood have not been excelled even by the compositions of Generals Halleck and Pope. As a specimen of unblushing mendacity, his address to the remnant of his army after the Chickahominy defeat is altogether unrivalled. Perhaps General McClellan has gained wisdom from experience; at all events, his general order on assuming the command of the army at Washington was unusually modest, and so far from threatening to annihilate the Southern army in so many days, it was confined to directions to his officers.

General Pope has been sent to the North-West, and he cannot complain that his command is circumscribed. It includes Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota, and the territories of Nebraska and Dakota, but he may reasonably complain of being appointed to a command without an army. We are told his forces are "the troops raising and to be raised therein under his command." If the Indians were quiet, the office would be a species of honourable banishment from active service, but Minnesota, Nebraska, and Dakota are in a disturbed condition. The Indians are preparing for a great war, and have even commenced their operations by capturing Government stores. Remembering General Pope's proclamation in Virginia, we do not dispute his fitness for the conduct of warfare with savages, but he will do well to bear in mind that the Indians punish, as well as make reprisals, without warning.

General Pope's official account of his campaign is worthy of this reputation—we cannot better describe it. He pretends that his forces were not only inferior to the enemy, but that he was to menace the North of Richmond with 32,000 men, and that after his retreat from Cedar Mountain, upon being joined by McDowell he only mustered 40,000 men. What has become of the army 700,000 strong? We believe that the campaign has been inconceivably destructive to the Federals, but not so as to reduce the numbers to the extent inferred by General Pope. When Federal commanders report a victory, they always exaggerate the numbers of the enemy to enhance their triumph and when they admit "a strategic movement," they usually represent their own force as wonderfully small in order to excuse their failure. But it is not the statement as to numbers that entitles General Pope's despatch to a passing notice. We are used to these Federal romances as well as to the kind of accusations that Pope brings against Generals McClellan and Porter. If these had done their duty all would have been well. The charge against General Griffin is somewhat original. He, we are told, looked on with his brigade, and spent the day in "making ill-natured strictures on the General commanding the action, in the presence of a promiscuous assemblage." This is rich, but not so funny as the explanation of the loss at Manassas. Be it premised that Pope knew all about General Jackson's movements from first to last, though he was careful not to communicate his knowledge to any one, or to make any use of it. "This movement of Jackson was well-known to me, but I relied confidently upon the forces which I had been assured would be sent from Alexandria, and one stray division of which I had ordered to take post on the works at Manassas Junction. I was entirely under the belief that these would be there, and it was not until I found my communication intercepted that I was undeceived." The General commanding depending upon a stray division is inimitable. General Pope, of course, claims to have done well. "To confront a powerful enemy with greatly inferior forces, and fight him day by day without losing your army; to delay and embarrass his movements, and to force him by persistent resistance to adopt long and cir-cuitous routes to his destination, are the duties which have been imposed upon me. How far I have been successful, I leave to the judgment of my countrymen." In reference to this passage we cannot do better than reproduce the comment of the Morning Post: "The mixture of mendacity with assurance contained in this extract has, we venture to say, never been surpassed."

General McDowell, who is charged with treason by the populace, has been granted a leave of absence for fifteen days, which he may probably find it advisable to extend. General Blenker has received an indefinite leave of absence, and has retired to his farm. Captain Wilkes has been appointed to the command of a flying squadron on the West India station. The partisans of Pope, McDowell, and Blenker are indignant. They assert, and there is some truth in the assertion, that these generals have not done worse than Halleck, McClellan, and Banks, who are neither banished nor dismissed. But the partiality of the Washington Government is unavoidable. Some unsuccessful generals must be punished to appease the mob; and it was impossible to dismiss all the unsuccessful generals; for then the Northern army would have been without a commander.

The indignation against Pope and McDowell was increased by the publication of the subjoined letter and comments in the New York World. The friends of Pope and McDowell aver that the letter is a fabrication got up to injure those generals:—

The following is an accurate copy of the letter written by Colonel Brodhead in his last moments to his brother and sister:—

Dear Brother and Sister,—I am passing now from earth, but send you love from my dying couch. For all your love and kindness you will be rewarded. I have fought manfully, and now die fearlessly. I am one of the victims of Pope's imbecility and McDowell's treason. Tell the President, would he save the country, he must not give our hallowed flag to such hands. But the old flag will triumph yet. The soldiers will regild its folds, polluted by imbecility and treason. John, you owe a duty to your country. Write—show up Pope's imbecility and McDowell's infamy, and force them from places where they can send brave men to assured destruction. I had hoped to have lived longer, but I die amidst the ring and clangour of battle, as I could wish. Farewell! To you and to the noble officers of my regiment I confide wife and children.

THORNTON.

The above was addressed by Colonel Thornton F. Brodhead, 1st Michigan Cavalry, when dying from wounds received in battle, near Centerville, Saturday, Aug. 30, to his brother, John M. Brodhead, and wife, Washington city. It was written within the Confederate lines, in pencil, upon a piece of discoloured paper, apparently torn from an old account book, and was stained here and there with drops of blood from the mortal wound in his left breast.

The letter does not read like the composition of a man bleeding to death, and the "drops of blood" is an evident flight of imagination, and further detracts from the credibility of the story.

General Sigel, who is admitted to be a brave man, and to have done much better than most of the Federal generals, is not promoted. Why? The Germans say on account of his nationality, and they begin to feel indignant that they are excluded from all chance of promotion and high command.

In face of the approaching elections, or under the impression that the anger of the mob may next be directed against the members of the Government, "the stringent war orders, in reference to drafting and volunteering, have been withdrawn. Restrictions on travellers are removed." We do not suppose these concessions will produce much effect. The people submitted so patiently to the loss of their liberty, and to the despotism of Mr. Lincoln and his Cabinet, that the present policy of the Government will be regarded as a sign of weakness, and induce the various factions to press their several interests. The Abolitionists are making strenuous efforts to gain ascendancy; they call upon the President to issue a decree of Emancipation, promising in that case to raise an army. If they can persuade Mr. Lincoln that any benefit to the Federal cause can result from Emancipation, he will doubtless, in accordance with his letter to Mr. Greeley, cast his lot with the Abolitionists.

Mr. Enoch Lowe has been appointed Provisional Confederate Governor of Maryland. He occupied the position of Governor a few years ago, is a gentleman of great personal popularity, and his appointment will be very acceptable to the Marylanders.

The reports of the number of the Confederate troops who have entered Maryland are conflicting. The Federal Governor has ordered the citizens to organize bands to resist the Confederates, who are styled "invaders;" but by this time the North must be convinced of the Southern character of Maryland.

Some idea of the demoralization of the Federal army may be gathered from the fact that whilst the last battle of Manassas was being fought, a large number of officers were in Alexandria. This statement comes from Northern, not Southern, sources. The following is the account given in the summary of Northern news:—

Washington letters of the 8th state that the Provost-guard has arrested and sent to their regiments 1600 stragglers, most of whom are worn-out men. A correspondent, writing on the 8th, says:—

"In my last I alluded to the great number of officers that had busied in Alexandria last Saturday and Sunday, while the fighting was going on in front. From the books at the Marshal-House and City Hotel alone I learn that on Sunday last 155 officers registered their names for dinner. Recollect this is only the number at two hotels, while there are hundreds of smaller hotels and boarding-houses that were besieged by them. The number of soldiers that straggled into and were scattered around the city last Sunday could not have been less than 6000 or 8000. To-day only seven officers registered their names at the two hotels above mentioned."

President Davis ordered the 18th of September to be observed as a day of thanksgiving for the late Confederate victories; the following is his proclamation:—

TO THE PEOPLE OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES.

Once more upon the plains of Manassas have our armies been blessed by the Lord of Hosts with a triumph over our enemies. It is my privilege to invite you once more to His footstool, not now in the garb of fasting and sorrow, but with joy and gladness, to render thanks for the great mercies received at His hand. A few months since, and our enemies poured forth their invading legions upon our soil. They laid waste our fields, polluted our altars, and violated the sanctity of our homes. Around our capital they gathered their forces, and, with boastful threats, claimed it as already their prize. The brave troops which rallied to its defence have extinguished these vain hopes, and, under the guidance of the same Almighty hand, have scattered our enemies and driven them back in dismay. Uniting these defeated forces and the various armies which had been ravaging our coasts with the army of invasion in Northern Virginia, our enemies have renewed their attempt to subjugate us at the very place where their first effort was defeated, and the vengeance of retributive justice has overtaken the entire host in a second and complete overthrow.

To this signal success accorded to our arms in the East has been graciously added another equally brilliant in the West. On the very day on which our forces were led to victory on the plains of Manassas, in Virginia, the same Almighty arm assisted us to overcome our enemies at Richmond, in Kentucky. Thus, at one and the same time, have two great hostile armies been stricken down, and the wicked designs of our enemies set at naught.

In such circumstances it is meet and right that, as a people, we should bow down in adoring thankfulness to that gracious God who has been our bulwark and defence, and to offer unto Him the tribute of thanksgiving and praise. In His hand is the issue of all events, and to Him should we, in an especial manner, ascribe the honour of this great deliverance.

Now, therefore, I, Jefferson Davis, President of the Confederate States, do issue this my proclamation, setting apart Thursday, the 18th day of September instant, as a day of prayer and thanksgiving to Almighty God for the great mercies vouchsafed to our people, and more especially for the triumph of our arms at Richmond and Manassas; and I do hereby invite the people of the Confederate States to meet on that day at their respective places of public worship, and to unite in rendering thanks and praise to God for these great mercies, and to implore Him to conduct our country safely through the perils which surround us, to the final attainment of the blessings of peace and security.

Given under my hand, and the seal of the Confederate States, at Richmond, this 4th day of September, A.D. 1862.

By the President,

JEFFERSON DAVIS.

ENGLAND.

Mr. Laing, ex-Minister of Finance for India, addressed a special meeting of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, on Thursday last. The principal topics with which he dealt were the supply of cotton from India, and the maladministration of Indian affairs by the Home Government. On the first point he considerably checked the ardent expectation of those sanguine men who have looked to our Oriental Empire to succeed or supersede the Southern States of America as the cotton-field of the world. It cannot, he assures us, furnish a substitute for the annual 4,000,000 bales withheld from us by the blockade; even if all the railways were completed and the means of transit perfected. As it takes five or six acres to produce a bale of cotton, 4,000,000 bales would require 20,000,000 of acres under cultivation, and these in addition to the acreage now cultivated to produce the supply required for the Indian markets and for export. We must look solely to America for a solution of the present crisis. As regards the future, India had one great disadvantage in the production of cotton—a disadvantage which no skill, ingenuity, or capital applied by man can remove—its climate. "For six months in the year it rained in torrents, and for the remaining six there were extreme heat and great drought, interrupted only by a few precarious showers. The consequence was that the indigenous cotton plant, to stand the drought, required to strike its root deeper into the subsoil for moisture. A shorter and more scrubby plant, with deeper roots, and fewer fibres and balls, and producing a less quantity per acre, was the result." This, was not, however, the case everywhere. There were districts—especially the Dharwar—where the American seed was largely sown, and he believed the districts where this kind of cotton could be grown were very numerous. In the other districts, doubtless, where American cotton could not be grown, by a careful selection of seed, and by careful cultivation, the Indian cotton could be gradually and largely improved. It was quite clear that in India there was a great extent of country where cotton of every quality, especially Egyptian, could be grown, always provided that the price was sufficient to warrant the diversion of the land from other tropical products. But it was questionable whether cotton would ever maintain a sufficiently high price after the present scarcity was at an end. He had some doubts on that point himself, and also as to cotton being largely cultivated on an extensive scale by European planters. In India cotton was more on a level with ordinary agricultural produce, such as rice or linseed. The cultivation of tea, for instance, and other products might be made more profitable by the ordinary planter; but where cotton was grown and would be grown in India was more on the small farms of the ryots than by European planters on a large scale. The ryot possessed his own bullocks and plough, his own labour; he did the hoeing himself, his wife and children were there to do the picking, and the consequence was that he could produce cotton at an exceedingly low price. If the prices of cotton could be kept at a tolerably low range, at anything like 5d. or 6d. per lb., he believed it would be found that an increasing quantity of cotton would come from India year after year; that every year ryots would take to the cultivation of cotton as a rotation crop; that they would get the best seed and grow American cotton where it could be grown, and cultivate their own where it could not.

We believe that experience has shown that, even in the favoured districts of which Mr. Laing speaks, the American seed rapidly degenerates. The Indian variety seems to be the product of the climate and the soil; and the American, in becoming acclimatized, loses its peculiar perfections, and is assimilated to the indigenous plant. In no case is India ever likely to produce more cotton than is required to clothe her own enormous population. That population may indeed be clothed in Indian cotton manufactured in English mills; but for the consumption of the rest of the world our manufacturers must still depend on America. The Government of India, bad in other respects, exercises also a retarding influence on the promotion by European agency of cotton cultivation by the natives. In denouncing the system by which he has himself been a sufferer, Mr. Laing waxed eloquent. He pointed out the absurdity of pretending to govern India from England, and the aggravated absurdity of subjecting the first-rate men sent out as Governors-General to the third-rate men usually selected for the office of Secretary of State for India (or, as formerly, President of the Board of Control) in this country. The Governor-General is surrounded by men who are thoroughly acquainted with India; who have spent their life there; who are selected with very impartial regard to their merit from the best set of civil servants in the world. He has the benefit of their experience and ability; he is on the spot; he knows all the circumstances; and when his decisions have been announced, and are about to be carried out, they are liable to be reversed at the will and pleasure of the Secretary at home, acting with or without the advice of the fifteen retired East-Indians who form his council. Mr. Laing gave three notable instances of such reversal—all of recent occurrence. Lord Canning, he said, was a great statesman, a good and great man, with the most perfect conscientiousness, the highest sense of honour and duty, and the greatest moral courage; slow to form a judgment, which was pre-eminently "safe" when he had formed it. Lord Canning, with the advice of his Council, had passed a law for the better enforcement of contracts—the inefficiency of the existing law on that subject being both disgraceful and disastrous. The law so passed was rescinded by Sir Charles Wood. Lord Canning had enacted a measure for the sale of waste lands, which would have opened a vast and valuable field to European enterprise, and introduced for the improvement of India the energy and the capital of England. And that law was rescinded by Sir Charles Wood. The descendants of the Royal family of Mysore had preferred certain claims against the Government of India. Two successive Governors-General had heard and adjudicated on those claims, and their judgment was decidedly against the claimants. The representative of the Mysore family came over to England, and obtained from Sir Charles Wood a reversal of that judgment, and an order that his demand should be satisfied. The moral effect of such a system was exceedingly bad. The prestige of British rule was bound up with the dignity of the Governor-General; to weaken his authority was to shake our own empire. Further, the natives believed in the perfect integrity of the local Government; they had had irresistible demonstration of it. But they had no similar conviction in regard to the Government in Downing-street; and, however absurd the notion might appear to Englishmen, who know that all English statesmen are equally above corruption, when the Hindoos saw a Bengalee Prince go over to England, and obtain there a reversal of the decree of the Governor-General in his case, the impression left on their minds was that the Home Government was open to the influence of bribery. He urged the men of Manchester to use their influence to obtain the abolition of the Home Council for India, and the limitation of the absolute control over the local Government of India now vested in and exercised by the Secretary of State. The feeling of the Chamber appeared to be strongly in favour of the speaker's views, particularly in regard to the sale of waste lands and the law of contracts, questions in which Manchester conceives itself to have a strong and immediate interest. Mr. Laing has since made a speech much to the same effect at Glasgow.

The Cotton Supply Association held its meeting on the 23rd. Both the report of the secretary and the leading speeches made were full of severe censure on the Indian Government. But it was not very easy to understand what were the sins of omission or commission which provoked those censures. The speakers complained, indeed, that the growth of cotton had not been officially encouraged, and that they had been told by the Indian Board to grow it themselves; but they did not indicate what encouragement ought to have been given, or who it is that should undertake to supervise and stimulate the growth of this important crop, if those who are most interested in the matter decline the task. The only charges to which the Indian Government seems really liable are those preferred by Mr. Laing. Lord Canning gave to Europeans who might be disposed to undertake the cultivation of cotton every facility which they could expect. Those facilities have been withdrawn by the Home Government, and to that extent Manchester has just ground of complaint. Mr. Bazley mentioned that three bales of cotton of first-rate quality, fully equal to American, had been received from Calcutta, and inferred from this that India might afford us a sufficient substitute for the supplies hitherto received from the Confederate States. But the fact hardly seems to warrant the conclusion. It is one thing to raise on one occasion, in a favoured spot, from imported seed, a small sample of splendid quality; it is quite another thing to supply in ordinary years and at ordinary prices the millions of bales that are needed to feed the enormous consumption of Lancashire. Because the first has been accomplished there is no reason to suppose that the second would, under any circumstances, have been possible. Mr. Haywood, the agent sent out to India, reports that there is not in that country any large stock ready of export. The quantity produced is probably as great as in the Confederate States. Three-fourths of this amount are at present consumed in India; the remainder, manufactured in England, does not more than balance the amount of cotton cloth exported thither. A greatly increased facility for internal communication might perhaps double our imports of the raw material, and our exports of manufactured goods to India.

The Association, with a not unnatural prejudice, is disposed to exaggerate the fitness of Indian cotton for the finer kinds of yarn and the better qualities of cloth. They have exhibited a collection of East Indian yarns up to No. 70's, and cloth bleached, dyed, and printed, which is said to be scarcely distinguishable from American. We should like to know whether these yarns and cloths are made from such sample bales as those mentioned by Mr. Bazley, or from the ordinary Surat cotton. In the former case they prove nothing, in the latter they certainly seem to prove too much.

Some new "substitute for cotton," which is to cost nothing, to make the fortune of the inventor, and to re-open the mills of Lancashire, is discovered every week. The inventors are mostly persons who know nothing of cotton spinning; and they forget, invariably, that a material which costs nothing when supposed to be useless, and gathered by handfulls, might become almost as dear as silk if there were a manufacturing demand for hundreds of millions of pounds weight of it. The following remarks, by a "Medallist in Botany" deserves notice:—

I have obtained samples of most of the fibres proposed, and I have submitted them to careful examination under the microscope. I find them all to be varieties of woody fibre, more or less split up and divided, varying in the length and thickness of the fibrilla. The fibres of all the specimens I have seen are nevertheless uniform in the following particulars:—They are all solid and inelastic, or brittle, with joints and rough edges, showing where the bundle of fibrillae have been torn apart. Having some practical acquaintance with cotton spinning and a weaving, I assert that the above qualities render woody fibre unfitness to be used as a substitute for cotton without a considerable modification of our machinery. The fibres which have been exhibited may probably be useful as substitutes for linen, if they can be largely produced at a cheap rate; but the woody fibre (from which all the proposed substitutes, I feel confident, are drawn) can never be a perfect substitute for cotton, which consists of vegetable hairs, hollow, elastic, riband-shaped, and spiral, with smooth edges and surfaces. If we want a substitute for cotton, we must not look for it in woody fibre.

The number of paupers in the cotton districts increased last week by 5410, of whom 1200 are in Preston, and 990 in Ashton-under-Lyne. The condition of the people is frightful. Persons are daily applying to the Relief Committees for food to save them from absolute starvation, who until lately filled responsible situations. The case of the overlookers and others of the highest order of working-men is peculiarly hard. They have exhausted the savings of a life-time; they are as helplessly dependent on charity as the poorest of the operatives, but they feel with intense misery the degradation of applying for it. Their employers really might take pity on them, and save them from this humiliation. The class is not numerous, and the preservation of its character, influence, and self-respect, is of the highest importance to the manufacturers. The operatives have, in one place, held a meeting to protest against the refusal of the Relief Committee to assist people in receipt of a parish allowance. The rule is stern, but we fear it is necessary; the result of its repeal would probably be to diminish the parish allowance, and, by limiting the power of relief, to throw many who are now supported by the Committee upon the Union. Proposals have been made to collect the cast-off clothes of London for the benefit of the operatives; and the Lord Mayor has suggested to the Committee over which he presides, a scheme for the organization of such a collection. This Committee have received altogether about £55,000 (£7000 last week) and distributed above £30,000.

Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Henley, and Lord Stanley have all made public speeches this week, the two first at agricultural meetings, the last at the opening of a mechanics' institution. Nothing of political interest is contained in any of the speeches.

The Stoke election has resulted in the retirement of Mr. Sargeant Shee and the defeat of Mr. Hope. It was said, some days ago, that the result depended on the amount of money spent; and liberal, indeed, must have been the expenditure which would induce any English constituency to return a candidate who has disgraced himself by such behaviour as that of Mr. Grenfell.

William Roupell, late M.P. for Lambeth, was yesterday arraigned at the Central Criminal Court on the charge of forgery. He pleaded guilty, and was sentenced to penal servitude for life. The facts of the case will be fresh in the recollection of our readers. The culprit was the eldest but illegitimate son of parents subsequently married. He enjoyed the full confidence of his father, and availed himself of it to get possession of and make away with much of the property, which the elder Roupell had amassed, he also forged a will by which, on his father's death, the whole property, chiefly in land, was transferred to his mother; and with her consent he alienated it, and spent the proceeds in unsuccessful speculations. Subsequently, after his bankruptcy he came forward in a civil court to give evidence that the will was a forgery; thereby, of course, invalidating the title of the alienees, and enabling his legitimate brother, as heir-at-law, to recover the whole of his father's estate. It appears that the alienees were apprised before this of his intention; but they chose to disbelieve his assertion, and imagined the story of the forgery to be concocted purely for the purpose of restoring the fortunes of the family. The evidence against Mr. Roupell consists solely of his own confession, and a mystery not yet fully cleared up hangs over the whole case. The prisoner, before sentence was passed, made an earnest, and almost eloquent speech, explaining the causes which had led him into crime, and protesting the sincerity of his repentance.

Belfast has been the scene of a disgraceful riot. A great Orange demonstration was held there, attended by some 70,000 persons, with the object of protesting against the policy of the Government, which is held to be too favourable to the Catholics. Lord Palmerston has the singular ill-fortune to have alienated all the partisans of one religion by his foreign policy, while the conduct of his subordinates has enraged all the extreme supporters of the other. The Orangemen seem at first to have behaved well, except in holding the meeting at all. But the Roman Catholics took fire; a mob assembled, and proceeded to smash the windows of the Presbyterian chapel of Dr. Hanna, a vulgar and violent anti-Papal declaimer, and one of the worst of those theological mischief-makers who are the curse of Ireland and the disgrace of Protestantism. The Orangemen retaliated by a series of similar outrages; large bodies of police were brought into action, but in vain; the mobs had it all their own way, yielding where the constabulary or troops appeared, and re-assembling elsewhere, to do more mischief before they could again be reached and dispersed. The most influential Catholic gentlemen of the vicinity met, under the presidency of their coadjutor Bishop, and issued a remonstrance to the co-religionists. The town is still in possession of the mob; and though a military and police force of 1000 men is there, only three of the rioters have been arrested.

EUROPE.

ITALY.—The health of General Garibaldi appears to be better than was expected. Mr. Patridge has reported that the ball has not entered the wound in the ankle, but fractured the bone by its impact; and the wound is going on favourably. Several medical comforts, thought necessary for the sufferer, have been ordered from England. He bears his confinement, and the pain of his wound, with admirable serenity of temper. His companions have contrived to make their complaints heard, and, in a letter to the Premier, speak very indiguantly of their treatment, which probably results from the limited accommodation at the disposal of the Government. Ports are not adapted to contain whole regiments of captives. They declare that they are confined, thirteen in one small room, with the strictest vigilance; that they have neither beds nor washing apparatus; that they are allowed no exercise, and are not permitted to receive letters from their friends. They demand of M. Ratazzi "light, air, room, motion; permission to obtain necessities at their own expense, and to make known to their relations and friends where they are and how they are." In conclusion, they bid the Minister "cease to tell lies, and to deceive their families and country." This not very courteous letter has received no public reply.

"It is a pity," one of our ablest contemporaries lately said, "that a hero should be a fool." That so great and so genuine a hero as General Garibaldi should be so great a fool as he shows himself, is not merely pitiable but perplexing. He has been again asked—this time by an American Consul—if he will give his services to the Federal cause; and we are sorry to say that he has returned a favourable reply. When released and cured, he will be happy to tender his aid to the great Republic, "which is fighting for universal liberty." As an American citizen, the General has, of course, a right to do so; but we think he might as well inform himself first as to what the Federal Government is really fighting for. He is not the man to save the failing cause of the North, even if he could hope to recover and reach the scene of war in time. He never showed any strategic capacity on a great scale; his great victories were triumphs rather of moral influence than of military skill; and were won against enemies far inferior to the Confederates, with the very flower of the Italian youth. We remember to have heard it said of Garibaldi by one who at that time held a higher influence than his over the mind of Italy, and who had known, trusted, and employed him, that there was no such leader living for 1500 or 2000 guerrillas; but that for the command of a great army engaged in regular warfare he was wholly unfit. This was said before the Sicilian expedition; but nothing that has happened since has in any way contradicted this view of Garibaldi's peculiar capacity. For the sake of his own reputation, we trust that the General will not have the opportunity he desires of drawing his sword in a bad cause which he does not understand, with which he has no practical concern, and in which he can win no laurels. But if he should do so, so much the better for the South. It will enhance the glory even of "Stonewall Jackson" to have beaten Garibaldi.

General Durando, Minister of Foreign Affairs, has addressed a note to the Italian representatives at the principal European Courts in reference to the Garibaldian enterprise and the occupation of Rome. He claims credit to Italy for the resolution and vigour which has been shown in enforcing the law against the most honoured subject and chiefest benefactor of the Italian Crown, and for her entire acquiescence in the action of the Ministry on an occasion so critical and so painful. But he asserts that the cry of the volunteers only echoed the deliberate will of the nation; that Italy demands her capital; and that she confides in and obeys her Government only because she fully believes in their determination to win Rome for her. The situation is, no doubt, full of peril for any Italian Government, and above all for that of M. Ratazzi, who enjoys far less of the national confidence of which his colleague boasts than either of his predecessors. But no action of their own can affect the issue of the question; and it is probable that the note was intended not to produce any practical effect abroad, but to influence opinion at home. In American phrase, it is addressed "to Bunkum."

The state of siege in Naples seems to give satisfaction to the respectable inhabitants, as it has enabled the Government to get hold of the Camorristi, who have been summarily tried and shot with scant ceremony. These ruffians, who had supporters even among the police, and exercised a despotism of terror even in the prisons, may possibly be put down by this late display of vigour. But against brigandage no progress is made. The country people are rather cowardly or lukewarm in the cause of order, and the banditti rob, burn, and murder at their pleasure. These agreeable pursuits acquire an additional zest, no doubt, from an occasional brush with the Piedmontese troops, in which the latter never seem to gain any advantage worth having; the brigands, even when defeated, carrying away their wounded. It is quite clear that this "brigandage" is of no common kind; and while the Italian Government fails to repress it, the King of Italy can hardly consider himself secure in the loyal affections of his Southern subjects. The authorities now threaten to deal very severely with all who may harbour or assist the brigands; and thus the frightened inhabitants of the infested country are placed between two fires. If they refuse the demands of the marauders, they are likely to be murdered; if they comply, they are liable to summary punishment from the Piedmontese. The National Guard is frightened out of its wits.

Victor Emmanuel, in replying to a deputation which presented to him an ordinary loyal address, is reported by a semi-official journal to have said that Rome would be in the hands of the Italians before the expiration of the year. The Official Gazette of Turin contains a strong and indignant protest against the suggestions of La France for the dismemberment of the kingdom, and the substitution of an Italian Federation.

GERMANY.—The constitutional system of Prussia, if not exactly "on its trial" is certainly passing through a grave and perilous crisis. The Crown and the Chamber of Deputies have been brought into angry conflict on a point on which the King is understood to feel strongly, and on which his Ministers have expressed themselves with unbecoming and almost menacing vehemence. The Chamber, as is the case under almost every form of constitutional government, has the right of voting or refusing supplies; has, in fact, the exclusive control of the national purse, and through that control is enabled, if not as in England to command, yet at least to check and modify the action of the Executive. The latter has undertaken the reorganization of the Prussian army. By law, every young man is bound to serve for three years in the regular army; he is then enrolled for two years in the reserve, and then passes into the Landwehr, which is never called out except on such great occasions of national exigency as occurred during the Napoleonic wars. The three years' service in the line has always been felt as a very oppressive burden on the youth of the higher classes in Prussia, cutting short their education and interfering with their advancement in life; and it had, up to 1859, become practically shortened to a term of two years. The Government thought fit to revert in 1860 to the old system, and further to enrol the retired soldier in the reserve for five years instead of two. These and other steps taken for the reorganization of the army have led to an extra expenditure this year of nearly a million sterling. The Chamber, which conceived that measures so important ought not to have been taken except in pursuance of an act of the Legislature, seized the occasion afforded by the presentation of the Military Budget to enforce its views upon the Ministry. The Select Committee to which, according to the usual rule, the Budget was referred, presented a report striking off all the additional items of expense necessitated by the reorganization, and recommended the Chamber to vote the Budget minus those items. On this recommendation a very long and angry debate took place. The Minister of War took high ground, and refused to submit to the wish of the House, intimating that if the deputies did not know their duty, they had only themselves to blame for the consequences. The result was that on the first item the Government were beaten, in a pretty full house, by a majority of four to one. They then endeavoured to effect a compromise; the Budget of 1862 was to be accepted, and that of 1863 was to be coupled with an act of the Legislature for the reorganization of the army, reducing the regular term of service from three to two years. But the proposal seems to have fallen through; the report of the Select Committee has been adopted and acted upon by the Chamber, and it is reported that the Ministers of War, of Finance, and of Foreign Affairs, will resign.

A curious incident occurred during the debate, forcibly illustrating the very different character of the Prussian and the English Parliament. One of the ministers used very offensive language, and the party insulted called on the President to enforce order. As the ministers, though they have seats and the right of speech in the Chamber, are not members, the President doubted his power to call them to order; and the little debate on this knotty point wound up with the declaration of the minister that, if he had been called to order, he should have paid no regard to the authority of the President. It is plain that the Prussian Chamber is very far indeed from having attained the power and privileges which, even, 200 years ago, would have made such a defiance of the most servile House of Commons that ever sat at Westminster too daring an act for the boldest minister of the British Crown.

PORTUGAL.—A serious military revolt has occurred at Braga; how, or why, or to what end, we cannot yet judge. The King has issued a proclamation offering pardon to those who shall lay down their arms within three days.

TURKEY.—The rebellion in Montenegro and the Herzegovina seems to be at an end. The Prince of Montenegro has tendered his submission on the terms accorded by the Porte; and it is reported that Omar Pacha will leave that region for Serbia, where the insurrection still continues, though the European Powers have agreed in recommending, and Turkey has accepted, terms of accommodation which differ very little from the status quo. It is difficult to understand what the hope of the Servians can be. Meantime it is said that the British Minister at Athens has formally notified to the Greek Government his knowledge of its complicity in the intestine troubles of the Ottoman Empire.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, Sept. 24.

The past week has been the most lifeless we have experienced in our cotton market for months; a total want of animation has characterised the business from day to day; buyers have held aloof, the trade have bought from hand to mouth, and speculators have been tempted to operate only at a heavy reduction in price. Sellers, however, have shown great firmness, withdrawing nearly all their cotton from the market, and whilst those disposed to buy are few, those determined to force off their cotton at the late decline are also few in number.

Our last report left the market extremely dull on the basis of 27d. for Middling Orleans, and 17½d. for Fair Dhollerahs. On Thursday, Friday, and Saturday, there was a little more tone, but no improvement in prices, with sales of 2000 to 2500 per day. The Persia's news, which was looked forward to with interest, proved to be no later than that received by the City of Washington, and left matters in the same critical state at the seat of war. Jackson was in considerable force in Maryland, but his destination was uncertain, while McClellan, at the head of a large force, had gone to meet him.

On Monday the market opened with a very languid tone, and a general disinclination on the part of both buyers and sellers to operate freely until receipt of further American news; the sales reached only 2000 bales.

On Tuesday business was quite stagnant, and at one time it seemed probable that there would be no sales at all; as the day advanced, however, they were with some difficulty raised to 450 bales!—about the smallest business ever known in our market.

To-day there is no improvement in feeling, and the sales are only estimated at 1000 bales. Yet there is no great anxiety to sell, and our market, during such a state of utter stagnation, has rarely been so well-supported in prices.

The North American and City of New York, with several days later dates, both over due, through the prevalence of easterly winds, are anxiously looked for.

A large import of East India cotton is probable before long; there are now 150,000 bales that have been afloat over 120 days, and 100,000 more upwards of 100 days, and their arrival cannot be delayed much longer.

The last business done to arrive has been on the basis of 16½d. for Fair Dhollerah and Omrawatee, June shipment. On the spot, Middling Orleans are nominally worth 25d., and Fair Dhollerah 17d. per lb.

MANCHESTER, Sept. 23,

Our cloth and yarn market continues to exhibit that quiet but firm tone which has been its chief characteristic during the two previous weeks, and very little business of moment has been effected.

All classes of goods are held for extreme rates, and very little disposition is shown on the part of holders of the better qualities to yield at all to offers under their quotations.

There have been inquiries for India and China shirtings, and offers made at 1s. to 1s. 6d. per piece under the extreme prices asked, but no business has resulted from them.

Green-end mulls 16×15 might be disposed of in quantities at a little under quotations, but makers refuse to listen to a concession.

In export yarns there has been a small business done in 20s, 24s, and 30s, water twist in bundle, at prices almost equal to the highest point reached during the late excitement.

Some trade yarns are little inquired for, consequent upon the rapid closing of weaving sheds, it being quite impossible for manufacturers to realize for cloth more than they give for yarns.

To-day has been the flattest market day on record, next to no business being reported, the quiet state of the Liverpool market being the principal cause of this. Their total sales of cotton to-day amounting to only 350 bales, out of which 200 are taken for speculation and export.

TOBACCO.

We have to report a very firm market, although the sales to the trade have been quite limited. The late advices from America have caused more attention to be turned to Maryland and Ohio leaf, and from 1000 to 1500 hogsheds have been taken since the beginning of the month almost entirely on speculation, and prices for these descriptions may be quoted ½d. to ¾d. higher.

There is some little business doing for export, and we may soon look for larger orders in this market.

The accounts from the Western States are unfavourable for the growing crop, so that under any circumstances the quantity must be small, and with a continuance of hostilities in the tobacco districts great difficulty will be found in securing it in proper order. Some parcels of the new import have been sampled in Liverpool, and the quality is reported to be fine.

LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH.

THE BATTLE OF CEDAR CREEK.

LIST OF KILLED AND WOUNDED.

The following is a list of casualties in the 31st Va. Regiment in the battle near Cedar Creek, Aug. 9th, 1862:—

Lieut.-Colonel Alfred H. Jackson commanding, wound in hip severely.

Company A.—Wounded: Privates B. K. Martin, shoulder; Robert Henderson, hand.

Company B.—Wounded: Privates Baxter Maleom, shoulder; George W. Sheffer, arm.

Company C.—Wounded: Private George M. Cookman, shoulder.

Company D.—Killed: Private Israel Marks. Wounded: Captain J. S. Kerr McCutchen, arm.

Company E.—Killed: Private William Hamilton.

Company F.—Killed: Private John M. C. Lewis. Wounded: Lieut. O. H. P. Lewis, thigh.

Company G.—Wounded: Privates George W. Phillips, arm; John B. Thomas, shoulder.

Company H.—Wounded: Capt. George Thompson, arm; Privates Joshua Lunsford, side; Emanuel Stone, leg.

Company I.—Killed: Lieut. Hiram M. Marsh. Wounded: Corporal Nathaniel Clark, ankle; Private William P. Roan, thigh.

Company K.—Wounded: Corporal John H. Wilt, arm. Total—killed, 4; wounded, 16.

This is the first list of our casualties that we have sent for publication, thinking that they would be published from headquarters. The 31st Virginia Regiment is composed entirely of troops from the North-west, and until May formed a part of that army, being actively engaged in the battles of Greenbrier River, Alleghany, and McDowell, and since then in those fought in the Valley and in front of Richmond. Our loss in the various battles has been about 275 in killed and wounded, including officers. In the battle of Port Republic we took into action 226 men, and lost in killed and wounded 100—missing 17.

Colonel John S. Hoffman being absent sick, the command devolved, in the present battle, upon Lieut.-Colonel Alfred H. Jackson. He was severely wounded while gallantly encouraging his men in front of the enemy's centre. Our loss in this battle was comparatively slight, but from our advantageous position our execution was very great.

JOHN G. GITTINGS, Adjutant.

FIRST TENNESSEE REGIMENT.

Company A.—Killed: Private Samuel M. Kelley. Wounded: Capt. Joseph A. Lusk, gun-shot, arm; Private Thomas S. Goodman, gun-shot, chest, penetrating.

Company B.—Killed: Private S. Scruggs. Wounded: Private Geo. W. Vaughan, gun-shot, knee joint; Moses Purcell, gun-shot, chest, penetrating.

Company C.—Killed: Private Elisha Meredith. Wounded: Lieut. Alfred H. Johnson, gun-shot, ankle, slight; Private M. Bradberry, gun-shot, foot.

Company D.—Wounded: Private Joseph Bolin, gun-shot, ankle.

Company E.—Wounded: Privates Burwell H. Babo, gun-shot, leg, mortal; J. Hoard Braadon, gun-shot, leg, slight, Sergeant J. A. Hobbs, gun-shot, leg, severe.

Company F.—Wounded: Lieut. James H. Thompson, gun-shot, hip, slight; O. Sergeant P. D. Boyce, gun-shot, leg, severe; Private David Bridges, gun-shot, fore-arm.

Company G.—Wounded: Privates James Cashion, gun-shot, arm, severe; James C. Kelso, gun-shot, elbow-joint; William W. McClellan, knee, slight.

Company H.—Killed: Privates Wm. Cooper, Thomas Harper, gun-shot, leg.

Company I.—Wounded: Privates William Rogers, gun-shot, arm, slight; Samuel Mulligan, gun-shot, little finger.

Company K.—Wounded: Private Francis D. Epps, gun-shot, foot.

The regiment carried into the fight only about 100 men, and they were almost completely exhausted from the excessive heat and the march; but never did men fight more to the purpose.

Col. Turney, after leading his men gallantly through every charge, fell exhausted on account of over-heat, but soon rallied.

THE TENTH VIRGINIA REGIMENT.

Company A (Stasburgh Guards).—Killed: None. Wounded: Private Luther Grove, slightly; Orderly Sergeant George M. Spengler, stunned by the concussion of a shell. 2 wounded.

Company B (Rockingham Rifles).—Killed: Private J. K. Ryan. Wounded: Lieut. S. M. Jones, slightly in arm; Private J. H. Austin, mortally; J. R. Gaither, slightly in hand; William L. Palmer, slightly in hand; J. Ashbury Payne, severely in leg; Joseph Watkins, slightly in leg; James Williams, severely in head. 1 Killed, and 7 wounded.

Company C (Southern Guards).—Killed: None. Wounded: Orderly Sergeant Lucius Cammuck, mortally; Private John Niswander, very slightly in thigh. 2 Wounded.

Company D (Bridgewater Greys).—Killed: None. Wounded: Lieut. F. Linbess, severely in ankle; Corporal B. F. Harmon, severely in leg; Private William H. Stinespring, slightly in shoulder. 3 Wounded.

Company E (Peaked Mountain Greys).—Killed: Privates Stewart Harner; Albert Newland, died from wounds. Wounded: Joseph L. Royer, leg broken; Franklin Michael, severely in neck and jaw; Sergeant Charles E. Hammon, severely in elbow; Corporal E. H. Leap, slightly in head; Stewart Shifflet, flesh-wound in arm; Corporal W. Wyant, stunned by the concussion of a shell; Isaac Wyant, also stunned. 2 Killed and 7 wounded.

Company F (Muhlenburg Rifles).—Killed: Private Edward Kendricks. Wounded: Private E. M. Bushong, flesh wound in thigh; W. Bair, stunned by the concussion of a shell; John Alison, also stunned; John S. Loder, also stunned. 1 Killed and 4 wounded.

Company G (Valley Guards).—Killed: None. Wounded: Private Jas. A. Wilson, severely in ankle; John H. Simmers, flesh wound in thigh; James M. Murphy, slightly; Gabriel Shank, very slightly; Wm. S. Rohr, stunned by the concussion of a shell; Wm. C. McAister, also stunned. 6 wounded.

Company H (Chrisman's Infantry).—Killed: None. Wounded: Capt. James P. Ralston, flesh wound in arm; Corporal A. F. Hopkins, stunned by the concussion of a shell, and slightly wounded by two spent balls, one in breast and one in foot; Private Isaac Keister, flesh wound in thigh; A. S. Kieffer, stunned by the concussion of a shell. 4 wounded.

Company I (Riverton Invincibles).—Killed: None. Wounded: Sergeant Philip M. Seerist, in breast, arm, and thigh; Private Miles G. Grove, severely in right shoulder; Lewis S. Lamb, severely in left shoulder; Noah W. Frazier, slightly by the concussion of a shell. 4 wounded.

Company K (Page's Volunteers).—Killed: Lieut. John W. Mauck; Sergeant James O. Wood; Private Henry H. Lucas. Wounded: Lieut. David C. Grayson, severely in side; Lieut. Wm. E. Pittman, leg shot off; Corporal F. H. Lauck, slightly in thigh; Private James E. Beasley, leg shot off; John J. Berry, severely in arm and side; Andrew J. Kibler, severely in both legs; Nehemiah Atwood, slightly in thigh; Thomas D. Walters, slightly in knee; Tilman S. Wearer, leg shot off; Jas. M. Baker, badly in hand; Jas. C. Wood, Wm. H. Price and Thomas Price stunned by the concussions of shells. 3 killed and 13 wounded.

Company I (Jeff. Davis Guards).—Killed: Private E. M. Ewell, died on the field from sunstroke. Wounded: Lieut. J. C. Crigler, slightly in hand; Private C. E. Jenkins, mortally; Jas. Thomas, slightly by the concussion of a shell. 1 killed and 3 wounded.

The casualties in the 37th Va. amount to 125 in killed and wounded.

THE TWENTY-FIRST REGIMENT VIRGINIA VOLUNTEERS.

(Lieut.-Col. R. H. Cunningham, Jr., commanding.) Field and Staff—Lieut.-Col. R. H. Cunningham, killed; Adjutant Man Page, hurt side and back, horse shot.

Company A (Lieut. D. W. Harvey commanding).—Killed: Sergeant Joseph T. Rainey; Privates James J. Shelton, Wm. Farmer, Wm. A. Turk, Richard E. Ellington, Jas. S. Farrar. Wounded: Jno. T. Hunter, since dead, Jas. L. Price, L. A. Armistead, Jas. A. Sublett, John M. Taum, Geo. W. Ramsey, Ed. J. St. John, Benj. C. Jordan, A. W. Manton. Missing: Corporal Jas. S. Daniel; Privates H. M. Hill, Samuel B. Sims.

Company C (Capt. T. S. Ames, commanding).—Killed: Sergeant Samuel J. Coleman, Corporal W. A. Oliver, Privates A. B. Lipscomb, Wm. M. Oliver, John S. Crouch. Wounded: Sergeant Ben. W. Tisdal; Privates Wm. B. Coleman, Richard C. Coley, Thaddeus P. Webb, Thos. W. Byass.

Company D (Capt. A. C. Page commanding).—Killed: Privates James Dowdy, John Price. Wounded: Lieut. W. E. Booker; Privates Samuel Garbrett, Thos. Hubbard, H. W. Griffith, John Morgan, W. Cook, E. B. Brown, Daniel Baughn, John E. Hazlegrove.

Company E (Capt. W. P. Mosely commanding).—Killed: Corporal Geo. W. Jones; Privates Thomas Morris, Thomas Newton, W. E. Pawin, Jas. H. Webb. Wounded: Lieut. A. M. Cosby, since dead; Sergeant Richard T. Cobb, Corporal P. A. Dorson; Privates Jos. C. Adcock, Jas. M. Austin, W. H. Day, Jas. Guill, Jno. T. Scruggs, Wm. A. Webb.

Company F (Capt. W. H. Morgan commanding).—Killed: Capt. W. H. Morgan, Corporal E. L. Lindsay; Privates H. V. Anderson, John G. Powell. Wounded: Sergeant W. G. Pollard, since dead; Corporal Jas. H. Nunally; Privates R. H. Gilham, C. E. Taylor, E. G. Tompkins, C. M. Redd, J. Peter Wren, Acting Sergeant-Major H. H. Watkins.

Company G (A. D. Kelley, commanding).—Killed: Corporal B. G. Watson; Private J. T. Brasswell. Wounded: Capt. A. D. Kelley; Privates A. C. Archer, A. Bathe, James H. Finch, J. J. Mosely, C. H. Kidd, T. J. Claig, W. Mosely. Missing: J. R. Nance, supposed to be wounded.

Company H (1st Lieut. John A. Younger, commanding).—Killed: 1st Lieut. John A. Younger; Sergeant Joel Y. Shelton, colour bearer; Privates W. J. Dove, W. A. Dove, A. C. East, Samuel Templeton, John P. Shields. Wounded: James Angel, since dead; W. J. Walker, since dead; Christopher Saunder, since dead; H. E. Bell, J. G. Dove, H. Hall, Lieut. Samuel T. Adams, Sergeant D. D. Owen, Zachariah Irby, P. Irby, A. K. Williams, John R. Shields, A. W. Jones, taken prisoner; James L. Moore.

Company I (Captain W. A. Witcher, commanding). Killed: Privates James Witcheer, Moses Mitchell, Jos. Dunu. Wounded: Sergeant A. P. Wagant, since dead; Privates E. B. Eanes, since dead; 1st Lieut. V. W. Swanson, 2nd Lieut. L. D. Minter, Corporal Jno. Riddle; Privates Samuel Gibson, V. Gibson, W. Wallace, Thomas Cooper, James A. Eanes, James A. Gibson, R. Edwards, Darling Allen, Jackson Riley, Lee P. Francis.

Company K (2nd Lieut. T. W. Brown, commanding, taken prisoner and killed by the enemy).—Killed: Private S. A. Elliott, Wounded: S. C. Douglass, James P. Craigue, W. T. Flowers. Robert Hood. Missing: J. Dunnivant.

THE BATTLE OF MANASSAS.

GENERAL LEE'S LETTER AND THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Headquarters of the Army,

Grovetown, August 30, 10 p.m.

The army achieved to-day, on the plains of Manassas, a signal victory over the combined forces of Generals McClellan and Pope. On the 28th and 29th each wing, under Longstreet and Jackson, repulsed with vigour, attacks made on them separately. We mourn the loss of our gallant dead in every conflict, yet our gratitude to Almighty God, for His mercies, rises higher each day. To Him, and to the valour of our troops, a nation's gratitude is due.

(Signed)

ROBT. E. LEE.

To President Davis.

MESSAGE OF PRESIDENT DAVIS.

I have the gratification of presenting to Congress two despatches of General Lee, commanding the army of Northern Virginia, communicating the result of the operations north of the Rappahannock line. From these despatches it will be seen that God has again extended his shield over our patriotic army, and has blessed the cause of the Confederacy with a signal victory on the field already made memorable by the gallant achievements of our troops. Too much praise cannot be bestowed upon the skill and daring of the Commanding-General who conceived, or the valour and hardihood of the troops who executed, this brilliant movement, whose results we now communicate. Our tired and worn troops advanced to meet another invading army, reinforced not only by the defeated forces of McClellan, but by the fresh troops of Burnside and Hunter. After forced marches, with inadequate transportation, and across streams swollen to unusual heights, by repeated combats they turned the position of the enemy, and, forming a junction of their columns in the face of greatly superior forces, they fought the decisive battle of the 30th, the crowning triumph of their toil and valour.

JEFFERSON DAVIS.

WOUNDED CONFEDERATE PRISONERS.

The Richmond papers of August give the subjoined list of wounded Confederate prisoners at Newport, Rhode Island:—

L. W. Heagefeth, Company I, 12th North Carolina Volunteers; Colonel L. V. Latfen, Company C, 12th North Carolina Volunteers; R. Loftin, Company B, 12th North Carolina Volunteers; M. W. Williams, Company C, 12th North Carolina Volunteers; Corporal J. A. Roberts, Company G, 37th North Carolina Volunteers; T. C. Blankinship, Company I, 37th North Carolina Volunteers; George Bell, Company A, 37th North Carolina Volunteers; Joseph Hightown, Company B, 37th North Carolina Volunteers; William J. Hinson, Company A, 37th North Carolina Volunteers; Wm. Semth, Company A, Latham's Artillery; William Andron, Company F, 26th Alabama Volunteers; John Hoornor, Company A, 18th North Carolina Volunteers; A. L. W. Rae, Company F, 18th North Carolina Volunteers; John W. Teddor, Company A, 18th North Carolina Volunteers; Captain Thomas V. Anderson, Company F, 23th North Carolina Volunteers, wounded at Hanover Court-house on May 27, 1862; H. C. Page, Company K, 28th North Carolina Volunteers; John M. W. Langhlin, Company F, 18th North Carolina Troops; John F. McLane, Company F, 18th North Carolina Troops; James A. Cromarier, Company K, 18th North Carolina Troops; A. B. Rooks, Company E, 18th North Carolina Troops; William Hall, Company A, 18th North Carolina Troops; Sergeant Thomas H. Chatman, Company G, 37th North Carolina Volunteers; R. C. Rutledge, Company G, 37th North Carolina Volunteers; Philip H. Paysour, Company G, 37th North Carolina Volunteers; Peyton S. Rhyne, Company G, 37th North Carolina Volunteers; John B. Nicholson, Company I, 37th North Carolina Volunteers; Corporal Zephaniah W. Burgess, Latham's Battery, North Carolina; W. J. Vaughan, Company I, 7th Tennessee; John Peter Merch, Company G, 27th Georgia; Second Sergeant John W. Murchison, Company C, 27th Georgia Volunteers; W. A. Collins, Company C, 4th Virginia Cavalry (Stuart's); Joseph F. Watts, Company B, 49th Virginia; Hubisk Dierkes, Company B, 5th Tennessee; C. Stokes, Company A, 5th Tennessee; Sergeant James Gubbins, Company F, 5th Tennessee; W. M. Davis, Company I, 5th Tennessee; Corporal J. W. Murphy, Company B, 22nd North Carolina Volunteers; Sergeant Albert Renaldi, Company K, 18th North Carolina Volunteers; Sergeant John S. Willis, Company K, 18th North Carolina Volunteers.

The following address appeared in the Richmond Examiner.

MARYLANDERS:—More than a year ago you were driven from your homes by the ruthless tyranny of the usurper at Washington, and with a zeal and gallantry worthy of your State, you rushed to arms in defence of constitutional liberty and Southern independence.

Untoward circumstances, to which it is not now necessary to make special reference, have conspired to impair your influence in the great army of Freedom; but we rejoice to see that the patriotic and generous statesmanship of the Confederate States' Government has at length assumed direct control of the difficulties by which you are surrounded, with a fixed determination to remove them all in the most efficient manner. You are now invited by the Government to enrol yourselves into a "Maryland Line," selecting your own officers, and modelling your organization under the same laws which regulate the volunteers from all other States. You are placed upon the high ground occupied by your brethren of the whole South, and it will now be your fault, nay, your unpardonable dereliction of duty, should you refuse or fail, through inactivity or want of harmony, to attain to a position of power and influence in the Southern army, which shall secure for your down-trodden State the respect of the Southern Government, the sympathy of the Southern people, and a full participation in the hopes and benefits of this struggle for independence.

You will see the published order from the Adjutant General's office inviting you to organize without delay; and we are assured that steps will be immediately taken to enable you to do so. Marylanders! dear friends! remember the wrongs, the sufferings, the dangers which are thickening around the loved hearthstones in old Maryland, where sit in deepest affliction and anxiety your fathers, mothers, wives, sisters, and subjugated brethren, awaiting with inexpressible solicitude the gleam of your avenging steel, and the victorious salutations of heroes, who are to break their chains and put arms into their hands to strike for freedom.

In God's name, lose not a moment in preparing to rescue our bleeding State, whilst we have cause to hope for, and time to accomplish, her redemption.

JNO. H. WINDER, FRANK BUCHANAN,
WM. HENRY NORRIS, E. LOUIS LOWE,
E. GRISWOLD, T. S. RHETT,
H. CLAY DALLAM,

PRIVATE LETTERS.

Charleston, July 23, 1862.

Since I last wrote to you (March 12) we have had eventful times. Our condition was never better than it is now—it was never worse than it was then. The battles before Richmond have been glorious victories for us; and so completely unexpected by the enemy were Jackson's movements that only the day before those battles commenced McClellan announced to his army, in a general order, that Banks had whipped Jackson miles off. "Stonewall" is the terror of the enemy, and will yet do more than he has done; he will completely out-general, and, perhaps, annihilate Pope before he has done with him. Our men seem to care for nothing—only give them a chance, and they rush into a fight, either singly, by platoons, or in regiments.

The Federals have exhausted their stock of Irish, Scotch, Germans, and French, who have been doing their fighting for them, and now know of no other direction in which to look than to the negroes of the South, and you will see that they are proposing to raise negro regiments. One of their members of Congress, a loud-mouthed Abolitionist, proposes, in a speech in Congress, to put them in the front of the battle, and thus to save the lives of their white mercenaries.

You will see Butler's explanation of his "woman order" in the Northern papers. It hears the lie on its face.

When I last wrote to you I was chaplain of the Greenville Regiment, but circumstances forced me leave that position on May 1, and since that time I have had so much business to look after that I have not been able to return to it. But I will be in service again in a short time, although I think of attaching myself to some hospital, or of doing missionary service in the army. Yet I would not be surprised if I go into regular fighting service. I have thought often of raising a company and leading them forth. I cannot remain at home. The men not in the war are going to be marked men hereafter. Almost everybody is in vigorous active service. Even B. F. Perry, who, you know, was as earnest a Union man as myself, and as bitterly opposed to the Secession of South Carolina, ran for colonel of one of the regiments, and is now Confederate District Attorney for Greenville District.

I trust we will soon have recognition from abroad, but no intervention, which I am afraid will be offered upon a proposition for a reconstruction of the Union (which will never, never be submitted to), or upon some other proposition which will be equally objectionable. We will be glad of arms, if any nation will furnish them, or of goods of any kind; but let us fight it out ourselves. We have, however, a fearful struggle before us. We have not yet begun to see the efforts they will make. If we invade them they will have out all their militia, and I think they will do it any how; and, if so, then there will be fighting such as the world never saw. Our men are anxious to be up and at them. If Kentucky rises we will soon show them an army in Ohio, perhaps in Illinois, and I think we will have one in Maryland before you get this letter. One thing you may say to friends abroad—that our people are ready to live on bread and water, to lose everything we have in the world, to come out of this war with nothing but liberty, but not to come out without it. Alexander H. Stephens thinks the war will last beyond this generation, yet he shrinks not. I know no man of foresight who expects less than two or three years more. The truth is, one party or the other must be badly beaten before we can settle the many questions that arise—the mouth of the Mississippi and its trade, the right to fortify it, the Florida forts, the status of Missouri, Kentucky, and Maryland, the possession of Washington City, the complications from the new State they are trying to make out of Virginia, the arrangement of our commercial relations, the Confiscation Bill (North), and the Sequestration Bill (South), these and many other points will make it very difficult to get peace unless we whip them badly or they annihilate us. I say annihilate, for, if they conquer, they will not have man, woman, or child, left to rule over.

How I wish you were here! Your heart would leap with joy to see the glorious determination and to join in the glorious deeds of your countrymen.

Foreign Correspondence.

(From our Commercial Correspondent).

New York, September 2.

Wall-street at present is in a Mieswiler-like condition—waiting for something to "turn up;" the chances are that everything will turn down, unless a short period of extraordinary inflation should follow the forthcoming issues of Mr. Chase, who has been holding his emissions back against the clamours of anxious creditors, paying only in the twelve months' certificates of indebtedness. The quotations for gold and exchange are again advancing; it is likely that the former will touch 30 and the latter 40 per cent. premium by October 1. The low rates for money in Europe keep the bankers and importers from making remittances, but they are committing a mistake in not taking advantage of the eagerness that now prevails.

A sense of truth is beginning to pervade the community, and it will be folly in Lincoln, Stanton, Seward, and the other vulgarians at Washington to attempt to deceive the people any more. The inhabitants of this city, too, are beginning to see the condition in which they have got themselves, and the majority are disposed to make friends with the South, the recent battles having demonstrated that the remedy advised by Greeley and others in the following resolution cannot be put in force—"That inasmuch as property in the loyal States is valueless should the rebellion succeed, we call on the moneyed and other corporations to contribute largely to the recruiting fund, and to every effort for suppressing the rebellion." The funds have stopped, the recruiting has fallen off, the drafting is postponed, and taxation has not commenced.

New York is ruined, but she will be buoyed up as long as the war lasts by the vast Governmental expenditure. So soon, however, as hostilities cease, it will be found that "trade's proud empire hastes to swift decay."

PARIS, September 24.

There has been further controversy going on in several papers, about the number of troops that are to be collected in Mexico under General Forey. The Administration alone could give the exact figure, by stating how many men and horses were shipped on each of the ships that have sailed from our ports. Yet those journals which have taken the trouble to sum up either the officially admitted, or the reasonably supposed numbers, cannot but have come to a pretty correct conclusion, and you may rely on the truth of my last statement that the total will reach 50,000 men. Whether such a large force, and the contingent expenditure, have no further object than to enforce on the feeble Government of Mexico a due regard for the rights of French citizens in that country, or whether the Emperor, in view of the American complications, deems it expedient to provide for all possible emergencies, is a question which every one must judge for himself. The Southern States, however, may rest assured that the French in Mexico will be most friendly neighbours, and even more, I hope that the friendship will be eventually cemented by a close alliance.

We have just received advices from Mexico to August 24. Two thousand infantry had arrived, besides a company of cavalry, and a large amount of military stores. The troops embarked at Algiers on July 5, and were detained a fortnight at Martinique, as directed by the French Government, for the purpose of resting and acclimatizing men and horses. They arrived in fine health and condition at Vera Cruz, and were started instantly on their way to Orizaba.

Speaking of health in a region so much subjected to the regular visitation of the terrible "Yellow Jack," reminds me that a perfect antidote to "black vomit" has been recently discovered. By crushing the leaves of the verberna, a juice is extracted, which, taken in small doses, proves a prompt and perfect cure in almost every case. The verberna is a bush that grows abundantly in many parts of the West Indies and America, especially in low and damp spots, and if there is any truth in the reports of its value as a remedy for yellow fever, it could not be too much known and tried in every country visited by that fearful scourge.

General Forey himself was expected to arrive at Vera Cruz about September 10. He has issued an order of the day dated from Martinique, which terminates as follows:—"We are not going to Mexico to wage war against the Mexican natives, but against those men who are her tyrants and are debasing her in the eyes of civilized nations, amongst whom we invite her to come and take her place." General Forey mentions, rather touchingly, the combat at Puebla, and it is said that his proclamation was drawn up at Vichy, with an approval of the very highest order. It is again reported that the greatest discouragement prevailed among the members of the Mexican Government.

The Northerners in Paris seem to be less sanguine about "crushing the rebels." They have given up Baltimore, they look upon Philadelphia as lost to the armies of the defunct Union, and cannot but entertain great fears for New York. They have still got some friends, though, among newspapers more respectable for the number of their readers than for the principles which they defend, and especially their veracity. The Independence Belge is a conspicuous one. It is much read, because it is published in Belgium. To give you an idea of its unfairness in regard to American affairs, I extract the following:—"General Pope has gained a victory at Bull Run"—"The French Consul at Richmond, having arrived in Washington, announced that the rebel capital was so bare of troops, that one or two brigades could easily take it"—"The telegrams sent to Europe are always got up in favour of the rebels, and people in Europe ought to receive them with caution." I might fill a whole page with such specimens as these.

As I suspected, when I first heard of the capture by the Federal cruisers of the French merchant ship La Manche, the French Minister at Washington has declared that its capture is in defiance of all principles of international law, and has energetically requested its immediate release.

The Emperor and the Empress are expected to return from Biarritz on the 6th of next month. The weather has been very wet for several days, but it has not prevented their Majesties from enjoying their daily walks and drives. It is asserted that the Emperor will remain some time at St. Cloud before going to Compiègne, and that he will make known his will on more than one important question during his stay at the former place. It is whispered in some well-informed quarters that recognition of the Southern Confederacy may be decided upon.

If the American war is not brought speedily to an end, the Federals, who are asking in vain for a leader, for "one man," will have a fair chance of being relieved, through the smartness of the Consul of the Washington Government at Vienna. Of course, you will gratify your readers with the correspondence exchanged between M. Canisius and Garibaldi, and I abstain from any comments on the subject.

The French papers are taking notice of the Garibaldian meetings in London. What will your journals answer to the following from La Patrie?—"If Garibaldi had landed at Malta, he would have been denounced in London, in Dublin, in Newcastle, in Birmingham; and again, he would have been denounced all through England, if sailing towards Greece, he had brought the aid of his valiant sword to the inhabitants of the Ionian Islands."

Paris is very dull at present; nearly all the news I can give you is an obituary. Madame Gressier, whose father, M. Chaix d'Est Ange, is one of our most celebrated lawyers; and the daughter of Litz, the wife of Emile Ollivier, also a remarkable lawyer, and one of the five liberal members in our House of Representatives, both young and charming women, died most unexpectedly, at the same time as the Duchess of Polignac, aged eighty-seven years. This week the poet Count, Jules de Rességuieras, has died, one of the romantiques, when Victor Hugo, Alfred de Vigny, Paul de Rémusat, M. de Lamartine, Alfred de Mallet, created romanticism; Count de Gasparin, the eminent agriculturist; General Richepouse, and Count de Castellane, Marshal of France, have died also; the last named volunteered at sixteen as a private, and has served in the army for fifty-eight years, ever faithful to the noble motto of his house, honos ab armis.

La France was the first French paper which published Victor Hugo's speech at Brussels, on the liberty of the press. In its issue of last Sunday it contained an article on American affairs, from which I will quote a few sentences, regretting that the want of space does not allow me to give it in full:—

The territory of the Confederate States, so boisterously invaded by those immense Federal armies, of whom it was boasted that they would crush everything before them, is free. McClellan and Pope have fallen back behind the fortifications of Washington, with the mutilated remnants of the splendid army of the Potomac. The North is invaded in its turn; Washington is in danger; President Lincoln and his generals have to defend themselves in their own capital, and if the Confederates progress further North, the Federal Government, entirely surrounded, will have no other resource but to take to the water.

That Government, which spoke so pompously of putting down in a few months the so-called Southern rebels, has now for its support nothing but raw recruits, undrilled, dubiously faithful, collected laboriously by means of large bounties, which will soon have to be followed by the hated draft, an army of mercenaries which is to meet well-disciplined and well-tried soldiers, with their courage heightened by their last success, full of confidence in their leaders, and composed of homogeneous elements, of determined patriots, who are fighting for their independence, for their families, for their property.

The Washington Government maintains itself in such a perilous situation only by despotism—by the overthrow of all liberty and public rights—by the reign of terror. Unable to overpower the South in fair fight, it employs means of warfare in violation of the practice of civilized nations; it threatens its enemy with the horrors of a servile war—but the threat is vain, for it is proved that the slaves refuse to listen to the instigations to rebellion which have been offered to them, for the last eighteen months, by those Abolitionists who have to offer them nothing in exchange for their present condition but the loathing of the Northern whites, starvation, and transportation.

And, lastly, "secret societies, an unheard of thing in free America, are organizing themselves for protection against the oppression under which the Federal States are moaning, and it is feared that the disasters of an internecine war may soon be added to the disasters of the war against the South."

Such is the situation. The South has gallantly defended its independence; it has hunted the enemy away from its territory, and it is the North that is now invaded and vanquished.

THE CONFEDERATE CONGRESS.

THE SENATE.

Mr. Yancey, of Alabama, presented the following series of resolutions:—

1. Resolved by the Senate of the Confederate States of America, That the war which is now being waged by the United States, for the avowed purpose of subjugating the people of the several States of this Government, to the dominion of the Government of the United States, is, in the opinion of the Senate, a war as well upon the people as upon the Government of the Confederate States of America; and that the principle upon which this Government and the Government of the several States which compose it are founded, justify each citizen thereof, when the invading enemy enters upon the soil of his State in taking up arms to defend his homestead and liberties, and in attacking the invader, either by individual action or in organized bands.

2. Resolved, That where any of our citizens shall exercise this sacred right, and shall, by the fortunes of war, fall into the hands of the enemy, they are entitled to be treated as prisoners of war, and if they shall be treated otherwise, it is the duty of this Government to extend to them all the protection which may be within its power, or to retaliate for injuries done them.

3. Resolved, That in the event the enemy shall, in revenge for any such patriotic defence of their State by any of its citizens, seize upon and imprison or otherwise injure other of its citizens, not implicated in the particular acts for which such revenge may be taken; or shall pillage or destroy the property of any of our citizens, it will be the duty of this Government to take prompt notice of such acts of cowardly barbarity, and, as far as may be within its power, to punish the perpetrators thereof, or to retaliate in such manner as may be most likely to deter the enemy from the repetition of such deeds.

4. Resolved, That the Senate has learned with lively satisfaction that the President of the Confederate States has already given serious attention and grave consideration to the subject of several gross violations of the laws and usages of civilized war by the military authorities of the Government of the United States, and has already initiated measures tending to prevent their recurrence. And while the Senate responds with sympathy to the regret expressed by the President at the stern necessity which the enemy seems ruthlessly to force upon this Government, of protecting its citizens by the bloody law of retaliation, it will give the President its unflinching support in the prompt execution of measures devised for the complete protection of our citizens in the exercise of the inalienable right of self-defence.

5. Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs are instructed to inquire and report whether any further, and if so, what legislation may be necessary to clothe the Executive with the amplest authority to act upon and carry out the intent and principles enumerated in these resolutions.

The object of the resolutions were explained at length by Mr. Yancey, and they were debated upon by him and Messrs. Wigfall and Semmes.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THE CONSCRIPT ACT.

Mr. Foote, of Tennessee, objected to the extension of the Act, because it was, in his opinion, needless, and not in accordance with State rights. He said: Our people were as willing as ever to volunteer. The Governors of the States were willing to co-operate with the President, yet some gentlemen thought there was a necessity for the bill, and the twelve months' men were consequently kept in camp. The President now says there is no present necessity for the extension of the Conscript Law; so says the Secretary of State. Yet some members of the House thought there was still a great necessity to extend the law. He believed the law was unconstitutional; he was not for interposing any obstacle in the way of the Government; he was prepared to vote 250,000 men, whether the President wanted them or not. He alluded to that part of the President's message which says that Congress can best devise the means to prevent collision between State and Government authority. He said we were struggling, shoulder to shoulder, against the most despotic power on earth, and we ought therefore to unite in a spirit of brotherly love to adopt some conciliatory measure. The old mode of raising troops by our fathers was effectual, and would be effectual now. He was proud of our President—he thought he was full of patriotism—he was a sage. His name will go on the pages of history as a pacificator of trouble; it was gloriously inscribed in history. As some objection had been made to some of his remarks by members of the House, he said he hoped none of them would be offended, as he certainly meant no offence to any one; and if he said anything in the excitement of the moment calculated to hurt the feelings of any member he would take the remarks back. He intended no admonition to the Government. The Secretary of War was a patriot; the grandson of Thomas Jefferson could not be otherwise. Nothing that he had said was meant in the spirit of factious opposition. Some persons thought his resolutions were unreasonable, but he desired to allow the members to know his views upon the subject.

Mr. Mills, of South Carolina, thought the resolution was premature at this time; it was not the time to discuss the merits of the bill. As far as his knowledge went, the people were willing to support the act. The strong arm of the people alone could carry us through a successful termination of this revolution.—It was a question of life and death. He yielded to one on the sovereignty of States' rights; but the country must be saved. The Conscript Act was a measure to sustain the Government, and must be submitted to; France had to resort to conscription. Our country was invaded, and it was the duty of the States to yield to any measure which was designed to serve the country. They should have no selfish motives. The Government was bound to call out troops if they were needed. He was willing to take State troops if he did not know they would not be half so effective as they would be under the existing law. Many regiments were decimated and should be filled up; the State ought to be glad to fill up those regiments, which had covered themselves with glory on the battle field. It was his duty to counteract the effect upon public sentiment by making these remarks; he had no idea of discussing the merits of the case; was rejoiced to hear so much praise for John C. Calhoun from nearly every quarter of the Confederate States; it was only a few years since his name was vilified in nearly every State in the old Federal Union.

Mr. Dargen, of Alabama, said that a short time since our armies were compelled to fall back from the mighty hosts of the enemy; different points had to be evacuated, and the enemy were likely to cross over the country even to the Gulf of Mexico; but the Conscript Law saved the country; it kept the army together and increased them; that was the necessity which compelled him to vote for it. He had only heard of one man in Alabama who had any doubt about the law; every one approved of it, including all from thirty-five to forty-five if necessary. He reluctantly voted for it, because he was opposed to the necessity of raising armies, but that law had protected our troops, our wives, our daughters, and our firesides; thought every man who was raised by the law, when he went back home would be received with universal outbursts of gratitude. He said Mr. Foote having made some remarks about conscripts being marked as such, he thought if the country was saved by conscripts that mark would be the greatest mark their country could place upon them. [Here there was some applause in the galleries, which was promptly suppressed by the Speaker.] Every man should be placed subject to the order of the President, in accordance with the Conscript Act. He hoped the Committee on Military Affairs would frame a bill to permit the President to call into the field every man who is capable of bearing arms, if necessary.

VOTES OF THANKS.

Mr. Bonham, of South Carolina, offered the following joint resolution:—

Resolved, by the Congress of the Confederate States, That the thanks of Congress are due, and are hereby tendered, to Colonel Thomas G. Lamar, and the officers and men under his command, for their gallant defence of Secessionville, in the State of South Carolina, against a superior force of the enemy, on June 16, 1862.

The resolution was unanimously adopted.

Mr. Barksdale, of Mississippi, offered a resolution of thanks to General Earl Van Dorn and his command, together with the citizens of Vicksburg, for their gallant and heroic defence of that city.

The resolution was passed.

Mr. Moore, of Kentucky, offered a resolution, which was adopted, tendering the thanks of Congress to General Breckinridge and his army, for the victory achieved by them at Baton Rouge.

Mr. Clapp, of Kentucky, offered a resolution of thanks to Colonel John H. Morgan, for his brilliant expedition into Kentucky. Unanimously approved.

Votes of thanks were passed to General Lee, General Johnston, and General Jackson, and their respective armies. Some discussion arose in reference to General Hughes. The matter was referred to the Military Committee.

THE NON. PIERRE SOULE.

Mr. Villere, of Louisiana, offered the following joint resolution:—

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives, in Congress assembled, That the President be requested to use all the means in his power to procure the exchange of Pierre Soule, now a prisoner at Fort Warren.

Mr. Villere: Mr. Speaker, I know there can be no objection to this resolution. In these times when all must suffer, when those who are in the army claim our particular attention, we are apt to pass by unnoticed those private individuals who suffer the privations and hardships in behalf of the cause. When the mind is engrossed with subjects affecting the safety and happiness of the whole people, it can hardly pause to look into the cell of the political prisoner. I ask it to pause—I ask it in the name of an unfortunate city—I ask it in the name of a proud and gallant constituency. An old man is now separated from everything that is dear to him—from his family and from his country, to which he has given every proof of his devotion, for which he has spent his best days. It was Pierre Soule that when others, forgetting the high responsibility imposed upon them, left unarmed citizens to the mercy of the foe—it was Pierre Soule who came and stood forth to defend the dignity of a great city, and the honour of a great people—it was Pierre Soule who was found to uphold the honour and the sovereignty of the State and people of Louisiana. He stood up nobly in the discharge of his duty, although he knew that it would lead him to the sacrifice of his liberty. I ask, then, that this resolution may pass; for though the President may be unsuccessful, yet it will be cheering to the wounded spirit, a balm to the noble heart of Pierre Soule to know that the representatives of the people in Congress assembled held him in grateful remembrance.

The rules were suspended, and the resolution offered by Mr. Villere unanimously passed.

THE ARMY.

Mr. Miles, of South Carolina, introduced the following bills, which were referred, upon his motion, to the Military Committee:—

An Act authorizing the granting of medals for courage and good conduct on the field of battle.

An Act to change the organization of the Engineer Corps of the Provisional Army.

An Act authorizing the appointment of additional officers of Artillery for ordnance duties.

An Act concerning Partizan Rangers, authorizing the consolidation of rangers into brigades and regiments when deemed necessary.

An Act to regulate promotion in the Provisional Army of the Confederacy, and to amend an Act to further provide for the public defence.

An Act to increase and regulate the appointment of General Officers in the Provisional Army.

PRIVATEERING.

Mr. Bruce, of Kentucky, offered a resolution directing the Committee on Naval Affairs, to inquire into the expediency of so amending the laws authorizing privateering as to allow a duly commissioned officer to enlist a crew anywhere, said crew to be covered by his commission. Also, to allow a privateer to destroy enemy's property when it cannot be brought into port, and to receive pay therefor under suitable regulations.

Mr. Bruce said:

I regard this, Mr. Speaker, one of the most important, if not the most important, subject which can engage our attention and consideration at this session. I am confident, too, that the revocation or repeal of some of the very stringent and unnecessary provisions of the laws pertaining to privateering, as indicated in this resolution, will cause the seas to swarm with privateers within the next six weeks. As the law now stands, it is a dead letter on the statute books—a nullity. With the indulgence of the House, I will read Section 3 of the law, to show the utter impracticability of its execution to the accomplishment of any desirable results.

"Sect. 3. That all persons applying for letters of marque and reprisal pursuant to this Act, shall state in writing the name, and a suitable description of the tonnage and force of the vessel, and the name and place of residence of each owner concerned therein, and the intended number of the crew; which statement shall be signed by the person or persons making such application, and filed with the Secretary of State, or shall be delivered to any other officer or person who shall be employed to deliver out such commissions to be by him transmitted to the Secretary of State."

Instead, Mr. Speaker, of requiring the compliance with these stringent conditions, I would so amend the law as to commission any man of character who desired to embark in the exciting enterprise of privateering, and allow him to put his commission in his pocket and make his way out of our country as he could, and purchase his vessel, associate others with him, enlist his officers and crew, in any part of the world from Cuba to China; and the commission so issued and held by the one man should protect every officer and seaman on board in case of capture. In my judgment, Mr. Speaker, some such liberal policy on the part of this Government will effectually destroy the command of our enemy—and when we touch this vital cord, we will command an honourable and an early peace. The Government would also be amply reimbursed for any expenditure in the payment for vessels and goods destroyed, by the consequent withdrawal of the enemy's blockading fleets, which are now belling our coasts to attempt the arrest of our privateersmen on the high seas; thereby permitting our citizens and Government to export cotton and import such goods and munitions of war as our citizens and Government require. There would be great inducement also for our privateersmen to bring in munitions of war and all descriptions of such other goods as we require, for the purpose of receiving cotton in payment for any amount that might be due them from the privateersmen. We could afford to make this inducement very great, which would result in incalculable advantage to us in this struggle—particularly if the war should be prolonged for another year. Hence, I am thoroughly satisfied that such amendments are imperatively demanded by the wisest financial and war policy. It is evident, Mr. Speaker, that while England, France, and other European nations, withhold that recognition which we thought we had a right to anticipate and expect, we have the universal sympathy and commendation of these nations in this struggle; and, indeed, the entire civilized world—as they are not indifferent spectators of the unprecedented atrocities committed by our unscrupulous and implacable enemy, and hence they will allow us the most liberal construction of international law relative to privateering. And when they see that we are in extreme earnest and striking such bold blows for independence, and that we have authorized the destruction of all property of the enemy on the high seas, they will look on with admiration at our national vigour, and change their policy towards us. The character, too, of the enemy's vessels is such as to make them easy prey to our privateers—the adoption of this law will prostrate the commerce of our enemy and consequently his finances, as he must now rely exclusively upon his expectations for his foreign exchanges, or submit to the exportation of all the coin of his people. Nothing can be clearer than that England and France earnestly desire our independence—indeed, I have never believed they ever intended to permit the United States to be reconstructed; but, entertaining an abiding confidence that we possessed the native ability and determination to achieve our own independence unaided and alone, they prefer not to implicate themselves in our affairs—neither will I criticise this policy. If, accidentally, our privateers destroy property belonging to these nations, it will be our duty to offer immediate apology and reparation.

Mr. Swan, of Tennessee, moved a joint resolution declaring Benjamin F. Butler an enemy to the human race, and that he should be treated as an outlaw whenever found. It was referred to the Military Committee.

ACTS OF THE CONFEDERATE CONGRESS.

We select the most important of the published Acts of Congress:—

THE NAVY. (No. 78.)

An Act to amend an Act entitled "An Act to provide for the Organization of the Navy, approved March 16, 1861, and for other purposes."

Section 1. The Congress of the Confederate States of America do enact, That the grades of the commissioned officers of the navy of the Confederate States shall, hereafter be as follows, to wit:—Four admirals, ten captains, thirty-one commanders, one hundred first lieutenants, twenty-five second lieutenants, twenty masters, in line of promotion, twelve paymasters, four assistant paymasters, twenty-two surgeons, fifteen passed assistant surgeons, thirty assistant surgeons, one engineer-in-chief, and twelve engineers.

Sec. 2. All the admirals, four of the captains, five of the commanders, twenty-two of the first lieutenants, and five of the second lieutenants, shall be appointed solely for gallant or meritorious conduct during the war. The appointments shall be made from the grade immediately below the one to be filled, and without reference to the rank of the officer in such grade, and the service for which the appointment shall be conferred shall be specified in the commission. Provided, that all officers below the grade of second lieutenant, may be promoted more than one grade for the same service.

Sec. 3. The warrant officers shall be as follows:—Twenty passed midshipmen, one hundred and six sailing midshipmen, fifty first-assistant engineers, one hundred and fifty second assistant engineers, one hundred and fifty third-assistant engineers, ten boatswains, twenty gunners, six sail-makers, and twenty carpenters.

Sec. 4. The annual pay of the additional grades ordered by this Act shall be as follows:—Admirals six thousand dollars; second lieutenant, for service afloat, twelve hundred dollars; when on leave or other duty one thousand dollars; for masters in the line of promotion one thousand dollars, for service afloat; when on leave or other duty nine hundred dollars; passed midshipman nine hundred dollars for service afloat; when on leave or other duty eight hundred dollars.

Sec. 6. The annual pay of assistant-paymasters shall hereafter be, when on service afloat, twelve hundred dollars; when on other duty eleven hundred dollars.

Approved April 21, 1862.

DRUNKENNESS IN THE ARMY. (No. 61.)

An Act to Punish Drunkenness in the Army.

Sec. 1. The Congress of the Confederate States of America do enact, That any commissioned officer of the Regular or Provisional Army who shall be found drunk, either while on or off duty, shall, on conviction thereof before a court of inquiry, be cashiered or suspended from the service of the Confederate States, or be publicly reprimanded, according to the aggravation of the offence, and in addition to a sentence cashiering any such officer, he may also be declared incapable of holding any military office under the Confederate States during the war.

Sec. 2. That it shall be the duty of all officers to report to the commanding officer of the post, regiment, or corps to which they belong, all cases coming under their observation of intoxication of commissioned officers, whether of superior or inferior grades to themselves, and it shall be the duty of the commanding officer of the division or brigade to which said post, regiment, or corps belongs, to whom such report may be made, to report the same to the officer commanding the brigade or division, who shall organize said court and order the trial of said offender at the earliest time consistent with the public service.

Sec. 3. The findings of any such court shall be promptly transmitted to the Secretary of War by the commanding officer, together with his approval or disapproval thereof, and shall be reported to Congress at the next session thereafter by the said Secretary.

Approved, April 21, 1862.

THE CONSCRIPTION ACT.

(No. 97.)

An Act to amend an Act entitled "An Act to Further Provide for the Public Defence, passed the sixteenth day of April, Eighteen hundred and sixty-two.

Sec. 1. The Congress of the Confederate States of America do enact, That all vacancies shall be filled by the President from the company, battalion, squadron, or regiment in which such vacancies shall occur, by promotion, according to seniority, except in case of disability or other incompetency, and that whenever a vacancy shall occur in the lowest grade of commissioned officers of a company, such vacancies shall be filled by election. Provided, however, that the President may, when in his opinion it is proper, fill any vacancy by the promotion of any officer from any company, battalion, squadron, or regiment, in which the same may occur, who shall have been distinguished in service by the exhibition of extraordinary valour and skill, and that when any vacancy shall occur in the lowest grade of commissioned officers of any company, the same may be filled by selection by the President of any non-commissioned officer or private from the company in which said vacancy may occur, who shall have been distinguished in the service by the exhibition of extraordinary valour and skill, and that appointments made by the President shall be by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Approved April 21, 1862.

(No. 82.)

An Act to Organize Bands of Partizan Rangers

Sec. 1. The Congress of the Confederate States of America do enact: That the President be, and he is hereby authorized, to commission such officers as he may deem proper with authority to form bands of Partizan Rangers, in companies, battalions, or regiments, to be composed each of such numbers as the President may approve.

Sec. 2. Be it further enacted, That such Partizan Rangers, after being regularly received into service, shall be entitled to the same pay, rations, and quarters during their term of service, and be subject to the same regulations, as the officers and soldiers of the regular army.

Sec. 3. Be it further enacted, That for any arms and munitions of war captured from the enemy by any body of Partizan Rangers, and delivered to any quartermaster at such place or places as may be designated by a commanding general, the Rangers shall be paid their full value in such manner as the Secretary of War may prescribe.

Approved, April 21, 1862.

THE BLOCKADE.

(No. 89.)

An Act to Increase the Facilities of Importing Goods, Wares, and Merchandise into the Ports of the Confederate States.

Sec. 1. The Congress of the Confederate States of America do enact That it shall be lawful for vessels to unload their cargoes on any part of the coast of the Confederate States, and that the law requiring entry of vessels or discharge of their cargoes at designated ports, and prescribing penalties for failure to do so, shall be and the same is hereby suspended.

Approved April 21, 1862.

THE COTTON SUPPLY.

Mr. S. Laing, late Financial Minister of India, was on Thursday last presented with an address of congratulation by the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, and in the course of his reply dwelt upon the question of getting cotton from India. He said:—

The first point which was of course uppermost in every mind at the present time was as to the supply of cotton. By this time it was pretty clear both what India could and could not do. It could not furnish a substitute for the 4,000,000 of bales of American cotton which had been suddenly withdrawn from the commerce of the world. Nor would it be reasonable to expect that India could do this when it was remembered that it took from five to six acres to produce a bale of clean cotton, at the rate of from 60lb. to 80lb. per acre. Even if all the railways were completed, and even if the Indian cotton grower had a guarantee as to price, it was quite out of the question that such an enormous transfer of labour and capital could be made from agriculture and other pursuits as to give an additional cultivation of something like 20,000,000, or even 10,000,000, of acres in the course of a year or two. What India in round numbers had given us was about 1,000,000 of bales—a great fact in itself, under the circumstances, for the present, and full of promise for the future. The Indian supply, short as it was, had made all the difference between cotton famine and cotton death. People talked sometimes about the large production of cotton in India, and said that there were five or six millions of bales growing there. That was pure moonshine. People in India did not grow cotton for which in ordinary years there was no demand. An immense population of 150,000,000 knew no clothing except cotton fabrics; therefore cotton was largely grown for home manufacture, by the peasantry in their own houses and villages, and there was a certain surplus for exportation. When, therefore, the prices rose, the surplus store came first. But the accumulated stock was already pretty well exhausted; but we had not yet the benefit of an increased production, because no one could calculate how long the present price would keep up. But even if this were certain, the production of cotton must be an affair of time. If in the next year we got a slightly larger quantity than that of the previous year, something like a million and a quarter bales, it was as much as could be reasonably expected. To those who wished to pursue the subject more closely he recommended an able article in last week's Economist, by Mr. Monie. That gentleman proposed that a great army of agents should be stationed by Government all over India, invested with powers as collectors of land revenue, and that they should be stimulated to promote the growth of cotton by having a commission upon the quantity grown in their districts. He (Mr. Laing) was convinced that at present this scheme lay in the domain of theory, and not of practice, in confirmation of which the conduct of the Home Government in vetoing the scheme proposed in India for offering the waste land for sale at one uniform price need only be quoted. If they were still at a stage when they were unable to prevent the Home Government vetoing a measure of that sort, what chance was there of adopting such measures as those discussed by Mr. Monie, which were totally exceptional and different from all recognized rules of Political Economy? If anything of this kind was expected they were trusting to a broken reed, and the best thing he could tell them was that for the next year or two nothing was likely to be done largely to increase the growth of Indian cotton. Practically, the only possible relief from the crisis under which Lancashire was suffering must come from America. It was his own private opinion that many months would not elapse before this horrid and unnatural struggle in America was terminated; and he believed the time would shortly come, if it had not already come, when they would see England, in conjunction with the other great Powers of Europe, recognizing the Confederacy of the Southern States. (Hear, hear.) This would be not only a benefit to England, but to India. It was desirable for the interest of India that a normal price of cotton should soon be established; then the question as to whether cotton could be grown in India to a large extent could be settled. At any rate, they would do well to clear their mind of India, and look solely to America for a solution of the present crisis. As a cotton-producing country India had many advantages, and, as far as he knew, only one serious disadvantage; that was in the climate, which was extreme. For six months in the year it rained in torrents, and for the remaining six there were extreme heat and great drought, interrupted only by a few precarious showers. The consequence was that the indigenous cotton plant, to stand the drought, required to strike its root deeper into the subsoil for moisture. A shorter and more scrubby plant, with deeper roots, and fewer fibres and balls, and producing a less quantity per acre, was the result. This was not, however, the case everywhere. There were districts—especially the Dharwar—where the American seed was largely sown, and he believed the districts where this kind of cotton could be grown were very numerous. In the other districts, doubtless, where American cotton could not be grown, by a careful selection of seed, and by careful cultivation, the Indian cotton could be gradually and largely improved. It was quite clear that in India there was a great extent of country where cotton of every quality, especially Egyptian, could be grown, always provided that the price was sufficient to warrant the diversion of the land from other tropical products. But it was questionable whether cotton would ever maintain a sufficiently high price after the present scarcity was at an end. He had some doubts on that point himself, and also as to cotton being largely cultivated on an extensive scale by European planters. In India cotton was more on a level with ordinary agricultural produce, such as rice or linseed. The cultivation of tea, for instance, and other products, might be made more profitable by the ordinary planter; but where cotton was grown and would be grown in India was more on the small farms of the ryots than by European planters on a large scale. The ryot possessed his own bullocks and plough, his own labour; he did the hoeing himself, his wife and children were there to do the picking, and the consequence was that he could produce cotton at an exceedingly low price. If the prices of cotton could be kept at a tolerably low range, at anything like 5d. or 6d. per lb., he believed it would be found that an increasing quantity of cotton would come from India year after year; that every year ryots would take to the cultivation of cotton as a rotation crop; that they would get the best seed, and grow American cotton where it could be grown, and cultivate their own where it could not. Ready money would make its way in course of time, but if an immediate effect were required business advances must be made where capital was so scarce among cultivators. It was for this reason that Lord Canning's Government were anxious to pass their contract law. At present the state of the law with regard to contracts was, he was afraid, little more or less than a premium to dishonesty. He spoke at some length upon the great necessity for defined legislation in this matter, giving instances of the annoyance caused by the present condition of the law. Although in England Lord Canning's scheme was opposed by some, the obstacle, however, was not in India, but in England. A great deal had been done in India to improve the Administration. The opposing spirit to which he had referred was well high extinct in India itself, and had been banished to its last refuge in the recesses of Westminster. (Laughter and cheers.) He was sorry to say that he had seen some very unfair attacks made upon gentlemen—more especially, in Manchester and Lancashire—because they had not gone into the speculation of sending agents out to India to buy cotton. Well, after all, cotton-spinning was an affair of business, and not of philanthropy; and he did not see that he had any right to call upon a man to go into what he thought a bad speculation. (Hear, hear.) No doubt gentlemen who owed their fortunes to cotton industry were morally bound, when a great crisis came upon it, to contribute liberally towards the support of the working people who were suffering from the effects of that crisis. (Hear.) But how, and in what measure, they ought to do so, was a matter entirely between themselves and their own consciences. They could not find fault with men because they declined to buy raw cotton at 2s. a pound when they did not see their way to selling it at 1s. 6d. a pound after it was manufactured. (Hear.) Moreover, the question of speculating in the growth of cotton concerned England exclusively, and not India. As regarded India, he thought it better that things should be left to follow their usual course, and not attempt to force the growth by artificial expedients. A great deal might be done to accelerate the growth of cotton in India if persons chose to run the risk of sending out capital to buy directly from the ryots. A still more important point was that India might have its market for cotton manufactures very much extended. (Hear.) There would probably be this large increase in exports to India even if not a bale more cotton were grown there. There were in India probably 200,000,000 of human beings all exclusively clothed in cotton fabrics, and these people were advancing in prosperity at a rate unparalleled in the history of the world.

Died at Richmond, on July 10, from the effects of wounds received at the battle of Games' Mill, on June 27, Albert Ker Boyce, aged 19 years, son of the late John J. Boyce, and grandson of the late Ker Boyce, of Charleston, South Carolina.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any rate, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HOTZE, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. Advertisements to be forwarded to the publisher at 102, Fleet-street.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 25, 1862.

What Constitutes the "South"?

THIS question, now that the Confederate armies are on the soil of Maryland, is uppermost in the public mind. It is strange that, despite the careful study of American history and statistics to which the war has given rise, the question should still require a reply, and that in endeavouring to reply to it, otherwise well-informed presses should fall into such stupendous errors as have within the last few days appeared in print.

In the American vocabulary the words "North" and "South" have always had a definite geographical and political meaning. They were known already to the colonists as designating the settlements lying respectively north and south of "Mason and Dixon's Line", so-called from the colonial engineers who drew the boundary line between the provinces of Pennsylvania and Maryland, and famous in colonial history. Already in the formation of the Constitution the distinct interests of "North and South" were canvassed. As the States northward of the line, finding slave-labour unprofitable, sold their slaves southward, and thus by slow degrees—not by any act of sudden emancipation, as many suppose—extinguished slavery within their limits, these distinct interests began to diverge more rapidly. With the extension of the Union a natural boundary, the Ohio River, came to assist the well-known artificial one between "North" and "South", that is, between the non-slaveholding and the slaveholding States. By a mere accident, "Mason and Dixon's Line" stopped short about twenty miles of the Ohio, and thus a narrow strip of land, called, from a fancied resemblance, the "Pan Handle", still remains in possession of the State of Virginia, though lying north of the line of the Ohio and "Mason and Dixon." This little outlying appendage of Virginia is the nucleus, and contains the pretended capital, of that anomalous organization which, under the name of "Kanawha," or "Virginia," claims to be one of the Border States and to speak in the Federal councils with the voice of the great State from which it seceded. With this trifling exception, of no importance either to the South or North, the line of "Mason and Dixon," and the course of the Ohio, indicate accurately, and have for the last half-century been held to indicate, the territorial boundaries of the two great antagonistic Powers. To the westward, the only organized "Territory," as inchoate States are termed, in which slavery exists by law, is that of New Mexico. This, and that portion of the "Indian Territory" which is inhabited by slaveholding Indians, are probably the only domains beyond established State boundaries, over which the Confederate Government would ever claim jurisdiction.

We can thus, without the possibility of error, define what portions of the late United States were comprised under the familiar appellation "The South," and a glance at the map will enable us to enumerate fifteen States and one Territory. Enclosed in the area of the "South," and belonging to it by social affinities and similarity of institutions, lies the District of Columbia, the special domain of Congress, and the only portion of the late United States over which Congress exercises direct local jurisdiction. The District of Columbia was formed of cessions of land by the Legislatures of Virginia and Maryland to the Federal Government, for the purpose of enabling it to erect a capital and discharge its functions upon neutral soil—that is to say, soil on which no local jurisdiction should conflict with its own. The original extent of the District, ten miles square, being found unnecessarily large for the purposes contemplated, the portion ceded by Virginia was returned to that State, and the present area of the District is limited to that portion only of which Maryland was the original proprietor. Slavery still continues a lawful institution in the District, until the complete execution of the recent Emancipation Act.

While the United States were thus practically divided into two great sections—geographically, politically, and socially distinct—each of these sections presented, though in an infinitely less degree, a similar division. Like a magnet cut in two, of which each fragment instantly assumes the qualities of the whole, and has its North Pole and its South Pole, so the North and South had each their extremes in their peculiar characteristics. The revolution which snapped the last remaining link, the governmental co-partnership, between the two sections, began, naturally enough, in the southern extremity of the South, just as the opposition to the revolution commenced with greatest vehemence in the northern extremity of the North. Hence has arisen the confusion of European ideas as regards the "Border States." A brief review of the progress of the revolution may tend to the formation of more correct opinions.

The States which formed the Confederate Constitution at Montgomery, and established the Provisional Government by which the war was conducted for the first twelve months, were, in alphabetical order, Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, South Carolina, and Texas. They were shortly afterwards joined by Arkansas, and, after Mr. Lincoln's proclamation of war against the seceders, by Virginia, North Carolina, and Tennessee. Of these four States only one, Virginia, is, in any sense of the word, a "Border" State, she being the only one having a frontage on the non-slaveholding States. The most casual glance on the map will convince any one that even she is a "Border" State in only a very limited sense of the word, more than three-fourths of her boundaries being drawn between slave-holding neighbours. Her traditions and instincts have always placed her at the head of the South, and thus, when Secession was accomplished, she became the metropolitan State of the new Confederacy and she has furnished for the requirements of the war a larger contingent of men and money than any of her sisters. To speak of Virginia as debatable ground between North and South is simply absurd. No portion of Virginia, considerable enough either in population or influence to affect at any time the policy of the State, has ever displayed disloyalty to the cause of the South, and the miserable corner of North-western Virginia which the Federal Government, without any show of law or reason, pretends to recognize as a separate community, is scarcely worth mention in the discussion of boundaries between North and South. It is important to remark that in each of these four States which joined the Confederacy after its formation, the act of accession was performed by the competent authority, ratified by an almost unanimous vote of the people at the ballot-box, and consummated with all the solemnity of law. In all these States, and in every portion of them, repeated elections to the Confederate Congress have subsequently been held. They are, therefore, de facto as well as de jure, as completely Confederate States as Alabama or South Carolina.

The only real "Border" States—that is to say, disputable States whose allegiance can give rise to any reasonable doubt—are Missouri, Kentucky, Maryland, and Delaware. The insignificance of the latter has caused it to be altogether overlooked in the present contest, and it is immaterial, for any practical purpose, whether it is counted with the North or the South. Maryland and Missouri were the first States invaded by the Federal troops. In the former, a majority of its Legislature were arrested when about to pass an Act of Secession, and detained in custody until their term of office had expired; in the latter, the Convention of the people was dispersed by Federal bayonets, and the executive officers of the State deposed and exiled. Neither of these two States had thus an opportunity of proclaiming their adhesion to the Confederate Government in the same clear and unmistakable manner as Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee, or Arkansas; but the lawfully-constituted authorities of Missouri have, to the extent of their power, confided the State to the protection of the Confederacy, of which she is thus considered a member. Kentucky was long divided within herself, and in the hope of preserving an impossible neutrality, and thus serve as mediator between the combatants, lost, for a time, the opportunity of making known her election between the two. Events of late have so clearly shown the disposition of the vast majority of these three States, which alone can be deemed by the most punctilious stickler for legal forms to be disputable border land, that the Confederate Government has nothing to fear from leaving them completely and unservedly to their own volition. This is the only legal and the only just mode in which their fate can be decided, and the Southern Confederation desires no other. Other States than those we have mentioned the South does not covet as allies, and would not receive as conquests.

A few statistics will enable the reader to form a correct estimate of the actual and prospective strength, as well as of the territorial area, of the South, and will dispose of the erroneous statement made by one of our most influential contemporaries, that the South has at present a larger population to recruit from than the North. In 1860, according to the eighth and last decennial census of the United States, the total white population was 27,490,203. These were divided between the two sections known as North and South, excluding from the latter Delaware, and including New Mexico, as follows:—

North	19,217,153
South	8,273,050
Total	27,490,203
The white population of the South is apportioned among the first seceding States; those who seceded after the formation of the Confederate Constitution, but previous to the outbreak of hostilities; and those whose secession may be regarded as partial or imperfect, and their allegiance consequently disputable, to wit:—
Alabama	529,164
Florida	78,686
Georgia	595,097
Louisiana	376,280
Mississippi	354,700
South Carolina	301,271
Texas	421,750
		2,658,948
Arkansas	324,323
North Carolina	661,586
Tennessee	834,063
Virginia	1,105,192
		2,925,164
Kentucky	930,223
Maryland	599,846
Missouri	1,067,352
		2,597,421
To which add the slaveholding territory of New Mexico, in undisturbed possession of the Confederates
		93,517
Total population, actual and prospective, of the Confederate States	8,273,050

The Confederate States' Navy.

THAT the Confederacy needs a navy is indisputable. Besides having a large sea coast to protect, her inland waters are accessible to an enemy's war-raft, and therefore require the egis of Confederate gunboats. The present blockade, and the few successes attained by the Federals, further testify to this urgent want. It is, however, far easier to get together an army than to create a navy; with all the means and appliances, the latter operation must be a work of time. The Southern States do not lack the raw material; they have abundance of timber, and have for many years been large exporters of naval stores. Moreover, they have the men. They are not dependent upon foreign sailors, or, if they had the ships, would not be compelled to press reluctant Germans and anti-nautical Irishmen into the service. Like ourselves, the Southerners are a people who take kindly to the sea; and their coasting trade is an excellent nursery for seamen. Amongst the maritime Powers of the New World the Confederate States will occupy a foremost position, and, indeed, seeing the manner in which her ports can be shut up by an enemy, a strong navy is indispensable to her independence.

The ingenuity displayed in the construction of the Virginia and the Arkansas gives the promise of a brilliant future; showing, as it does, a rare fertility of invention and resource. It is curious, but true, that the new-born navy of the South brought about a revolution in naval warfare, by solving the problem of iron versus wood. Be it remembered, too, that the Virginia and the Arkansas were put into iron armour whilst there was not a single rolling mill in the country. The achievements of these two vessels read more like romance than reality, and certify to the daring and seamanship of the Southerners. Thus encouraged by the past, and stimulated by necessity, the Confederates seem to be making great exertions to get a navy to cope with their Northern antagonist. There are difficulties in the way, but apparently not so formidable as those on land which have been overcome by the devotion of the army and the genius of its commanders. About the possibility of utterly crippling the navy of the United States with the immediate and prospective naval resources of the Confederate States, there may be a diversity of opinion, but that a moderate force would suffice to raise the blockade is unquestionable. We are not surprised at the rumours of European nations being anxious to aid, as far as they legally can do so, the creation of a Confederate navy; for the breaking of the blockade means a ready market for European manufactures, a supply of cotton for European looms, and revival of trade. On the other hand, we perfectly understand why the North dreads a consummation that will be of such immense advantage to the South. The opening of the Southern ports would do much towards convincing the North of the folly of continuing the war.

It is not our intention to speculate on the vessels of war that are in course of construction in the Southern States, except that we take this opportunity of assuring our readers that the Federal reports about naval preparations and movements of the Confederates are not more reliable and accurate than those which refer to the movements or the Confederate land forces. Nor are we in a position to give a statement of the present strength of the Confederate navy; but it is well known that it has been considerably augmented during the last few months. We wish, rather, to notice an important proposition that has been brought before the Confederate Congress, and which, if it becomes law, will tend to the rapid development of the Southern navy, and involve other important consequences.

Mr. Bruce, of Kentucky, submitted a resolution to the House of Representatives, directing the attention of the Committee on Naval Affairs to the expediency of amending the law relating to privateering. The hon. member suggests that a duly commissioned officer shall be allowed to enlist a crew anywhere, and the crew to be covered by his commission. "I would," said Mr. Bruce, "so amend the law as to commission any man of character who desired to embark in the exciting enterprise of privateering, and allow him to put his commission in his pocket, and make his way out of our country as he could, and purchase his vessel, associate others with him, enlist his officers and crew in any part of the world, from Cuba to China; and the commission so issued and held by the one man should protect every officer and seaman on board in case of capture." As the law now stands, any one applying for letters of marque and reprisals has to give "a particular description of the tonnage and force of the vessel, and the name and place of residence of each owner concerned therein, and the intended number of the crew." By the proposed change the commander, and not the vessel, will be licensed or commissioned. During the blockade the necessity of registering the vessel is an insuperable difficulty, and, as it seems to us, a needless precaution. The practical difference will be that the officer's commission will cover any vessel or crew he may command, instead of covering a registered vessel and crew. No objection can be made to purchasing vessels in Europe for privateering, even if the purpose of the purchase were needlessly avowed; for procuring vessels for Confederate privateering is not a greater violation of the law than the Federals buying rifles and other warlike stores in Europe. If we have not misconceived the bearing of Mr. Bruce's proposal, it will impart to the commanders of privateers, whilst in service, somewhat the standing of officers of the Confederate navy, just as the Confederate Government has recognized the so-called guerilla bands as a branch of the regular military service. Such an alteration would raise the character of privateering, and bring it under the direct and wholesome control of the Executive.

There is, we know, with some people much that is objectionable in the idea of developing and systematizing privateering. We shall, perhaps, be told that its business is plunder of private property, and that we ought not to compare it to the so-called guerilla bands, who are bound to respect, and in the South have respected, private property. We need only reply that privateering is retaliation. The Federal war vessels do not respect the private property of Confederate citizens. Let them raise the blockade and allow private property of merchants free ingress and egress, and privateering would be unjustifiable, because there would be no demand for retaliation. Privateering is a system of reprisals, lawful and just. We do not offer any opinion as to the expediency of permitting the merchantmen and merchandize of an enemy to be unmolested. It may be said that since commerce supplies the sinews of war, the less commerce is interrupted the longer would be the war, and so the philanthropist who thinks more of his fellow-creature's lives than he does of his pocket, may have some pretence for opposing any scheme to make war less costly to the general community; but so long as seizing the property of private citizens at sea is right, privateering cannot be wrong. It is of the utmost importance that privateers should not transgress the law of nations, and this will be to a great extent insured by a system that commissions respectable men, irrespective of the ship or crew. In the circumstances of the Confederate States, we agree with Mr. Bruce that the alteration is expedient as well as commendable.

Mr. Bruce also proposes "to allow a privateer to destroy enemy's property when it cannot be brought into port, and to receive payment therefor under suitable regulations." This will vastly increase, should it be adopted, the number of privateers, for it will prevent the dissatisfaction consequent upon having to lose property captured at a considerable risk; and it will also prevent privateers incurring the danger of being taken by the enemy, in trying to save their prizes. Mr. Bruce observes that the Confederate Government will not lose by such an arrangement, for the privateers will tax the resources of the North, withdraw a portion of the blockading squadron, and will, in fact, be a cheap and very efficacious auxiliary to the Confederate navy. In the event of the property of neutrals being accidentally seized or injured, Mr. Bruce justly observes that the Confederate Government would make immediate and ample reparation.

It is not easy to estimate the probable results of a great increase of Confederate privateers. It would, as we have remarked above, be a valuable aid to the regular navy. Many privateers would, doubtless, be able to run the blockade with cargoes of ammunition receiving in payment cargoes of cotton. The main effect would be the paralysis of Northern commerce, and this would make the war felt by those cliques who are amassing riches on the ruin of their country, and who are unsparing in their endeavours to prolong the contest. If Congress should think proper to adopt the proposal of Mr. Bruce, no one on this side of the Atlantic will find fault with its decision.

India and the Cotton Supply.

WHEN the Cotton Famine was looming in the distance the men of Lancashire were told to make themselves easy, for if the American supply failed, the indispensable staple could be procured from elsewhere. When the catastrophe happened, and the Cotton Famine was at our doors, we were bidden to be of good cheer, and not to repine at a crisis which would make us independent of America. During the whole continuance of the Cotton Famine the agents of the United States' Government have, by their English tools, been cautioning us not to interfere in any way to shorten the contest in America, even if we could do so; since America's extremity is India's opportunity. Why should we pay £20,000,000 or £30,000,000 per annum to America when the same sum might be spent in India, to the incalculable benefit of the British Empire? There has been a vast exhibition of virtuous indignation at the conduct of Manchester; but if the allegations were not utterly false there would be more need for pity and contempt. There are millions a year going begging. The men of Manchester will not accept the proffered wealth. The world is wrong about the money-making propensities of our great industrial capital. Its citizens reject the kind gifts of fortune. For some inscrutable reason, if we are to believe the gentlemen who are anxious to become secretaries and managers of Indian Cotton Companies (Limited), our manufacturers would rather see their mills closed, and their mill hands starving, than invest a portion of their capital in an enterprise that must inevitably yield them a fabulous profit, a profit that the victims of the South Sea Bubble hardly dreamed of. Very curious indeed, but not more so than the generosity of the philanthropists who are so angry with Manchester. If the return is so certain, why do they not go into the business on their own account? Why do they want to give away Aladdin's Lamp? How is it London does not grasp the treasure so wittily refused by Manchester? The whole affair is strange, passing strange; we may add, miraculous. Capitalists are eagerly looking out for investments at 5 per cent., and they will not go into one that would yield them, say, 50 per cent. The fact is, Manchester and London, as well as the philanthropists, know that the Indian cotton scheme is a delusion, and the wonder is that it should have been so pertinaciously paraded; that such a distinguished political economist as Mr. Laing should last week have deemed it necessary to expose what he very correctly called "moonshine." It would have been extraordinary if Manchester men had been gulled into allowing themselves to be bled by the India cotton chimera, as it is extraordinary that shrewd men of business were thought so gullible by philanthropic bubble-blowers. The India cotton schemers are refuted by their own arguments. They say India is capable of supplying almost any quantity of cotton. If so, why has India hitherto supplied so little? The reply is, the lack of capital and enterprise. But if we look to the returns of trade, we find that India has not wanted for capital and enterprise for other products. If anything, she is now rather suffering from a plethora of capital. We are then told it is a question of price, and at present prices India can grow cotton profitably. But how long is America to be kept out of the market? Suppose the war lasts five years; still at the end of that time American cotton will be appearing at Liverpool, and Indian cotton will have to come down. But we need not discuss the question, for the argument is in itself untenable. The price of cotton is enhanced on account of the scarcity; and hence at the enhanced price India can export cotton at a profit. When the scarcity ceases, will not the price decline? The proposition is this—the supply of cotton hitherto obtained from the Confederate States can be procured from other countries and notably from India—India can export cotton profitably when there is a dearth; but, then, if India removes the dearth she loses her profit. She can replace the American supply with advantage so long as she does not replace the American supply. This, we grant, is a ridiculous paradox, yet it is the inevitable conclusion from the arguments brought forward by those who contend that England will be immensely benefited by the war in America, because it will transfer the production of cotton from the Confederate States to India.

Besides, in this case experience hindered speculation. Even fools will not take a flash note that has been detected and marked. There have been many and fruitless efforts to foster the cultivation of Indian cotton. The East India Company made several costly experiments under the most favourable circumstances, and failed. Private individuals have also tried, and tried in vain. Mr. Laing explained briefly, but irrefutably, why in the Confederate States cotton can be produced of a better quality, and cheaper, than in India. "As a cotton-producing country, India had many advantages, and, as far as he knew, only one serious disadvantage; that was in the climate, which was extreme. For six months in the year it rained in torrents, and for the remaining six there were extreme heat and great drought, interrupted only by a few precarious showers. The consequence was, that the indigenous cotton plant, to stand the drought, required to strike its root deeper into the subsoil for moisture. A shorter and more scrubby plant, with deeper roots, and fewer fibres and balls, and producing a less quantity per acre, was the result."

This is entirely true, but not the whole truth. Mr. Laing might have added, that the Cotton States of America have a climate peculiar to themselves, and which is especially adapted for the growth of cotton. There are in the Confederate States places in which cotton cannot be better grown than it is in India, and there are two districts in which it can be more profitably grown than in all the world, and the area of these districts is so extensive that if there were the labour and demand they could yield cotton enough to clothe mankind. So our dependence upon American cotton is the result of Providential arrangements, and is not due to the apathy of Manchester. It is true that India cotton schemers pooh-pooh Providential arrangements, but, then, they cannot alter them. In bygone days an ecclesiastical dignitary denied that the earth moved round the sun; but he could not by a decree make the sun move round the earth.

India does produce a large quantity of cotton for her own consumption and a considerable quantity for exportation; but cotton is not her most profitable production. We do not agree with those who think that the more cotton India grows the richer she will become; on the contrary, we hold that the increased growth would be detrimental to her material interests; but we may be sure India will not take the place of America. When prices are exceptionally high she will export more cotton, and that is all we can expect from her. The cause of the enormous consumption of cotton is its cheapness; let the high prices be lasting—that is, let the supply have to come from India, and not from America—and, by a natural law, the demand will be less. The greatness of our cotton manufacture depends upon the cheapness of the staple. Our readers must forgive us for repeating the A B C of Political Economy, since it is the first principles of the science that are assailed.

Mr. Laing observed that it would be well for India "that a normal price of cotton should soon be established." If the present abnormal price of cotton should induce Indian farmers to invest their means in its more extended cultivation, India will, assuredly, be one of the sufferers from the present American war. The price of cotton must come down, and the Indian farmer would find that it was not the American competition that prevented him supplying the looms of Lancashire, and that scarcity, though it increases the value of stock, does not, at least for any length of time, increase the profits of production. Those who are endeavouring to increase the cultivation of cotton in India by holding out the bait of an abnormal price will, if successful, do India an injury.

We do not say the world is in bondage to the Confederate States, but we contend that, without American cotton, the commanding and all-important commerce in cotton fabrics must dwindle, and become comparatively small. We do not deny that the South would not lose immensely if the demand for her peculiar staple should cease, but she does not depend upon cotton; she can produce other articles of commerce, and without exporting a single bale of cotton would do a large and profitable trade. So far as our cotton manufacture is concerned, Mr. Laing spoke the truth—nothing but the truth—when he said, "practically, the only possible relief from the crisis under which Lancashire was suffering must come from America," and that we should "do well to clear our mind of India, and look solely to America for a solution of the present crisis." This is sound advice, and, coming from such a quarter, cannot fail to exercise a salutary influence in checking speculations, the results of which would be worse than useless, since they would not remedy the present distress, and would eventuate in disappointment and loss to all connected with them.

National Thanksgiving.

THE people of the Confederate States have good reason, in the very midst of mourning for their dead, to meet together and return thanks unto the Lord of Hosts for deliverance from the hands of their enemy. No one can marvel at the universal feeling of gratitude to which President Davis gave expression in his proclamation setting apart the 18th of this month as a day of solemn thanksgiving. When the war broke out the South was not only without allies, but was, by the calumnies of the North, cut off from the sympathy of other nations. Alone and unprepared, she had to face an enemy whose numerical superiority and greatness of resources seemed irresistible to the looker-on. At the first battle of Manassas part of the Southern army was without firearms, and few, if any, regiments had half a dozen rounds of ammunition. The fight was gallantly contested, but victory was inclining to the invader, when the division of Kirby Smith appeared, and the Northern army was panic-stricken and fled in disorder. Thus upon an apparent accident this victory, which encouraged the South, depended. General Kirby Smith, from what has been called "an inspiration," changed his route, and so appeared unexpectedly before the enemy. The North, not discouraged by this failure, determined to crush the South by a renewed and unprecedented effort. An army, reputed 700,000 strong and splendidly equipped, and aided by fleets of powerful gunboats, was commissioned to subjugate the South. The Northern troops set forth with a shout of triumph, whilst the Federal Government and press boasted of their invincibility, and decreed death and confiscation to the Southerners. Never in the history of the world was there such an instance of arrogant confidence. What has become of the Northern army? What are the triumphs of the Northern fleets?

The Army of the West, always boasting of its success, seems to have wasted its strength in disastrous inactivity, and is no longer aggressive, but is doing its best to defend itself from attack. The great Army of the Potomac, that was to have been in Richmond before July 4, and the other Federal armies in Virginia, have been driven back to shelter themselves behind the fortifications of Washington. We cannot forget the defiant tone of the North after the defeat on the Chickahominy. General McClellan issued an address to his army, in which he mocked them with congratulations on victory, after they had been fleeing for days until they found shelter under cover of the gunboats. Mr. Lincoln, too, told the remnant of the once mighty army that, it never had and never would be beaten, and that it would go to Richmond. It remained on the peninsula, unable to advance, and being daily decimated by pestilence, and then it retreated to the neighbourhood of the Federal capital. General Pope took the field with a blast of triumph, and in a few short weeks he is not only beaten, but disgraced. If the North is not rebuked by these events, surely the South is right in discerning in them "the guidance of an Almighty hand." The battle is not always to the strong, nor the race to the swift. The brilliant strategy of the Confederate commanders, and the heroism of the Confederate army, leave the military critic still amazed at their uninterrupted success since the Seven Days' Battle; and the people who have been delivered from a ruthless invader cannot fail to perceive in such an unbroken series of triumphs the aid and blessing of the God of Battles.

The fleets of the North have on two occasions—and notably so with the Arkansas—been defied and overawed by a single Confederate vessel. The navy has not earned mere laurels than the army. It captured New Orleans. Has that proved a calamity to the South? Has not Benjamin F. Butler, by his extreme barbarity, exposed the execrable character of the Northern invasion, and won for the South a sympathy as profound as the admiration inspired by her heroism?

The proclamation of President Davis does not modify the greatness of the Southern victories. In counselling the people to render prayer and thanksgiving, the manly reticence that distinguished his Message to Congress would have been unsuitable; but in words that will find an echo in English hearts, he acknowledges that unto God alone must be ascribed the honour of their deliverance. In the hour of triumph, in the flush of victory, in the moment of exultation at the overthrow of two great armies, President Davis does not forget that the future depends on the will of God, and therefore he counsels the people of the Confederate States not only to return thanks for the great mercies vouchsafed, but "to implore Him to conduct our country safely through the perils which surround us to the final achievement of the blessings of peace and security." A fiery ordeal may yet be awaiting the South; but we cannot doubt that a people thus supplicating and depending on the favour of Heaven will, if adversity comes, bear it bravely, and ultimately attain to the longed-for blessings of peace and security.

"Mason and Dixon's Line."

THE turn which the conflict on the other side of the Atlantic is now taking renders the boundary, or imaginary line, between the sections of the late American Union of some interest at the present time.

Sir Walter Raleigh having obtained from Queen Elizabeth a patent to discover and occupy lands in America, arrived on the Roanoke in the year 1584, when he took formal possession, and named the country Virginia. Notwithstanding that there were some settlements of the Dutch and Swedes on the Hudson and Delaware Rivers, the whole territory east of the Mississippi continued to be so designated until charters were granted for the colonies of New England, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, the Carolinas, and Georgia. Owing to a want of knowledge of the topography of the New World, there were for many years disputes between the several Proprietories in reference to the respective boundaries; some of the patents were confined to the limits of rivers, whose courses were entirely unknown, while others called for straight lines; hence the same soil had, on some occasions, two claimants. The most remarkable and long contested difficulty was that between the heirs of William Penn and those of Lord Baltimore in relation to Maryland, Delaware, and Pennsylvania, concerning which we present the following account.

In 1632, Charles the First granted to Cecilius Calvert, Lord Baron of Baltimore, "all that part of the peninsula or chersonese, lying in the parts of America, between the ocean on the east and the Bay of Chesapeake on the west; divided from the residue thereof by a right line drawn from the promontory or headland, called Watkins' Point, situate upon the bay aforesaid, near the river of Wigheo on the west, into the main ocean on the east, and between that boundary on the south, and that part of the Bay of Delaware on the north which lieth under the fortieth degree of latitude, where New England terminates." Under this grant Lord Baltimore and his descendants claimed the whole peninsula, from the "right line" to the fortieth degree, but the title, strictly speaking, only extended to that portion unsettled or uncultivated, the Dutch and Swedes having had possession of the western margin of the Delaware; from whom the Duke of York conquered the same, as well as their settlements on the east side of that river, and exercised sovereignty over them until 1682, when he transferred all his rights on the western shore to Penn, who was desirous of owning all the territory from his province to the Atlantic. This constituted the "three lower counties in Delaware." The Duke of York having succeeded to the throne (King James the Second), and desiring to put an end to all disputes, ordered, by a decree in Council, in 1685, "that for avoiding further differences, the tract of land lying between the Bay of Delaware and the eastern sea on the one side, and the Chesapeake Bay on the other, be divided into equal parts by a line from the latitude of Cape Henlopen to the fortieth degree of north latitude, the southern boundary of Pennsylvania by charter." This decree did not, however, remove the difficulty, as the situation of Cape Henlopen was still uncertain; the middle of the peninsula had yet to be ascertained. The dispute was protracted until the 10th of May, 1732, when an agreement was made between the parties "that a semi-circle should be drawn at twelve English statute miles around Newcastle (Delaware) agreeably to the deed to Penn in 1682; that an east and west line, beginning at Cape Henlopen—which was admitted to be below Cape Cornelius, the present Cape Henlopen—and running westward to the exact middle of the peninsula, between the two Bays of Chesapeake and Delaware, and, the end of the line intersecting it in the latitude of Cape Henlopen, a line should be run northward, so as to form a tangent with the periphery of the semi-circle at Newcastle, drawn into the radius of the twelve English statute miles, whether such a line should take a due north course or not; that after the said northwardly line should touch the Newcastle semi-circle, it should be run further northward until it reached the same latitude as fifteen English statute miles due south from the most southern part of the city of Philadelphia; that from the northern point of such a line, a due west line should be run, at least for the present, across the Susquehanna River, and twenty-five miles beyond it, and to the western limits of Pennsylvania, when occasion and the improvements of the country should require; that that part of the due west line not actually run, though imaginary, should be considered to be the true boundary of Maryland and Pennsylvania;" * * * and "that the route should be well marked by trees and other natural objects, and designated by stone pillars, sculptured with the arms of the contending parties, facing their respective possessions." This important document, though seemingly so free from ambiguity, was afterwards the subject of much litigation; but was finally carried into complete effect, in all its parts. It accounts for the "three lower counties" which subsequently "seceded," and became the State of Delaware. The quiet of the provinces continuing to be interrupted by the conflicting claims of settlers along the border, both parties applied in 1737 to the King's Council for some order which should lessen or allay these ferment. An amicable temporary arrangement was first effected, it being agreed "that all the vacant land not now possessed by, or under either of them, on the east side of Susquehanna River down as far as fifteen miles and a quarter south of the latitude of the most southern part of the city of Philadelphia, and on the west side of Susquehanna as far south as fourteen miles and three-quarters south of the latitude of the most southern part of the city of Philadelphia, should be subject to the temporary and provisional jurisdiction of Pennsylvania; and that all vacant land not possessed by or under either, on both sides of the Susquehanna, south of the said temporary limits, should be subject to the jurisdiction of Maryland, until the boundaries were finally settled, but to be without prejudice to either party." In accordance with this understanding, commissioners were appointed to run the temporary line, who began their operations in the spring of 1739, and surveyed "to the most western end of the Kittochinny Hills." The controversy between the proprietors, nevertheless, continued; the cause got into Chancery, on the construction of the agreement of May 10, 1732, and was not decided until 1750. Lord Baltimore's counsel contended that it could not be carried into effect by reason of its vagueness. The Lord Chancellor (Hardwicke) overcame all objections, and decreed a performance of the articles of agreement. He ordered that new commissioners be appointed, to begin their work in November of that year, fixing the centre of the semi-circle as near the middle of the town of Newcastle as possible, and that Cape Henlopen should be taken as laid down in the map accompanying the articles of agreement, about fifteen miles from the cape now known by that name. The commission met at Newcastle on November 15, 1750, and fixed upon the court-house as their starting point; but Lord Baltimore's representatives conjured up a new and unexpected difficulty, by insisting that the radii of the semi-circle should be measured superficially, without allowing for the inequalities of the ground, regardless of the absurd consequences resulting therefrom and utter impossibility of describing anything like a semi-circle. They persisted in their objections, and the heirs of Penn were again under the necessity of applying to court, when in 1751 they obtained a decision in favour of horizontal measurement. The commission again proceeded in their task, and having first run the semi-circle, marking it in the ground, they commenced operations at the point then known as Cape Henlopen, and finished the "middle line" between the two bays. After some further delay and cavilling as to distance, Frederick, Lord Baltimore, weary of the controversy, entered into articles of agreement with Thomas and Richard Penn on July 4, 1760, which at length effectually closed their tedious and irksome altercations. It was covenanted that the semi-circle as already run should be adopted; that the distance across the peninsula, in the latitude of Cape Henlopen, should be taken as correct at 69 miles 298½ perches from the stone pillar east of the mulberry tree at Fenwick's Island; that the middle of such line should be ascertained, from which point it should start northwardly, whether exact or not, so as to form a tangent with the semi-circle at Newcastle, drawn within a radius of twelve English statute horizontal miles from the court-house, in that place, and past the said point of contact in the same direction, until it reached the latitude of fifteen miles below the most southern part of the city of Philadelphia; that from that point a line should be run due west—to the utmost longitude of Pennsylvania; that all claims should be released to the territory within the limits there to be ascertained, and that the Penns should appoint surveyors to run the lines as yet unfinished. The persons in whose charge the matter was placed made very slow progress, and at the end of three years accomplished little more than the peninsula line and the measurement of the radius; this left to be ascertained and established "the tangent from the middle point of the peninsula line to the tangent point—the meridian from thence to a point fifteen miles south of the most southern part of the city of Philadelphia—with the arc of a circle to the west of it, the fifteen miles distance, and the parallel of latitude westward from its termination." At this stage, the Penns and Lord Baltimore, being in London, agreed to employ Charles Mason and Jeremiah Dixon, "two mathematicians and surveyors," "to mark, run out, settle, fix, and determine all such parts of the circle, marks, lines, and boundaries, as were mentioned in the several articles or commissions, and were not yet completed." Messrs. Mason and Dixon arrived at Philadelphia on the 15th of November, 1763. After receiving their instructions from the Commissioners of the Provinces on the 9th of December following, they forthwith engaged in the duty assigned to them. They ascertained the southernmost part of the city of Philadelphia from a house occupied by Thomas Plumstead and Joseph Huddle, on the south side of Cedar (now South) Street, to be 39 deg. 56 min. 29.1 sec. north; and in January and February, 1764, measured thirty-one miles westward from the margin of the Delaware to the forks of the Brandywine, where they planted a quartzose stone, known to this day in the vicinity as the "Stargazers-stone." In the spring of 1764, they ran from said stone a due south line of fifteen English statute miles, crossing the Brandywine three times in the first mile, horizontally measured by levels each twenty feet in length, to a post marked "west," ascertaining there, also, its latitude, computed at 39 deg. 43 min. 18 sec.; they then repaired to a post marked "middle," at the centre point of the peninsula west line, running from Fenwick's Island to Chesapeake Bay; and during the summer they made and described the tangent line that had been agreed to. Then, in the autumn of 1764 they set off from the post marked "west," and produced a parallel of latitude westward as far as the Susquehanna, from which they went to the tangent point, and in the next year they completed a meridian line from thence northward until it intersected the said parallel of latitude at the distance of 5 miles, 1 chain, and 50 links, thus and there determining and fixing the north-east corner of Maryland. Before the close of 1765 they described such portion of the semi-circle round Newcastle as fell westward of the said meridian, in due north line from the tangent point. "This little bow or arc reaching into Maryland is about a mile and a half long, and its middle width is 116 feet; from its upper end, where the three States join, to the fifteen-mile point, where the great Mason and Dixon's line begins, is a little over three and a half miles; and from the fifteen-mile corner due east to the circle is a little over three-quarters of a mile." The surveyors repeated their operations at several points, and finally proceeded beyond the Susquehanna to the end of five degrees longitude from the Delaware, in the parallel of the west line, which they extended to the distance of 230 miles, 18 chains, and 21 links, from its beginning at the north-east corner of Maryland, or 244 miles, 38 chains, and 36 links from the Delaware, near to an Indian war-path on the Dankard Creek; the red men prevented the continuation of their labours, and they were obliged to abandon the five degrees of longitude from that place to the western limits of Pennsylvania. They, however, agreed that the length of the southern boundary of that State was 267 miles, 58 chains, and 90 links, and on November 9, 1768, this was certified by the commissioners to have been marked, described, and perpetuated, by setting up and erecting therein stones at the end of every mile, from the place of beginning to the distance of 132 miles, near Sideling Hill; every five-mile stone having on the side facing the north the arms of Thomas and Richard Penn, and on the south the arms of Lord Baltimore. These stones were imported from England, and were hewn from that variety of calcareous rock known as oolite or roestone. The line thus marked is stated to have been measured horizontally, the hills and mountains with a 16½ foot level; and the vista cut through the forest eight yards wide, was "seen about two miles, beautifully terminating to the eye in a point." The residue of the southern line of Pennsylvania—something less than twenty-two miles—was afterwards, in 1782, run by other surveyors, but was not completely and permanently marked until 1784. When the interference of the Indians arrested the proceedings of Messrs. Mason and Dixon they returned to Philadelphia, and received an honourable discharge on December 26, 1767, having been engaged in the service about four years. They were allowed twenty-one shillings per day, for one month, from June 21 of the last year, and the residue of the time ten shillings and sixpence each per day for the expenses, &c., and no more until they embarked for England, when the allowance of ten shillings and sixpence was renewed until their arrival home. The amount paid by the Penns under these proceedings, from 1760 to 1768, was £34,200 Pennsylvanian currency.

It will thus be seen that "Mason and Dixon's line" is not, as often supposed, the line of the Missouri compromise, which was drawn in lat. 36° 30' N. It became famous in colonial times by of reason the controversies herein related, and the slavery question had nothing whatever to do with it. But it subsequently marked a well-defined social and political boundary, in consequence of Pennsylvania being the most southerly State that abolished slavery, while Maryland is the most northerly State that retains that system of labour. It will, moreover, be observed that the boundaries between Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland have been so long established that they are as well known and recognized by the large population on the borders as if they had been defined by a river. Indeed, the different States are just as distinct in their organizations as the several nations of Europe, and no difficulty has ever been experienced on account of the absence of natural divisions; in fact, until the tyranny of Lincoln's Government was exhibited during the past twelve months, the hand of Federal authority was never known or felt by the people of the States, the Power at Washington being only a foreign agent for the individual commonwealths.

SOME weeks ago we had occasion to refer to a fund for the relief of the wounded prisoners still in the hands of the Federal authorities, raised and managed by the "Southern Club" at Liverpool. The undertaking has been crowned with marked success.

From a comparatively small beginning the amounts collected and transmitted by the Club, exclusively the contributions of patriotic Southerners resident in Europe, have increased to largely upwards of £3000. The agency organized for supplying the wants of these poor fellows, many of them nurtured in luxury, or, at least, affluence, and now destitute of even the commonest necessities of life, or even the means of changing the clotted shirt that has stiffened on their wounds; is accomplishing its work in a manner beyond the most sanguine expectations. We are not authorized to divulge more in this respect than that woman is here, as in every work of charity or self-devotion, the untiring ministering angel.

In answer to various inquiries on this subject, we take pleasure in stating that we have the most ample evidence before our eyes, not only of the complete efficacy of the relief, but of the admirable and judicious machinery for its management. Our Southern friends will appreciate the motive which restrains us from publishing particulars. Those who desire information on the subject should address the Chairman or Secretary of the "Southern Club," 80, Tower Buildings West, Liverpool.

THE EXODUS OF SOUTHERN MEN FROM MARYLAND.

It was ascertained from actual register that upwards of 800 Marylanders have reached Richmond within ten days. Among them are the sons of some of the most prominent and wealthy planters, farmers, and merchants of the State, who have been compelled to fly their comfortable homes to escape the impending drafts to fight against the South.

Yesterday the arrivals were very numerous, mostly from the counties, the roads from Baltimore being too strongly guarded to admit of many escapes from that point. One party, leaving Leonardstown, Md., were pounced upon by about forty of the 7th New York Cavalry, and eleven of them captured after the exchange of a number of shots. Another party were overhauled by the cavalry, but a large jug of whiskey in one of the waggon's released them from the difficulty by making the cavalymen drunk, and they thus escaped capture.

Several of the cavalry men have been killed in the various encounters with the escaping refugees, but large numbers of the refugees have been captured.

One died of sunstroke while endeavouring to reach the Confederate lines.

We are glad to know that all who have arrived are fired with the patriotic spirit, and are rapidly taking their posts where they can best avenge their wrongs, and in due time recover their homes from the spoiler.

Among the arrivals are Colonel J. B. Brooke, of Prince George's county, and President of the late State Senate, and Hon. James S. Franklin, a Breckenridge elector, and a member of the State Legislature from Annapolis.—Richmond Examiner.

Three Months in the Confederate Army.*

MY MESSMATES.

The pages of my note book will not serve me here. The jest which beguiled an idle hour of camp life sounds ghastly now when it conjures up the image of a dear friend bleeding and dying on a battle-field. The rough sketches of my companions, made while we all were together, though the idea of death, separation was not absent from them, jar painfully on my feelings. Alas! of these companions many a one no longer answers when the roll is called.

The first who fell was Major R. B. Armistead—there is no indelicacy in naming the heroic dead. He was a harrister of eminence in Mobile, past the first flush of youth, and on the platform, as in the forum, an orator of no mean repute. He was an accomplished gentleman, a true friend, but neither by nature nor taste fitted for a soldier. Rather predisposed by temper and pursuits in favour of all established order, he saw with regret the disruption of the magnificent Republic, and acquiesced in Secession only as a sad necessity. But when his native State (Virginia) after long hesitation and anxious deliberation, dissolved her connection with the Federal Government, and solemnly united her fortunes to those of the Gulf States, he stepped into the ranks of the first Mobile Company despatched to the seat of war. I doubt whether before that period he had ever shouldered a musket, and his portly figure was the mark of many a good-natured joke in the squad of raw recruits; yet a few weeks sufficed to make him one of the best drilled men in the company. When we were mustered into the Confederate service, our corps having more than the legal quota of members, Private Armistead was one of the three whom the captain, to prevent dispute, selected to forego their claims to membership. These three never left the company, and remained subject to all its regulations and duties, but without pay or rations, until some vacancy in the ranks should enable them to step in again. Such was Private Armistead of Mess No. 5, and few more efficient soldiers were there in Company A. When off duty, he was a diligent student of "Hardie's Tactics," and as we had daily opportunities for practising the lessons of this admirable text-book, both as automata in the drill of our own battalion, and as criticising spectators of the drill of the other, it need not excite much surprise that a well-trained mind like Mr. Armistead became in a few months respectably proficient in the tactical knowledge required of a regimental officer. When, therefore, on the authorization of the new levies, subsequent to the battle of Manassas (Bull Run), Private Armistead was invited by the Secretary of War to raise, in conjunction with another gentleman, a new Alabama Regiment, he was not quite unprepared for the responsible duties devolving upon him. The regiment was soon raised, and placed, fully armed and equipped, at the disposal of the Government. Private Armistead left us to become Major Armistead of the 22nd Alabama, the lieutenant-colonelcy having been declined by him in favour of a West Point graduate. In the great battle of Shiloh, where every Southerner did his duty, no regiment won brighter or more dearly-bought laurels than the 22nd Alabama Volunteers. The second day of the battle found Major Armistead in command of this corps, and while leading it on to victory he was shot through a vital part. Quietly dismounting from his horse, he walked to the rear; with hands convulsed in the agonies of death, he wrote a brief farewell to those he had dearest in the world, and a few hours after expired without a groan. There was something so quiet, so unassuming, so truly manly, in the brief military career of this man, there was such a stern heroism in his death, that among the many martyrs Mobile has given to the cause the memory of none is more dearly cherished than that of Major Robert B. Armistead, of the 22nd Alabama.

The head of our mess was Sergeant James Broune. He was well descended, and connected with some of the most aristocratic families of Alabama and South Carolina. His pride consisted in being the best non-commissioned officer in the regiment, and to repeated offers of a commission he used to reply, "No, no, leave me where I am; I know what I am fit for, but I don't know whether a lieutenantancy would fit me." An excellent drill-officer he certainly was, and a strict one, as I have occasion to remember, whenever my musket was not up to his standard of dazzling brightness, or when luck placed me in the rear rank at the "march in line." If Sergeant Broune had any military ambition, it was to be the colour-bearer of our regiment; and no taller or handsomer man for the post could have been selected. "I should be sure to be killed, the Yankees could never miss me," he was in the habit of saying, half jestingly, half seriously, when discussing his prospects for the coveted appointment. On the expiration of the twelve months' term, he re-enlisted with his regiment; at the battle of Seven Pines, near Richmond, he bore aloft the riddled flag of the 3rd Alabama, and fell shot through the heart.

The lists of killed and wounded which chance has from time to time, brought to this land of peace—these fragmentary leaves torn out of the awful record of death and mutilation—are seldom without a name of one of my messmates, and there is not one of them of whom I can confidently speak as being still in the world of the living. We were twelve in number before the country's service called us, one after another, to different fields of duty, higher and more distinguished than those we then had, but surely not more honourable. During the three months that we were crowded together under the same tent there never was an unkind word spoken to or of each other. Nearly every profession, and certainly every variety of natural temperament, was represented in the mess. I well remember how "at taps" we were wont to huddle together in our narrow quarters, each man's knapsack serving for his pillow, and with what a sense of relief we counted upon the nights when, in the alphabetical order of the roll, one or two of our number should be detailed for guard duty, and leave breathing space for the rest. Beside me, nearest the opening of the tent, lay a well-to-do cotton broker of middle age, whose epicurean experience and practical culinary accomplishments added largely to our material comforts; who eat well and slept well, and who never seemed sad, save when a letter from home brought more vividly to his mind the thought of a young wife and child a thousand miles away. Just opposite to me, on the other side of the tent, our legs fitting carefully between each other, was a planter's son, a dashing, singularly handsome youth, whom we never should have suspected of a serious idea, or a pang of care, had we not surprised him once or twice pensively poring over a photograph, which no profane eye was permitted to see. Poor fellow! his wedding day had been fixed when the summons of war dispelled his dreams of happiness. Those who were in his confidence knew his boisterous gaiety to be seldom genuine. At my left lay a young physician who, after a brilliant graduation in the best medical school in America, was perfecting his professional education in Europe when the revolution called him home to take his place in the ranks also. When off duty he found time to assist the surgeons of the regiment, and in one instance, at least, gave evidence of more than ordinary skill in his profession; but for himself, he firmly declined the appointments on the medical staff, which were more than once urged upon him. At a later period of the war, he raised a company, and at the head of it won the honourable mention of General Beauregard.

This brief sketch of some of my messmates has carried me far beyond the period embraced in my notes. The reader will pardon the anachronism, and return with me to the camp near Norfolk in the early part of May, 1861.

SOLDIERS DUTIES.

Camp near Norfolk, May 11.

Yesterday was my first detail for guard duty since we have been subjected to the rigid discipline of a camp in presence of the enemy. As I write, now released from guard, exempt from drill for the rest of the day, to record my first impressions, it is difficult for me to distinguish between the ludicrousness; and the extremely disagreeable nature of some of my duties during the last twenty-four hours. I rather enjoy the recollection of the night passed shelterless under a heavy rain; for the guard tents, which have been promised us these eight days back, have not yet gladdened our sight. Thanks to my India-rubber cloak, I slept tolerably well during the better part of the four hours "off guard;" and the two "on," the wind and rain notwithstanding, were rendered less dreary by the novelty of the position. It is during the day-time that I don't know whether to be amused or ashamed at my curious predicament. As luck would have it, the post of all other posts which I should not have selected fell to me, post No. 1 at the entrance of the camp, my sole duty being to enforce the police regulations. Our officers appear to have no fear of spies, and freely permit visitors of respectable appearance to pass through the camp. So far so good, though I did feel a little awkward at first in my new attitude towards my lady acquaintances at Norfolk, and I pride myself that no sentinel ever more politely yet firmly refused admittance to a carriage attempting to trespass. My duties towards the smugglers of illegal commodities were not so easily discharged. All fruits, shell-fish, cakes, but especially all ardent spirits, were rigidly prohibited. A pitiless refusal to the vendors of the former wares was generally sufficient; but experience had taught me what wonderful resources of ingenuity were brought into the service of the last-named. As my general instructions on this head were specially sharpened by the officer of the guard, who happened to be a professor of temperance in the strictest sense, I could not conscientiously let a laundress pass without a scrupulous examination of the contents of her basket. Then I knew the jugs labelled "vinegar" or "molasses" to be extremely suspicious vessels. Nor was it always safe to permit the owner to pass after he had produced a sample of treacle on his finger from the mouth of the jug. Canteens, also, could not be trusted, even after a specimen of water had been poured from them. A still more irksome duty was the arrest of every luckless wight who presented himself at the entrance of camp a few minutes after the hour fixed in his furlough. No excuse in such a case is valid, though there is not a man in the regiment who would not rather be shot than sent home, much less think of deserting. What makes the regulation appear so absurd is that our camp is filled with negroes, either hired from town by the different messes, or brought with us from home. These negroes, not coming within the cognizance of the military code, have free ingress and egress at all hours between reveille and tattoo. They enjoy amazingly being able to pass unquestioned where their masters cannot pass without written permits, and then only on strictly defined conditions. They no doubt wonder at our scrupulous obedience; for the most severe rules to which any of them have been accustomed are lenient compared to those which govern us.

* Continued from No. 9.
† See No. 5 of THE INDEX.—"Taking the Oath."

Despite these disagreeable incidents, the day was not without amusement. I have a prejudice in favour of strawberries and cream at this season, and after a narrow construction of the rules, I did not feel myself compelled to interfere when thirst suggested to some of my companions the expedient of negotiating for the purchase of these luxuries across the line which I was entrusted to guard. Provided the consumer kept on one side of the boundary and the vendor on the other, I paced my watch with dignified indifference to the evasive transaction. Nay, when a kind corporal of the guard consented to relieve me for a few moments, I seized the opportunity of refreshing myself from the rapidly disappearing supply. Inveterate disciplinarian as was our colonel, who at that moment rode up, he could not, probably, help feeling amused at the spectacle of a couple of score of soldiers kneeling on one side of a little path, with a row of fruitmongers ranged opposite them. At all events, no notice was taken, though I was fully prepared for an extra turn of twenty-four hours of guard duty wherein to digest my strawberries.

The next humorous incident occurred at the forming of the first relief for the night-guard. The officer, determined to carry out to the letter the regulations for the instruction of illiterate recruits, made us repeat after him the different calls or replies to be made by us on our post under every conceivable circumstance. The rehearsal of our lessons, singly and collectively, was much after the fashion of a geography lesson in an olden-time country school. The instructor being a mustachioed officer, and the scholars a set of strapping fellows with muskets in their arms, made the analogy only the more amusing. Yet I may add, I think to our credit, that each man of us appreciated the motive, and no one attempted to give the rehearsal a more comic turn than it inherently possessed. We all felt that though the thing was unnecessary and ridiculous in our case it might not be in others, and that it was better our officers should err in this direction than in the opposite one. Upon the whole, now that I have put on paper my first experience "on guard," the pleasant recollection predominates over the unpleasant one, and I feel conscious that I am not insensible to the compliment just paid me by one of the officers of having been an efficient sentinel, though a few weeks ago I certainly did not think that I would earn praise in that capacity.

Reviews.

A SOUTHERN STATEMENT.*

MR. WILLIAMS' book will, we think, have a large circulation in this country. There is no land inhabited by a people of European race about which Europe knows so little as about the Confederate States of America. There is no people so thoroughly and universally misunderstood, no class of institutions of whose working we have so inaccurate an idea as those of the South. A book like this is of great use, because it reveals, rather by implication than by direct assertion, some of the main features of Southern society, and unmasks some of the enormous errors current concerning the condition and character of the dominant and the subject races. It was not written distinctly for this purpose. It consists principally of a defence of the Southern cause addressed, during the last Presidential contest of the United States, to the American people, through the medium of the American newspapers. Written in this way, it does not, of course, enter into much detail with respect to the actual facts of Southern life. It is not a social sketch, but a political argument; polemical in its purpose, and to some extent in its tone. But the facts which it does exhibit carry the more conviction because they appear incidentally and unintentionally, and not as elaborated or coloured for effect's sake.

Our English idea of the working of negro slavery is derived from our own experience of it in the West Indies. It can scarcely be doubted, now, that we exaggerated the extent and amount of cruelty which was practised there. But, admitting that the abuses which there prevailed were such as would have compelled the strenuous interference of the mother country, even had no Abolitionist convictions obtained among us, there are many circumstances which, as Mr. Williams reminds us, alter the conditions of slavery, and render it in the Southern States very different from what it was in Jamaica, or even what it now is in Cuba. First—until within the lifetime of men who were young when West Indian servitude was abolished, the slave trade was in full vigour, and the great majority of the slaves in English islands were born in Africa. This worked evil in more ways than one. The slave was a savage—unused to labour, brutal, heathen; in fact, a wild animal put to domestic uses, like a buffalo yoked to the plough, or a zebra harnessed to a cart. Dealing with such a being, a severity was necessary which tended to make the master also a savage. The African-born negroes were dangerous; to the tyranny necessitated by the difficulty of getting savages to perform the work of a civilized country was added the more hideous tyranny which is always called forth by the fears of the tyrant. The owner or his deputy was brutal, because he had to control a brutal race—cruel, because he felt constant alarm lest that race should rise in murderous rebellion. Moreover, imported negroes were cheap; so that, while their character gradually deprived them of that security which they might otherwise have derived from the natural humanity of the superior race, their abundance destroyed that protection which might otherwise have been afforded by the self-interest of their masters. A man could afford to work his negroes to death, because the supply of negroes was plentiful; and he was tempted to use them savagely, because they were, with few exceptions, savages. Again, the owners of West Indian plantations were not, generally, residents or natives. Often they were absentee; at best, they were sojourners. The estates were managed either by proprietors who had come out to make a fortune in a few years, and then return home, or by overseers for absent masters. In neither case had the owner any personal interest in the slave, or any close tie with him, such as exists between those who have grown up together and expect to live and die together. There was nothing to soften the natural repugnance of race, or mitigate the hardship of servitude. The slave trade has not existed for the South during the last half-century. An infinitesimal proportion of the present slave population—and these all old—can possibly have been born in Africa. Probably, not one in 500 was born of an African father or mother. The enormous majority are descendants of persons who were slaves in America when the Declaration of Independence was signed. They are a domesticated race, used to labour and to obedience, to dependence, to civilization; they are Christians; they are accustomed to work under white direction, to ape white manners, to lean upon and receive protection from the whites. Most of them were born on the plantation on which they now live. Their masters have been brought up along with them, are used to them, understand them; and it is not in human nature that they should be indifferent to one another. What man but feels an affection even for the dog or horse that has been his for years, or for the old servants of his family? And though the slave is of a different race, and a race to which the white man elsewhere evinces a natural aversion, the constant contiguity of the two races prevents this feeling from gaining a hold on the Southerner, as on the West Indian, brought up and intending to spend his old age at least where negroes are not. It is clear, therefore, that we are not to judge Southern slavery, a priori, by the slavery of the West Indies.

But we are told the most horrible stories of brutality actually practised by Southern planters towards the negroes. And by whom? by the same Northern orators, editors, and politicians whose habits of falsehood, as regards all other subjects, are perfectly well known to us. We know that the Abolitionists are in the habit of calumniating England in the most outrageous manner. We read in almost every book written by an American of the Republican party, in every Northern journal, in every reported speech of Abolitionist lecturers or statesmen, whenever they have occasion to mention England or Englishmen, a tissue of falsehoods so extravagant, of abuse so unscrupulous, that they simply provoke our laughter. Why should we believe them when they abuse their political opponents? During the agitation for a reform of the factory system, men of high position were found to affirm, in Parliament, on the platform, and in the press, the grossest untruths respecting the millowners of Lancashire, and to make accusations which, allowing for the difference of national temper and habits of speech, were scarcely less atrocious than the charges preferred by such writers as Mrs. Stowe, and such orators as Wendell Phillips, against the Southern slaveholders. Yet all the time the factory population were, and they still are, far better off than the labourers on the estates of the noble lords and honourable gentlemen who believed and repeated those falsehoods; and the millowners were, and are, no more capable than the country gentlemen of the barbarities laid to their charge. We may, therefore, believe Mr. Williams when he says:—

The Southerner, knowing the falsehood and wickedness of these allegations, is almost tempted to doubt the evidence of his own senses. He knows that if there are faults in the treatment of slaves by their masters, they are, as a rule, the reverse of those which are charged by ignorant or malicious commentators. He knows that the feelings of kindness and affection between master and slave are cultivated to an extent utterly unknown to the intercourse of employer and servant, or apprentice, in his own or any other country. He believes that there are fewer instances of cruelty practised by masters upon slaves in America than even by parents upon their own offspring in any civilized free state of the world; though he is also well aware that when such instances do occur, they are exceptional in both. The Southerner who reads or listens to the recital of these stories in a foreign land is silenced by the very magnitude and enormity of their falsehood!

The fact that in the West Indies the number of the negroes living was always far less than the number supposed to have been imported from first to last, while for 400,000 imported into the Southern States there are now four millions living there, sufficiently proves the very different character of the institutions of the two countries. Granted that of the imported negroes of the islands a disproportionate number were males, so that the normal rate of increase could not be expected, this fails to explain away the figures recorded by Mr. Williams. Of the West Indian slaves, far more died than were born; of the American, the births as much outnumber the deaths as among the white population. The last fact alone shows that the physical condition of the slaves is not one of such extreme misery, nor their treatment so atrocious, as it suits the Northern Abolitionists to represent. Indeed, if the writings and orations of those gentlemen were reprinted verbatim in England, they would obtain no credence. Their frantic violence would be held to prove their unfitness to give evidence. It is because their allegations are cut out from amid a mass of rabid denunciation, for publication in English newspapers, that they receive any attention or any credit.

It is not unnatural that Mr. Williams, as a Southerner stung by unjust reproaches and false charges, should misunderstand and misrepresent the Abolitionism of England. But we are bound to protest against his view of the anti-slavery policy of a country which had and still has greater interest in slavery than any other Power in the world, except the Confederate States. It is true that we did at first force slavery and the slave-trade on our reluctant colonies, and on those very States from which we have since so vehemently demanded its abolition. But it is equally true that we have undergone a great and sincere national repentance; that we proved its sincerity by abolishing slavery throughout the dominions of the British Crown at the national expense; that we keep up costly stations and an expensive fleet on the African coast to put down the slave trade; and that we have done this without a thought of national gain—nay, at a heavy national loss; we ruined thereby our richest colonies. If we could carry out completely the theory—ser in regard to the internal institutions of America it cannot be called a policy—to which we have clung so fondly, and sacrificed so much, we should utterly ruin our wealthiest towns, and desolate our most populous countries. Never before did any nation do so much "for an idea" as England for negro emancipation. Never was a political faith more fervently, honestly, and unselfishly held than that professed by the Anti-slavery party in Great Britain.

The book contains another error, common to nearly all American writers. Mr. Williams knows nothing of the condition of the mass of the English people; and on the evidence of Englishmen who were, with far less excuse, as ignorant as himself, he misrepresents it altogether. In the first place, in ordinary years, all our skilled labourers are well employed at high wages. In the factory districts a family will earn by fifty-seven or sixty hours of labour per week an income of 30s. to 50s., or even 70s. In the worst of our agricultural districts we do not believe that the wages of a family ever fall below 10s. a week, and they are generally much higher. It is so far from being true that half our labouring population is unable to get work, and the other half illpaid and helpless, that half our population certainly have enough to live on, and the other half enough to procure many comforts and all necessities, and to save money besides. It is true that in our great cities we have a certain half-starved class of thieves, beggars, and so forth; but it is also true that the misery and crime of this class arises far less from want of work to do than from a determination not to do it. And extreme misery is almost confined to our great cities; elsewhere, it would be seen and relieved; there, it escapes notice, and for that reason only escapes relief.

*The South vindicated: Being a Series of Letters written for the American Press during the Campaign for the Presidency in 1860; with a Letter to Lord Brougham on the John Brown raid, and a Survey of the Result of the Presidential Contest, and its consequences, by the Hon. JAMES WILLIAMS, late American Minister to Turkey. With an introduction by JOHN HARRIS HOPKINS. London: Longman, Green, Longman, Roberts, & Green.

But in regard to that which he has the means of judging fairly and knowing accurately, and that which we chiefly desire to know from him, Mr. Williams, is clear, sensible, and temperate. Except the misconceptions of English policy and society, which we have exposed, there is nothing in his book which will displease, while there is much that will instruct and something that will surprise, the English readers. His history of Northern Abolition—his criticisms on the conduct of the Republican party—his account of the Presidential contest and its consequences—are written with fairness, temper, and good sense; they add not a little to our knowledge on all these subjects, now of so much interest, and are evidently and entirely reliable. Mr. Hopkins's Introduction contains some very remarkable statistical exposures of favourite Northern fictions concerning the South; and the volume, as a whole, contains more information—and that in a readable form—concerning the institutions, the feelings, the history, and the prospects of the South, than is to be found anywhere else in print.

SHORT NOTICES.

An Account of the Cruise of the St. George on the North American and West Indian Station, during the Years 1861-1862. By N. B. Denny. (Sanders, Olley, and Co.)
The Siege and History of Londonderry. Edited by John Hempton. (Londonderry, Hempton; London, Simpkin and Co.)
Fern Vale; or, the Queenland Squatter. A Novel. By Collin Munro. (Newby.)
Robert O'Hara Burke and the Australian Exploring Expedition of 1860. By Andrew Jackson. (Smith, Elder, and Co.)

The account of the cruise of the St. George would not have been written but that Prince Alfred was on board as midshipman, for it is hardly possible to conceive a more uneventful voyage. The author is obliged to eke out his matter by commenting on the want of sympathy between the whites and blacks, although the separation between the races is perfectly well-known. The aim of the book, however, is to tell us about the Prince; but though Mr. Denny may be an excellent courtier, he is a bad retailer of royal doings. The author evinces the disposition, but he lacks the descriptive power of Jeames Plush. It is a pity Mr. Denny did not confide his notes to the editorship of "a fashionable reporter;" for though the book would not have been more valuable, it would, in some quarters, have been more readable.

Mr. Hempton refutes some errors into which Macaulay has fallen in reference to the Siege of Londonderry, but the errors are neither very numerous or very important. Macaulay has been so severely criticized, all his statements have been so thoroughly tried, and the detected faults are so insignificant, that he is entitled to be regarded as one of the most accurate, as he certainly is the most eloquent, of modern historians. We do not say that his history is not tinged by his political opinions, but there is no evidence of his suppressing a fact or parading a falsehood for the purpose of enforcing his views. Mr. Hempton has brought together some valuable documents about the famous siege, and irrespective of his attack on Macaulay, his book will repay perusal.

The author of "Fern Vale" tells us that he has blended fact with fiction, and we believe him. The descriptions of the country, and, to some extent, of colonial manners, are true and well told; but the adventures are fictitious and exceedingly tame, both in conception and relation. Some of the language is remarkable. A kiss is called "a fond inoculation," and a fly is described as "going through various crural manipulations on its cranium." This kind of writing is neither elegant nor witty, but is not devoid of a coarse humour.

Mr. Jackson has composed from a Blue-book an interesting account of the Australian Exploring Expedition, which was conducted with undoubted bravery and resolution, but with the most singular want of judgment, not to say of common sense.

THE HISTORY OF THE WAR.—Mr. J. W. McMahon, of Richmond, Va., is preparing a history of the war from the commencement until the present time. In his announcement he says:—

In the preface to "Cause and Contrast," I stated that if that work met with public favour, it was intended solely to constitute an Introduction to a History of the Present War. With this view, I have succeeded in collecting a large and valuable mass of documents and other historical materials. I have placed myself in communication with the officials of the several State Governments in the Confederacy, as well as with those of our General Government, each and all of whom have nobly promised to supply me with facts indispensable to complete history. But other information is necessary, and to supply this desideratum I now earnestly solicit the aid of all who feel an interest in putting the gigantic proportions of our struggle on a footing which shall place them fully and fairly in sight of an impartial world—the aid of generals, all army officers and privates, informing me as to the plans, disposition of forces upon the field, miracles, incidents and results of battles and engagements; the aid of citizens in the vicinities of places invaded by the foe, setting forth such depredations, public wrongs, and deeds of darkness as he has perpetrated. These are perishable essentials, if not recorded by the contemporaneous historian; and as it is my chief ambition to render my enterprise candid, critical, philosophical, and complete, every fact bearing upon such subjects will be most thankfully received, and properly acknowledged in the contemplated work.

MISSOURIAN PATRIOTISM.

From the Richmond Enquirer.

By the following correspondence it will be seen that, in addition to the magnificent contributions recently announced as received from General Price's army, a single company of his Missouri soldiers have forwarded to Richmond, from Tapelo, Missouri, the sum of $220 for the relief of the brave men who were wounded in the recent battles in this vicinity.

It is not at all improbable that their gallant and honoured chief will soon again lead the Missourians against the foe, when they perchance may need the same aid and sympathy which they now so freely give to others. In that hour they will be remembered, even as they now remember and assist their suffering brothers-in-arms. We long for the day when the Confederacy will be able to render that assistance to those brave men which will enable them to free their Commonwealth of the enemy. The combined tenderness and courage of the Missouri soldiers is such as proves them true heroes, and fastens them to our sympathies and affections by hooks of steel:—

[Copy.]

Tapelo, Mississippi, July 25, 1862.

Dear General,—Lieutenant Whitman, of Company A, 2nd Regiment, Missouri Confederates, has just handed me $220, a donation to the wounded and suffering under the command of General Lee in Virginia.

Our beloved and honoured commander will readily comprehend that the handsome donation comes from men who have left their friends, homes and families, at the call of their chief, resolved to stand by him and their country until each one of the Southern States shall have been declared independent. Our hearts are all overshadowed with the sorrows of Missouri, but we pray the God of battles that you may live to lead us back to the homes not yet consumed by fire.

These brave men are nearly all from North Missouri, many of them from my own city of Hannibal, and most of them my neighbours, which accounts for the money being sent to me.

Remit the amount as you please.

Yours most truly,
J. P. McMILLIN.

To Major General Sterling Price, Commanding Army of the West.

(Copy.)

Headquarters, Army of the West,
TUPELO, MISS., Aug. 1, 1862.

Major: You will find herewith a communication from Mr. John P. McMillin, enclosing ($220) two hundred and twenty dollars, which the officers and men of Company A, 2nd Missouri Infantry (Cockrell's) have contributed for the relief of their compatriots who fell wounded upon the field in the battles which resulted in driving the enemy from before Richmond.

These men fought under me at the Oak Hills, at Fort Scott, at Lexington, and at Elk Horn, and demonstrated upon every field their bravery and their devotion to the cause of their country.

I am proud that their present act demonstrates that they are also kind-hearted and generous, and that their sympathies are as extensive as their country.

You will please deliver the money to such persons in Richmond as will most faithfully execute the kind wishes of the givers.

I am very respectfully, your obedient servant,
(Signed) STERLING PRICE,
Maj. Gen. Commanding.

To Major Henry W. Williams,
Maury's Division, Army of the West.

Richmond, Va., Aug. 15, 1862.

Madam,—I herewith enclose to you the sum of two hundred and twenty dollars ($220) and two communications—one from Mr. John P. McMillin to Major-General Sterling Price, the other from General Price to myself.

These communications fully explain the use to which the money is appropriated, and by whom contributed.

In placing this trust in your hands, Madam, I am satisfied that I comply with the instructions of General Price, "to deliver the money to such persons in Richmond as will most faithfully execute the kind wishes of the givers."

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
HENRY W. WILLIAMS.

To Mrs. Wirt Robinson, Richmond, Va.

Richmond, Va., August 16, 1862.

Dear Sir,—In becoming the recipient pro tem. of ($220) two hundred and twenty dollars, so generously contributed by the officers and members of Company A, of Cockrell's 2nd Missouri Regiment, of General Sterling Price's command, for the benefit of the wounded in the army around Richmond, believe how gratefully my heart responds to the delicate compliment, and with what pleasure its judicious disbursement will be promoted by its rendition to Mrs. George W. Randolph, wife of the Secretary of War, whose well-known efficiency for so sacred a mission, is ample guarantee for its Samaritan distribution, when and where most needed.

The opportune arrival of the liberal offering will afford relief to many more noble sufferers, in whose behalf we would express most grateful acknowledgments to the brave and kind-hearted contributors.

"Woman's words seem weak; her heart, though poor is thanks, is rich in thankfulness."

May I request you personally to proffer to each and all of the gallant soldiers interested herein, such hefting meed of commendation as may prove "how much more blisc it is to give than to receive."

Most respectfully,
Mrs. WIRT ROBINSON.

To Major Henry W. Williams.

RETALIATION.

(From the Richmond Enquirer.)

In the first War of Independence the British captured Colonel Isaac Hayne, a popular citizen of South Carolina, and refused to treat him as a prisoner of war. The ground of this refusal was that Colonel Hayne had some time before taken an oath of allegiance to the British crown. This was indeed true, and is justly lamented by the historian (Lieut.-Colonel Henry Lee) as a grave fault. But the circumstances under which the oath was extorted and especially the subsequent withdrawal and expulsion of British authority from the region which included Colonel Hayne's home, were considered as fully releasing him from British allegiance, and justifying him in taking arms with his countrymen.

Hayne had been among the prisoners taken long before at the capitulation of Charleston. By the terms of that capitulation he was paroled, and returned to his home under guarantee of protection. Subsequently, and in flagrant violation of engagements, all the prisoners thus paroled were required to report themselves in Charleston, and go into close confinement, or take the oath of allegiance to Great Britain. Overwhelmed with distress at the condition of his family, then smitten with the small pox, and anxious to be free to minister to them, Hayne yielded, after earnest remonstrances, and took the oath of allegiance; the doing of which, even under such circumstances, the historian justly pronounces an error.

Hayne carefully observed the obligations thus forced upon him by conquest, so long as the British asserted authority in his quarter. But the time came when Greene drove off the British and redeemed Hayne's home from British rule. Hayne, and those in similar circumstances with himself, justly reasoned that the allegiance due to a conqueror ceased with his expulsion from the subdued territory. Under this impression he and many others repaired to Greene's camp and tendered their services, which were gladly accepted. Soon after, while on detached duty, he was captured and thus fell into the hands of the British again.

The British commanders determined on his speedy execution. This was attended by circumstances corresponding with the edict, while Hayne's bearing has made his name immortal.

When the news of these proceedings reached the camp of Greene, it excited universal indignation. Greene demanded explanations, which, when received, were found to be an attempt at justification of the act. Greene instantly determined to retaliate by discarding on his part, also, the restraints of civilized hostilities. In this he was unanimously sustained by his officers. In the conclusion of a manly address, they said to him, "Permit us to add, that while we lament the necessity of so severe an expedient, and commiserate the sufferings to which individuals will be necessarily exposed, we are not unmindful that such a measure may, in its consequences, involve our own lives in additional danger. But we had rather forego temporary distinctions, and commit our own lives to the most desperate situation, than prosecute this just and necessary war on terms so unequal and dishonourable."

Greene accordingly issued a proclamation to his army, "declaring his determination to make reprisals for all such inhuman insults, and to select for the objects of retaliation officers of the regular forces." The feeling produced in Greene's army by this resolve is thus related by the historian:

"The deliberate resolve of Greene, guaranteed by the solemn and spontaneous pledge of his officers, changed the character of the war, and presented death to the soldier in the most ignominious form. * * * Nevertheless, the army exhibited on its march the highest spirit, with zealous anxiety to reach the foe, and conscious of the justice of the measure adopted by their general, with one feeling cheerfully submitted to its consequences."

As before related, the war closed so soon afterwards that Greene's order was not practically executed.

The Confederate States find themselves at the present time, driven to contemplate a war of extermination, such as our fathers were ready to engage in, when the defence of their liberties required it. Our officers and soldiers will be as ready now, as our fathers were then, to assume all the responsibilities of such a condition of affairs; for they are as brave as their fathers were, and they have even a better cause. It is to be hoped that the necessity will be turned aside now as it was then; but if not, let us nerve ourselves to the new order of things. Meanwhile let all our citizens take warning from the error of Hayne, and refuse the oath of allegiance to the enemy, under any and all circumstances.

GENERAL BUTLER'S LIST OF SOUTHERN PATRIOTS.

We copy from the New Orleans papers the order of General Butler for a forced contribution from those who had assisted the Confederate authorities before the occupation of that city by the Federals. The list will interest many of our readers:—

GENERAL ORDER, No. 55.

Headquarters, Department of the Gulf,
New Orleans, August 4, 1861.

It appears that the need of relief to the destitute poor of the city requires more extended measures and greater outlay than have yet been made.

It becomes a question in justice upon whom should this burden fall.

Clearly upon those who have brought this great calamity upon their fellow-citizens.

It should not be borne by taxation of the whole municipality, because the middling and working men have never been heard at the ballot-box unawed by threats and unmenaced by Thugs and paid assassins of conspirators against peace and good order. Besides, more than the vote which was claimed for secession have taken the oath of allegiance to the United States.

The United States' Government does its share when it protects, defends, and preserves the people in the enjoyment of law, order, and calm quiet.

Those who have brought upon this city this stagnation of business, this desolation of the hearthstone, this starvation of the poor and helpless, should, as far as they may be able, relieve distresses.

There are two classes whom it would seem peculiarly fit should at first contribute to this end. First, those individuals and corporations who have aided the rebellion with their means; and second, those who have endeavored to destroy the commercial prosperity of the city, upon which the welfare of its inhabitants depends.

It is brought to the knowledge of the Commanding General that a subscription of $1,250,000 was made by the corporate bodies, business firms and persons whose names are set forth in schedule "A," annexed to this order, and that sum placed in the hands of an illegal body known as the "Committee of Public Safety," for the treasonable purpose of defending the city against the Government of the United States, under whose humane rule the city of New Orleans had enjoyed such unexampled prosperity, that her warehouses were filled with the trade of all nations, who came to share her freedom, to take part in the benefits of her commercial superiority, and thus she was made the representative mart of the world.

The stupidity and wastefulness with which this immense sum was spent was only equalled by the folly which led to its being raised at all. The subscribers to this fund, by this very act, betray their treasonable designs and their ability to pay at least a much smaller tax for the relief of their destitute and starving neighbours.

Schedule "B" is a list of cotton brokers, who claiming to control that great interest in New Orleans to which she is so much indebted for her wealth, published in the newspapers in October, 1861, a manifesto deliberately advising the planters not to bring their produce to the city, a measure which brought ruin at the same time upon the producer and the city.

This act sufficiently testifies the malignity of these traitors as well to the Government as their neighbours, and it is to be regretted that their ability to relieve their fellow-citizens is not equal to their facilities for injuring them.

In taxing both these classes to relieve the suffering poor of New Orleans, yea, even though the needy be the starving wives and children of those in arms at Richmond and elsewhere against the United States, it will be impossible to make a mistake save in having the assessment too easy and the burden too light.

It is therefore ordered—

1st. That the sums in schedules annexed, marked "A" and "B," set against the names of the several persons, business firms and corporations therein described, be and hereby are assessed upon each respectively.

2nd. That said sums be paid to Lieutenant David C. G. Field, Financial Clerk, at his office in the Custom-house, on or before Monday, the 11th inst., or that the property of the delinquent be forthwith seized and sold at public auction, to pay the amount, with all necessary charges and expenses, or the party imprisoned till paid.

3rd. The money raised by this assessment to be a fund for the purpose of providing employment and food for the deserving poor people of New Orleans.

By order of MAJOR-GENERAL BUTLER.
R. S. DAVIS, Captain and A. A. G.

[Lieutenant Field may be found in the room formerly occupied by the Navy Agent.

SCHEDULE A.

List of subscribers to the Million and a Quarter Loan placed in the hands of the Committee of Public Safety for the Defence of New Orleans against the United States, and expended by them some $38,000.

	Sums subscribed to aid treason against the U. States.	Sums assessed to relieve the poor by the U. States.
Abat. Generes & Co.	$210,000	$52,500 0
Jonathan Montgomery	40,000	10,000 0
Thos. Sloo, Pres. Sra Ins. Co.	50,000	12,500 0
C. C. Gaines	2,000	500 0
C. C. Gaines & Co.	3,000	750 0
Trustees McDonough School Fund	340,000	85,000 0
J. B. Slawson	10,000	2,500 0
S. H. Wood	5,000	1,250 0
Mrs. S. H. Wood	2,000	500 0
Jacques Lange	7,000	1,750 0
Widow W. P. Welham	10,000	2,500 0
Robert Godes	10,000	2,500 0
Widow Vogel	20,000	5,000 0
J. Levois & Co.	10,000	2,500 0
Samuel Harby	14,800	3,700 0
Citizens' Bank of Louisiana	306,400	76,600 0
Giquel & Jamison	7,500	1,875 0
E. Booth	400	100 0
Edward Chapman	8,000	2,000 0
Thomas Layton	1,000	250 0
D. J. Beagnot	2,000	500 0
B. Dryer & Co.	1,000	250 0
W. H. Pierson	3,000	750 0
Samuel Locke	10,000	2,500 0
Hart & Wintz	5,800	1,450 0
Southern Bank	10,000	2,500 0
Richard & Co.	10,000	2,500 0
Dr. B. Moss	3,000	750 0
J. & J. C. Davidson	20,000	5,000 0
Dque Lanata	9,000	2,250 0
H. Samory	1,000	250 0
R. Turney	1,500	375 0
R. D. Maclin	2,500	625 0
J. H. Cohen	3,000	750 0
Mrs. C. A. Slocomb	5,000	1,250 0
Committee of Public Safety	865	216 25
H. Lee	150	37 50
George Zackendath	200	50 0
Hyde & Goodrich	1,000	250 0
Magee, Horton, & George	500	125 0
Samuel Loeb	100	25 0
Valentine Heerman	1,000	250 0
S. S. Bicker	250	62 50
John M. Demarest	100	25 0
Thomas O'Donnell	50	12 50
Mrs. B. V. McMahon	50	12 50
W. H. Litchford	1,000	250 0
O. F. Thieseman	50	12 50

Frederick Bauer	725	181 25
John Rickerson	250	62 50
M'Stan. Value, & Co.	1,000	250 0
Jacob Zuelly	1,000	250 0
T. Lafon	500	125 0
E. Creswell	100	25 0
H. H. O'Meallie	50	12 50
Joseph Field	1,000	250 0
Jules Done, D. Amann	150	37 50
John Farrell	150	37 50
D. H. Holmes	2,000	500 0
S. P. Lamson	350	87 50
Fanny Hollander	100	25 0
J. W. Stanton & Co.	300	75 0
John H. Randolph	500	125 0
Harriet Morgan	775	193 75
Rachel Morgan	125	31 25
Sarah Morgan	175	43 75
Elizabeth Morgan	150	37 50
Mary M. Morgan	50	12 50
Margaret Harrod	50	12 50
Travis Brothers	200	50 0
Trustees Finke Asylum Fund	55,000	13,750 0
William Massey	300	75 0
F. Lagay	25	6 25
John J. Adams	1,000	250 0
A. W. Bosworth	600	150 0
Charles Briggs	100	25 0
J. A. Lam & Co.	150	37 50
Charles Leoffler	200	50 0
George C. Brower	50	12 50
Patrick Howard	25	6 25
George Clauman	50	12 50
H. H. Hedden	500	125 0
James Goran	100	25 0
Biscoe & Sims	500	125 0
B. C. Young	150	37 50
D. A. Bruen	125	31 25
Madame Ve. H. Chetreu	200	50 0
Henderson & Gaines	1,000	250 0
J. S. Aitkens	250	62 50
W. O. Denegre	1,000	250 0
J. C. McLellan	200	50 0
Mrs. C. F. Sawdew	50	12 50
Louisiana State Bank	7,500	1,875 0
Bank of America	5,000	1,250 0
Gen. D. E. Twigge	1,000	250 0
Jean l'etit	13,125	3,281 25
	$1,250,865	$312,716 25

SCHEDULE B.

List of cotton brokers, of New Orleans, who published in the Crescent, in October last, a card advising planters not to send produce to New Orleans, in order to induce Foreign Intervention in behalf of the Rebellion:—

	Sums assessed to relieve the starving poor by the U. States.	Sums assessed to relieve the starving poor by the U. States.
Hewitt, Norton, & Co.	$500	$125 0
West & Villere	250	62 50
S. E. Belknap	100	25 0
Brander, Chambliss, & Co.	100	25 0
Lewis & Oglesby	500	125 0
W. A. Johnson & Co.	250	62 50
Carroll, Hoy, & Co.	500	125 0
Farley, Jarey, & Co.	500	125 0
W. Cox & Co.	500	125 0
James M. Putnam	100	25 0
A. Levi & Co.	250	62 50
Montgomery & Hall	100	25 0
Belloep, Noblum, & Co.	250	62 50
Ahat & Cushman	100	25 0
Holloway & Lonsdale	100	25 0
Geo. S. Mandeville	250	62 50
Bell & Bouligny	250	62 50
Richard Nugent & Co.	500	125 0
A. Miltenberger & Co.	250	62 50
Geo. Connolly & Co.	500	125 0
J. & G. Cromwell	500	125 0
Moses Greenwood	100	25 0
A. Hillay & Co.	500	125 0
Scroggs, Donnegan, & Co.	100	25 0
Hughes, Hyllested, & Co.	500	125 0
W. & D. Urquhart	500	125 0
Phelps & Jones	100	25 0
John T. Hardie & Co.	500	125 0
Hawkins & Norwood	100	25 0
Walker & Snyder	500	125 0
Gillis & Ferguson	250	62 50
J. B. Gribble & Co.	100	25 0
Walker & Co.	100	25 0
John L. Lee	250	62 50
P. H. Skinnier	100	25 0
Knox & Higgins	100	25 0
J. J. Person & Co.	250	62 50
Battle, Noble, & Co.	500	125 0
R. C. Cummings & Co.	500	125 0
Montgomery & White	500	125 0
Wright & Allen	500	125 0
Robt. L. Adams & Co.	500	125 0
Horrell, Gayle, & Co.	250	62 50
John Watt & Co.	500	125 0
Rothford, Brown, & Co.	500	125 0
M. D. Cooper	500	125 0
Smith & Johnson	100	25 0
James Bankhead	100	25 0
M-Lemore, Rayburn & Co.	250	62 50
	Total	$29,200

Soon after the occupation of Memphis by the Federal forces, a difficulty occurred between a Yankee soldier and a citizen named Forest, brother of our gallant General Forest. Forest is an infirm man, so much so that his limbs are contracted, and it is with difficulty that he can get about even upon crutches. He was immediately seized by the Federal authorities, and after having been kept in irons for several weeks, he was put into a wooden box, but little longer than his body, bored with holes barely sufficient to admit the necessary air to sustain life. In this condition he was transferred to the most heated part of one of their gunboats, lying opposite the city, where he was fed on bread and water, and steamed to the utmost extent of endurance, without taking the life of their suffering victim. He was in this condition when his brother, General Forest, made his gallant and successful charge on Murfreesboro', since which time, for reasons fully satisfactory to themselves, they have thought it prudent to liberate their victim and banish him beyond their lines.—Charleston Courier.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL BRADFUTE WARWICK.
(From the Richmond Enquirer.)

Died, at his father's residence, in the city of Richmond, on the 6th day of July, 1862, Lieutenant-Colonel Bradfute Warwick, in the twenty-third year of his age, of wounds received in the battle of Gaines' Mill, on the 27th of June, 1862. The career of this young hero was short and brilliant. His early morning possessed the brilliancy of mid-day, and gave promises of greatness and glory, but before these could be gathered the storm of battle swept across his existence, and extinguished the spirit that shone with such brightness. It was his fortune to pass through many stirring scenes in the brief period allotted to him. He passed through all the perils and hardships incident to an Oriental tour, and was with Garibaldi in his brilliant and successful Italian campaign, in which Colonel Warwick wreathed his brow with laurels. When clouds, prophetic of war, began to collect upon the political horizon of the New World, he returned from Europe to his home in Virginia; and long before his State seceded he buckled on his armour, and joined the noble band of patriots who were battling for Southern rights before Sumter. During the spring and summer of 1861 he was engaged in battling for the rights of the South in Western Virginia, where his deportment was ever gallant. In October, 1861, he was appointed, by the President, Major of the 4th Regiment Texas Volunteers, with which his fortunes have been identified ever since. Upon the promotion of Colonel Hood to Brigadier-General, he became Lieutenant-Colonel. At the battle of Elkton's Landing, near Barhamsville, his gallant bearing attracted the attention of all, and all joined in praise of his high valour. Wherever danger was most he was to be seen urging the regiment to fresh deeds of glory. In the battle of Coal Harbour or Gaines' Mill, the colonel of the regiment having been killed as it was entering the action the command devolved upon Lieutenant-Colonel Warwick, who led the regiment in a charge which, for dash and intrepidity, is not surpassed by anything in either ancient or modern times. As the regiment was rushing on with an irresistible impetuosity to the charge, he seized a battle-flag which had been abandoned by one of our regiments, and placing it aloft, he passed both of the enemy's breastworks in a most gallant style, and as he was about to plant the colours on a battery that the regiment captured, his right breast was pierced by a Minie ball, and he fell mortally wounded. Such was the unfortunate but glorious end of one of the bravest of the brave. In leading this charge—the first to break the Yankee lines in this battle—he gave his name to historical fame. He was a man of fine talent, splendid accomplishments, and possessed a military genius of the highest order. In his death the Confederate States loses a brave and patriotic soldier, his family a devoted brother and son, and his regiment (4th Texas) a gallant officer that had become dear to it, because of his many noble and manly qualities. Let us not grieve over the gallant deal that meets such a glorious death, but admire the deed and emulate the example that led to such an end.

GALLANTRY OF TENNESSEE TROOPS IN THE BATTLE OF CEDAR RUN.
(From the Richmond Whig.)

This battle, like all real and great victories, grows upon us as time runs on. Our "enemies themselves being judges," confess a loss of 3000, and, if they admit that, what truth would give there is no "rule of three" to decide. The following extract, from a letter dated 14th inst., written by a young Virginian, member of Brigadier-General B. H. Robertson's Virginia Brigade of Cavalry, gives some interesting details of its own doings at the commencement of the fight, and pays a tribute to the Tennesseans, the more valued because spontaneously and unconsciously given by one who never expected it to reach the public. The Tennesseans themselves have hitherto, in former battles, allowed the heavy lists of their killed and wounded to tell all that need be told to the thoughtful reader. But to the extract:

"Our regiment had the honour of opening the ball at the battle of Cedar Run. It attacked the 1st Maryland Cavalry, took twenty-five prisoners, killed fourteen, and wounded some eight or ten; but the Yankees ran so fast that it was impossible for us to catch them. The Tennessee troops fought like tigers, and where they made the charge the Yankees lay as thick as hail. The Virginia troops fought well—in fact all did their duty.

BURNING A FEDERAL VESSEL.

The Richmond papers give the following:—
At 1 o'clock on Saturday morning last Corporal Cocke, Thomas Martin, William Daniel, Alexander Dimetry, and William Williams, members of the Prince George Cavalry, having procured a boat, left Coggins' Point, on the south side of James River, and pulled to a schooner laying in a fleet of vessels and gunboats about half a mile from the shore. As the boat neared the vessel a dog on board gave the alarm; but the boat was made fast, and Mr. Martin sprang on deck, followed by the rest of the party, just as the captain of the schooner made his appearance from the cabin. Mr. Martin informed the captain he had come, by order of General McClellan, to arrest him and carry him to headquarters. The captain was accordingly lowered into the boat, and a straw bed in the cabin of the schooner having been ripped open and fired, our adventurers pulled for the southern shore. Just as they were safely landed, the flames burst out aboard the vessel, and, in an instant after, she was in a sheet of flame from stem to stern, the light illuminating the river and its banks for miles. The prisoner is ascertained to be Captain John A. Jones, of New York. He is now in the Petersburg jail. His schooner was the Louisiana River, of 163 tons burden. She was loaded with corn and provisions, and was valued at $5000, exclusive of her cargo.

FEDERAL BARBARITY IN KENTUCKY.

The Richmond Enquirer says:—
A highly respectable gentleman who has recently escaped from Kentucky, informs us that the tyranny in that State is almost insupportable. His own house was surrounded with Federal soldiers for the purpose of capturing him, and he eluded them with difficulty. He says that a gentleman well-known to the writer, near Louisville, Kentucky, hearing firing in his yard, went out, and found a squad of Federals firing their guns at one of his little negroes, who had taken refuge behind a tree, which was riddled with the balls. On his appearance they fired at him, the ball passing between himself and his wife, and lodging in the front door. All the respectable citizens of Louisville are Southern in sympathy, and firm in their expression of indignation against the prevailing tyranny. J.

FRANCIS FORD, Manufacturer,
MANCHESTER, Thine and Six Cord Spool
Thread, Cotton Bells, Knitting and Embroidering
Cottons, Imported by FOSTER AND MOORE,
Norfolk, Va.; F. RIMALLHO AND NEYREY,
New Orleans

R. D. RUSDEN, MANCHESTER,
B. ENGLAND, American Drills of all kinds, Denims, Stripes, Slittings, and all sorts of Manchester Goods.

SEARING AND CO.,
Commission Merchants,
MOBILE AND NEW ORLEANS, C.F.A.
Represented by R. G. BRESLEY, Cotton Broker,
2, Byron's-court, Royal-exchange, Manchester.

ROBINSON & OLIVER,
Commission Merchants,
NEW ORLEANS,
C.S.A.

Represented by
Jos. T. ROBINSON & Co.,
India Buildings, Water-street,
Liverpool.

JOHN FRASER & CO.,
CHARLESTON,
South Carolina.
FRASER, TRENHOLM, & CO.,
Liverpool,
Commission Merchants.

REID AND STEWART, Com-
mission Merchants, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.
Represented by Andrew Stewart, 1, Rufford-place,
Liverpool.

HARPER AND CAUGHEY,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA. Represented by J. and A. CAUGHEY,
Tempest Chambers, Tempest Hay, Liverpool.

TO EAST INDIA MERCHANTS.

A GENTLEMAN, in his 30th Year,
who has had nearly 16 Years' experience in
the Manchester Yarn and Cloth Market as a SALESMAN, also 23 Years' experience in East India and American Cottons, desires to go to Bombay,
under the auspices of a first class firm, to act as their Cotton buyer.
Address, BOX, J. 19, Post-office, Manchester.

TO SOUTHERN AMERICAN FAMILIES IN PARIS.

A FRENCH LADY,—living with
her mother and her daughter in a pleasant location close by the Champs-Elysées—offers the
comforts of a home and motherly care and attention, together with the advantages of the best
education and excellent music-teaching, for TWO YOUNG CHILDREN, or for a YOUNG LADY
under fifteen.
Address, MADAME DE W., care of Mr. Largier,
17, Rue de la Paix, Paris.

A. M. GAUTIER, Tailor, 229,
Regent Street, London (and 20, Rue de la Chausée d'Antin in Paris.)

MRS. E. PRESTON,

31, BURY STREET,
Furnished Apartments and Bed Rooms to Let.
References to Hon. Wm. L. Yancey, Hon. E. J. S.
Macfarland, and Henry Hotze, Esq.

MR. WILLIAM FREEMAN,
Publisher of THE INDEX, will promptly
attend to all orders from, or for the Continent, Europe and the States. Commissions for books and
goods of all kinds undertaken on moderate terms.
102, Fleet-street, London.

WORKS RECENTLY PUBLISHED

WILLIAM FREEMAN,
102, FLEET STREET.

SHIFTING SCENES: and Other Poems. By J.
STANXAN BIGGS. Feap. 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.; handsomer bound, 5s.
POEMS OF TRUTH AND FANCY. By S. R.
REDMAN. Crown 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.
THE WEARMOUTH ABBOTS. (Second Edition.)
A Tale, Illustrative of Saxon Christianity. Feap.
8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.
JESUS THE SOUL'S NEED. By C. A. PORTER.
Royal 32mo. paper, 8d.; cloth, 1s.
PROGRESS; or, The International Exhibition.
By the Rev. W. ANDERSON, Author of "Self-
made Men." Royal 32mo. paper cover, 3d.
THE FATHERS OF THE VIRGILY FAMILY.
By the Rev. S. BEALE. Crown 8vo. cloth, 1s. 6d.
DECISION AND CONFIDENCE. Exemplified
and Honoured in the Life of Daniel and his Three Friends. By THOMAS COLEMAN, Author of "Two Thousand Confessors." Feap. 8vo. cloth, 2s. 6d.
HOW THEY GOT THERE. By the Rev. W.
BARKER. Being an Answer to "How Did They Get There?" Crown 8vo. sewed, price 2d.

IN THE PRESS.
PUNCH IN THE PULPIT. (Second Edition).
TO BE, OR NOT TO BE? or, Man's Present and Future Condition Considered.
JESUS, OUR ARK.
ESSAYS, CRITICAL, BIOGRAPHICAL, and MIS-
CELLANEOUS. By S. F. WILLIAMS.
London: William. Freeman, 102, Fleet Street.

Crescent Mutual Insurance Company.
OFFICE:
Corner of Camp and Commercial Place.

TWELFTH ANNUAL STATEMENT.
Amount of Premiums for ten months
ending 30th April, 1861..... $31,750 11
Profits for ten months to 30th April,
1861..... 2,238 27
Assets, 30th April, 1861..... 1,422,950 35
The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of
THIRTY PER CENT., after paying interest at the
rate of Six per cent. per annum on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved to redeem Forty per cent.
of the issue of 1858, payable as follows:—
Twenty per cent. 1st June, 1862.
Twenty per cent. 30th September, 1861.
Scrip Certificates for the year 1861, deliverable on
and after the 12th day of August next.
THOMAS A. ADAMS, President
G. W. SPRATT, Secretary.

Now ready, in 1 vol. 8vo. price 10s. 6d. cloth,

THE SOUTH VINDICATED:

Being a Series of Letters written for the American Press during the Canvass for the Presidency in 1860, with a Letter to Lord Brougham on the John Brown Raid, and a Survey of the Result of the Presidential Contest, and its consequences.

BY
THE HON. JAMES WILLIAMS,
Late American Minister to Turkey.
WITH AN INTRODUCTION
BY JOHN BAKER HOPKINS.
London: LONGMAN, GREEN, and Co., 14, Ludgate-Hill.

European and Confederate States Advertising Agency.

THE object of this Agency is to
effect a direct trade alliance between the European and the Southern Press, through the medium of advertising. The most practicable mode
of introducing the Merchants, Manufacturers, Capitalists, Insurance Companies, &c., of Foreign Countries, to the Southern Trade, is by an organised,
classified, and liberal system of ADVERTISING.
Trade, like time and tide, waits for no man. The commerce of the world will not pause in ruinous inaction, but will commence its irresistible ebb and
flow the moment peace is established. One of the most dangerous, corrupting, and insidious means to be used by the North will be the medium of advertising in Southern papers. Advertising Agencies
are already organised in every Northern city, and only bid their time. We must see to it that our papers are so filled with Foreign Advertisements
and the advertisements of Southern Importers,
Dealers, and Manufacturers, that there will not be
space left in any Southern newspaper for the advertisement of a single Yankee notion. Then will
our papers present to their readers a faithful and true picture of the business of the Old World, and of our business men at home, and thus attach to Southern interest that mighty lever "the Press," and disrupt the tie which, by means of Northern advertising, has had so much influence in
binding the South to dependence upon its enemies.
Through the medium of a liberal advertising patriot, our Southern editors can maintain
against the stagnation in their business, which proceeds from interrupted or disorganised trade.

The object of this Agency is threefold:—
1st. To advertise European Merchants, Manufacturers, Hotels, Railroads, Insurance Companies, &c.,
&c., in Southern papers.
2nd. To advertise Southern business, property,
&c., in European journals.
3rd. To advertise home industry and Southern enterprise in our own papers, and thereby build up
the cities of our Confederacy, instead of those of
our enemies.

Our arrangements abroad are all completed. We now address you this preliminary Circular, to ask
you to send us duplicate copies of your paper, accompanied by a private letter (which shall be strictly confidential), stating your terms of advertising, &c.

We will soon appoint agents in each important
sea-board and inland city. Atlanta, at present, is selected for the Central Office, on account of its geographical position. We request of your paper enterprise your hearty co-operation and assistance;
and guarantee, in return, strict integrity in all
business transactions.

By order of the Board of Directors,
WILLIAM H. BARNES,
SUPERINTENDENT.

Atlanta, Ga., August 24, 1861.

Louisiana Mutual Insurance Company.

OFFICE:
Iron Building, corner Camp and Natchez Streets.
Amount of Premiums for the year ending 31st December, 1861..... 609,528 70
Amount of Profits for the year ending
28th February, 1861..... 213,759 74
Amount of Assets for the year ending
28th February, 1861..... 866,420 98
The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of THIRTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent.
interest on outstanding Scrip, and have ordered
the redemption of Fifty per cent. of the Scrip issue
of 1859.
Interest and redeemable Scrip payable on and after the second Monday of May next.
Certificates of Scrip for the year 1861 deliverable
on and after 1st June, 1861.
CHARLES BRIGGS, President.
R. P. JACVIER, Secretary.
New Orleans, March 20, 1861.

Home Mutual Insurance Company of New Orleans.

OFFICE..... 78, Camp Street.
Amount of premiums for year ending
31st December, 1861..... 433,725 47
Amount of Profits for year ending 31st
December, 1861..... 282,908 38
Amount of Assets on 31st December,
1861..... 1,338,306 77
The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of
FIFTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent.
interest on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved
to redeem the Scrip of 1857.
Interest and redeemable Scrip, payable in cash on
and after 10th February next.
Certificates of Scrip, for the year 1861, deliverable
on and after 15th March, 1862.
A. BROTHIER, President.
JAMES H. WHEELER, Secretary.
New Orleans, January 11, 1862.

Merchants' Mutual Insurance Com- pany of New Orleans.

At a meeting of the Board of Directors held this
day it was resolved to declare a Scrip dividend of TWENTY PER CENT. on the net earned premiums of the last year, and also to pay Six per cent.
interest on the outstanding Scrips of the Company. Scrip Certificates to be issued on and after the first day of August next.

DIRECTORS.
Geo. Connelly. J. N. Nevins.
John Pemberton. S. Maspero.
P. Poux. C. H. Stocomb.
C. Honold. B. F. Voorheir.
G. Miltenberger. B. O. Vignaud.

Citizens' Mutual Insurance Company.

The Board of Directors has resolved to pay an interest of SIX PER CENT. in cash on the outstanding certificates of profits to the holders thereof,
or their legal representatives, on and after the
second Monday in February next; also, to declare a dividend of Twenty per cent. (20 per cent.) on the
net earned premiums of the Company, for the year
ending 30th November, 1861, for which certificates
will be issued on and after the second Monday in February next.

TREASURERS.
Geo. W. West Vice- M. Masson.
President. R. P. Hunt.
D. Jamison. Martin Gordon, jun.
Ar. Miltenberger. Cesarre Olivier.
Lecky. A. Babu.
Jas. White. Numa Augustin.
Douglas West. Omer Gailhard.

PAYNE, HUNTINGDON AND
CO., NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A.,
Cotton Factors.

MOSES GREENWOOD, NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Cotton
Factor and Commission Merchant.

McDOWELL, WITHERS, AND CO., MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A., Com-
mission Merchants.

GARLAND GOODE, MOBILE,
Cotton Factor and Commission Merchant.

BOYKIN AND McRAE, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

MILLER AND BATTIE, Exchange
Brokers, MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

R. AND D. G. MILLS, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
GALVESTON, TEXAS, C.S.A.

ROTCHFORD, BROWN, AND
CO., Cotton Factors, NEW ORLEANS,
LOUISIANA, C.S.A.

R. W. RAYNE, NEW ORLEANS
LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Commission Merchant, offers facilities to European Consignors of Boots and Shoes to supply the markets of Texas, sec. Mississippi, Arkansas, and Alabama. Specifications furnished of goods suitable to these markets.

ANDREW LOW AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

CHARLES GREEN,
Commission Merchant, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

H. D. WEBDE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

JAMES CHAPMAN,
Commission Merchant, CHARLESTON.

N. A. HARDEE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

J. W. ANDERSON AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

R. N. GOULDINE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Charleston.

J. H. ASHBIDGE AND CO.,
Shipping and Commission Merchants, NEW ORLEANS.
Office—No. 80, Tower-buildings West, Liverpool.
Agents—Liverpool and New Orleans Mail Steam
Navigation Company.

S. A. PLUMMER AND CO.,
Importers and Dealers in Hardware,
PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA, C.S.A.

H. O. BREWER & CO.,
MOBILE, ALABAMA,
General Commission and Shipping Merchants.

WARWICK AND BARKSDALE, GALEGO FLOUR MILLS.
This immense establishment of capacity to manufacture 1000 barrels of Flour per day, purely for South American Market. RICHMOND.

JOSEPH R. ANDERSON,
TREDEGAR IRON WORKS
Manufacturers of Locomotive and other Engines,
all descriptions of Machinery, Rifled Cannon, &c.,
RICHMOND.

DUNLOP, MONCURE, & CO.,
General Commission Merchants,
RICHMOND.

A. G. MILWAINE, AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Tobacco, Cotton,
Grain, and other produce, PETERSBURG,
VIRGINIA.

C. W. WHITE,
Commission Merchant,
ST. THOMAS, WEST INDIES.

HAMILTON AND GRAHAM,
Importers, Wholesale Dealers in Dry
Goods, &c., PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA.

H. LEVY AND SON,
Commission Merchants, MOBILE.

BRITISH AND NORTH AMERI-CAN ROYAL MAIL-SHIPS.

NOTICE.

These Steamers call at CORK HARBOUR on both Outward and Homeward Passages, to receive and
land Mails.
Freight by the Mail Steamers to Halifax and Boston, and to New York, 43 per ton, and 5 per cent.
primage.

PATTERN PARCELS.—Parcels containing samples of Goods on board will be taken free of freight by
the Mail Steamers.
Freight on other Parcels 3s. each and upwards, according to size.
Parcels for different Consignees, collected and made up in Single Packages, addressed to one party for delivery in America, for the purpose of evaluating the payment of Freight, will, upon examination in America by the Customs, be charged with the proper Freight.
Dogs not taken on any terms.

The British and North American Royal Mail
Steam-Parcel Company, draw the attention of Shippers and Passengers to the 32nd section of the New Merchant Shipping Act, which is as
follows:—

"No person shall be entitled to carry in any ship,
or to require the master or owner of any ship to carry therein, aquafortis, oil of vitriol, gunpowder,
or any other goods which, in the judgment of such master or owner, are of a dangerous nature; and
if any person carries or sends by any ship any goods of a dangerous nature, without distinctly
marking their nature on the outside of the package containing the same, or otherwise giving notice in writing to the master or owner, at or before the time of carrying or sending the same
to be shipped, he shall for every such offence incur a pecuniary not exceeding £100; and the master or owner of any ship who takes on board or carries any parcels that he suspects to contain goods of
a dangerous nature, and may require them to be opened to ascertain the fact."

The Index,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS,
LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

Published every Thursday Evening.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

Subscriptions, Twenty-six Shillings per annum.
Stamped, Thirty Shillings per annum.

Nos. I. to XXII. NOW READY.

Office:—102, Fleet-street.

In this great metropolis, on the native soil of free speech and a free press, every interest—political social, religious, literary, scientific, benevolent
commercial, however remote, however small the
class to which it addresses itself—has long had its recognized representative in Journalism, through
which it seeks to obtain a share of the public attention. The one solitary exception has heretofore been in the case of the Confederate States of America. Engaged in a life-and-death struggle against a vastly superior foe—hemmed in on all sides, quite as effectually by the deserts of the Far West and of Mexico, as by the enemy's armies and navies—they suffer even more from that intellectual
blockade which excludes them from communion
with the rest of mankind, than from the commercial difficulties of obtaining their much needed
supplies. The disruption of the American Union—
despite repeated warnings—startled Europe without at once awakening it to a full consciousness of the reality and importance of the event. So little had the internal politics of America entered into
the routine of European thoughts, that even now—
when the effects are undeniable and irrevocable—
the causes still remain a mystery and a riddle to by far the greater portion of the intelligent European public. When the catastrophe occurred, the Northern States had the ear of the Governments
and of the peoples; and so zealously have they retained it, so ingeniously and persistently have
they pleaded their cause, so imperfect and dis-
torting was the medium through which alone the South's voice could be heard, that Europe may fairly be said to have listened to but one side of the quarrel. It is true that the respectable portion of the English press has treated the weaker party in
that spirit of fair play upon which every English-
man prides himself; and, as the struggle progressed, has evinced a painstaking study of a perplexing subject, which stands in honourable contrast to the flippancy and indecorum of American Journalism. But this has not supplied the want, so long and keenly felt, of some organ of Southern interests and Southern opinions, to which the Statesman, the Journalist, the Merchant, and the
public at large might look for reliable intelligence
of the progress of events, and for valuable indications of the manner in which the South itself views
and weighs the importance and bearing of those
events.

This want it is one of the principal objects of
"THE INDEX" to supply as far as possible. The measure of success which may reward the effort will necessarily depend upon the co-operation of the friends, and of the private, as well as official, representatives of the South in Europe. This cooperation has been most generously accorded us.
There is a large amount of Southern intelligence
which reaches Europe through various private channels. Still more important information is obtained from Northern sources, which finds no
outlet through the muzzled press of those States.
Much of such valuable material has already been
placed at our disposal; and we have a reasonable
prospect of making "THE INDEX" the receptacle
and depository of all, or nearly all, that is available
in the United Kingdom and on the Continent. Our arrangements are such that our friends may rely on
this respect upon a scrupulous and sound discretion, and the inviolable sanctity of private
communications.

While we have thus frankly explained one of the principal objects of "THE INDEX," it may be necessary to state—in order to prevent a possible
misapprehension—that it is not the sole object.
Literature and General News—in fact, every ingredient of a Weekly Journal—will command our earnest attention; and it will be our unremitting
endeavour to make "THE INDEX" worthy of that
liberal patronage which is promised us in advance.
"THE INDEX" will be represented by competent Correspondents at the different capitals of the Continent, at Washington, and at Havannah. It is our design, also, that "THE INDEX" should partake of
the character of a Magazine, without departing
from its proper sphere as a Review of current
events.

For the lenders and literary contributions, we shall enjoy the valuable aid of the pens of gentlemen already favourably known to the public.

The Cotton Market will monopolize much of our
space, and is entrusted to hands theoretically and
practically familiar with the subject and all questions bearing upon it.

It is superfluous to add that "THE INDEX" is
necessarily committed to the advocacy of the principles of Free Trade.

Subscribers will be furnished with handsome
Covers for each Half-Yearly Volume.

A full list of the original "INDEX" Subscribers
and a carefully prepared Table of Contents will accompany the concluding number of each Volume.

Subscriptions and Advertisements to be sent, and
Post-office Orders made payable to
WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102, FLEET ST., E.C.

Printed by HENRY F. MACKINTOSH, of 11, Graucourt, Fleet-street; and Published for
the Proprietors by WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102,
Fleet-street, London E.C.—September 25, 1862.

THE INDEX

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS, LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

OFFICE:—102, FLEET STREET.

Vol. I—No. 23.]

LONDON—THURSDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 2, 1862.

[PRICE 6D.

CONTENTS.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK	PAGE
America	353
England	354
Europe	355
COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET—
Liverpool Letter	355
Manchester Letter	356
TOBACCO MARKET	356
LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH—
Private Letters	356
FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE—
New York	356
Paris	357
Havannah	358
LEADERS—
The Operations in Maryland	360
The South and the African Slave Trade	360
The Higher Law	361
The Confederate Press	362
Substitutes for Cotton	363
German Unity	363
Editorial	363
THE "PAN-HANDLE"	364
THREE MONTHS IN THE CONFEDERATE ARMY
The First Visit of Death	365
A Dinner Party in Camp	366
REVIEW—
The Public Life of Lord Macaulay	366
ADVERTISEMENTS	368

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

WE are obliged to depend almost entirely upon Federal reports as to the latest movements in Maryland, and we must therefore remind our readers that, though we may present a generally correct view, we cannot guarantee the accuracy of any statement derived solely from the North. Indeed, the reports are in themselves so contradictory, that a person having the most complete faith in Federal veracity would still find it difficult to understand them.

On September 12 the Confederates, under General Jackson, occupied Hagerstown, and were reported to be entering Pennsylvania. It was even stated that the Confederate advance guard had entered Pennsylvania. This, however, is most improbable, especially when we remember that three days later General Jackson compelled the surrender of Harper's Ferry. An army is not moved about with the celerity of lightning. It is not, however, improbable that Jackson made a feint as if he intended a movement on Pennsylvania, to secure the capture of Harper's Ferry. A most important question, and which, if we could answer it, would make the rest of the movements more intelligible, is, "What was the Confederate force in Maryland?" Before the recent battles were fought it was stoutly denied by the partisans of the North that more than 50,000 Southerners had entered Maryland, and on the 13th September General Lee was reported to be at Leesburg with a large force. Since the news of the battles it has been assumed that the main body of the Confederate army had passed into Maryland, but we know not upon what ground. We think an examination of the Northern accounts of the engagements prove that only a portion of the Confederate army had crossed the Potomac.

On the 14th September was fought what the Northerners call the battle of South Mountain. An official report from General McClellan, dated Headquarters, beyond Middleton, September 14, evening, says:—

After a very severe engagement, the corps of Generals Hooker and Reno have carried the heights commanding Hagerstown road by storm. Our troops behaved magnificently. General Franklin has been wholly engaged on the extreme left, but I do not know the result, except that the firing indicates progress on his part.

The action continued after dark, and terminated leaving us in possession of the entire crest of the heights.

It has been a glorious victory. I cannot yet tell whether the enemy will retreat, or appear in increased force in the morning. General Reno was killed.

A second report from General McClellan, dated Headquarters, September 15, says:—

General Franklin's success on the left was complete, resulting in his capture of the Gap. We have taken a considerable number of prisoners. The enemy disappeared during the night, but our troops are advancing in pursuit. I do not know where they will next be found.

General Hooker reports from the advance that the enemy is making for the river in a perfect panic.

Later information, just received, completely confirms the news of the rout and demoralization of the rebel army. General Lee is reported to be wounded. General Hooker has over 1000 prisoners. It is stated that General Lee gives his loss at 15,000 men.

We are following as rapidly as the men can move.

An official despatch was never more loosely worded. The Confederates were attacked, and before General McClellan knew whether the assault had succeeded, ("I cannot yet tell whether the enemy will retreat,") he claims a glorious victory. At that time, too, he could only guess the result of General Franklin's operations by the firing. The second report is not only palpably untruthful in its statement about General Lee giving "his loss at 15,000 men,"—for Confederate generals have something else to do besides gossiping about their losses—but many of its details are discredited by later news. We know that the "pursuit" was at best sending out a few skirmishers, and that the enemy "making for the river in a perfect panic," and "later information, just received, completely confirms the news of the rout and demoralization of the rebel army," were utterly mendacious reports, for on the 15th and 17th the engagements were renewed; and, after the last battle, according to Northern accounts, the Confederates crossed the Potomac in perfect order. It was also reported that General Longstreet had been captured, and this is contradicted a few days later. How can we place faith in such accounts? A Maryland correspondent of a New York paper says, "The rebel troops engaged were Longstreet's, D. H. Hill's, and A. P. Hill's corps," and probably on this point he was well informed. The Federals seem to have occupied the position of the Confederates, though not immediately after the fight. It is likely that the loss was heavy, but we need hardly remark that the reputed Confederate loss of 15,000 men is an exaggeration. It would have been immense if the whole army had been engaged; in an engagement of only a part of the army, it is impossible. The Federal loss is variously estimated. General Reno, who commanded the attack, was killed.

On the 15th General McClellan advanced, and an affair occurred at Sharpsburg, of which we have no details, and it, therefore, probably was nothing more than a skirmish.

On Tuesday, the 16th, the fighting was continued, but all that we have heard about it is that it was very severe.

The crowning engagement of this series was on Wednesday, the 17th.

The battle lasted from morning till night, and it was reported that the result was indecisive.

Even on Friday General McClellan officially reports, "I do not know if the enemy is falling back to an interior position, or crossing the river. We may safely claim the victory for ours." This was thirty-six hours after the fight, and at the time the Federal commander did not know whether he had gained the battle. He was too much exhausted to ascertain the movements of his enemy, and knew not if the engagement was to be renewed. A few hours after that letter he writes, "Our victory is complete. The enemy is driven back into Virginia. Maryland and Pennsylvania are now safe." After forty hours he is assured of victory by the withdrawal of the Confederates. After this we are not surprised to hear that "the Confederates all succeeded in crossing the Potomac on Friday morning, saving their transports and all their wounded except 300." The interval between the battle of the 17th and the recrossing of the Potomac on the 19th not only attests the indecisive character of the fight, but indicates its severity. For four days General McClellan displayed the greatest energy, but after the 17th, though he thinks he may safely claim the victory, he was quiescent; and from the accounts we have of his losses, his inactivity is quite excusable.

The Northern accounts estimate the Federal loss at from 6000 to 10,000 men; but these figures are not so startling as the list given of the casualties amongst the Federal generals; it is almost incredible. We are told that "the Federal General Mansfield was killed, and Generals Hooker, Dureza, Sumner, Meagher, Max, Weber, Dana, Hartsuff, Richardson, Sedgwick, French, Ricketts, and Rodman, were wounded. The loss of Federal generals and field-officers is said to be so large as to be unaccountable." The number of generals killed and wounded is conclusive evidence of the large number of the Federal forces engaged. It also indicates such a list of casualties amongst lesser officers and men as under ordinary circumstances would hardly be covered by an estimate of 10,000 killed and wounded. The Federal estimate of the Confederate loss at 18,000 or 20,000 men is, of course, a mere speculation, and a very exaggerated one. According to Northern accounts, the Confederate loss was 15,000 on the 14th. The engagements of the 15th and 16th are described as very severe, and we may be sure the loss would not be set down at less than 10,000 for the two days. It is reported that 15,000 men were captured between the 14th and 17th, and that on the 17th the loss was 18,000, making the total Confederate loss equal to 58,000 men killed, wounded, and captured. Yet the Confederates on the 19th recrossed the Potomac unmolested, and carrying with them all their wounded, except 300. The Federal estimates are evidently and ridiculously untrue. From the rapidity of the movements, and from the contracted space on which these battles were fought, as well as from the details given by the correspondents of the New York press of the battle of the 14th, it is not likely that the aggregate Confederate force exceeded 70,000 to 80,000 men, and it is not impossible that it was much less. But granting, for an instant, that the Confederate force was 100,000, then, according to Northern estimates, every other man was killed, wounded, or captured. We press this point to show with what caution it is necessary to receive Northern accounts, and how difficult it is to distinguish the true from the false.

After the passage of the river had been effected, we are told "The Confederates are still visible in force on the Potomac shore, opposite McClellan's position, and have posted artillery to prevent the Federals from crossing."

According to the latest advices, the Confederates had left the neighbourhood of the river, and were withdrawing towards Winchester. It is rumoured that the passage of the Potomac was commanded by General "Stonewall" Jackson—a further proof that even at the great battle on the 17th the main body of the Confederate army was not engaged. During the time of the occupation of Maryland large quantities of stores were purchased and sent across the Potomac; these operations could not have been effected without the alacrity displayed by the Marylanders to do their best to assist the Southern cause. Considering the large armies that Virginia has had to support, the supplies thus procured are of great consequence.

The following is the address issued by General Lee to the people of Maryland:—

Lee's Headquarters, Army of Northern Virginia, near Frederickton, Monday, Sept. 8.

To the people of Maryland.—It is right that you should know the purpose that has brought the army under my command within the limits of your State, so far as that purpose concerns yourselves. The people of the Confederate States have long watched with the deepest sympathy the wrongs and outrages that have been inflicted upon the citizens of a commonwealth allied to the States of the South by the strongest social, political, and commercial ties, and reduced to the condition of a conquered province. Under the pretence of supporting the Constitution, but in violation of its most valuable provisions, your citizens have been arrested and imprisoned upon no charge and contrary to all the forms of law. A faithful and manly protest against this outrage, made by a venerable and illustrious Marylander, to whom in better days no citizen appealed for right in vain, was treated with scorn and contempt. The Government of your chief city has been usurped by armed strangers; your Legislature has been dissolved by the unlawful arrest of its members; freedom of the press and of speech has been suppressed; words have been declared offences by an arbitrary decree of the Federal Executive, and citizens ordered to be tried by military commissions for what they may dare to speak. Believing that the people of Maryland possess a spirit too lofty to submit to such a Government, the people of the South have long wished to aid you in throwing off this foreign yoke, to enable you again to enjoy the inalienable rights of freemen, and restore the independence and sovereignty of your State. In obedience to this wish our army has come among you, and is prepared to assist you with the power of its arms in regaining the rights of which you have been so unjustly despoiled. This, citizens of Maryland, is our mission, so far as you are concerned. No restraint upon your free will is intended—no intimidation will be allowed within the limits of this army at least. Marylanders shall once more enjoy their ancient freedom of thought and speech. We know no enemies among you, and will protect all of you in every opinion. It is for you to decide your destiny freely and without constraint. This army will respect your choice whatever it may be, and while the Southern people will rejoice to welcome you to your natural position among them, they will only welcome you when you come of your own free will.

R. E. LEE, General Commanding.

Whilst General McClellan was fighting the battle of South Mountain, General "Stonewall" Jackson was attacking Harper's Ferry. It appears that on September 11 Jackson broke up his camp at Frederick; and by a forced march arrived the same night at Williamsport, crossed the Potomac the next day, and surrounded Harper's Ferry, which was garrisoned by 12,000 Federal troops. On Saturday the 13th, he shelled the place, and on the 14th the firing was continued, and the enemy was driven from his position in consequence of the Confederates charging his batteries and spiking his guns. On the 15th the firing was renewed at daylight, and soon after 9 o'clock the Federal commander hoisted a white flag. According to Northern accounts, from 6000 to 8000 men surrendered. The privates were at once paroled. The quantity of stores captured was very considerable. Even the Federal accounts describe the booty as immense. The continued losses of stores weakens the Northern resources, and proportionally assists the South.

An important Confederate success is the capture of Munfordsville, Kentucky. This place was attacked on September 14 (on the same day McClellan was fighting in Maryland, and General Jackson was engaged at Harper's Ferry, in Virginia), but the Federal garrison held out until the 17th, when it surrendered to General Bragg, who took 5000 prisoners, ten pieces of artillery, and a valuable booty in stores. That the place could not be relieved in three days shows that the Federal forces in Kentucky are insufficient for the exigencies of the war.

In Cincinnati there has been a panic. The place was daily expecting an attack. At the latest advices, General Kirby Smith, after appearing within seven miles of the city, had suddenly withdrawn; but this movement was only regarded as a feint.

Washington, North Carolina was attacked on September 6 by a small Confederate force (1200). The Federals, assisted by their gunboats, repulsed their assailants. One of the gunboats blew up, killing the captain and seventeen men. Such is the Northern version of this affair. A Confederate attack on Newburn, North Carolina, was considered imminent.

On the 11th the Confederates captured Bloomfield, but do not appear to have held the place for longer than one day.

The Federal gunboats have been operating against some of the small towns on the Mississippi. Prentice and Bayou Sara have been destroyed. Such acts invite, and will doubtless lead to, retaliation. Natchez has been bombarded. It is said "the city surrendered, but was not occupied by the Federals." Guerrillas are reported "to be swarming in the neighbourhood of New Orleans."

On the 10th the Confederates attacked the Federals between Fayette and Gauley, in Western Virginia, and forced them to retreat to Elk River, and from thence to Ripley. A body of Confederate cavalry occupied Palmyra, Missouri, on the 13th, and retired after releasing some Confederate prisoners.

The Ovi-to has run the blockade at Mobile, and the commander of the Preble has been dismissed from the United States' service for suffering it. If all commanders are dismissed who do not prevent vessels running the blockade, promotion in the United States' navy will be very rapid.

The following telegraphic summary of the proceedings of the Confederate Congress is forwarded from New York:—

In the Confederate House of Representatives resolutions were offered thanking General Lee for his late successes, and declaring it to be the policy now that Maryland should be occupied for the purpose of advancing into the enemy's country. Messrs. Lyons, of Virginia, and Conrad, of Louisiana, formerly Secretary of War, opposed the latter clause. The latter approved of the passage of the Potomac into Maryland, but there his approbation must stop. He did not believe there could be a safe invasion of the North. Porcher Miles (South Carolina) favoured giving Jackson half the present Confederate army, and he would drive all the Federal forces before him. The resolution was finally passed, with thirty votes against it.

The Confederate Congress has adopted a resolution to make a proposition to the Federal Government to treat upon the manner of conducting the war so as to mitigate its horrors.

A Bill has been introduced in the Confederate Congress to facilitate obtaining letters of marque, so as to render privateering more efficient.

In our last impression, in an article upon the Confederate Navy, we gave an account of the Bill for facilitating privateering.

The telegraph also announces the passage in the Confederate Congress of a resolution recalling Messrs. Mason and Slidell. It is possible that this is a mere echo of the information previously received, that a resolution recalling all the Commissioners had been introduced by Mr. Harbridge, of Savannah. We doubt whether such a resolution has really passed both Houses, and received the sanction of the Executive. But should this be the case, it may be assumed that it is at the request of the Commissioners themselves, and in accordance with certain suggestions some of them are said to have made to the Confederate Government.

The Richmond Whig estimates the expenses of the Confederate Government from the commencement of the war to August, 1862, at $347,000,000.

Orders have been issued by the Federal Government to proceed with the drafting. Disturbances have occurred at Newbern, Connecticut, in consequence of this order.

It is stated "the Provost-Marshal of St. Louis has received instructions immediately to carry out the Confiscation Act in Missouri. The property liable to confiscation is estimated at $50,000,000." The Provost-Marshal may not find it easy to obey his orders. As it is, Missouri is far from being secure to the Federals, and this act of spoliation may rouse the people to a further effort to free themselves from the despotism of the Washington Government.

The Indians have captured two trains of Mormons about 300 miles from the Salt Lake City. "Other parties have been driven back by the Indians."

The court-martial to try the officers charged by General Pope with disobedience to orders has been adjourned sine die, at the request of General McClellan. After such an insult, if Pope has any regard for his honour, he will resign his command in the North-west. Perhaps he may not be sorry of the excuse for getting rid of the task of subjugating the Indians to obedience with such troops as he can raise in States already denuded of their fighting population.

General McDowell has demanded a court-martial. The public now think he is not guilty of treason, but that his misfortune arose from incapacity.

General Fremont has accepted the offer of the New York War Committee to raise 50,000 men, but the Secretary of War has refused to grant permission to the War Committee to raise troops for Fremont. General Fremont's idea of subordination to the Government must be peculiar.

The Federal press is not complimentary to the Washington Government. The telegraph informs us:—

The New York Times thinks there are symptoms that the Confederates, in invading the Northern States, propose, instead of establishing their independence, to overthrow President Lincoln's Administration, and obtain the control of the Federal Government.

The same paper is of opinion that Lincoln's Government, by its weakness and incapacity, offers itself a prey to the first strong hand venturing to seize it.

The same paper thinks that the danger can only be met by President Lincoln giving the country a responsible Cabinet made up of the strongest and best men.

The Governors of Pennsylvania and Ohio have issued a call to the governors of all the Union States to meet on the 24th at Altoona, Pennsylvania.

The New York press strongly condemn the Federal officers for surrendering Harper's Ferry; and urge a military tribunal of inquiry.

ENGLAND.

THE increase in the number of paupers in Lancashire during the past week has been above 6000. The Mansion-house Committee, on Saturday, reported their receipts for the week at £4400, and their disbursements at £3100. They have organized an establishment for the reception and distribution of cast-off clothing.

The Central Executive Committee, administering the funds collected by several distinct societies for the relief of the sufferers in the cotton districts, have presented a report to the General Committee. It appears that the funds entrusted and promised to them amount to nearly £130,000, besides supplies of clothing, coal, &c., given or promised from various quarters. Halim Pasha, brother of the Viceroy of Egypt, has given £200. They report that the manufacturers, so furiously reviled by the correspondent of the Times, are, in many cases, paying two or three days' wages to the hands whom they cannot provide with work, and, in other instances, are employing fathers of families for a few hours every week in whitewashing the rooms, cleaning machinery, and similar jobs, for which they are liberally paid. The Committee have endeavoured everywhere to secure the presence on the local committees of the chief lauded proprietors, clergy, dissenting ministers, and employers of labour, and have generally been successful in this endeavour. They have addressed a circular to the local magistrates, calling their attention to the necessity of putting down a class of dishonest vagrants who, taking advantage of the compassion excited by the distress of the operatives, are making money out of the charity of deluded almsgivers.

The Earl of Derby has been appointed Chairman of the Executive Committee, in the room of the deceased Earl of Ellesmere. The Bishops of Peterborough and Gloucester, and the titular Catholic Bishop of Salford, have ordered collections throughout their dioceses for the relief of the suffering districts. The Wesleyan Conference has taken a similar step.

The following is the report of Mr. Farnall, the Poor Law Inspector, specially appointed to superintend the afflicted counties:—

Manchester, Sept. 29.

My Lords and Gentlemen,—A reference to my report for this week, on twenty-four Unions in the cotton manufacturing districts, will show you that there is an increase in the number of persons receiving parochial relief as compared with the number relieved last week of 6617 persons.

There are now 156,229 persons receiving parochial relief in the unions adverted to; in the corresponding week of last year there were 12,945 persons so relieved; there is therefore an increase of 113,284 persons in the receipt of parochial relief, or 263.0 per cent.

The average percentage of pauperism on the population of these unions is now 8.1; in the corresponding week of last year it was 2.2 per cent.

The average amount of out-relief per head per week in these unions is 1s. 3d., the lowest being 11½d., and the highest 1s. 6½d.

It will be remembered that in the first report I presented to you the weekly increase of persons in receipt of parochial relief was 4637, and that in the second report it was 4810, while in this third report it is 6617. In three weeks, therefore, 16,064 persons have become paupers, and I am again obliged to inform you that both applicants for parochial relief and for aid from local committees of charity are still rapidly increasing throughout the district.

I have received authentic reports relative to the unions of Ashton-under-Lyne, Glossop, Haslingden, Stockport, and Wigton, and I find that in those places there are 32,718 operatives working short time, 33,651 wholly unemployed, and 14,530 working full time; and I also find that the weekly loss of wages in these five unions amounts to £27,430.

H. B. FARNALL, Special Commissioner.

On Friday last Mr. Galt, the ex-Finance Minister of Canada, addressed the Chamber of Commerce in Manchester Town-hall. His object was to answer some of the very ignorant, impolitic, and ungenerous attacks which have been made on their Canadian countrymen by certain English scribblers and stump-orators, and notably by the organs of that school which, by its low and vulgar views, its mercenary theories of national duty, and its unblushing avowals of the meanest political selfishness, has brought merited contempt on itself, and unmerited obloquy upon its native Manchester. Mr. Galt explained the necessity and the effect of the high colonial duties on imported manufactures. Those duties were not intended to be, and are not in fact, protective. The imports of British manufactures are steadily on the increase, and so far from Manchester having any right to complain, or having suffered anything from those duties, the fact is that there is not a single cotton manufactory in Canada. As to the question of Colonial defence, on which the Ministry of which he was a member was thrown out, he pointed out the impossibility of the colonies, with their actual population, their want of communications, and their poverty in all other resources than those which are always the sole wealth of a new country, undertaking the whole burden of their own defence against a Power like the United States. So far as the slanderers of Canada are concerned, Mr. Galt simply wasted his words. The gentlemen of the "Manchester School" have learned from Mr. Bright the valuable faculty of deafness; and when their fictions are exposed, and their misstatements of fact corrected, they only repeat them in precisely the same form as before, without taking the slightest notice of the contradiction. Two somewhat notorious disciples of the arch-agitator, Mr. H. Ashworth and Mr. H. Mason, rose after Mr. Galt sat down; repeated what he had just shown to be untrue, that the Canadian tariff is protective and almost prohibitive; and denounced the Canadians for desiring to put their hands into the pockets of the heavily burdened taxpayers of England. Some of their colleagues repudiated them, as Manchester in 1857 formally repudiated their leader, and the whole "Manchester School." Mr. Galt quietly repeated his explanations, showed that Canada received nothing from the Imperial guarantees of which complaint was made, but had paid every farthing to the Home Government before the debt fell due, and departed, carrying with him, of course, a very unpleasant impression, which is not unlikely to extend itself to the Colonies generally. These men are a nuisance to England and a disgrace to Lancashire, which, for the most part, is heartily ashamed of them. Their idea evidently is, that they are the élite of Manchester; that Manchester is the centre of the universe; that the human race exists only in order to wear cotton clothes, and that the sole use of the British Empire is to afford a market for Manchester produce. It is only just to the class from which these orators spring to say that no one speaks so indignantly of their doctrines, or so contemptuously of their character, as do the more intelligent and patriotic manufacturers and merchants of Lancashire. When they speak on English questions, they are simply disregarded; but in insulting their fellow-subjects beyond the seas, they have hit on a direction in which they may really exercise some power for mischief; it is essential, therefore, that they should be peremptorily disavowed by their loyal countrymen.

More than 54,000 bales of Indian cotton have reached Liverpool, and above 300,000 more are said to be on their way. This would be enough to keep the mills of Lancashire at work for seven weeks in ordinary times. It may serve to sustain the present rate of starvation for about three months, but certainly not longer. It must be remembered that Liverpool now supplies the Continental as well as the English demand.

At an agricultural meeting, held at Melton Mowbray, Lord John Manners was imprudent enough to enter on the subject of the cotton famine. Like most other persons who do not understand the question, he had his own pet remedy for the evil. Flax and wool, he thought, might be substituted for cotton, both in the employment of the Lancashire operatives, and in the clothing of the millions who have hitherto been clad by the Lancashire looms. Unfortunately, cotton machinery can with difficulty and at great expense be adapted to spin either flax or wool, and cotton clothing has certain peculiar properties which do not belong either to woollen or linen, and which peculiarly fit it for tropical climates, and for certain uses at home. It is a mistake to suppose, as Lord John does, that it is merely a question of cheapness.

The Education-Office has recovered from the heavy blow it received at Mr. Walpole's hands during the earlier part of this year; and has issued a series of directions to Inspectors of Schools in receipt of Government aid, in order to carry out, as far as possible, the scheme which Mr. Lowe was compelled to modify; but which, owing to the very injudicious lenity of his opponents, he was not compelled to withdraw altogether. As was predicted by the opponents of the Revised Code, all security for the proper payment of teachers is taken away; every encouragement is given to managers to beat down their salaries as much as possible; and facilities are afforded for the employment of teachers who have received only the minimum of education themselves. The directions are drawn up in a spirit of un concealed hostility to the certificated teachers, and with a manifest desire to reduce, as far as possible, the standard of popular education.

The official return of the revenue for the quarter just ended was published on Tuesday night. The figures are not very assuring; the distress in the manufacturing districts is written in large letters on the face of them. The Excise return, which has always been held to be the surest index of the condition of the country, has been going steadily downward during the last four quarters. The decrease on the half-year is £902,000, of which decrease £617,000 belongs to the quarter just ended. In the Customs, on the other hand, the balance is the other way, though it does not redress the evil. The increase on the quarter is £219,000. On the Stamps, Post Office, and Miscellaneous there is an increase—in the last to an extent which shows there has been a regular clearing out of old stores, or stores not very old. But the most cheerless feature in the balance sheet is the state of the income tax. There is a decrease on the quarter to a very trifling extent indeed, and it is more than made up by an increase on the half-year; but on the whole of the last four quarters the decrease exceeds £600,000. It would thus appear that the springs of our wealth are giving way under the general pressure. The balance on the whole quarter is slight, but trifling as it is, it inclines the wrong way; and on the half-year it is £11,000; and on the four quarters it exhibits a decrease of £120,620.

A meeting was held in Hyde Park, on Sunday, to express the sympathy of the English working classes with General Garibaldi. The organizers of the meeting were, we believe, men of no character, and the principal speaker was a very notorious infidel lecturer of the name of Bradlaugh. The affair ended in a violent collision between the Garibaldists and a body of Irish Catholics, which necessitated the interference of the police. The affair has provoked a general demand for the prevention of all meetings, religious or political, in the parks, which were intended to be places of recreation, and not arenas of battle, whether waged with words or with stones.

Tralee, in Ireland, has been the scene of a disturbance only less disgraceful than those which have renewed the bad reputation always enjoyed by Belfast. That itinerant nuisance, Father Gavazzi, announced his intention to lecture; some Catholics made their way into the hall, created a row, and were turned out. The Catholic mob besieged the place, and kept the Protestant audience imprisoned all night. On getting home in the morning, the captives found their houses without windows, and very much worse for the attack of the rabble. Of course, such outrages ought to be punished; and, of course, the Protestants have a right to meet where they please, and hear whatever orator they like. But, with all respect for freedom of speech, we do think that steps should be taken to put down men like Gavazzi, the Baron de Camin, and similar foreign notoriety, who go about making money out of the provocation of such riots and conflicts. If they cannot be punished as vagabonds, they might surely be indicted for provoking a breach of the peace.

EUROPE.

FRANCE.—This week has witnessed the publication of one of the most remarkable and most important pieces of diplomatic correspondence that the press has ever given to the world. The date of the three documents just made public is not very recent; but the fact of their issue at the present juncture gives them an immediate significance not less striking than if they had been written yesterday. The first is a letter from the Emperor of the French to M. Thouvenel, his Minister for Foreign Affairs. Napoleon III. declares that since 1849 it has been his constant endeavour to reconcile the Pope with the national aspirations of Italy. He has hitherto been unsuccessful, and, in consequence, the Roman question has been a source of perplexity and moral disorder throughout Europe. Each party to the conflict sees only its own side, and forgets what is due to the other. Italy, treating the Papacy as dead, without respect to its political rights or its immemorial sanctity, pretends to dispose of the Papal territory. The Pope, regardless of the rights of nationality, treats as dead an Italian people supplicating and struggling for political life. From this state of things arises danger to both. Italy provokes the animosity of the Catholic world, and of the party of order; the Papacy incurs the hatred of the Italian nation and of the Liberals of Europe. On the one hand, the country jeopardizes its peace; on the other, the Church is in danger of a terrible schism—a moral revolt against her Head. On what basis is reconciliation possible? The Pope must accept everything which can bind him to Italy, and Italy must guarantee the independence of the Pope. The Italian Government must recognize and respect the present limits of the States of the Church; the Pontifical Government must restore to its subjects their old municipal privileges and rights of self-government. This, however, is to be regarded, not as a French ultimatum, but as the basis of a policy which France should endeavour to carry out by her "legitimate influence and disinterested advice."

This letter bears date May 20. Enclosing a copy thereof, M. Thouvenel wrote on May 30 to the Marquis de Lavalette, French Minister at Rome. The French Government had hoped that its previous overtures would have met with the peremptory rejection they have actually received. It is compelled, by that rejection, to explain itself distinctly and unreservedly in regard to its plans of reconciliation. In the first place, it has never uttered a word which should entitle the Italian Government to expect that France would ever consent to see Rome made the capital of Italy. It is her firm determination to maintain the integrity of the Papal territory, and the independence of the Pope. No arrangement, except on the basis of the territorial status quo, would meet her approval. The Holy Father may reserve, by whatever form he pleases, his rights over the Trans-appennine provinces wrested from him by Italy; but he will do well to agree not to attempt any exercise of power therein. Italy, on the other hand, will have to engage with France to respect the territory still left to the Pontifical See, and to assume the whole or the greater part of the Papal debt. If the Pope will agree to these terms, France will guarantee to him, with or without the support of the other Powers, parties to the Treaty of Vienna, the integrity of his remaining dominions; and she will grant to him an annual income of £120,000—more than the whole amount of his present civil list. Meantime, the Pope will grant to his subjects such reforms as may reconcile them to his sovereignty. His Holiness has admitted that, though the Temporal Power be necessary to the Papacy, it is not an article of faith. If not the power itself, then still less the extent of territory to be subject to that power. No religious duty, therefore, prevents the Pope from acceding to these terms; and they are to be pressed both on Cardinal Antonelli and on the Supreme Pontiff himself. Anything like menace must be carefully avoided; but it is to be understood that if the Papal Government persists in its "theory of immobility" the Emperor must decline to accept that doctrine; and, while guarding, as far as possible, the interests he has hitherto protected, he must endeavour to extricate himself from what, if prolonged, must become a false position.

The reply of M. de Lavalette, dated the 24th of June, narrates his interview with the Cardinal Secretary of State. Cardinal Antonelli stood firmly to his refusal to give up, no matter under what reservation of right, any portion of territory that had ever belonged to the Pope. Non possumus. The impossibility, he it noticed, is not exactly religious. The Pope is bound not to give up any part of his States by one moral and one legal consideration. First,—in those States he is only trustee for the Catholic Church throughout the world. Secondly,—he is restrained, by a formal and solemn decree of one of his predecessors, from any alienation of his dominions. Cardinal Antonelli inquired why the French Government had not first addressed itself to Piedmont, the aggressor, rather than to Rome, the victim. The Ambassador replied that it had seemed more respectful first to address the Holy Father; inquiring in his turn whether, if Italy had assented to the proposal, the Pope would have been more favourably disposed to it? The Cardinal answered in the negative. His Eminence then remarked that the parties to the Treaty of Vienna had already guaranteed to the Pope the whole of his dominions; and it was useless now to ask them for the guarantee of a part. The Ambassador rejoined, with all diplomatic circumspection, that the Treaty of Vienna was waste paper: a new guarantee would have a present and practical effect. Antonelli repeated his non possumus, which he extended to the transfer of the debt. That transfer would be equivalent to a recognition of the Piedmontese usurpation. For the same reason the Pope must refuse the contribution offered by France. To accept compensation would be to acquiesce in spoliation. M. de Lavalette accordingly reports the total failure of his attempt to obtain the acquiescence of the Papal Government in the scheme suggested by the Emperor. The publication of this despatch at the present juncture has given rise to much discussion and not a little excitement. The French papers differ as to the construction to be put upon it. Some, looking to the declaration that Rome will never, with the consent of France, become the capital of Italy, regard it as favourable to the Pope. Others, referring to the last clause of M. Thouvenel's despatch, conceive it to portend the speedy withdrawal of France from a position admitted to be morally untenable.

M. de Lavalette has quitted his post, and it is said that he will not return to it. Whether a successor will or will not be appointed is not yet known. If not, we may probably accept the retirement of the Ambassador as almost equivalent to the withdrawal of the Embassy, and as indicating a change of policy towards the Pope on the part of France.

ITALY.—The subscriptions for the relief of Garibaldi have been closed, all expenses having been paid. Mr. Partridge has returned, and reported to the committee. He gives a very hopeful account of the case.

Turin has been busy with the ceremonies attending marriage of the Princess Maria Pia, daughter of Victor Emmanuel, to the young King of Portugal. The bride is not yet fifteen. The marriage, on the part of her family, is not a political one; Portugal has good reason to desire the speedy marriage of her King, lest the extinction of the reigning branch of the House of Braganza should involve her in serious troubles. The bride has left for her new home, accompanied by her brother, Prince Humbert.

The brigandage in Naples is on the increase. It is said that 700 more banditti have left Rome for the disturbed districts. The last reported achievement of these so-called reactionists is worthy of the German banditti in the service of President Lincoln. They waylaid and attacked a bridal party of rank; the bridegroom defended himself and his young wife—he was murdered; the bride burst out into violent execrations on the murderers, and she shared his fate. The bodies were stripped in presence of the wretched mother of the bride, and the scoundrels made off with their booty. What are the Piedmontese troops about? Italy has an army of above 300,000 men; she can spare a force to capture and shoot down the man who added the Southern provinces to the kingdom; yet she cannot deliver those provinces from this murderous banditti. And what are the French doing at Rome, to allow the invasion of the Italian territory by these lawless ruffians?

General Garibaldi has sent to some London papers an address to the English nation, from which we can only gather that the hero's misfortunes have unsettled his reason. He calls upon England to summon other nations to co-operate with her in the path of human progress; to summon France, which is for the moment under the dominion of the Spirit of Evil; America, which is fighting for the abolition of slavery, involved in a fearful struggle by the "traffickers in human flesh;" (does the General mean the English slave-traders of the last century, or the Northern slave-traders of the present?) Switzerland, and Belgium. Armies and iron-plated ships, artillery, diplomacy, and navies, are to be done away with; and a World's Congress, sitting in London, is to arbitrate in all international differences. We fear that we must consider the writer of extraordinary document to be in a state vis duabus Anticyris medenda.

GERMANY.—The Prussian news is not of a pleasant complexion. The King, it is said, is determined not to yield. The Minister of Finance, who is supposed to be averse to force upon the people the scheme of military organization repudiated by the Chamber, retires. General Von Roon, Minister of War, who is officially responsible for that scheme, remains. Count Bernstorff, the representative of a liberal foreign policy and of an entente cordiale, resigns the seals of the Foreign Office, and is succeeded by the Count Von Bismark-Schönhausen, a partisan of a Russian alliance and a close connection with France in antagonism to Austria. It is impossible as yet to foretell the course of the new Ministry; but its composition inspires no confidence either in Prussia or elsewhere.

The Ministry, in order to avoid an immediate collision with the Chamber, has withdrawn the Budget of 1863, and announces its intention to bring it forward again next year, together with a Bill for the reorganization of the army—a measure on which it is clear that the King is firmly resolved. The Committee of the Chamber has demanded that the Budget shall be submitted to it this year; and has resolved that the expenditure, by order of Ministers, of money not voted by the Deputies, is unconstitutional. The Ministers remain obstinate.

An assembly of politicians and writers from all parts of Germany has been sitting at Weimar to discuss the conversion of the Germanic Bund into a real union of States—a compound nationality like the late American Union. They have decided in favour of this scheme, and recommend, ad interim, the renewal and reform of the Zollverein or Customs' union, which will shortly expire. It is needless to say that there is not the least chance of the realization of the Federal scheme.

BELGIUM.—A Congress of the International Association for the Progress of Social Science is sitting just now at Brussels, under the presidency of the Duke of Brabant, the heir apparent to the throne. The congress is attended by representatives from all the countries of Europe; and their views on education, taxation, &c., appear to be as diverse as their nationalities.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, Oct. 1.

Our last report left the market in a state of great depression, with an uneasy feeling among cotton holders as to the effect of the next news from America. On Monday there was no abatement of the heaviness, and with sales of 1000 bales. Middling Orleans was sold at 2s. 1d., or even less, and Fair Dhollerah at 17½d.; but the steamer's news to hand on Friday completely changed the tone of the market. By this arrival the first intimation was received of the reverse that had befallen the Confederate arms in Maryland. It was reported that McClellan had defeated Lee, and that the Southern forces were in disorderly retreat; considerable doubts were entertained as to the correctness of this news, for it was thought highly improbable that the veteran and victorious army of the South should be discomfited by the raw levies that had just reached Washington, mixed with the broken fragments of the beaten army of the Potomac. Still sufficient was known to allay the apprehension of holders that the onward progress of the Southern arms might lead to the overthrow of the Federal Government. An active demand in consequence sprang up, and the business reached 5000 bales, at 1d. advance on the depressed sales of American, but not more than ¾d. to ¾d. on Surats. The movement to the latter class was prevented by the appearance of the long-expected glut of Bombay ships, of which ten or twelve arrived that day.

On Saturday, with sales of 3000 bales, American cotton continued to improve. On Monday the Asia's advices were to hand, but they threw little further light on the military situation of the belligerents; the accounts were very obscure, and many persons believed that the final denouement would still be in favour of the Confederates. Our market was not affected by them, and the business reached 4000 bales, American cotton still hardening under an active demand. Cut Surats kept in check by the continuance of heavy arrivals. Yesterday the Norwegian's news was received, and the full import of the military movements in Maryland became known. The Confederates, after a series of desperate engagements, had been overmatched, and forced to retreat, though in perfect order, across the Potomac. This news took the public somewhat by surprise, for it revealed rigour and prowess on the Federal side, which was not anticipated, and dispelled the hopes some had entertained that the continuous ill success of the North would lead to a settlement. Still the market did not respond more fully—buyers seemed disposed to await the large supply of Surat cotton that must soon be offering; and in Manchester no desire was shown to do business, though producers continued very firm. The sales reached 4000 bales, and the same amount was sold again to-day, with a dull inanimate feeling in Surat cotton, while American under a lively demand, has still an upward tendency. Our quotations may be given to-day as 27½ for Middling Orleans, 27 for Mohiles, and 26½d. for Bowed, 21½d. for Fair Sawginned, 19d. for Fair Breach, 17½d. to ¾d. for Oomra Wutte, 17½d. for Dhollerah, and 17½d. for Comptah. A considerable business has been done in the past few days in cotton just arrived, to be delivered from the quay, and prices have been taken fully ½d. below the rates ruling on the spot. For cotton afloat prices have been paying fully as high as on the spot, and the preference is given to July shipments over May and June, the present quotation is 17½d. for Dhollerah, and 17½d. for Oomra-wutte.

The import of Surat cotton this week is enormous, reaching already 125,000 bales, and nearly double the largest import ever known before. The general impression is that, when the full weight of this comes on the market, some decline in prices is likely to ensue. This opinion is strengthened by the extraordinary reduction in consumption that has recently taken place. During the last month a very large number of additional mills have been closed in Manchester, many persons now estimate the consumption as low as 10,000 or 12,000 bales per week. There can be little doubt that these figures are entirely too low, still it is doubtful whether the trade are using at the present time more than 15,000 bales per week.

At this rate it is evident that the supply of cotton has for the moment quite overtaken the demand; but it is very unlikely that the consumption will remain long at this level. A process is going on which will soon improve the position of spinners materially. The production of goods is evidently far short of the actual "tear and wear," and when the response from the various foreign markets arrives to the last great advance, it is probable that cotton fabrics will begin to move upwards again. Highly stimulating news is expected from India before long, and this is expected to give a strong impulse to Manchester. The ample supply of cotton, on the other hand, tempers the elasticity of our market, so that spinners are not likely, for some little time, to pay out on the raw material so much as they gain on the manufactured article.

MANCHESTER, Sept. 30.

Our market, although firmer in price and steadier in tone than it was last week, appears generally to have disappointed sellers, who find the demand less active than they expected, and in consequence they have done hardly any business to-day.

Yarns are held for a slight advance on last week's rates, and spinners for the most part are very firm, and show little disposition to press sales. The buyers, both for the home trade and for export, continue to act with much caution, and the business doing in all departments seems to be quite insignificant in amount.

For some doubled yarns, from 60's upwards, there is rather more enquiry to-day, but the prices for which they are held have checked business materially, and we hear of few actual transactions. Fine yarns, single and two-fold, remain steady and unchanged in value. Goods are very firm, and the feeling in this department is one of increasing steadiness, most sellers holding stiffly for the extreme rates current last week.

We hear of little or no business in cloth, and the demand continues very languid, most of the buyers holding quite aloof. The India merchants are waiting the arrivals of telegrams, now due from the East, while other buyers are equally inactive, and as, at the same time, sellers are extremely still and little disposed to press sales, the amount of business transacted has been very small.

TOBACCO.

The business of the month amounts to about 3000 hogs-heads, of which 1600 are Marylands taken chiefly on speculation, induced by their proportionate cheapness when compared with the continually advancing prices for Western Strips. Of this latter article sales have been upon the most limited scale, and the consumption is doubtless going upon almost every class of substitutes, among which Dutch and Java hold the chief place.

The demand for export continues, as most of the foreign Regies are in the market, and London and New York may be said to be now the chief depots of supply. The buying for export has been chiefly at prices from 6½d. to 9d., but fine selections have commanded as high as 10½d. and 11d. for home trade purposes; there is scarcely any high dried leaf in first hands, and the demand has been supplied from good natural parcels from 9d. up to 12d. and 12½d. for fine colony selections.

A reference to our tables below of deliveries of stemmed and unstemmed for the month, as well as the eight months ending 31 August, will exhibit the continued decreased consumption of strips, while the total consumption of tobacco remains at its fall average quantity.

The latest accounts from America have certainly stimulated the market. Maryland, which has been hitherto open, has become the scene of invasion; and although the temporary check to the Confederate forces may again shift the seat of war into Virginia, it is felt that there is no present prospect of any termination to hostilities. Tobacco will be still more closely blockaded in the producing States, and the influence of short crops, which has all along been felt, will have no counterpoise by the import of any considerable quantity of the tobacco which has been raised.

Tobacco, duty paid, in the United Kingdom, for the month of August:—

	1860. lbs.	1861. lbs.	1862. lbs.
Stemmed	1,640,594	1,490,597	1,233,334
Unstemmed	1,400,760	1,377,790	1,622,607
	3,041,354	2,868,387	2,855,941

For Eight Months, ending August 31:—

	1860. lbs.	1861. lbs.	1862. lbs.
Stemmed	11,886,955	12,514,804	10,390,463
Unstemmed	11,461,035	10,322,028	12,736,031
	23,347,990	22,836,832	23,126,494

STOCK IN LONDON.

	Virg. Stem. hds.	Virg. Leaf. hds.	West. Stem. hds.	West. Leaf. hds.	Mary. hds.	Negro. & Cayen. pkgs.
September 1	508	521	5287	7635	6218	2329
Imported during Sept.	7	0	1284	844	1291	152
	515	521	6571	8479	7509	2481
Delivered during Sept.	50	39	302	615	226	554
Stock, October 1	465	482	6179	7864	7283	1827

QUOTATIONS.

Virginia leaf	10½d. to 14d. per lb.
Ditto stemmed	18d. to 22d. "
Western leaf—
Common to medium export..	6d. to 9½d. "
Good and fine	10d. to 13d. "
Western stemmed	13d. to 16½d. "
Marylands	6d. to 9½d. "
Negrohead and Cavendish	nominal.

LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH.

PRIVATE LETTERS.

The following letter is addressed to a London firm:—

PARIS, TENNESSEE, Sept. 1.

It is some time since I have written to you. Your letter of June 7 came to hand, and would have been answered if I had had any convenient way of getting a letter mailed at Paducah.

We are cut off here from all communication with the South, and our nearest post-office in the North that I know anything about is thirty miles off. Our prospects for peace are no better now, so far as I can see, than they were at the commencement of hostilities. Our unhappy country is in a deplorable fix. If peace could be made to-day, this generation would not see the country restored to its former prosperity.

Tennessee is overrun by the Federals, and hundreds and thousands of her citizens are nearly ruined. Some families who were wealthy have been deprived of all their negroes, stock, and, in fact, everything they possessed. Soon after they invaded Tennessee, they took all by force to Fort Hickmans, and offered them the alternative of taking the oath of allegiance, or going to a prison in the Northern States. As all my sons and sons-in-law were in the Southern army, and I had no one to attend to anything for me, I chose to take the oath. I was already subjugated, and could not help myself. I then determined to go to Paducah and endeavour to regain the tobacco, the Federals had seized and carried off from the mouth of Sandy belonging to me—about 8 hds. leaf, 48 hds. stems, and 101 boxes of manufactured. As yet I have not recovered anything, and have but little prospect of ever doing so. I then concluded I had better cease both buying and shipping, as I believed I was losing nothing by holding unless I chanced to lose the tobacco, which, I fear, is too probable. Even if I could convert it into money I should still fear losing it, as there have been a great many robberies committed during the night; in fact it is said that down towards Memphis they would take off a man's cotton during the day, and at night return and rob him of his money, in some instances even threaten to hang him because he would not produce it.

Most of the cotton has been burned, and very little planted, and very little is likely to be planted until the war is over. I don't think there was more than a fourth of a crop of tobacco planted; and even that has been reduced one-half by the severe drought we have had, and the worms. The price has advanced here to figures along way above your quotations. A man living near me sold a hhd. at Louisville for $28; and leaf is selling here at $10 to $12, for crops round. I shall have, when I have done pressing, about 275 hhd's, some of it very good shipping, but none factory dried; I also had about 70 hhd's. at New Orleans, but whether it has been burned or sold, I have no knowledge, on account of the currency. I would greatly prefer shipping all my leaf to London or Liverpool, if I only knew I should be safe in so doing. Besides, I am certain I should lose nothing by holding on, if I do not lose the tobacco. I am selling manufactured tobacco, such as I sold last winter at 16 cents, at 42 cents, and all other brands in proportion. Three of my negroes ran away last winter, but I recovered them, and have not lost any since; but I do not know how soon I may do so, as we have no law nor means of enforcing their staying, if they choose to go.

The following is an extract from a letter bearing date New Orleans, August 30:—

You will be sorry to hear that your friend, Mr. George Connelly, has been imprisoned. Cause—arms found within his house, but declared by him not to be his, or there with his knowledge or consent. Messrs. Nixon and Co.'s office has been seized, and all the furniture therein seized and confiscated. Cause—non-payment of the $500 special tax assessed upon them.

Foreign Correspondence.

(From our Commercial Correspondent.)

NEW YORK, September 16.

Wall Street got quite excited yesterday upon the receipt of the pass of the battle in Maryland on Sunday; but to-day stocks have fallen back, and gold has again risen upon the facts becoming known, coupled with the surrender of Harper's Ferry with 12,000 men. It is generally believed here that the invasion of Maryland is a mere feint to draw McClellan from Washington, and that is the reason why the Confederates have kept within a short distance of the Potomac, in place of moving on to Baltimore, which could have easily been accomplished. The capital is in greater danger now than ever; it is stated that all the archives have been moved to New England, and that several gunboats are in readiness to carry Lincoln and his cabinet away. The immediate future is full of interest.

The Pennsylvanians have been much alarmed; their Treasurer, Henry D. Moore, formerly a tailor, has arrived here with all the valuable papers of the State, as well as those of the city of Philadelphia. The Quakers, it is to be hoped, will make efforts to bring about peace, but their influence is not as great as formerly. An attempt at something of the kind would at least be creditable to them.

I the opinion of many clear-thinking persons, the war will not be brought to a close until the Federal Government is completely broken down; the powers that be have not sense enough to bring hostilities to a close. The moral effect of the recognition of the Confederate States by the leading nations of Europe, would be more effectual than even armed intervention. The people of the North are anxious for it, and such intelligence would be hailed with delight. The Democrats will no doubt carry this State by a large majority. The Contractor, Governor Curtin, of Pennsylvania, has, unfortunately for the country, another year to serve.

NEW YORK, September 13.

The Confederate invasion of Maryland is still an enigma to the North, and although it is reported that the Southerners have penetrated as far as Hagerstown—close to the peninsula line—we know scarcely a word respecting their numbers, or anything concerning their intentions.

If we are to credit some of the authorities "fresh from the invaded territory," the rebels are only in small force, and are merely engaged in purchasing provisions, &c., and forwarding them across to Virginia for the use of their main army there. Others, however, also "late from the scene of invasion," represent the rebels in strong force—say 150,000—and amply provided with artillery and all the necessaries for a long and vigorous campaign. Which of these two vastly conflicting statements to believe we do not know, and even McClellan, who has now been an entire week hunting up and "following" the rebels (so say the accounts) has failed to enlighten the Government, or, if he has, the Government has failed to enlighten the people. All we know outside of official reports is, that as he advances he finds no enemy, and that he yesterday even occupied the town of Frederick (one of the first Confederate points of invasion) without any opposition whatever. The rebels had gone, but whither, no one appeared to know, though, through other sources, they are said to have arrived at Hagerstown, and were preparing for an immediate march into Pennsylvania.

It may be that this is so, and that the army is a strong one, but intelligence reached Washington yesterday that the bulk of the Confederate army was not in Maryland, but still at Leesburg, under General Lee, and that the dash into Maryland is a mere feint to draw McClellan from Arlington, and then march by that route upon Washington.

The Pennsylvanians, however, are acting as if their State was already shaking beneath the tread of hostile feet, and an army of probably not less than 100,000 has suddenly been improvised to meet the expected debut of the enemy. "No more troops shall be sent to Washington," says the Governor of Pennsylvania, "for we need them all at home." Indeed, the Governor has been forced to call upon the General Government for a strong force of well-drilled troops to protect the State.

Since the occupation of Maryland the Confederates are said to have received considerable additions to their army; but, I repeat, we actually know nothing concerning the number of that army or its plan of operations; their movements are a sealed book to the North, and not even the Administration, or any of its "sharp" generals, have yet been able to open it. This suspense, however, cannot continue much longer, for the game that is being played is too momentous to admit of an hour's delay on either side.

In my last I alluded to a great change that was coming over the Northern public with regard to the present conduct of the war. That change is rapidly spreading, and bids fair to result in the entire overthrow of the Lincoln Administration! Journals and editors heretofore its warmest supporters now condemn its ruinous and fanatical course without stint, and demand that there shall be a change.

The bankruptcy and headlong ruin that is staring every one in the face has become altogether insupportable, and the people want no more shuffling and imbecility in the head of affairs at Washington. It is even publicly hinted that there are many ready to shake hands with General Lee, the leader of the Confederate army, if he will guarantee a return of peace, and a restoration of the Union as it was.

The New York Times, in speaking of this great change in public sentiment, says the people see no strength in the Government, they doubt the capacity of the Administration to carry the country safely and victoriously through the crisis; they see no adequate preparation to meet it; indeed, the Government is growing weaker day by day, and the people actually look upon it as falling to pieces, and offering itself a prey to the first strong hand that may venture to seize it! What do you think of such language from a journal that has heretofore vigorously supported the Administration? Are not things working?

As matters look now, the Democrats will sweep the state at the next (November) election, and then look out for squalls. The party is arousing from its two years of silence like a lion from its lair, and when it again moves forth it will seize the reins and crush all before it. What has surprised me is, that the fanatics and demagogues have been so long permitted to hold sway and bring the nation to the verge of ruin; but at last the star of hope appears.

Our advices from New Orleans are more discouraging than ever. While the whites have been compelled to surrender their private arms, the slaves have been allowed to retain theirs, and the whole proceeding would seem to be no less than an invitation to the slaves to rise and murder their unarmed masters. I can scarcely bring myself to believe this; but if such really is the infamous project, it will assuredly fail.

One of the very first delights of the rabid Abolitionists when this accursed war commenced arose from the belief that the slaves would rise en masse, and slaughter their masters without mercy. In not a solitary instance, however, has such a scene been witnessed, nor has there been the slightest disposition on the part of the slaves even to leave their masters, except in cases where the invader has appeared, and the master has fled, leaving slaves and all other property behind; and even in these instances many of the slaves are known to have remained and protected the interests of their masters to the best of their ability. I have no fears, therefore, of a rising of the slaves in New Orleans, even though they be armed, and their masters defenceless. That fiendish expectation will fail, as have all the other anticipations of the Radicals regarding slavery since the war commenced.

But there is a dark cloud that hangs over the people of New Orleans, and that is the Confiscation Act passed by the last Federal Congress. This Act is to go into effect on the 24th of the present month, and it is asserted that General Butler will enforce it against every man and woman who has not taken the Lincoln oath. In preparation of this enforcement, he has ordered returns to be made immediately of all who have taken the oath; and upon those who have not the Confiscation Act will fall, and all they possess in this world will be ruthlessly swept away.

To avoid the blow is scarcely possible for any who have not subscribed to the hated oath, and there are thousands and tens of thousands who have not, and who will not; they will not thus violate the oath they have already taken to their own Government, and to support which they have suffered so much, and sooner than perjure themselves they will stand boldly forth in the panoply of a clear conscience and a conscious feeling of right, and abide the result.

"Aid, abet, or countenance," are the words of the atrocious Act, and there is scarcely a resident in the whole city but who would be found guilty of one, if not all, of these specifications. If they do not openly "aid" and "abet" the rebellion, they assuredly cannot, and probably will not, deny that they "countenance" it; for the very fact that they refuse to take the Lincoln oath, shows that the Confederacy their leaders are endeavouring to establish has, at least, their moral support, and therefore, their "countenance"; and in this they are just as guilty, according to the tyrannical law, as though they openly aided the rebellion by their money or their influence. I have reason to know that quite a number have disposed of their property (such as real estate) to foreign friends or reliable parties abroad, and they themselves left the city. These will most likely escape the infliction of the law, but where one has done this fifty have not, and hence the dark picture that stares so many of the noble, patriotic, and perfectly innocent residents of the Crescent City in the face. There is not a heart of flesh but what must bleed for them, and cherish the hope, faint though it be, that the bitter cup may pass away.

While speaking of New Orleans, I must mention another gross outrage perpetrated only a fortnight since upon the ladies of that city, or the "women," as the invaders habitually call them. The Delta, the organ of General Butler, in alluding to these ladies, spoke of them as having "fine eyes," which they obtained not from the pure blood of the white race, but "from their negro ancestors, more or less remote!" It is hard to conceive a more wanton or devilish insult; there was not the slightest provocation for it (as in the case of "Order 28"), but it was a cool, premeditated, malicious, public insult, heaped upon a body of ladies whose character and standing will be the theme of praise when their present vile defamers are buried and forgotten. Let them pass.

Cotton holds firm at 58 cents per middling. It is King of Commerce yet, and its might is being most painfully felt all over the world.

PARIS, October 1.

When a man in authority speaks but little, and after long intervals of silence, it is natural that he should attract to his words the serious consideration of all those who are in any way to be affected by his opinions and decisions. More especially is this the case when upon his decisions depend the civil and religious conditions of those who await with lingering anxiety the words that are either to fulfil or to blast their hopes.

Napoleon III. has spoken but seldom; but his words have been of greater significance to every people of Europe than those which have issued from the mouth of any other absolute ruler. This, not alone from the vast power that he wields, but from the fact that he never gives forth his views in an official manner without having decided to uphold them, if need be, by a vigorous exercise of that power.

The Emperor has at length spoken out on the Roman question—a question which has for so many months been battled about between the people, the priests, and the diplomatists of Europe. And what has the oracle said? Aye, that now is the question, which takes its turn in the minds of peoples, priests, and governments. Here, in France, we are as much excited in weighing this question as we were, ere it came before us, by wonder and perplexity as to whether or no the oracle ever would speak, and thus put an end to the difficulties which beset the position. And now that the Emperor has deigned to let us know what has been done by him to settle the Roman imbroglio, the press of France finds abundant food for their readers in endeavouring to extract from his words what he means to do in the future, should the Pope still continue in his obstinate declaration of "non possumus."

In commentaries upon the Emperor's text, the whole press of France, religious and political, are eagerly engaged. And if the people were doubtful as to its meaning, they have assuredly become no wiser through those commentaries; for it may be affirmed that no two of them agree, and, like most commentators, they place the subject in the very fog from which they pretend to extricate it.

The difficulty seems to lie more in the party view which each writer wishes to take of it, to forward his own purposes. Thus, the Legitimist, the Imperialist, the Protestant, the Catholic, and the Red Republican, each in his turn, indites whole essays, at once laborious, earnest, and incomprehensible, in the hope of extracting ingredients which are to form capital for the uses of his party. To the impartial reader the text seems clear enough. It is only when it is looked upon with a mind possessed of the opinion that the Emperor always writes with a view to veil his real designs, that obscurity comes over the subject.

The Emperor tells us, in very distinct language, what have been his efforts to reconcile the Pope to the state of things which surround him, and by so doing, avert from the Church the perils which must result to it from the attempt to hold the political convictions of men in subjection to a form of religious faith; that if the Church would retain the affections of two hundred millions of believers, add new lustre to its history, and become more powerful for good, it must reconcile itself with the Italian people, and with those modern ideas of government which are essential to human progress and happiness. Surely here is something politically profound and remarkable, as coming from the most powerful Sovereign of a Catholic country.

The Emperor, more generous than most of his counsellors, promises to the Pope the aid of his own powerful arm, should it be found necessary, to carry out the views he expresses regarding the independence of the Pontiff, and what territory still remains under his control. After offering such counsel and assistance, the Emperor promises that in case the Holy Father adopts the means indicated, by which the peace of Italy and his own spiritual sovereignty are to be secured, he will undertake to obtain the participation of the other great Powers, in a guarantee of security against any future disturbance of the seat of the Church; and more even than this, engages to contribute from his own exchequer 3,000,000 francs annually towards the splendour of the Pontifical throne, and the works of charity with which it is charged.

Now, however men may differ as to the propriety or justice of these counsels, they can scarcely charge with vagueness the words through which they are conveyed to the reader. And can any one conscientiously say that the Emperor's advice is not sound, and likely to promote the happiness of the Italian people by securing the independence of their Government? Is it not within the bounds of possibility that the refusal on the part of the Pope to accept and act up to the wishes of Napoleon, will eventuate in the withdrawal of his troops from Rome, and leaving the Holy Father to the mercies of the party of action? Where then will be the Holy Pontiff and his "non possumus?" Where, indeed, the liberties of the Italian people? Could the first sustain himself against the Red Republicans, or the latter against the Austrians? And should another war be the result, can the people of Italy count a second time upon the mighty army of Napoleon to bring them independence? Would not the Emperor find his own people divided upon the question to such a degree as to induce him to elect to pursue a course of masterly non-intervention towards the belligerents? Under all the difficulties surrounding this great question, is there any one, however opposed to the policy of Napoleon, that can propose a clearer and more acceptable course by which it can be happily solved? Garibaldi has attempted to solve it by a stroke of his sword, and how sad a business he has made of it. It is not for men of hot heads to settle so mighty a problem; and if Victor Emmanuel and Louis Napoleon cannot bring about a peaceable conclusion to the contentions of the political and religious strife which rends the Italian Peninsula, it is not for lesser minds and weaker hands to presume upon certain success to their own ill-considered projects.

It is rumoured that a despatch from Turin received here affirms the important fact of a decree of amnesty to Garibaldi and his companions having been signed that day by Victor Emmanuel. But to-day's despatches from Turin neither confirm nor deny this statement; but a general hope is expressed that it may be true. It is asserted in letters from Turin that the amnesty was owing, in a great measure, to the good offices of Prince Napoleon, Princess Clotilde, and her sister the Queen of Portugal.

Mazzini is still busy issuing manifestoes to the Italian people. A late one announces his complete rupture with the Government of Victor Emmanuel because of the affair at Aspromonte.

(From an occasional Correspondent).

HAVANA, September 5.

Why do European Powers delay in their recognition of the independence of the Southern Confederacy? This question is asked every hour of the day in the streets of this city, and no man will venture a reason why such powerful states as England, France, Russia, or Spain, hesitate to proclaim a plain truth, known now to all the world—that for eighteen months the young Republic has sustained a separate, dignified, and independent Government, growing stronger each day in all the material national resources, while her invaders have become weaker. A few months since, Mr. Lincoln's Secretary-at-War reported, officially, that he had SEVEN HUNDRED AND FIFTY THOUSAND men in the field, and prepared a chart, on which he gave the position of 720,000 of this force, with which he affirmed he would immediately crush out the rebellion. It was natural that such a grand, imposing army should startle all Europe, and that even the most powerful and interested States should pause to witness the mighty struggle or the speedy subjugation of a proud people madly overrating their strength. The hour of trial came, and the God of Battles gave almost superhuman strength to the arm of the defenders; the Northern legions were driven back, their armies beaten, dispersed, or annihilated, and a shout for reinforcements is uttered by every Northern commander. The Southern capital is secure; there is no excuse for delay; and the principles of divine and international law prompt immediate intervention; precedent upon precedent for both recognition and intervention may be found in the history of almost every European state. A majority of the Northern people would hail the voice of the "peacemaker." They have seen their armies destroyed and their treasure melt away in a hopeless, fruitless contest, and they are heart-sick at the thought of more blood. Now, this is a propitious moment for intervention.

It took McClellan twelve months to organize his great army for the capture of Richmond, and if it takes a new general half that time to organize this new army, now being recruited, Mr. Lincoln will find himself crushed by a debt of $200,000,000; while the Southern Government, have captured from their enemy in the late campaigns nearly all the arms and munitions of war she requires, and owe only, agreeable to the New York Tribune of August 28, as follows: $45,000,000 to her soldiers (not true); $50,000,000 to banks; $65,000,000 property seized (not true); $45,000,000 State aid, to be reimbursed; $100,000,000 Treasury notes; $65,000,000 war loan;—total, Tribune's statement, $370,000,000; actual debt, $255,000,000; with donations of cotton stored in the interior, at appreciated prices, sufficient to pay a large portion of the debt in ninety days after her ports are open to general commerce.

Who is to command Mr. Lincoln's new army when he gets it? Mr. Lincoln's generals have, by the aid of newspaper-puffs, flashed up, and gone out like meteors, and he has now no one he can call to the command who could inspire confidence or ardour amongst his troops; he is engaged in a hopeless contest; and each Northern failure seems to excite their defeated generals to acts of brutality unknown to civilized warfare. Retaliatory measures will be resorted to by the South, and, unless Europe speaks peace, the blood and carnage of the next campaign will appal the world. I repeat, humanity, interest, and the laws of God and of nations call aloud upon all Christian states to put a stop to this horrible war.

September 5.

The Confederate gunboat Florida, mounting eight large rifled guns, commanded by Captain J. N. Moffitt, reached Cardinas on the 18th ultimo, where she remained, making some repairs, until the night of the 31st, and sailed for this port, and arrived on the morning of the 1st instant, and sailed again the same evening. She was supplied at Cardinas with coal, and here with such stores as she required—the Captain-General ordered that every attention be extended to her, that would be extended to other national vessels, and that she be permitted to remain in this port at the pleasure of her captain, and return as often as convenient. She is a fine vessel, and will, no doubt, do good service for the Confederacy.

A smack, just in from Key West, reports that the Florida has sunk the Federal gunboat Santiago de Cuba, and disabled the Cayler. Also that General Breckinridge is threatening New Orleans, at which place the yellow fever is said to be raging.

THE LONDON PRESS ON THE EVACUATION OF MARYLAND.

(From the Standard, Oct. 1.)

The invasion of Maryland is an episode in the American war creditable to the skill and energy of both the contending parties. That the Confederates should have attempted an in-road upon what is for the present naturally Northern territory, so many miles distant from their real basis of operations—the country around Richmond—leaving their capital comparatively defenceless, is an extraordinary proof of the reliance of both leaders and men on their ability and prowess. That McClellan should have been enabled within so short a time to reorganize battalions and brigades that had been decimated by hardship and disease, and beaten in half a dozen great battles, and to lead them, not only undaunted, but confident, against the enemy that had so often defeated them, is evidence of a courage and patriotic spirit that do honour to the people of the United States. The misfortune is, that all this gallantry, all this sacrifice of life, all this devotion to an idea on the one side, and a great principle on the other, brings us no nearer to the termination of a war from which humanity is suffering. Practically the retirement of the Confederates from Maryland leaves matters as they were. The North, after having sustained great disasters, is as strongly bent as ever upon the prosecution of the conflict to the bitter end. The South, after enduring unheard-of privations, is at every point hurrying back the invader, and preparing for the resumption of the struggle, with resources more ample, with strength more developed, with confidence more undisturbed, than at any former period in the history of the war.

The latest news from Maryland will receive diverse interpretation from the friends of North and South. But the balance of advantage, in our opinion, is on the Confederate side. We have from the first endeavoured to combat the notion which prevailed very generally in this country, that General Lee, in his advance across the Potomac, contemplated any real invasion of the North. His object, so far as we can offer an opinion upon it, was to convince the Marylanders of Southern sympathy and power; to show the Northern States what his army could do; to favour, possibly, the passing of a secession ordinance; to obtain for his troops those supplies, which Virginia, impoverished by the presence on her soil of some 350,000 soldiers for a period of six months, could not furnish. It was well known that Western Maryland abounded in forage and stores of all kinds serviceable to an army. The rapid advance of the Confederates cut off Western Maryland from the North, and day after day, as the Confederates moved on, great trains of waggons, laden with all sorts of necessities for an army in the field, warlike stores and provisions, were filled and driven off across the Potomac. Maryland was to the shoeless and tattered soldiers who marched with "Stonewall" Jackson a veritable land of promise, whilst to the whole South the appearance of a Southern army north of the Potomac was an assurance of triumph which could not fail to console her people for the sacrifices and privations they had undergone. Another advantage was that the movement threw into the hands of the Confederates all the depots of arms and ammunition which the North had been accumulating at the various military stations in north-western Virginia, and amongst them the strong position of Harper's Ferry, with its garrison of 12,000 men, and its vast military stores. All these considerations justify the present movement of General Lee, and account for it. And those who look upon it as executed for these objects, and not for an impracticable scheme of conquest, will find in the operations that it has developed, abundant proofs of its expediency and of its success.

It is now beyond a doubt that the Confederate army in Maryland commenced its retreat as soon as it learnt that McClellan was advancing from Washington in force, and that in the engagements which preceded the great battle of the 17th, the Federals had only to do with General Lee's rearguard. But on that day it would appear that a strong Confederate force had been marched to join the division which had given battle on the 14th at Turner's Gap, on the Hagerstown Road, either reinforcements from Martinsburg, hurried across the Potomac at Shepherdstown, or Jackson's division, which had just captured the Federal garrison at Harper's Ferry. On the 17th, then, the Confederates turned to bay, but whether they were the assailants or not we are not yet informed. On the 16th Longstreet's army was reported to be in a critical position. An action was said to have taken place on the banks of the Antistam Creek, a few miles from Sharpsburg, in which the Confederates had the worst of it. But it was reported in Washington that the action of the 17th took place some seven or eight miles north-east of Sharpsburg, at Centreville, on the direct road to Washington. This may be accounted for by the fact that Jackson, marching from Harper's Ferry, got on the left flank of the Federals, or that the Federals, finding the Confederates in great numbers, retired some miles to take up a stronger defensive position. The contest was maintained from dawn till night with equal obstinacy and courage on either side, and with a carnage unprecedented in any previous engagement. As the Federals admit a loss of from 6000 to 10,000 men, we can hardly place it at less than 15,000; of the Confederate losses we have no data whatever for giving an estimate, but in a battle raging from sunrise to nightfall, they must have been terrible. The casualties amongst the Federal officers are "so large as to be unaccountable." No less than thirteen general officers are among the wounded. Such a list is only to be accounted for by the fact that the contest was exceedingly severe, and that unusual exertions and sacrifices were demanded from the Federal officers, and in itself goes far to negative Northern claims to a victory. But the most conclusive witness against the Federals is McClellan. The action took place on Wednesday. But it was only on Thursday night that the Confederates abandoned their position, and on Friday morning the Federal commander cannot say whether they are crossing the river in retreat or preparing for another battle. He is evidently in great perplexity on the Friday morning. Sad indeed the welcome news arrives that the Confederates are retreating, and up goes the hat—"Our victory is complete." The enemy is driven into Virginia." It turns out that the enemy is retiring comparatively without molestation across the Potomac, carrying with him artillery, supplies, and even his wounded, and that the sole effect of which the Federal army is capable after the twelve hours' fight is to pursue with two batteries and two regiments of infantry. All the reports about the capture of Longstreet and his division are false, all the delusions of captured Georgian brigades have vanished. The Confederate army has gone off leisurely, and at its own time, and we have very little doubt but that when the true accounts of the battle of the 17th reach us, another Federal defeat will be recorded.

(From the Morning Herald, Oct. 1.)

Assuming the offensive in Maryland was a necessity of the position of the Confederates, McClellan, defeated, was in retreat from the peninsula; and Pope, defeated, was in retreat from the Rapidan. An advance was therefore incumbent, unless we are to suppose good generalship required the Confederates to rest on their laurels until again attacked by the "Lincoln hordes." General Lee, besides, by pushing across the Potomac, might reasonably hope to gain the formal admission of secession Maryland. He might also count on obtaining large supplies, and reasonably hope to alarm the North; and under the circumstances, he was not likely to suffer great loss. From Point of Rocks to Frederick, through Sharpsburg to Boonesboro', and from Williamsport to Eagers-town, the country is hilly and difficult, so that in the contingency of a reverse the Confederate troops might fall back at leisure on the many fords of the Upper Potomac, disputing every mile of ground with the bayonet. Once across the fords of the Upper Potomac the passage of the pursuing Federals might be delayed, if not stopped; and, as a matter of course, in the Shenandoah the Federals would in turn experience all the drawbacks incident to an invading force. Then finally, but for the unexpected and unprecedented rising of the Potomac, General Lee would have had in his power to take advantage of the ungaurded state of Washington by transporting what may yet appear to be the main body of the Confederate army across the Lower Potomac from Aquia and the adjacent creeks. Perhaps he has since done so, and if he has the tide of war may be soon once more changed. The map of Maryland has only to be consulted to perceive that if, after the crossing of the Upper Potomac by the Confederates, General McClellan and the Federal forces are drawn northwards, another crossing of the river at Aquia, by the Confederates would be something more than embarrassing to McClellan and the Lincoln Cabinet.

The Confederates, as we say, put themselves apparently in a position of extreme danger when they crossed the Potomac into Maryland. But they not only saw the necessity of providing themselves with a proper base of operations, they proceeded at once to secure it, in the most skillful manner and with complete success. From Harper's Ferry, on the Potomac, to the Pennsylvania frontier, a distance of about twenty-five miles, the chain of the Alleghany Mountains runs nearly due north, cutting off from the rest of the state a narrow and irregular corner of Western Maryland. Not far from the river, at Point of Rocks, and some miles eastward of these mountains, is the town of Frederick, where the Confederate army first halted. Hagerstown, on the mountains near the Pennsylvania frontier, is a short day's march from this place. Now, it is clear that if Lee had waited at Frederick to receive the onset of McClellan he would have been in a most unfavourable position. If worsted, his army would have been driven back on the river and on the Federal position of Harper's Ferry. The idea seems also to have occurred to him, that by moving northward he might draw away after him the whole army of McClellan, diverting the attention of the enemy from Harper's Ferry. This ingenious ruse succeeded to admiration. Lee waited for the Federal army at Hagerstown. It came after him pell-mell, and fought with him all day on September 14. The Federal army seems to have approached from the east and north-east and to have made no attempt to cut off the retreat of the Confederates southward. This was a fatal error. While the Northerners were achieving the prodigies of valour which so surprised their commander and themselves, while Hooker and Reno were "carrying the heights of Hagerstown by storm," and utterly demolishing the enemy, as they thought—at that very time, Jackson, who had been detached by Lee for the purpose, fell like a thunderbolt upon the station at Harper's Ferry, took prisoners the Federal garrison of 6,000 men, and established communications with the Valley of the Shenandoah!

To be more particular about the battle at Hagerstown on the 14th—of which we have so meagre an account—it appears that General McClellan's notion of a "glorious victory" is a somewhat strange one. At nightfall he did not know whether the enemy would retreat or advance in force in the morning. The next day he reports that they disappeared during the night, that they were making for the river in a panic, that their rout and demoralization were complete. General McClellan has a character for veracity, but that all this was either singular romancing or a singular delusion is apparent from the fact that this "routed and demoralized army" was met with on the 16th near Sharpsburg, but a few miles from its original position. General Lee had retreated to the south-west to effect a junction with Jackson, who had crossed the Potomac again after his recent exploit. A battle, described as very severe, took place on the 16th at Sharpsburg. It was apparently indecisive, for on the morning of the 17th it was "renewed by the Confederates with great vigour, lasting till 4 o'clock in the afternoon." The advantage is claimed by the Federals, the Confederates being said to have retreated, and General Longstreet being made prisoner. What kind of an advantage it was, and what kind of retreat, we may guess from the admission which concludes this Northern report—that "another battle was necessary to determine finally who shall be the victor." As this is the language generally used by the Northern correspondents when their army has met with some very signal reverse, we have ample reason for supposing that the Southerners won a victory on September 17.

(From the Times, Oct. 1.)

Military history records operations which, though they occupied only a few days, are reckoned as campaigns, when the results were distinct enough to make them a fresh stage or turning point of the contest. The American conflict has just reached such a point in the termination of what may be called the Campaign of Maryland, to distinguish it from the other operations of the war. It has been an episode of the main action, brief in duration, and not unimportant in itself, though it may not much affect the great current of events of which it was a side eddy. General McClellan brought up his forces with great energy and rapidity. The Confederate army has withdrawn, or retreated, if we do not "miscall retire" by using the word, into its own territory of Virginia, and the military positions of the opposing forces will return to nearly what they were in the last days of August. To the Federal Government the retreat of its enemy is a temporary relief; but it is far from a complete and final rescue from the perils amid which it is drifting. The ship is water-logged; and, though by vigorous working at the pumps a few inches less of water can be reported in the hold, the fatal breach in the hull is not closed. That terrible rent yawns as widely as ever, and appears beyond the carpenter's skill.

The last accounts, to the 22nd, report the result of the engagements that continued from the 14th to the 17th. Down to the 15th the tale was told by General McClellan's despatches, as published by the Government. They left another battle impending, that was to determine which party should hold the State of Maryland, and with it the city of Baltimore; possibly, also, the possession of the State of Pennsylvania hung in the trembling scales of victory. On the evening of the 15th the Federal commander was not certain whether the engagement in which he claimed the advantage had been fought with only a part or the whole of the Confederate force. From the language of this report we believe his own conviction was that he had met only a portion of his opponents. The 16th was "chiefly passed in deploying his forces and gaining positions," preparing, in fact, for the real contest. Most of the descriptions, therefore, of the desperate fighting on the 16th, the routing of troops, the slaughter, and the capture of prisoners by thousands, must be read with a large allowance for the confusion and evident ignorance in which they were written. Painters who have never seen a battlefield always put too much smoke into their picture of one, and those who attempt military narration on hearsay use the epithets of war too lavishly for much the same purpose. A cloud of words conceals the want of exact and technical knowledge. We have no doubt that the official account of the movements of the 16th is correct—that they were merely preparatory. On the 17th the real battle took place. What numbers were engaged on both sides is not stated, but the conflict appears to have been very obstinate. It continued from dawn till dusk, and, as General McClellan estimates the loss on his own side to have been from 6,000 to 10,000 men, the battle must have raged fiercely the whole day. Darkness, we may assume, put an end to the struggle, as the two armies appear to have remained nearly on the ground they occupied. There was no immediate retreat and no pursuit. The loss of life was enough to have been a heavy price for a brilliant victory. Yet we are told the "result was not decisive," though "the superiority of positions remained with the Federals." If so, their army was not in a condition immediately to act on the advantage, for the fierce engagement was followed by a pause. On the 18th little occurred beyond skirmishing, at least, on the Federal side. We infer that the day was employed by the Confederates in making their retreat in good order and unmolested. On the morning of the 18th McClellan perceived that his opponents were moving; but he evidently could not follow them closely enough to ascertain in what direction they were going. He again records his deficiency of information, "I do not know if the enemy is falling back to an interior position, or crossing the river." Again, too, he employs a term which is not one of exaltation, and ominously recalls the similar expression that described his army as "safe" on the banks of the James River,—“We may safely claim the victory for ours.” It is only in a later dispatch, written after he had discovered the direction the Confederates had taken, he ventures to announce the victory as complete, adding, "The enemy is driven back into Virginia; Maryland and Pennsylvania are now safe." Placing an army or a State in that negative condition really seems to be the Federal Commander's idea of a triumph.

All the engagements by which Maryland has been recovered from the Southern invasion have been fought within a comparatively limited space of ground. Of the twenty counties into which the State is divided, the Confederates seem never to have held more than portions of two,—less than half the county of Frederick and a corner of its north-western neighbour, which, to add to the confusion of American topography, bears the same name as the Federal capital, Washington. The road from Frederick City to Hagerstown and the Potomac, running with many curves, but in its general direction parallel to the road, are the limits of the part of Maryland into which the Southern army advanced. It is a strip, about twenty-four miles long and ten miles broad, a very small fraction indeed of the whole territory. But from Harper's Ferry northward are the upper fords of the Potomac, by which the river can be easily crossed at several points. The battle of the 17th was fought near Sharpsburg, and it was by the bridge at Shepherd's town and the fords above and below it that the Confederates recrossed the Potomac into Virginia. The distance of these points from Sharpsburg is only four miles. The army, it is stated, began to pass the river early on the night of the 18th. But if its numbers were as large as they have been described the operation must have required many hours to complete. We have little doubt the Confederates were crossing during the whole day of the 18th, while the skirmishing spoken of was kept up to the rear. The pursuit could not have been closely pressed, as it was only "during the night" that McClellan "advanced a battery, and shelled the Confederates" from the heights on the river. But he saw only the skirts of the retiring enemy. "Stonewall" Jackson, who conducted the retreat, had got the whole army across the Potomac with but slight loss—in the retreat itself, we presume—of men, wagons, or artillery. Of the Confederate loss in the battle of the previous day no estimate is given. The list of casualties on the Federal side includes so many officers of high rank that it has created a feeling of dismay even in the first flush of the success. General Mansfield was killed, and no less than thirteen other officers of the same rank are returned by name as wounded. Indeed, the loss among the Federal Generals and field-officers is so great that the ordinary hazards and chances of the battle field do not account for them, and the public are perplexed by the unusual fatalities that attended the conflict.

The impression derived from the few official statements given is that the battle was very severely contested, that the Federal advantage at the close of the day was not decisive, and that it was not so much the result of the fighting, as the next day's retreat of the enemy, made it a victory that could be "safely claimed." We are inclined to believe that, had it been the policy of the Confederates to have still held their ground in Maryland, they could have done so notwithstanding this battle.

(From the Daily News, Oct. 1.)

Until yesterday evening the last official despatch of McClellan which had arrived was dated the 15th, the day after he forced the mountain passes through which the road between Frederick City and Hagerstown passes. At that battle it is clear that only a part of the Confederate army was engaged. It now appears that the next two days, Monday and Tuesday, the 15th and 16th, were spent in comparative inactivity. The Confederates, who instead of retreating northward to Hagerstown, had retreated westward towards the banks of the Potomac, had need of time. It was necessary to collect their scattered troops. As we observed yesterday, neither Lee nor "Stonewall" Jackson had a suspicion that the Federal army could so soon take the field after having retired to Washington. The promptitude and rapidity of McClellan evidently disconcerted them. And even after McClellan was known to be advancing upon them, they thought that some portion of the Confederate army would be sufficient to check the Federal army. They found out their mistake. They retired towards Sharpsburg, so as to be nearer the rest of their army, and awaited its arrival under Jackson. They took post behind Annetam Creek, but it was not until Wednesday, the 17th, that the great battle was fought. The battle seems to have lasted all that day, and at the end the result was indecisive. The Federals admit a loss of 6,000 to 10,000 men, one general killed, and no fewer than 13 wounded. As yet nothing is known of the details of this engagement, but the few facts connected with it which are known prove that it must have been most severe. One thing certainly is clear, that if the Federals had been as skillfully and as gallantly led in their retreat across the Rapidan and the Rappahannock, neither Lee nor Jackson would ever have succeeded in inflicting upon them the losses which they did inflict. The extraordinary difference between the manner in which the Federal army fought on September 17th under McClellan and during the battles under Pope, is not to be accounted for except in one way. In one case, the army was well commanded, and had confidence in its general; in the other case, it was ill commanded, and had no confidence in its general. The short, but brilliant, campaign in Maryland, against such men as Lee and Jackson, is quite sufficient to retrieve McClellan's military reputation, even though it had been more seriously damaged than it was. The truth probably is, that until now McClellan never was quite his own master, and this his army probably knew full well. His hands were tied, and therefore he was not responsible for the disasters which occurred.

The battle which closed with uncertain results on Wednesday night was not renewed on Thursday morning, the 18th. The combatants seem to have been exhausted. But on Friday, the evening of the 19th, McClellan reported that the enemy had abandoned his position and was crossing the river. Sheppardstown, which lies a mile or two to the west of Sharpsburg, but on the other side of the Potomac, and is about twenty miles directly west of Frederick City, is the place at which the Confederates recrossed from Maryland back into Virginia. At the same time it must be observed, that the retreat does not appear to have been precipitate. They carried with them all their transports and took all their wounded, except 300. Even after the Confederates had crossed they posted some artillery to prevent the Federals crossing immediately, so as to allow their men to retire with deliberation. But, according to the latest accounts, the artillery had been withdrawn, and the Federals had themselves crossed into Virginia. The Confederates took the road to Winchester, which lies in the Shenandoah Valley, some thirty miles to the south-west. In short, the retreat of the Confederates is undoubted. So long as they had a chance of maintaining their position on the north side of the Potomac they did so; even on their first defeat on the 14th at South Mountain, they retired only so far as was necessary to secure a good position and the aid of reinforcements. But having secured these advantages they fought a determined action, and only retreated after deliberating two days. Probably they found that McClellan was receiving fresh reinforcements from Washington, and would renew the attack. If anything further were needed to prove that the Confederates have definitively abandoned Maryland, it would be found in the fact that Harper's Ferry is evacuated. Only three days before the great battle of the 17th Jackson had succeeded in taking Harper's Ferry, and an immense amount of military stores. The possession of this place gave the Confederates the best access into Maryland. But it appears that on Friday, the very same day the Confederates crossed the Potomac at Sheppardstown, they evacuated Harper's Ferry, after destroying all the Government stores and the pontoon bridge, and partly destroying the bridge of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. This proves that the Confederates have no immediate intention of re-crossing into Maryland.

In short, "Maryland and Pennsylvania are now safe." And for this result the Federal Government is entirely indebted to the skill and promptitude of McClellan, and to the courage of the Northern soldiers.

PRISONERS IN NORTHERN GAOLS.

(From the Grenada Appeal, August 14.)

A large number of privateersmen, released from Northern prisons, have arrived in Charleston. The Mercury gives a list of their names, and dates of capture, and states that the accounts obtained from them in regard to the brutal treatment to which they have been constantly subjected during their captivity, realize all that has ever been written of the cowardly and malignant cruelty of the Lincoln Government and its hirelings. Most of the privateersmen were tried and convicted as pirates, and, during the long and terrible term of their confinement in the close, damp, and filthy cells allotted to condemned felons, the cheerful prospect of a halter was frequently held up for their coification. The crew of the Petrel were imprisoned for six months in Moyamensing prison, Philadelphia, five months in Fort Lafayette, and about four weeks in Fort Delaware. A considerable portion of this period was spent by these unfortunate men in double irons! their fare was a very small piece of bread and a still smaller piece of salt pork twice a day, occasionally varied by a little bean soup of about the consistency of water. Nearly two-thirds of the men had scurvy and the itch.

The government allowance for rations purports to be sixteen cents a day for each prisoner; but it was stated in a Philadelphia newspaper that Captain Gibson, by "his excellent management," saved about two-thirds of this sum, and expended it in clothing, which the prisoners never received the benefit of. The Confederate commissioned officers, forty-seven in number, were confined in a room forty feet long, by fifteen in width, the ascent to which was taken away every night. On some days, as the caprice of the commanding officer happened to be, the officers were permitted to walk for half an hour on the parapet of the fort. The treatment of Colonel Zarvona (the "French Lady") so well known for his daring feat in accomplishing the capture of the steamer St. Nicholas, and other vessels on the Potomac, is described to have been most villainous and inhuman. He is still languishing in a cell, so narrow as to give him no opportunity to lie down, and into which the light of heaven never penetrates, except through a small arched hole in one of the boards with which his cell window has been planked up. And yet this gallant man is a regularly commissioned officer of the Confederate States! The general determination of the ex-changed prisoners is to be shot before they will again be taken and undergo the miseries of a Northern prison.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any rate, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HORTZ, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. Advertisements to be forwarded to the publisher at 102, Fleet-street.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 2, 1862.

The Operations in Maryland.

AFTER the series of battles which resulted in the Federal armies withdrawing to the fortifications of Washington, it was generally expected in the North that the Confederates would either enter Maryland, or despatch a considerable force to Kentucky. It was rightly conjectured that the victorious army would not remain inactive and, accordingly, General "Stonewall" Jackson, at the head of a corps, variously estimated at from 20,000 to 40,000 men, crossed the Potomac at a place called the Point of Rocks, and passed on to Frederick City, where he was welcomed by a friendly population. His advance was followed by other divisions of the Confederate troops, but we have no information that leads us to suppose the main body of the army crossed the Potomac. All accounts agree that on the 13th of September General Lee was at Leesburg in great force. It may be as well to observe, that from the first entrance of the Confederates into Maryland, until the enemy came up to them, they were engaged in purchasing and transporting to Virginia large stores of provisions, forage, and clothing.

On September 11, General McClellan set out from Washington at the head of an army composed of the late armies of Virginia, and some of the new levies. A force under General Banks was left for the defence of the capital. On the same day General Jackson left Frederick City with a portion of the troops that had been there concentrated. He marched in the direction of Hagerstown, and it was reported that he had occupied that point, and that his advance guard had entered Pennsylvania. It is probable that the Confederate commander made a feint of going northward to cover his real movements, to which we will immediately revert.

Meantime General McClellan, who had rapidly reorganized his army, arrived at Frederick City on the 13th, and finding the enemy had departed continued his march, and next day came up with the Confederates, and fought the battle of South Mountain. Of the numbers engaged we have no estimates, but the Confederate force consisted of the corps of Generals Longstreet, D. H. Hill, and A. P. Hill. McClellan claimed a victory, and reported that the Confederates were fleeing in disorder to the Potomac, and that they were completely disorganized. This turned out to be a mistake, for the battle of South Mountain and the fighting of the next three days occurred within a distance of about ten miles. McClellan, from the wording of his despatches, seems to have been led into this error by the report of General Hooker.

The accounts of the 15th and 16th are indefinite. On both these days we are told there were severe engagements in the neighbourhood of Sharpsburg; but these encounters were probably more in the nature of severe skirmishes than regular battles. We may assume that the Federals were the assailants, for it is manifest that the Confederates, knowing that they would shortly be reinforced by General Jackson's troops, would not in the interim attack the Federal army. When we are in possession of the details of these affairs we shall probably find that the Southern force was not only too small to attempt driving McClellan back, but that it was only enabled to resist the pressure of the Federals by reason of operating in the hilly country, which is always a strength to a small force acting on the defensive.

It is now necessary to return to General Jackson. On the 11th he moved from Frederick City in the direction of Hagerstown, but he did not go to that place. On the night of the 11th he arrived at Williams Point, the next morning crossed the Potomac into Virginia, with 15,000 men, and the same day appeared before Harper's Ferry with 40,000 men, according to the Northern report. We think there is no doubt he was reinforced as soon as he entered Virginia from that position, and we suppose the main body of the army had not entered Maryland. We now perceive why the Confederates, during the 14th, 15th, and 16th, so obstinately resisted the advance of McClellan. Harper's Ferry was strongly fortified and garrisoned with 12,000 or 15,000 troops, and was not therefore likely to fall at the first assault. It was not, then, sufficient that Jackson should surround that place, whilst the Federal armies were elsewhere engaged; but to ensure success it was necessary that for two or three days the beleaguered garrison should not be assisted by the co-operation of any part of McClellan's army. Jackson lost no time, but commenced shelling Harper's Ferry on the afternoon of the 12th, but finding his artillery made little impression, on Saturday he ordered an assault, and drove the enemy from some of his positions. On Sunday, the 14th, the assault was renewed. The Confederate troops dashed on to the enemy's batteries, captured them, spiked the guns, and drove the Federals to the mountain. This charge was decisive. On Monday, at early dawn, Jackson commenced the attack with his artillery, which was speedily replied to by the enemy, and at 9 o'clock the Federal commander hoisted a white flag, and surrendered with the whole of the garrison excepting a body of cavalry, who escaped on Sunday night to Greencastle. Jackson immediately paroled the prisoners, with the exception of the officers. Harper's Ferry was a Federal depot for warlike stores, and the booty captured is admitted to have been immense. It is impossible to exaggerate the importance to the North of these constantly occurring losses of arms and ammunition. Having accomplished this work, General Jackson crossed the Potomac with his forces, and on the evening of the 16th joined that portion of the army that had for three days been fighting with McClellan. On the same evening the Federal army had also been reinforced.

On the 17th a battle took place, which lasted from the dawn of morning until night put an end to the combat. The carnage appears to have been terrible. The Federals had confessed to a loss of 10,000 men, and judging from the casualties among their officers, this high figure does not fully represent the actual number of killed and wounded. Federal General Mansfield was killed, and thirteen Federal generals wounded. This fact testifies to the fierceness of the conflict, and it also proves that we are right in saying that General McClellan brought into that engagement an army numerically formidable.

What was the result of this sanguinary conflict? to which side did victory incline? On Friday morning, thirty-six hours after the termination of the battle, General McClellan, who had been expecting a renewal of hostilities on the Thursday, but on which day there had only been skirmishing, was in a state of uncertainty as to what advantage he had gained, or in what direction his enemy had removed. He was evidently too much exhausted to follow up the battle by a renewed attack, a pursuit, or even to send out a reconnaissance to watch the proceedings of the Confederates. So, on the Friday morning, in his official despatch, he says, "We may safely claim the victory as ours;" a few hours later he hears that the Confederates have crossed the Potomac, and hence he exultingly writes, "Our victory was complete; the enemy is driven back into Virginia." So far from being driven back, the Confederates recrossed the Potomac without molestation, with all their stores, ammunition, and wounded, with the exception of 300. So ended what has been called, for the want of a better and more accurate name, the campaign in Maryland.

If by the advance into Maryland the Confederates intended to make that State the basis of their operations for an invasion of Northern territory, then the North has a right to consider the withdrawal into Virginia as a triumph; but, as we have emphatically stated on a previous occasion, a Northern invasion was not contemplated. A review of the Confederate movements shows, we submit, that the occupation of Maryland was not intended upon this occasion to be permanent; only a portion of the Confederate army went into that State, and even that portion was divided by the withdrawal of General Jackson to operate against Harper's Ferry, leaving only a force sufficient to defend itself against the advance of McClellan's army. What advantage, then, has the South derived from this expedition. In the first place, the Confederates have obtained those supplies of which Virginia, after so long being the theatre of war, was comparatively denuded. The capture of Harper's Ferry, with its stores of arms and ammunition, is likewise a very considerable gain. We must also remember that there is no pretence for the Federal commander saying that Maryland is safe, because that State can be re-entered by the Confederate forces. It is possible, too, that we may be discussing only a part of the Confederate plan. Whilst the Federal army was fighting in Maryland, Jackson was assailing Harper's Ferry, and it is possible, whilst McClellan has been drawn so far north as Boonesboro' and Hagerstown, the main body of the Confederate army may have re-entered Maryland at another point, or even be threatening Washington.

Supposing, however, that the expedition into Maryland has no other object beyond those achieved and known, what, we ask, is the position of McClellan? What is to be his next movement? Can he remain in Maryland, and keep his large army in a state of costly and demoralizing inactivity? Will he follow the Confederates into Virginia, to that ominous Shenandoah Valley? If he does so, where will be the scene of his operations, or how will Washington be protected? As we have seen, all the material advantages of the Maryland expedition have resulted to the South, and unless we have much misconceived the strategy of the war, the present return to Virginia, so far from weakening the position of the South, has so placed McClellan that he cannot advance, except at great hazard, and yet it is ruinous for him to remain where he is, and if he retires upon Washington he leaves Maryland open to another Confederate expedition; and the fearful expenditure of blood and treasure, during the four days' fighting, has been in vain. In making these observations, we do not wish to detract from the merits of Gen. McClellan; he has manifested skill and energy in the rapid organization of his army, and great resolution in following up his enemy. Our object in this article has not been so much to criticise the Maryland battles, but rather to examine the strategy of the whole movement, and its absolute and probable results.

There is a somewhat curious coincidence, unless we suppose it to be a preconcerted plan, that on September 14, three important military events were occurring in three several States. In Maryland, was being fought the battle of South Mountain. In Virginia, Jackson was making the assault on Harper's Ferry, which eventuated in its surrender the next day. In Kentucky, the Confederates commenced the attack upon Mumfordsville, which resulted in the surrender of that important position.

The South and the African Slave Trade.

AMONG the many baseless allegations against the South, none is more frequently and more effectively used by its enemies than that the Confederate States, if permitted to enjoy an independent national existence, will avail themselves of the first safe opportunity to reopen the African slave trade. It requires no deep study of the motives which actuate individual and national action in all countries alike, to demonstrate the palpable absurdity of this charge, even without reference to the practical refutation of it which the fundamental law of the young Confederacy affords.

The South, it is asserted, is controlled by an oligarchy of slaveholders. We grant the assertion in the sense, not that the slaveholding interest is an oligarchy, but that the holders of slaves form so large a portion of the Southern population, and their interest, through the ramifications of family and business connections, is so closely identified with that of the great majority of the non-slaveholders, as to make it true that they control the policy of the whole country. This fact, then, being admitted by all parties, the friends as well as the enemies of the South, it should be evident to the most careless investigator that the African slave trade can never be reopened without an utter subversion of the ruling elements of Southern society. The immediate and permanent effect of the reopening of that trade would be to depreciate immensely the value of the slaves already in the country, and—as the value of that species of property serves as the standard of all other values, as it is the security upon which moneys are borrowed and lent, and nearly all financial transactions based—to overwhelm in one universal ruin every man who has anything to lose. So utter and wholesale an overthrow of its old-established foundations of credit was never yet effected by any nation, and certainly never could be with the consent, much less at the instigation, of the property classes. Compared to this, sudden emancipation would be cheap, and, if the well nigh unanimous language of the Southern press be any criterion, it would be readily preferred, were the alternative ever forced upon the proprietors of slaves.

The exclusion of Africans gives a monopoly to the slaveowner, and, since exotic labour is the only one practically available for the cotton field, a monopoly also of the production of this great staple. With a foreign supply of slaves, not only would the ostensible value of his property be seriously impaired, but the proceeds of his plantation would be lessened, for the production of cotton is limited only by the amount of available labour, a very small, not quite one-twentieth, part of the cotton lands of the South being under cotton cultivation. Thus the most powerful and obvious considerations of self-interest commit the property classes to implacable hostility against the African slave trade. Any argument in favour of its reopening can only be addressed to the poorest classes of the population, who, having no moral objection to slavery itself, might be tempted by a share of the profits from which they are now excluded by the high price of slaves. To them the demagogue might say—"Look at the fortunes which were founded when slaves were cheap; you and your children will have the same opportunities if you break down the monopoly which now keeps you poor." But such a man could not live politically one day under the tempest of public opinion that would be raised against him. There is not at this moment a single man holding an office of power or trust under the Confederate States who has ever defiled his skirts with that forbidden thing. During the period of agitation which preceded the revolution, the subject was mooted by a few, a very few, men of isolated views, and one cargo of Africans, the only one since 1808, was actually imported during that period; but the revolution itself would have failed had not the leaders most energetically disclaimed any toleration with the trade. President Davis, then Senator from Mississippi, in one of his ablest public speeches, protested against the African slave trade in the name of his State. Mr. Yancey, accused of secretly favouring it, indignantly denounced what he termed the malignant perversion of his meaning and intentions by unscrupulous enemies. No sooner had the Federal tie been broken, than the monopoly, which the United States' Constitution secured only by implication, was reaffirmed in clearer and more unmistakeable terms. Almost the first act of each State after Secession was to insert in its own Constitution a perpetual and solemn prohibition. It is only necessary, to illustrate this fact, to compare the language of the discarded Federal Constitution with that adopted by the Confederate States on the same subject. The only reference to the African slave trade in the United States' Constitution is as follows:—

SECT. IX.—1. The migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the year 1808; but a tax or duty may be imposed on such importation, not exceeding $10 for each person.

The corresponding section in the Confederate Constitution reads thus:—

SECT. VII.—1. The importation of African negroes from any foreign country other than the slave-holding States of the United States is hereby forbidden; and Congress is required to pass such laws as shall effectually prevent the same.

2. The Congress shall also have power to prohibit the introduction of slaves from any State not a member of this Confederacy.

Let it not be supposed that self-interest suggested the only, or, indeed, the most prominent, argument by which the abortive agitation already referred to, was summarily silenced. Every pulpit, and almost every respectable press, the speeches and letters of public men, resounded with the moral arguments which the subject presented. The horrors of the Middle-Passage were vividly depicted; the sin of man-stealing was contrasted with the right of holding to labour your hereditary servant; the fearful consequence of introducing among the docile and domestic labourers of the plantation untamable savages from Africa, was predicted to be inevitably a renewal of the cruelties which marked the earlier stages of slavery, and which rendered it odious in the sight of mankind. In fact, all that the Emancipationists said years ago was repeated by the Southern press in 1859 and 1860, with this striking difference, however, in the conclusions—that the few advocates of the reopening of the trade were held up to public execration, not as extreme partisans of slavery, but as invidious and dangerous foes to the institution. In vain did they defend themselves by proving that in the certain operation of economic causes slavery must ultimately fall if slave-labour, unlike all other labour and all other merchantable commodities, remained excluded from the law of supply and demand. In vain; though on this point the argument was in their favour, public opinion was too strong against them, and they were silenced for ever.

A close and anxious study of the facts convinces us that the defeated agitators in the South were the most sagacious friends of slavery, and were right in declaring that it must die a certain, though slow death, owing to the impossibility, under the organization of Southern society, of ever placing it under the operation of the law of supply and demand; and that it can die of no other or sudden death. Already before the present war broke out, the price of slaves had risen above their intrinsic value, that is, so high as to make their labour dearer than free labour, and already, then, the period was foreshadowed when a judicious scheme of emancipation might become the cheapest remedy for the anomaly. Every increase in the demand for cotton, or in its value, brings that period nearer. It may startle some of our readers, yet the assertion is not lightly or inconsiderately made, when we add that, on the other hand, had the South been subjugated, had its broad estates been parcelled out among conquering colonists, the new-comers would soon have discovered that their fields were useless without negro labour, and in some form or other, though assuredly not more humane, the reopening of the African slave trade would have become a real and imminent danger.

The Higher Law.

A GOOD deal was said during the years of political and social conflict which preceded the outbreak of the present American war, of a law higher than the Constitution, in obedience to which the extreme section of one party professed to act, and to which the party at large would refer for its justification when hard pressed by constitutional arguments. God forbid that we should deny the existence of such a law, or its paramount obligation on the conscience! But, at the same time, we cannot but hold that more mischief has been done and more demoralization caused by rash and passionate appeals to that law, and by wanton defiance of human laws well-known and ascertained, in obedience to alleged decrees of nature of which each man constitutes himself the sole interpreter, than by any other cause of political evil. We grant that in the name of this law the greatest battles of humanity have been fought, and the greatest triumphs of justice and freedom and religion secured. But we cannot close our eyes to the fact, that in the same name have been committed outrages on justice, and on liberty, and on religion, such as never would have been dared by men avowedly acting under the mere impulses of passion or self-interest; nor can we disguise from ourselves that, as civilization progresses and enlightenment becomes more general—as, in fact, human legislation comes into closer accord with the written law of God, and with that unwritten law of which the maxims are inscribed on the human heart, and of which the precedents are recorded in the lives of saints and of heroes—the presumption against those who violate the laws of their country in obedience to the dictates of their conscience becomes constantly stronger. Always the tendency of men has been to mistake the voice of passion and of prejudice for the voice of God, and to excuse the crimes of ignorance and impatience in the name of the eternal principles of right and equity. It is too easily forgotten that it is always Deep harm to disobey,

Seeing obedience is the bond of rule;

that defiance of law only ceases to be a crime when obedience becomes utterly and clearly wicked; that the first duty of a citizen, and above all of a Christian citizen, is submission to the legitimate authorities of his country; that, though it be true that we were men before we were citizens, yet that, while our obligations as citizens are clear and well defined, those which are binding on us as men are those in regard to which we are most liable to deceive ourselves, and to mislead or do wrong to others. Never does Satan so easily disguise himself as an angel of light as when he approaches us in the character of a preacher of the "Higher Law."

If any tribunal existed to which the decision of cases arising under that law could be referred, there could be no doubt that it must override all other. But as it is, the first decision must be given by each individual conscience; and from that very unsatisfactory authority there lies no appeal but to the God of Battles. An honest and sober-minded man will hesitate long before, even in [the cases which seem clearest to himself, he ventures on that awful appeal; knowing that if he has made it wrongfully, he has incurred a load of guilt from which the worst of ordinary criminals might shrink with horror. And, knowing that this is the sole appeal, all men who are not prepared to make it are bound to abstain from raising questions which, if raised, must one day be decided, and which can be decided in no other manner. Among the Abolitionists of New England there always existed a party which had convinced itself that slavery was a wrong so horrible, so intolerable, that in order to destroy it they would be justified in plunging their country into civil war. To us it seems clear that they were not merely mistaken, but morally wrong; but, at least, it was possible to believe them honest men. They denounced the Constitution as "a league with Death and a covenant with Hell;" and they very properly refused to have anything to do with it. They would not hold office, they would not vote, they would do nothing which bound them to support a law which they abhorred, or which would compel them to swear allegiance to a Government which they pronounced to be founded on the most heinous of crimes against God and man. They may have been fools; they certainly were fanatics; but in the war between North and South these men alone on the Northern side have accepted the ordeal of battle with a clear faith and an honest purpose. As the legal phrase runs, they have come into court with clean hands.

But there was another and a far more numerous section, which held a different and an infinitely less creditable course. They were prepared, perhaps, to be guilty of murder—certainly, to be guilty of perjury—for Abolition's sake; but they were not prepared to be martyrs or even confessors in the cause. They made no sacrifices to it, except the sacrifice of conscience and of character. They might speak of the Union as a covenant with Hell; but of the benefits of that covenant they were careful to secure their share. They hated slavery; but they were willing to get all they could out of a Constitution of which slavery was an integral part; and they swore fidelity to that Constitution with the deliberate and avowed intention of setting it at defiance when it suited their purpose to do so. Such an Abolitionist was Mr. Seward, of New York, now Secretary of State in the Federal Cabinet, who, while a Senator of the United States, publicly proclaimed the existence of an "irrepressible conflict" between slavery and freedom, and gave the sanction of his name and authority to a book which advocated the forcible destruction of slavery, and the confiscation, without the shadow of an indemnity, of $400,000,000 worth of property held for generations under the protection of State and Federal law. Such an Abolitionist was Salmon P. Chase, of Ohio, now Federal Secretary of the Treasury, who presided at a meeting where the following resolution was passed:—"That, as Abolitionists, considering that the strength of our cause lies in its righteousness, and our hopes for it in our conformity to the laws of God, we owe it to the Sovereign Ruler of the Universe, as a proof of our allegiance to Him in all our civil relations and offices, whether as citizens or public functionaries sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, to regard and treat the third clause of that instrument, whenever applied in the case of a fugitive slave, as utterly null and void, and consequently as forming no part of the Constitution of the United States."

Surely plain and open defiance of morality is better than this invocation of the "Higher Law" to sanction the lawlessness of an unscrupulous faction; and even the notorious and avowed atheism of many leading Abolitionists is preferable to this blasphemous justification of perjury as a duty to One who will in no wise hold him guiltless that taketh His name in vain. Well may Abolitionists of this stamp be dissatisfied alike with the politics and the religion of their country, and clamour to earth and heaven for "an anti-slavery Constitution, an anti-slavery Bible, and an anti-slavery God."

We are far from saying that it is the moral duty of every inhabitant of a Northern State to surrender a fugitive slave. There may be many who honestly and conscientiously believe it their duty to assist his escape. But this much cannot be denied—it is the duty of a citizen of the United States, and doubly the duty of a functionary of any State who has sworn obedience to the Federal Constitution, to render such obedience. And if he be not prepared to do so, he has no right to take up the privilege of citizenship, or accept the position and pay of an office to which are attached obligations which he is not prepared to fulfil. There are many persons in England who have a conscientious objection to capital punishment. But such persons have no right to take upon themselves functions which may involve the infliction or adjudication of capital punishment, and then refuse to perform their duty. Such men must refuse to become judges or sheriffs; if called to serve as jurors, they must submit to the fine for disobedience. If, having sworn to decide according to the evidence, they acquit a murderer in order to save him from the penalty awarded by law to his crime, they are guilty of perjury; and though the law cannot reach them, the judgment of every honest man condemns them as hypocrites and scoundrels. A condemnation precisely similar is deserved by those who passed and acted upon the resolution above quoted.

Violation of the law by those who, as citizens, voluntarily take the benefit of the law, is infamous even in a single community, where the law is an expression of the collective will of the nation, and liable to modification by the authorized exponents of the national opinion. But it is still more infamous under a Federal Constitution, where the compact entered into by States with sister States is deliberately violated by those who have neither the power nor the right to modify its conditions. The Abolitionist citizens and functionaries of Massachusetts were guilty, not not only of rebellion against the law and treason to the Union, but of a gross breach of faith towards the Southern States. It could not, of course, be held that they were to be bound for ever by the compact sanctioned by their fathers; though this is the assertion of those who deny the right of Secession. But it is clear that they had no right to choose what portions of the compact they would obey and what violate. They were bound either to abide by it in its integrity, and to act up to it in good faith, or to repudiate it in toto, and renounce all the benefits they enjoyed under it. They were bound either to obey the law, or to induce their State to secede from the Union. And the respect of the English people for Massachusetts and her sister States of New England was weakened, if not forfeited, by the fact that they did not secede; that, instead of renouncing the "Covenant with Hell," and clearing themselves of all further liability for the sin they so fiercely reviled, they clung to the Union, while they violated the Constitution, and claimed the full benefit of a compact which they refused to observe.

"To do evil that good may come," has been the policy of the Abolitionists. It is a policy not more distinctly condemned by Scripture than by experience. The world has been so constituted that good shall not come of doing evil; that "as a man sows so shall he reap." The Abolitionists sowed treachery, perjury, slander, incentives to assassination; they have reaped dissolution of the Union, civil war, individual ruin, and national bankruptcy. Wantonly, with the blood of peaceful citizens on their hands, and the guilt of perjury on their souls, they rushed before the tribunal that decides the causes of nations through the arbitrament of battle; and let the issue be what it may, judgment has clearly been given against them. The independence of the South, paralyzing their intrigues, and destroying their ground of action, is accomplished beyond recall. And even while the Union subsisted, it had become clear that the only effect of their conduct had been to inflame the passions of the Southern people, to rivet the fetters of the slave, and to render impossible any discussion or amelioration of the system of slavery. "Fanaticism," Mr. Williams truly says, "begets reverse fanaticism, and to the eye of the disinterested spectator . . . the acts of all appear as the acts of madmen." It is only from the complete victory of the South, the suspension of all the passionate struggles which arose within the Union from Abolitionist declamation and intrigue, and the influence of reflection and quiet discussion of the subject among those who can discuss it together without antagonistic passions, that those who desire to witness the gradual amendment of the faults of Southern institutions can expect the realization of their hopes. While the Union existed, the Abolitionists had made all discussion dangerous, all criticism suspicious, and all improvement impossible. Such was the only result of the labours of men who, pretending the sanction of a higher law written in their own hearts, set at defiance alike the Constitution of their country and the plainest rules of justice, morality, and the Christian religion; and such is the invariable result of labours animated by such a spirit.

The Confederate Press.

ANY ONE who looks over a life of Richmond papers may form a better idea of life in the Confederate capital than a person who passes a single day in Richmond, but who has not an opportunity of reading the newspapers. The Southern press is unlike that of any other country, excepting the press of England, to which it has a remarkable resemblance. It not only represents the politics, but the manners, habits, and customs of the people. It reflects, as our press does, the social life of the community. National questions receive due prominence, but nothing is too small for consideration. If a Southerner has a complaint to make, or a suggestion to offer, he writes to the Inquirer, the Examiner, to the Mobile Register, the Charleston Courier, or one of the numerous, and, let us add, prosperous journals that constitute the Fourth Estate of the Confederate States of America; just as an Englishman writes to the Times, or some other contemporary. In the Southern journals the editorial comments are few, and rigidly terse in style. The object is not to fill a column and a half, but (especially just now, when paper is so scarce and dear) to say what has to be said in as few words as possible. Unlike French and German papers, the Southern papers are full of news—not war news only, but accidents, offences, and local chit-chat. The Northern press is "newsy," but is strikingly dissimilar to the Southern press. The difference has not been brought about by Secession, for it existed when the old Union was intact, and is a proof that the political union continued after the North and South had in all other respects become separate peoples.

But for our own, we should call the Southern press the freest in the world. In no country, not even in this land of liberty, was discussion in the midst of a terrible war so unfettered. Of course, if Secession had been rebellion or revolution, such freedom would have been incompatible with the existence of the Government; and, even as it is, we are somewhat surprised, as well as gratified, to find that the life and death struggle has not impaired or suspended the constitutional liberty of the subject. Whilst the Confederate capital was besieged, whilst the army of the South was being raised and recruited, the acts of the President and of Congress were criticised without let or hindrance. Governor Brown, of Georgia, objected to the Conscription Act, and his letter to President Davis was published in extenso in the Georgia papers and reprinted in all the leading journals of the Confederacy. Some Southerners were a little angry with Governor Brown, but not so the President, who wrote and published an elaborate reply. Every movement of the President is noticed and commented on. If he visits the army in the field or returns to Richmond, it is more than probable he will have acted contrary to the views of the Opposition, and forthwith the Richmond Examiner comes out with a smart leader or a stirring letter on the subject. Every member of the Cabinet, and, indeed, every member of Congress, is dealt with in like manner. The strategy of the war is fully canvassed; but the generals and the troops fighting their country's battles, are, as they should be, sacred from criticism, until any expedition in which they are engaged is completed, and then, even if there has been what is esteemed a failure, the commander is not condemned for unavoidable misfortune; but it must be confessed that the South has not been greatly tried by the non-success of its military operations. On the other hand, the Southern press does not make heroes, it only recognizes their existence. Till a soldier has made himself famous he gets scant praise in the South.

The management of the commissariat and the hospital departments of the army has been as freely discussed as with us during the Crimean war; and the Confederate soldiers are thereby assured that their welfare is anxiously cared for by the Government, and zealously protected by the press.

Such freedom, we need hardly remark, is remote from license or a thought of revolution. If the people of the Confederate States were not so thoroughly Conservative (we do not use the word in a party sense) they could not be so thoroughly free. They reverence their Constitution, and honour and respect the Executive chosen in accordance with the provisions of that Constitution. For example, whilst there have been strictures upon the policy of some of President Davis's acts, no journalist has ever expressed the slightest doubt of his splendid ability, of his high character, and of his unswerving and devoted patriotism. In the Confederate States, as in England, any attack upon the Constitution or the authority of the Executive would unite the whole press in the defence of the one or the other. The people have agreed upon the maintenance of their free Constitution, and this point being irrevocably settled, they have agreed to differ upon questions of detail. Strong in vital unity, there is no necessity to insist on a stagnant uniformity. An erroneous, but not unnatural, misapprehension would be eradicated by reading Southern newspapers. It is supposed that the war absorbs the entire attention of the Southern people, that they are panic stricken, and in a state of chronic excitement. But though the war is the main topic of conversation, and is anxiously considered by all persons, the pursuits of peace are not, could not, be wholly neglected. There are marriages and births, as well as deaths in the Confederacy. In the advertising columns of the Richmond Inquirer are demands for agriculturists and other kinds of labourers; announcements of good and cheap guano, and of quack medicines. Young ladies are, as usual, seeking situations as governesses. Then there are theatrical advertisements. On August 16, the Richmond public was invited to witness, at the "Varieties," the extravaganza of Beauty and the Beast, a dance, and The Stage Struck Tailor. At the "Metropolitan" the amusements offered were opera and farce. Life in Richmond, even when that city was beleaguered by the Northern armies, went on much as it does in times of peace. From the outset of the contest the Southerners seem to have so completely relied on the justice of their cause as to feel assured of its ultimate triumph; and though they thought, and still think, the struggle must be severe, they never have contemplated the possibility of becoming the conquered subjects of the North. They have been calm, because they counted the cost and prepared for sacrifice, when the North forced on them the issue of dependence or war.

But no part of the Confederate press is more English in its tone than the reports of the debates of the Confederate Congress. The House of Commons' spirit is apparent in the House of Representatives in Richmond. There is the same frankness of demeanour, the same tendency to enliven debates by personalities, which are sharp, but never coarse or libellous; and there is the same profound obedience to the Constitution and to the orders of the Assembly. During the Session of 1862 there have been some lively discussions. The Conscription Act was opposed by Mr. Foote, of Tennessee, who made a very strong speech against what he thought looked like an infringement of State rights. His arguments were not very cogent, and his views were antagonistic to the opinions of the House, and sometimes he was betrayed into saying rather more than he meant. Still, he was listened to without any other interruption than hon. members rising to correct a misstatement, or the reception of messages from the President, who, by the way, has to send a message rather frequently, in consequence of not being ministerially represented in Congress. Mr. Foote was answered by several members, and he responded by assuring the House he did not intend by any remark of his to give offence to any member, and above all, he begged to repudiate the idea of his opposition to the Conscription being founded on any want of confidence in the President. As far as he was concerned, he was quite ready to vote 250,000 men for the President upon the bare assurance that the troops were required. The discussion upon Secret Sessions elicited a general expression of opinion that it was solely defensible upon the ground of expediency; that it was not intended to keep information from the Southern people, but from their enemy; that no constitutional question should be debated in Secret Session; and that as soon as the war was over the necessity for them would be at an end. The debate showed the unanimity as well as the differences of the House of Representatives. The public are admitted to the House; and one objection urged against Secret Sessions was, that it sent the public and the reporters away, and the rest of the sitting, when publicly resumed, was not published. But the public must be silent; for when some applause greeted a proposition to consider Benjamin F. Butler as an enemy to the human race, and that he should be treated as an outlaw wherever found, the Speaker announced his intention of having the gallery cleared if such a manifestation of feeling was repeated. In short, the Southern Congress is a legislative assembly, and not a convention of demagogues, and the liberty of the Confederate States, like English liberty, is not a theory, but an actuality.

Substitutes for Cotton.

If no more cotton were grown, mankind would have to wear clothing made of other fibres, but it would not follow that we should find a perfect substitute for cotton. Unless we could light on a material equally cheap, that is, equally abundant, and the spinning of which would not be more costly, and the use as salubrious and convenient, we might have a very good make-shift, but not a perfect substitute. Even if we could obtain a substitute for cotton so long as the American supply is cut off, when American cotton is again brought into the market the substitute that is not as cheap and good will be abandoned. It is, then, reasonable to suppose that during the continuation of the cotton dearth other fibres will be looked after, but as yet we have not heard of any material which can, in any degree, compensate us for the loss of cotton. One lesson may be learned from the cry for substitutes, which is of considerable importance. No one pretends that any proposed substitute is better than the old staple; and, therefore, if it was not well known that other cotton growing countries could not give us enough of the raw material to feed our looms, no attention would be paid to substitutes. There is some gain in such a decided, though tacit, acknowledgment about India, or other places making us independent of the Southern States so far as their cotton crop is concerned. It is a practical admission that Mr. Laing is right in telling us that if we want cotton we must look to America, and not to India, for a solution of the present crisis.

Mr. Harben proposes a seaweed, zostera marina, as a substitute. Some of our contemporaries have been liberally praising this gentleman for his generosity in making his idea public without stipulating for any reward; and if he had been at the trouble of testing his idea by experiment, and proved that the woody fibre of the zostera marina could be prepared for textile purposes, he would have merited the ovation he has received. A multitude of vegetable substances besides seaweed contain woody fibre, and the problem is to adapt it to spinning. He who can solve it will be entitled to the honour of making a useful invention or discovery, if the cost of adaptation does not render its use impossible. There have been many unsuccessful attempts to employ woody fibre in the manufacture of paper. We are not saying this zostera marina cannot, by chemical and mechanical ingenuity, be made a substitute for cotton; but, as far as we know, it has not yet been done; and we would suggest that until the utility of the seaweed is proved, Mr. Harben is rather premature in his confident predictions about the value of his suggestion. It may be invaluable; but until this moment its value is speculative.

At the present prices of cotton, flax is to some extent a substitute, or, rather, would be a substitute if it were quite certain that the American supply was permanently stopped, and it was worth while to cultivate it on a large scale, and to erect machinery for its manufacture. There are two reasons why flax has not been able to compete with cotton; it is more expensive, and for most purposes more desirable as an article of clothing. Cotton, either in warm or cold climates, is more salubrious than linen. The latter is a good conductor of heat, condenses the vapour of perspiration into moisture on the skin, and is unable to absorb this moisture; the former is a bad conductor of heat, condenses very little moisture, is a great absorber, and leaves the skin dry, instead, as is the case with linen, wet and chilled. Flax, then, can be produced in large quantities, and can be spun into cloth, but it cannot compete with, much less supersede, cotton. If the use of flax is stimulated by the scarcity of cotton it will inevitably decline when cotton again becomes plentiful.

Considerable attention has lately been bestowed upon jute. This is, we believe, almost exclusively an Indian product. It has long been used as a staple in the manufacture of cheap carpets and mats, and, on account of its glossy appearance, has been introduced into silk fabrics. The natives of India have cultivated jute for their own manufactures for centuries. The Indian gunny cloths, or bagging used by the American planters, are made of jute, and, in 1860 nearly 900,000 yards of this material were imported into the United States. Not many years ago jute was almost a drug in the English market; but in 1853—in which year the imports were 275,000 cwts.—in consequence of the high price of flax, jute was mixed with linen yarns, and during seven years the imports gradually increased, until in 1859 they exceeded 1,071,000 cwts. Moreover, it has been used for cheap broad cloths mixed with cotton warps. The employment of jute as a substitute is not a novel experiment, but it is manifest that its use depends upon its comparative cheapness; and with cotton at a normal price it would only be introduced into the coarsest fabrics. The demand for jute will, no doubt, increase; but it will only be a substitute for cotton, and that in a limited degree, during the continuance of the Cotton Famine.

A perfect substitute must be as abundant, as cheap, and as well adapted for spinning; and such an article has not yet been discovered. On the contrary, jute and flax will not even come into competition with cotton, for the one is too expensive and the other too inferior in quality. With regard to the fibre of sea-weed, it is impossible to express any opinion whilst its usefulness is uncertain, or even if usable, whilst we are ignorant of the cost of preparing it for the loom.

German Unity.

In the modern text books of international law, the terms "Federal State" and "Confederation of States" are usually illustrated by the United States of America, and the Germanic Confederation. These chapters must be re-written. Where the bonds were tightest they have been abruptly broken; where they are so slack that they are hardly felt, there is a general craving to have them tightened. The contrast between the resolute assertion and the triumphant maintenance of the principle of Secession in the Federal States, and the vague longing and ill-directed efforts for unity in the Confederation, is significant enough. The South has rent the Union in twain, because it shrunk from no labour and no sacrifice to effect what it had unanimously willed. Germany will have to content itself with less radical changes, because the demand for union is not a unanimous one, and few even of those who feel the desire are prepared to risk all in the effort to obtain it.

The new birth of this old dream of German unity dates from the Italian war. The probability of an attack from France aroused a common German patriotism; the want of unity and concert in the defensive preparations excited general alarm and disgust. The forces of the nation would have been divided, because its princes could not agree amongst themselves about the command, and a feeling spread through all classes that the existing Constitution of the Confederation did not provide for the security of the fatherland. Upon that feeling the men who have inherited from 1848 the fantasy of a German Empire and a National Parliament have worked. Not altogether nurtured by experience, they did not at once renew those demands to which the history of that period gives such a decisive answer; but they sheltered themselves under the wing of Prussia, anxious to wipe out the humiliation of Olmutz, eager to humiliate, in her turn, Austria, and assume the representation of all Germany. They put forth a programme which, answering to the public feeling of the hour, favoured the ambitious projects of Prussia. They asked for the erection of a central Power, to which should be confided the representation of Germany abroad, the conduct of its defence, and the execution of the resolutions of a National Parliament, which they proposed at the same time to establish, and they proposed to confide that central power to Prussia. But if these men set the ball rolling, they have been unable to control its course. The desire for unity has undoubtedly become a nearly unanimous one in Germany. The Governments themselves acknowledge the defective constitution of the Bund, and the necessity of common action upon many points in which that constitution renders it almost impossible. They have put forward their schemes for the reform of the Confederation, and their admission of the necessity of a change has given the union sentiment a prodigious impulse. But the unanimity is only for union in the abstract. The moment you come to the discussion of the kind of union, irreconcilable antagonism exhibits itself. The Prussians want a union which shall be an aggrandizement of the Prussian State. They would like to incorporate in their monarchy all the neighbouring small States, or, if they cannot do that, they would be content with the formation of a narrower Bund within the Bund; that is to say, of a confederation of which Prussia should have the entire control. As a matter of course, the dynasties generally object to a reform which would consist in getting rid of them altogether, and, except in North Germany, and perhaps, with a portion of the professional and mercantile classes in the south, the people would equally object to it. And here comes in that apple of all discord, the disposition of Austria. What to do with the Austrian Empire, upon the assumption that they can do what they like with it, is the puzzle of all German patriots. Your true German shudders at the idea of losing a single inch of German soil, and Austria has some thousands of square miles. Now, he cannot abandon his countrymen who inhabit this German territory; but then he will not take in, even if they would come, all the Poles, Magyars, Ischeques, and Slaves who occupy the other parts of the Austrian Empire; and the Austrian Emperor, so far from allowing his State to be dismembered, is just now engaged in an attempt, hitherto remarkably successful, to unite it. What is to be done? The Prussian, who hates Austria and wishes to be relieved of her opposition, and have it all his own way, says, "Oh, we will make our Germany without Austria!" But the South German of Bavaria and Wurtemberg replies, "Then you must make it without us. We have no desire to make a German Empire merely for the profit of a people we dislike so much as we do you, and we can see pretty plainly that if you make your Germany without Austria, you will very soon set about Prussianizing it." So we have the two parties of Klein Deutschland and Gross Deutschland, or Little and Great Germany—Prussia and Austria in face; and quite safe never to agree; and then there is a host of other questions which rise up to produce confusion whenever the modus operandi is discussed by the Unionists.

Mr. Renter, who elevates a great many very inconsiderable persons into notoriety, has given considerable importance to the proceedings of some hundred and fifty gentlemen who met at Weimar last week to settle the affairs of the nation. The resolutions, if resolutions they can be called, to which these gentlemen deputies of former or present German Legislatures (a sufficiently comprehensive qualification seeing that each of the thirty-eight German States has its Legislative chamber or chambers) arrived, illustrate the perplexity in which the most ardent patriots find themselves when it comes to a question of the execution of their wishes. The practical result of their conclusions is the adjournment of everything. They adjourn the question of Austria, and adjourn the question of the constitution of the central Power. The only thing they agree upon is a condemnation of the reforms which the Governments have recently proposed to the Diet; no doubt from the well-founded fear that the remedy of such inconveniences as are really felt would take the wind out of their sails. They agree, indeed, as all such meetings do, that a National Assembly, elected by the people, is required, but they cannot take any step to call it into life.

There are only two ways in which the convocation of such a Parliament is possible. It must come from a unanimous call of all the Governments, produced by irresistible manifestations of the people, or it must be summoned by one State strong enough to enforce its will upon the other Governments, and confident that the people generally would go with her. There is no chance of the first course being tried, for the simple and satisfactory reason that the German people generally are very well off, enjoy a fair amount of political liberty, and are too sensible to risk these advantages for the chance of obtaining an object which is, for the most part, a sentimental one. There is no chance, that Prussia, the only State which would have the power to frighten the small States into acknowledging such a Parliament, will do so. A national Parliament would not be to her interest just now; she has ceased to be the leader of Germany; the Prussian Government must be reconciled to the people, or must submit to them, before it can ask the confidence of Germany, and invite the people of the smaller States to dethrone their own sovereigns, or deprive them of some portion of their power, for her profit. Whilst some of the States which the Prussian liberal press has been wont to denounce as reactionary and bigoted possess Constitutions which have never been violated, and under which the sovereign and the people have worked together harmoniously for the welfare of the land, the Prussian Constitution, although the creation of a reactionary period and chary enough, therefore, of privileges to the representatives of the people, has been persistently violated by the King and his Ministers. At this moment the King of Prussia and his people have hurled defiance at each other, and are preparing for a strenuous conflict. Victory will, no doubt, rest with the people in the end, but so long as the struggle lasts the influence of Prussia in Germany is annihilated. The people of the other States of Germany will naturally believe that a King who violates the Constitution of his own state, and would reduce the Parliament to a mere consultative assembly, will have little respect as holder of the central power for the conditions upon which it was granted him and the directions and remonstrances of a national Parliament. The King of Prussia is quarrelling with his people out of sheer obstinacy. He will not ask the Houses of Deputies for what he wants, and they will not let him have it until he acknowledges their right to say yes or no, as they please.

The army reorganization, the subject of this quarrel, equally dates from that eventful year 1859. When the Prussian Government, fearing an extension of the war into Germany, mobilized its army, it was found that many important reforms were needed. The creation of the Prussian army dates, it is known, from the period of disaster in which the nation lay at the feet of the great Napoleon. Although it bears hardly upon the people, it is endeared to them by the successes which it enabled them to achieve. Every Prussian has to serve three years in the regular army; remains some years in the reserve, during which he is liable to be called upon to serve again in the regular army at the will of the King; then passes into the first division of the Landwehr, liable to be called upon to fight at home or abroad; then into the second division of the Landwehr, only to fight in defence of the country. Of course, the burden of this system is the time of actual service, and in practice the Governments of late years have only required two years actual service, and the nation has become accustomed to it. But the King and his advisers in reorganizing the army insist upon the whole three years, and extend the term of service in the reserve. These changes are exceedingly unpopular, the people feel that two years is quite enough for a young man to lose, and they object, too, to the increased cost of the army under this system. In 1860 the Government, acting in a constitutional manner, laid a bill for carrying into effect the alterations of the law involved in the reorganization, before the Lower House. The bill, however, was withdrawn; but the Government got the money it needed, and went on with the reorganization. In 1861 it persisted in the reorganization, and had still the funds to carry it out. The House, which met in the beginning of the year, was known to be strongly opposed to the reorganization. It was dissolved on another question; but the new House was even more strongly resolved to resist it. Instead of laying a bill for regulating the reorganization before the House, the Government presented the budget, and asked the means to carry its pet scheme out without leave. The House, resolved not to be overridden, has struck out of the budget all the items, amounting to about six million thalers (nine hundred thousand pounds sterling), which can be considered as occasioned by the reorganization; but it took care to let the Government understand, in the course of the debate, that it would have voted all these amounts, the larger part of which, inasmuch as three quarters of the financial year have expired, have been already expended, if the Government, on the other hand, would meet the country, accept two years service, and treat the Landwehr legally. The Government refused any compromise until after its defeat, when it for a moment seemed disposed to accept one, but the Minister apparently spoke without the authority of his master, and the King has now called to his counsels a statesman who is avowedly an enemy to all liberal institutions.

That is the present state of affairs in Prussia. It is not calculated to diffuse an ardent love for Prussian supremacy throughout Germany, and inasmuch as the execution of any of the favourite schemes of a united Germany necessarily imply that supremacy, it is probable that any genuine proposition for reforms of the Confederation made by the Governments of the smaller States, will, after a time, win popular adhesion.

IN answer to several inquiries made of us, we are authorized to state that the Treasurer of the Fund for the Relief of Confederate Prisoners, is J. H. Ashbridge, Esq., of the firm of J. H. Ashbridge and Company, of New Orleans and Liverpool.

The "Pan-Handle."

OUR last impression furnished an historical sketch of "Mason and Dixon's Line," by which survey the dispute long pending between the proprietors of Maryland and Pennsylvania was adjusted. In continuation of the subject, we now present an account of the line that separates the latter State from Virginia, and which forms what is commonly designated the "Pan-Handle." This completes the artificial boundaries of the Northern and Southern sections of the late American Union, except those between Missouri and Iowa, and the Territories in the Far West. The remaining divisions are marked by the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers.

Several years after the voyage of Columbus, the Cabots discovered and laid claim, on behalf of England, to all the territory in America from 68 degrees N to the Floridas, or at least from 30 to 45 degrees N, being the extreme bounds of the Carolinas and the New England States, which was in 1584 named "Virginia," in honour of Queen Elizabeth, by Sir Walter Raleigh. In 1606, these possessions were divided into two parts by King James. The first, Southern Virginia, comprehending the now States of North and South Carolina, Virginia, Maryland, and part of Pennsylvania, embraced between 34 and 41 degrees N latitude, was granted to the London Adventurers' Company; the second, extending from 41 to 45 degrees N latitude, which included part of Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York, and the New England States, was patented to the Plymouth Adventurers' Company. The first corporation did not begin its operations until 1608, the second not until 1620, when a new charter was granted to it on November 3, under the title of "Council for the Affairs of New England." During the year 1623, the first company managed the concerns entrusted to it so badly that its charter was suppressed on July 15, 1624, and subsequently the second company shared the same fate. In 1625, King Charles the First published a proclamation that the Government of the colonies should in future depend upon himself, and he placed their administration under charge of a House Council, who appointed, with his concurrence, a resident committee, subject to their control. The soil thus reverting to the Crown, charters were granted for Massachusetts in 1628, for Maryland in 1632, and for other provinces from time to time, leaving Virginia proper under the immediate dominion of the King, who, up to the period of Independence, appointed her civil officers, while the patentees of the neighbouring settlements had all such authority delegated to them. Hence Virginia has been called the "Old Dominion;" the Crown exercising sovereignty over all soil not disposed of by special grants; and she has been regarded as the mother of States, as well as statesmen.

George Calvert, a gentleman of Yorkshire, who was appointed, by the favour of Sir Robert Cecil, to a post in the State Department in 1604, and knighted in 1619, became a Catholic, and for a long while concealed his religious opinions; he was an original member of the Virginia Company, but withdrew therefrom in 1622, obtained the grant of Avalon, on the S.E. coast of Newfoundland, where he began a little colony. With the growth of Puritanism, the cry against the Catholics was so great that he resigned his office, frankly avowing his adherence to that faith. He, however, retained favour at court, and for past services was created an Irish peer, with the title of Lord Baltimore. He twice visited his colony; he did not like the cold region, or the opposing claims of the French and Spanish, whose fishing vessels had visited that coast for a century, or the danger of collision with English fishermen, who regarded with hostility his exclusive possession of certain shores and harbours. Finding out these disadvantages, he paid a visit to Virginia in 1628, where he was not very warmly received, owing to the Protestant feeling being so strong in that colony. He found, however, a large unoccupied region north of the Potomac, which he readily obtained from Charles the First, naming it "Maryland," in honour of Queen Henrietta Maria. The line due east from the mouth of the Potomac across the Chesapeake to Delaware Bay formed his southern boundary, on the east the Delaware Bay, on the north the fortieth degree, on the west a line due north from the head of the Potomac. Before the patent was passed, he died, and the charter limiting the grant to unsettled lands, was issued to his son and heir, Cecilius, on July 20, 1632. The first settlers arrived on February 24, 1634. The Virginians looked upon the Marylanders as intruders, but Governor Harvey took the part of the new-comers, and being retained in office until 1639, quelled all ill-feeling.

On March 4, 1681, William Penn, who had adopted the principles of the Quakers while a student at Oxford, obtained a charter for Pennsylvania, creating him "true and absolute lord" thereof, with property in the soil, and ample powers of government, but the "advice and consent of the freemen of the province" were necessary to the enactment of laws; the Crown retained the right of veto, and Parliament to levy taxes. It appears that Penn had arranged the boundaries of his province in such a manner as to have the very best water communication; considering that the Maryland grant extended on the north only to the 40th degree, he arranged for territory from that limit, the 39th line, in the south, which he designated as the beginning of the 40th parallel, so as to include a portion of Chesapeake Bay, giving an outlet to the ocean by it as well as by Delaware Bay. His possessions in the north were to extend to the southern extremity of latitude 43, the 42nd line, making three degrees north and south, should the Delaware River run that far North; if not, up to its head; the western boundary was to be five degrees from the eastern coast of the province. This, with the Dutch and Swedish occupancy of lands on the Delaware, which were captured by the Duke of York and ceded to Penn, as well as an error in regard to the situation of Cape Henlopen, caused the difficulty with Maryland, which was finally settled in the manner related in our article on Mason and Dixon's Line. By which arrangement Pennsylvania is only about 155 miles north and south, while otherwise her breadth would be about 208.

Although all disputes with Maryland were brought to a close, the boundaries between Virginia, west of that State, and Pennsylvania, were a source of much difficulty. Penn's heirs claimed that the compromise with Maryland, which made the dividing line 36.44 N., had nothing to do with Virginia, and that west of Maryland the soil of Pennsylvania should extend south to the 39th line, or the beginning of the 40th degree. Virginia, on the other hand, in 1753, claimed, in the name of the King, the whole of Western Pennsylvania, by reason of her people migrating thither. In March, 1754, Governor Dinwiddie, of Virginia, wrote to Governor Hamilton, of Pennsylvania:—"I am much misled by our surveyors, if the forks of the Monongahela be within the province of Pennsylvania." There were conflicts between the two States in reference to the ownership of lands west of the Alleghenies. The proprietor of Pennsylvania, in 1768, had purchased large tracts from the Indians on the Ohio and Allegheny Rivers, and had appointed commissioners to make sales thereof, but the settlers did not heed them, stating that they were uncertain as to which colony they belonged, probably having a secret wish to acknowledge the right of Virginia, as their cost in that case would be only one-fourteenth that of the fixed price in Pennsylvania. In 1774, Lord Dunmore, who was then Governor of Virginia, likewise opened land offices in that district, furnishing warrants, at two shillings and sixpence, with trifling purchase-money—say, ten shillings per 100 acres—and even that was not demanded. This was held out as an inducement to the people to apply to his agents instead of to those of Pennsylvania. The territory being claimed as the property of the King of England, it was alleged it was only disposable by the authority of Governor Dunmore, who established two Virginian courts in the vicinity; but on May 3, 1779, this course was changed; Virginia having become a State by the Declaration of Independence, passed a municipal regulation recognizing actual settlers, from January 1, 1777, who had made a crop of corn, as freeholders entitled to a farm not exceeding 200 acres. There would have been open hostilities concerning this affair had not the difficulties with England commenced. Lord Dunmore was obliged to escape on board a ship in the James River, on June 8, 1775, in consequence of his having had placed a spring gun in the arsenal at Williamsburgh, which wounded a "rebel," in his attempt to break open the same in order to obtain arms. The affairs of Virginia were conducted from that time by a Provincial Convention until the election of Patrick Henry, who was chosen Governor on June 12, 1776.

Although the "Articles of Confederation" were passed by the second Continental Congress on the 15th day of November, 1777, they were not ratified by all the States, until March 1, 1781; the dispute in reference to the western portion of Pennsylvania could not, therefore, be referred to a Federal court under article 9 of that document until after that date. In the meanwhile, in 1780, the boundary was settled by mutual agreement. The Pennsylvanians, relying on the terms of their charter, had claimed that west of Maryland their boundary should be the 39th degree of north latitude; the Virginians insisted on the 40th degree. It was finally agreed that Mason and Dixon's Line should be continued to a point five degrees west from the Delaware; and as a western boundary, exactly parallel to that river could hardly be run, a due north line drawn from that point should constitute the western boundary of Pennsylvania. Under this arrangement Pittsburgh, that had been under the dominion of Virginia, returned again to the jurisdiction of Pennsylvania. The space left between the limits of that State and the Ohio was, therefore, retained by Virginia, and from its peculiar form upon the map, has ever since been denominated the "Pan-Handle." On March 3, 1792, the Governor of Pennsylvania purchased from the United States' Government about 200,000 acres of land, north of the line of 42 degrees N., on Lake Erie, for \$151,740 $\frac{4}{10}$ Continental money.

These lands were a portion of those ceded by the State of New York, on September 6, 1780, to the General Government, about which time Virginia, Connecticut, Massachusetts, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, made similar cessions, Maryland having withheld her consent to the "Articles of Confederation" of 1777 until the territory of the respective States was in a measure thus equalized.

The two Virginian counties of Accomac and Northampton, on the extreme end of the peninsula, between the Chesapeake Bay and the Atlantic Ocean, were settled by the earliest colonists, and Lord Baltimore's grant, extending east from the mouth of the Potomac only, caused the Southern boundary of Maryland to be fixed at the 38th line north latitude.

Three Months in the Confederate Army.

THE FIRST VISIT OF DEATH.

Camp 3rd Ala. Vol., near Norfolk, — May, 1862.

Last night, some time after "taps" had sounded, the tent lantern put out, and we were composing ourselves to sleep, the report of a musket broke upon the deep stillness of the camp. Was it an alarm? Was the enemy approaching? The conjecture was improbable, for no enemy was so near that the first signal of his approach should be given by our own sentinels. Every man was instantly upon his feet; from all the tents rose the buzz of excited conversation, when the stern voice of the orderly-sergeant ordered "Silence! no man to leave his tent." The conviction at once flashed through our minds that some dreadful accident had occurred. A few minutes afterwards a corporal rushed to our tent, with orders for Drs. — and —, privates in our mess, to proceed with all possible haste to guard-quarters, where the regimental surgeons required their assistance. A lieutenant had been shot—was dying at that very moment—this was the hurried information of the breathless messenger, in answer to our anxious inquiry. He did not know the name or corps of the dying man—we had not been long enough together for each of the subaltern officers to become personally known to all the men—could only say that he was slight of figure, and fair in complexion. The imperfect description applied to the brevet-lieutenant of our own company—a general favourite, and on guard this very day—and a simultaneous rush was made to the opening of the tent. But the order, "No man to leave quarters," again thundered forth, and we were fain to obey. The suspense was fearful, and became agonizing, when presently a special detail was noiselessly made from each tent in the company—for what purpose was not told. The oldest members of the messes had been selected; they were not to load; the bayonet alone was to be used; above all, the most absolute silence was enjoined and preserved. Again, all sounds were hushed in the excited camp, save only the distant tramp of rapidly marching men, which from time to time our ears, closely pressed to the earth, could catch. Thus we lay for hours, some surmise more dreadful than the rest being occasionally communicated in a low whisper from neighbour to neighbour.

At last one of our medical messmates returned. It was not our lieutenant that had been shot, but an officer of a country company in the left wing. He had expired after brief suffering; his last words, "That I should die thus—not on a battle-field." The murderer was a sentinel. His own company disowned him; no one had any personal knowledge of him; he had joined on the way to Virginia, since the company was formed. Was considered an intruder, an unfit associate. There were ugly rumours about his antecedents. A fearful excitement prevailed in the murdered officer's company; the remaining officers would not answer for the men; some of the hotheaded youths had sworn summary vengeance upon the murderer. A strong guard, drawn close to the inner lines of the camp, alone prevented them from at once attempting their mad design. The criminal himself was protected by a picked guard. Patrols intercepted all unauthorized communication between the inner and outer lines. Such was the statement of our messmate, and we had not finished our whispered comments upon it when the reveillé summoned us to our morning duty.

This morning, after the first drill, and before the order of "break ranks" was given, the captain briefly related to us the tragic events of the night. He enjoined us to form no rash opinions, and especially to abstain from comments, either among ourselves or with others, assuring us that the offender would be tried by the proper authorities, and that, in all probability, his crime, though great, was not intentional. There is, of course, but one topic of earnest conversation throughout the regiment; but expressions are more temperate. A feeling of pity, even, is manifested for the unfortunate man who, perhaps, is guilty only of stupidity or gross awkwardness. His friendless condition in his own company, which with some raises such grave suspicions against him, is urged by others as a claim on our sympathies, and a private in our ranks who has earned a high reputation at the bar volunteers to be his counsel, if the colonel will grant permission. In the Wetumpka Guards the excitement has also much abated since the object of their wrath is removed to the city. Some few still sullenly speak of reaching him even there; but, upon the whole, the sense of justice and the spirit of discipline predominates, and no trouble is apprehended. They have certainly sustained a great loss, for Lieutenant Storrs was an officer of great promise, and in his private life a gentleman of high social respectability, esteemed for many excellent qualities of head and heart.

This evening, at dress parade, the death of Lieutenant Storrs was officially announced at the head of the regiment, and the customary mourning ordered. A few feeling words of eulogy on the deceased and of sympathy with the bereavement of his company followed the announcement, but no allusion whatever was made to the manner of his death, except that "he died on duty." The city papers, which have just reached camp, briefly chronicle the occurrence, and attribute the fatality to the "accidental discharge of a gun."

To the surprise of the entire regiment, the homicide was never tried by a court-martial. Though the offence had been committed within the lines of a military camp, and in time of war, it was argued that in the absence of any formal proclamation of martial law, the offender was amenable only to the law of Virginia, and to the authorities of that State he was accordingly handed over. Undoubtedly, our military superiors gladly availed themselves of this pretext, if pretext it was, to avoid the necessity of applying the sterner code of war, and also to remove beyond the camps a topic of constant and, perhaps, dangerous irritation. The trial, which took place some weeks afterwards, was conducted with the time-honoured formality and solemnity that distinguish a Virginian court of justice, and the imposing scene, so novel to us from the more southerly States, produced a wholesome impression upon the entire regiment. The fate of the prisoner remained for a time doubtful, though he was defended by most able counsel—the barrister who is mentioned in the preceding note as having volunteered his services—but it being proved that his musket, although a new one, had a fault of construction, he was acquitted of any worse crime than gross carelessness, and escaped with a term of imprisonment. Months afterwards, when he had paid the penalty of the law, the poor friendless man made a last visit to the regiment to receive his dismissal from service; and in honour to frail humanity be it said, no one thought of insulting him by word or gesture.

A DINNER PARTY IN CAMP.

— May, 1862.

Up to this time we have been under command of our Lieutenant-Colonel, Tenant Lomax, of Montgomery. Colonel Withers, being at the time of his election the Mayor of the City of Mobile, a few weeks elapsed before he could transfer the city government to his successor. Last Friday the announcement that he had arrived at Norfolk, and would, within a few days, assume the command, caused some little trepidation in the regiment, for if our present commander is strict in discipline, the new one has the reputation of being stern to severity. The rural companies especially, who are familiar with many more or less apocryphal stories of the summary dealings of the Mayor of Mobile, look to his advent as their colonel with something very much like awe. His first unofficial visit to camp, and the complimentary remarks he is said to have made to the officers upon the appearance of the regiment at the review, have softened this harsh impression, and it is generally admitted that, though he may be a severe disciplinarian, he appears to be a just and generous man, who will not unnecessarily resort to harshness. That he is an officer of tried capacity, the most inveterate prejudice cannot deny. He is a soldier by education and graduated with distinction at West Point. In the Mexican war he won the rank of colonel, and was appointed by the commander-in-chief civil and military governor of an important province. The rumour is already current that he will not command us long as colonel, but will soon be appointed by the President a brigadier.

With the colonel arrived two ladies upon whom our company has special claims, and looks upon almost as members. One is the bride of our second-lieutenant, married only a few days before we received our marching orders; the other, the young wife of our orderly sergeant, and the daughter of the colonel himself. Both these ladies accompanied us from Mobile as far as Montgomery, where they remained until our destination should be ascertained, and our location comparatively permanent. They will now take up their residence in Norfolk, where it is probable some of us may soon need them as nurses—that is, if the Federals have not so utterly lost their senses as to leave us undisturbed in our present untenable position. We are not a little proud of our lady members, and they, in return, are not a little proud of us. Almost every man in the company is a friendly acquaintance of long standing to one or both, and it may be that among the younger members of the company there are those who once contended for the prizes which our lieutenant and orderly sergeant have drawn. In fact, the roll of Company A might almost serve as the list of male visitors at their respective homes.

Their appearance in camp was quite a holiday. We did the honours of our humble tents; they peeped, looked, and wondered at our improvised house-keeping arrangements, and had a thousand questions to ask. They laughed heartily when some young gentleman whom they had known for his care and taste in dressing came up in undress uniform, laden with a pile of the ration bread, which kept tumbling down when he caught a glimpse of the unexpected visitors; another struggling under a load of ration pork, or jauntily swaggering along with a bucket of water in each hand; still another surprised, broom in hand, with head tied up in a handkerchief, sweeping the space before the mess-tent. Upon the whole, the domestic inspection was favourable to us; they could not understand how we managed to live so comfortably, left all to ourselves; and we, elated by the compliments, invited them to dinner. The invitation was accepted, and yesterday, Sunday, fixed for the grand occasion. There being no battalion drill that day, and Divine Service not held until after dress parade, we had nearly the whole afternoon free. Two o'clock was accordingly the appointed hour.

The inviters were my mess, No. 5. The guests invited, besides the ladies themselves, their husbands, the captain of our company, the colonel, who considered himself sufficiently represented by his daughter, and the general commanding, who sent his aide-de-camp, a personal friend of several members of our mess. Altogether, it was thought throughout the regiment to be the most important thing that ever was done by a set of mere privates; but there being nothing in the military code to prevent privates from giving dinner parties which did not interfere with their duties, and the social position of all concerned being established beyond a doubt, the affair was humoured by those in authority. The captain even lent us his commodious tent. A deal table of sufficient size was quickly constructed by amateur mechanics, and its rough surface concealed under several layers of table cloths. Crockery, napkins, and other essentials were sent for from town, either hired or bought, as the case might be. Wines and provisions were judiciously selected by the caterer of the mess; our own black cook, the servant of one of our messmates, was entrusted, under the superintendence of a committee of one, with the details of the cuisine. Another of our number was appointed butler, another gentleman-waiter; and thus the memorable dinner came on. In an artistic point of view it was not, perhaps, a perfect success; there were, unquestionably, some of the discomforts of a pic-nic; there were also some discoveries of things forgotten which ought to have been there, and of others thought of which might well have been dispensed with; but I venture to say that none of the twelve that yesterday sat down to the table ever before knew how much enjoyment might be derived from a dinner. The zest was heightened by the dull boom of the enemy's cannon, which interrupted our desert, but alarmed no one, not even the ladies, to whom we soon explained that it proceeded from Fort Calhoun, familiarly called "the Rip Raps," on a rock half way between Fortress Monroe and Sewell's Point. Upon this rock the Federals have recently placed a long-range gun, called the Sawyer Gun, with which they practice every afternoon upon our outposts, but without much chance of ever hurting any one, for several of their shells, which have been dug up, were found to be filled with sawdust instead of powder, probably through some treachery among the operatives of their arsenals.

The novel banquet was brought to a sudden close, after a duration of four hours, by the tap of the drum, which called us to dress-parade. Leaving the more fortunate ones of the party, whose rank exempted them from this duty, to entertain the ladies, and exacting a promise that our fair guests would not leave until we had had the honour of escorting them to their carriages after parade was dismissed, we were soon in our places in the ranks—twelve months "enlisted men" once more. Much as life in the extreme South habituates one to strange contrasts, this trifling event is so out of keeping with our position and its duties, and is so strikingly characteristic of the composition of the army on which the fate of our young Republic rests, that it deserves a conspicuous place in my note-book.

Reviews.

THE PUBLIC LIFE OF LORD MACAULAY.*

If Macaulay could have seen himself as others—his friends we mean, not his enemies—saw him, he might have composed an autobiographical essay as witty and amusing as his sketch of Walpole, whom he describes as a Republican by profession, and a gentleman usher at heart, and which might have been in many respects as brilliant as his essay on the life of Warren Hastings. Macaulay was the architect of his own fortune; but whilst we acknowledge the splendour of his intellect, it is impossible to help regretting his Whiggery. We do not make the observation in a party sense. If Macaulay had constituted himself the advocate of Toryism, we should not less deplore the political partisanship of a man who was fitted by natural gifts to write history, rather than to take any active part in the political drama. As a politician, he was a brilliant inconsistency. It is true he never forgot his party allegiance, and even as an historian he looked at men and measures through Whig spectacles; but when, on one occasion, he called himself a Conservative, he did not make a hypocritical profession. In his writings, and to a less extent in his speeches, we can perceive that his ardent love for Whig principles was the accident of birth and association, and that if he had been born thirty years later he would, in all probability, have cast in his lot with the Conservative party. He was a Whig because he was his father's son, and the associate of his father's friends, and not from intellectual conviction.

Macaulay was peculiarly fortunate as a politician. He was not a great debater, though his parliamentary speeches are fine specimens of House of Commons' oratory. He had good cause to be grateful to the Whigs, who not only introduced him into public life, but embraced every opportunity of rewarding his devotion rather than his services. We refer especially to his Indian appointment; he was not a lawyer, yet he was placed at the head of a law commission that was to inquire into the jurisdiction of the courts of justice and police establishments, and the operations of the laws of India. And seeing that his salary was equal to £10,000 a year, we are not surprised that the appointment was denounced as a job, and that upon his return from India, the Times, as well as other leading journals, should have assailed him. "The mission of Mr. Babington Macaulay to India was, morally considered, there is reason for believing, a nefarious job; financially considered, a most prodigal and unprofitable waste of the public money. The only definite and simple characteristic of the mission provided for this party-speechmaker was, that he was secure in the enjoyment of £10,000 per annum." This is severe, but how much more severely would the Edinburgh reviewer of Montgomery's poems have treated such a transaction. We do not impute any improper motive. Macaulay was a man of the highest private and public integrity, and though we do not pretend that he was indifferent to the large emoluments of office, yet he doubtless accepted them under the impression that his services fully deserved the remuneration. He went to India with the expectation of benefitting 70,000,000 of his fellow subjects; but even if his legal acumen and administrative capacity had rivalled his eloquent diction, his mission could only have resulted in disappointment. It is impossible for a commission of foreigners in three years to gain an elementary knowledge of so vast a subject as the operation of laws which govern 70,000,000 of an alien race.

Macaulay professed adherence to the extreme Anti-slavery party, to that party which was not contented with declaring that the negro ought to be free, but that the negro was the equal of the white man, because all men are naturally equal. If Macaulay ever believed this doctrine, his faith must have been rudely shaken by his Indian experience. In our Eastern Empire he found races as physically and mentally superior to the negro as the European is to the effeminate Asiatic. If, then, the negro is fit to be treated as the political equal of the European, much greater must be the fitness of the native Indians for this equality. But not so, and Macaulay was no sooner brought into contact with an inferior race than he perceived the fallacy of the doctrine. So marked is the difference that he tells us that "to be an Englishman is a rank in India," and in one of his minutes he observes:—

What is the great difficulty which meets us whenever we meditate any extensive reform in India? It is this; that there is no helping men who will not help themselves. The phenomena which strikes an observer with the greatest surprise, and which, more than any other, damps his hopes of being able to serve the people of this country, is their own apathy, their own passiveness under wrongs. He comes from a land in which the spirit of the meanest rises up against the insolence or injustice of the richest and the most powerful; he finds himself in a land where the patience of the oppressed invites the oppressor to repeat his injuries.

Self-government would be the greatest curse we could inflict upon India, and if the people of India left to themselves could govern themselves, still it is impossible for Europeans to live with them on any other terms than that of masters. But because the rule of England must be absolute it need not be tyrannical, and, indeed, with despotisms tyranny is the worst possible policy, because loyalty is then made to depend solely on fear, instead of being also supported by respect and affection.

The rejection of Macaulay by the electors of Edinburgh, on the ground of his Roman Catholic tendencies, is not an act that can be easily defended, but it may be palliated. Macaulay was so tolerant that we defy anyone, from reading his History, to tell whether he was a Roman Catholic or a Protestant. We know he was a political Protestant, but do not those glowing eulogies of Romanism indicate the religion of his heart? We are aware he was a Protestant, but not from his writings. Again, how loudly he proclaimed his full toleration for the creeds of India. Such toleration is indifferentism and irreligion, and is not a quality that public men should parade. A statesman may act tolerantly without confessing, or even feeling, an equal veneration for all religions or forms of religious worship. The popular mind does not discriminate between the atheism that rejects all religions, and the toleration that equally respects all religions. It regards the one as irreverent as the other.

Happily, the last honour bestowed upon Macaulay was for services not rendered to a party, but to England, and to the cause of constitutional liberty. But for his "History of England" he would not, probably, have been raised to the peerage; and no one denies that the eloquent historian of his country deserved a place in the Painted Chamber.

Mr. Arnold has not produced a life of Lord Macaulay, but his book is an imperfect sketch, furnished with ample quotations from speeches and writings; nevertheless it is a volume that will repay perusal.

* The Public Life of Lord Macaulay. By the Rev. Frederick Arnold, B.A. (London: Tinsley Brothers.)

A NORTHERN ACCOUNT OF THE CAPTURE OF HARPER'S FERRY.

(From the New York Times.)

Another serious reverse has overtaken the national arms. Harper's Ferry, the Union stronghold on the Upper Potomac, has been overwhelmed by the rebel hordes, and on Monday morning at 8 o'clock, surrendered after three days' fighting. What so many feared was successfully accomplished; the heavy siege guns on the Maryland heights were successfully attacked in the rear, and we lay at their mercy.

A glance at the map will enable us to understand why it could not be held against such powerful odds. The village is situated on the Potomac (sixty-six miles from Washington, and eighty-two miles from Baltimore) where it forms a conjunction with the Shenandoah, these two rivers uniting their energies, as it were, for cutting a channel through the lofty range of mountains before them. On the east bank of the Potomac, which here runs in a south-easterly direction, are the precipitous Maryland Heights, thousands of feet high, and consisting of three distinct ranges, known as the Elk, South, and Catoctin Mountains, the two former being more directly opposite the ferry. On the right bank of the Shenandoah, which flows into the Potomac from a south-westerly direction, are the famous Loudon Heights, where the guerilla loves to make his retreat. These are also very lofty and steep. Clustering around the base and climbing up the sides of the point formed by the junction of the rivers is to be seen the village proper. About three-quarters of a mile up there is a small valley extending across from river to river, and on beyond the Bolivar Heights, which command Harper's Ferry. The Maryland Heights not only command Harper's Ferry and Bolivar Heights, but the Loudon Heights and the country for miles around. Artillery planted on them have been known to do splendid execution to the distance of four miles. A few weeks since four rebel cavalymen, who had taken up their abode in a school-house at that distance down the valley, were entirely annihilated by a hail from the heights.

Being well aware of the strength of this position, our forces posted some weeks since two 126-pounders, one 96 rifled, and four brass Napoleons part way up the mountain, in a spot which had been cleared. Recently the clearing had been enlarged, giving the guns a wider range. These seven guns were able to keep any force at bay approaching up the valley, and dismount any guns planted on the surrounding summits. As Jackson once said, whoever held them successfully was able to bid defiance to the world. The artificial defences of the place consisted of a heavy line of earth entrenchments, with a deep trench in front, crested on the brow of Harper's Ferry proper, and extending from the Potomac nearly across to the Shenandoah. These were built several months since by 1,000 contrabands in the employ of the Government. There were also rude earthworks thrown up on Bolivar Heights last week, designed to protect infantry in musketry fire. In the event of our forces being driven from these, it was designed to have them fall back to the former. On the left of Bolivar Heights formidable hedge entrenchments prevented a sudden approach from that quarter.

About the commencement of the month, Colonel Dixon II. Miles, of Bull Run memory, who succeeded General Sigel (General Saxton's successor) to the command of the post, began to apprehend a forward movement by the enemy. On Monday, September 1, the 87th Ohio, Colonel Banning, was sent down with two howitzers to the vicinity of Nolan's Ferry to prevent their crossing. They took up a position on the Maryland side of the canal, which runs parallel with the river. The enemy appeared and succeeded in crossing, when Colonel Banning destroyed the canal-bridge, killed five of the enemy, and withdrew before the large force with no loss. From that time it was known that the enemy had entered Maryland, and Colonel Miles began to strengthen his position at every point. His force consisted of the 12th New York State Militia, Colonel Ward; 87th Ohio (three months' regiment), Colonel Banning; 126th New York, Colonel Sherrill; 111th New York, Colonel Segoin; 1st Maryland Home Brigade, Colonel Halsey; 8th New York Cavalry, Colonel Davis; 1st Maryland Cavalry, Colonel Russell; a detachment of the 1st Maryland Cavalry (Home Brigade), two companies of 5th New York Artillery, commanded by Captains McGrath and Graham; 15th Indiana, and one or two more Western batteries. All of the infantry, with the exception of the three months' men, were raw troops. General White retreated about this time to Martinsburgh, via Harper's Ferry, leaving a portion of his command here. On Thursday evening, being obliged to evacuate Martinsburgh, owing to the approach of "Stonewall" Jackson, the remainder of General White's brigade fell back to the ferry.

THE FIGHT OF FRIDAY.

On the morning of this day the enemy had begun to make their appearance, three miles away, on the Maryland Heights, near Solomon's Gap, having ascended from the rear. During the week we had advanced to the extreme top of the mountain, and constructed a barricade of trees 400 yards in front of what is known as the "look-out," and not far from an open clearing. Colonel Ford, of the 32nd Ohio, appointed to guard the heights, desired very much to make the fight at Solomon's Gap, through which they would have to enter, believing that he could hold it successfully. Being, however, overruled in his wish, he deployed on Friday afternoon portions of his own and the 126th New York as pickets, under Major Hewett, 32nd Ohio, along the mountain this side of the Gap. Skirmishing commenced at about half-past 3 o'clock, continuing until sundown. Owing to the thick underbrush the skirmish was of a bush-whacking character, as, indeed, was all the fighting on the heights. The Garibaldi Guards, 39th New York, were in the meantime scouting still further to the left. Under cover of night, Major Hewett deployed his men as pickets from one side to the other of the mountain, and then went down to headquarters to ask for reinforcements, believing that the enemy would attack him in force on the morrow. He was promised two or three regiments as soon as they could come up in the morning.

Few slept that night. At daybreak the line of battle was formed about 300 yards in front of our barricade as follows:—Companies K and B, 1st Maryland Home Brigade, held the extreme right, the 126th New York next in order, 32nd Ohio front and centre, Garibaldi Guard extreme left. The reinforcements were sent up late, eight companies of the 3rd

Maryland Home Brigade not reaching the field until 8 o'clock, and the 11th New York not until near noon, too late to render any assistance to companies I and H of the 1st Maryland Cavalry. "Russell's Roughs" advanced on foot, with revolver and carbine in hand, in front of the line of battle near to the clearing. The enemy appearing on the other side, they fell back. The rebels then, about 7 o'clock, opened with musketry on the front and right, and made two partial charges, in which they were handsomely repulsed. Fighting became general along the whole line, continuing one hour. At the end of this time the rebels received reinforcements and advanced with terrific yells, at the same time beating the long roll. The 126th New York then became disorganized, and the whole line fell back to the barricade, fighting as they receded. Having reached the barricade, a new stand was made. Colonel Sherrill, of the 126th, gallantly dismounted from his horse, and, with revolver in each hand, rallied his wavering troops. The balls fell thick and fast around him, but he never flinched, calling upon his boys to stay by him, until he was shot in the mouth by a musket-ball, and borne to the rear. Two-thirds of the regiment rallied, and fought well during the rest of the engagement. We maintained our position for several hours, Company K of the 1st Maryland Home Brigade, with its handful of men, preventing a flank movement on the right, but, the enemy turning our left flank, we were obliged to fall back again for some distance. The 8th Company of the Maryland Home Brigade then coming to the support, we advanced, re-occupying the look-out. Again, however, the enemy succeeded in flanking us on the left, and we were obliged to fall back, first to the guns, and afterwards down the mountain.

Our large guns on the heights commenced shelling the woods in the rear at 10 o'clock, and kept it up until half-past 3, p.m. (one hour and twenty minutes after the order to spike them had been given.) They were then dismounted, spiked, and otherwise rendered ineffective. Too much praise cannot be awarded to Captain McGrath, when commanding the guns, for the skilful manner in which he manned them. A detachment of Fremont's, more familiarly known as "Jackass" guns, were taken to the heights during the day, and rendered valuable assistance. They were manned by company 1, 12th regiment New York State Militia. Colonel Fort, though seriously indisposed, left his coach repeatedly to go upon the field.

Captain Russell, of the Maryland Home Brigade, who exchanged the pastorate of the Presbyterian Church at Williamsport for his captaincy, displayed much fearlessness and courage, at one time mounting the breastworks in full view of the rebels, who were close upon it. Lieutenant St. Clair, company B, 32nd Ohio, also exhibited much heroism. First Lieutenant Samuel A. Bares, of the 126th New York, showed so much coolness while endeavouring to rally his wavering companions as to attract the attention of Colonel Miles. Lieutenant-Colonel Downy, of the 3rd Maryland Home Brigade, was also complimented by the Colonel for his courage and skill in handling his troops. Corporal Chapman, of the 126th New York, brought down a rebel Colonel. During the engagement the 126th unfortunately fired upon one another, killing three. By a premature explosion, two members of Captain McGrath's battery were blown to pieces. I was standing close by at the time, watching the splendid firing of the piece. God deliver me from ever again witnessing such a sight as those mangled and disfigured bodies presented! One lived for several moments, but died as we were lifting him into an ambulance.

While several members of Company K, 1st Maryland, were taking breakfast, after the first repulse of the enemy, five different balls struck the table. W. Hemen, of the 126th New York, had his hat shot off; Gordon Williams, of the 32nd Ohio, had his right lock of hair shot away. A rebel ball carried away a portion of the gun-stock belonging to M. H. Bingham, of Company C, 3rd Ohio, and glancing struck W. Koff's gun, of the same company.

At 4 o'clock the regiments retreated down the mountain in good order, and the Maryland Heights was thence-forward lost to us.

Who gave the order for their evacuation I am unable to say. Certain it is that every soldier was ready to stigmatize its author, whoever he may have been, as a coward or traitor. And yet it may have been best, under the circumstances. Had more troops been drawn from Bolivar Heights for the defence of the large guns, our position then might have been weakened as to invite an easy and successful attack from the enemy, who had made their appearance in that direction in large numbers.

No sooner had our troops retired to the valley before the rebels occupied the heights above the guns and deliberately commenced a musketry fire upon the village below, which was returned by our soldiers. A shell from one of our batteries posted near the bridge, however, caused them to skedaddle in quick time. Everybody retired that night feeling that all was lost unless reinforcements arrived, and expected to be awake on the morrow with the booming of artillery from the evacuated heights.

Morning came, but with it no signs of the enemy, except in front. Our guns and camps on the mountains remained just as we had left them, and yet the silence was ominous of no good. One rifled 6-pounder and one 12-pounder Napoleon remained posted at the bridge to guard it and prevent an approach from Sandy Hook below. The 1st Maryland Home Brigade took position near the pontoon bridge to destroy it should the enemy attempt to make a crossing, while a portion of the 87th Ohio was so posted as to guard the approach from Winchester. Four 20-pound Parrots, three 24 howitzers, and several 12 and 6-pounders were planted in the graveyard half-way up the hill, and behind the first line of intrenchments, to open on Loudon and Maryland Heights. They continued shelling them for several hours. The line of battle was formed on the breastworks behind the Bolivar Heights, nearly as it had been the day before—viz., Colonel D'Uzay occupied the extreme right with his brigade, consisting of the 65th Illinois, 111th, 115th, and 39th New York, Garibaldi Guard, Captain Phelps' New York, and 15th Indiana batteries, and two sections of the 5th New York Artillery, Colonel Trimble's Brigade, consisting of the 32d and 60th Ohio, 126th and 135 New York, detachments of the 3d Maryland Home Brigade, 9th Vermont (deployed as skirmishers), and Rigby's Battery, occupied the extreme left. The 12th New York Militia remained posted behind the first intrenchments, and a portion of Captain Pott's battery were moved up to the Bolivar Heights and planted near the Charlestown road. General White commanded the heights. Major M'Intyre all the artillery, and General Miles held command over all the forces. Colonel Baring, acting Brigadier-General, whose forces consisted of all the infantry and artillery (5th New York and Pott's Battery) behind the first line of intrenchments, continued to shell the neighbouring heights. At about 12 o'clock two companies of the Garibaldi Guard and two of the 65th Ohio bravely ascended the Maryland Heights, secured some of their camp equipage, and brought down four of the pieces of artillery which had been left spiked. This was a daring deed. On the day before a portion of the Garibaldians, who were doing picket duty, barely escaped capture, no word having been sent them to retreat. Hour after hour passed by, and no signs of the enemy appearing on the heights, we were beginning to think that they were foiled in their plans, and that the only force we should have to contend with was that in front.

"The hope, however, was dispelled when, at 10 minutes to 2 o'clock, they opened a furious fire simultaneously from Maryland, Loudon Heights, and Sandy Hook, with howitzers. Our artillery replied with much spirit, Captains M'Elrath and Graham, of the 5th Artillery, silencing the Loudon batteries. Shot and shell flew in every direction, and the soldiers and citizens were compelled to seek refuge behind rocks, in houses, and elsewhere. The enemy opened two more guns on the Shepleydown, and a full battery on the Charlestown roads. Heavy cannonading was thus brought to bear upon us from five different points. Yet we held our own manfully until it closed, toward sunset. About dusk the enemy in front opened a musketry fire on our left, which was replied to by the 32nd Ohio, 9th Vermont, and 1st Maryland. It continued some time, when our forces were obliged to contract their lines, the rebels having turned our left flank.

An attempt to storm Rigby's battery about 8 o'clock, which did fearful execution, signally failed. During the afternoon the 11th and 115th and 39th New York moved down the hill to the outskirts of a piece of woods, where they took up position for the night. By some mistake, the 11th fired into one another about 9 o'clock, killing several. All became quiet and the men slept on their arms. During the night, the 126th New York fell back to a ravine running at right angles with our line of defence, and the 9th Vermont changed position, so as to support Rigby's battery. Under cover of the night the enemy planted new batteries in every direction.

Monday morning the rebels opened fire on Bolivar Heights at 5 o'clock, which was replied to until 8, when our ammunition gave out. The rebel batteries were so arranged as to enfilade us completely. To hold out longer seemed madness. Where is McClellan, that he does not send us reinforcements? Heavy firing is heard in the direction of Martinsburgh and Sandy Hook, indicating the presence of Sigel and Banks, but why are no reinforcements sent to us? Fully one week and a half has elapsed since the enemy crossed into Maryland, evidently with the design of capturing this place. Are we to be left to our fate?

A few minutes after 8 a council of war was held. The brave Colonel D'Uzay for one voted never to surrender, and requested that he might have the privilege of cutting his way out. White flags were run up in every direction, and a flag of truce was sent to enquire on what conditions a surrender would be accepted. General A. P. Hill sent back word that it must be unconditional. Further parleying resulted in our obtaining the following liberal conditions, which were accepted:—

The officers were to be allowed to go out with their side arms and private effects; the rank and file with everything save arms and equipments.

A murmur of disapprobation ran along the whole line when it became known that we had surrendered. Captain McGrath burst into tears, exclaiming, "Boys, we have got no country now." Other officers exhibited a corresponding degree of grief, while the soldiers were decidedly demonstrative in their manifestations of rage. Yet, what could be done? Rebel batteries were opened on us from seven different directions, and there was no hope of reinforcements reaching us.

I afterwards ascertained from Confederate officers that the forces which beleaguered us were not far short of 100,000. General D. H. Hill's army, consisting of several divisions, was posted on the Maryland Heights, and General Walker, with several brigades, on Loudon. Those directly in front of us were commanded by Jackson and A. P. Hill, and consisted, among others, of Jackson's old division, now commanded by General Stark (at present under arrest), Ewell's division, General Gregg's South Carolina Brigade, numbering six regiments, General Branch's brigade of North Carolinians, Generals Pindar's and Archy's brigades, 2nd Louisiana and 2nd and 3rd Virginia brigades.

As soon as the terms of surrender were completed, Generals A. P. Hill and Jackson rode into town, accompanied by their staff, and followed by a troop of Loudon soldiers, who straightway commenced looking for "those d— London guerillas," referring to Captain Meus's Union Company, who were fortunately not to be found. General Hill immediately took up his headquarters in the tavern stand, next Colonel Miles's. "Old Stonewall," after riding the river, returned to Bolivar Heights, the observed of all observers. He was dressed in the coarsest kind of homespun, seedy and dirty at that; wore an old hat which any Northern beggar would consider an insult to have offered him, and in his general appearance was in no respect to be distinguished from the mongrel barefooted crew who follow his fortunes. I had heard much of the decayed appearance of the rebel soldiers, but such a looking crowd! Ireland in her worst straits could present no parallel, and yet they glory in their shame.

As soon as Jackson returned from the village, our entire force (11,500) was mustered on Bolivar preparatory to stacking arms and delivering over generally. The artillery taken comprised the following:—Twelve 3-inch rifled guns, six James's, six 24-lb. howitzers, four 20-lb. Parrott guns, six 12-lb. guns, four 12-lb. howitzers, two 10-inch Dahlgren, one 50-lb. Parrott, six 6-lb. guns, and several pieces of "Fremont's guns" of but little value. Seven of the whole number were thoroughly spiked. But few horses were taken, the cavalry having secured most of them. The Commissary Department comprised six days' rations for 12,000 men. This embraces nearly all the Government property which was surrendered.

THE RESULTS OF THE WAR TO THE NORTH.—If any one would sum up the results impartially, he would find that thus far the war has cost the lives of 200,000 men, and the limbs and health of as many more; that it has added one thousand millions of dollars to the Federal, and half as much to the Confederate debt; that it has divided the North and South into two irreconcilable nationalities, retarded the progress of the country for half a century, and enriched the previously superabundant vocabulary of American slang with the word "skedaddle." If there are any other results they may be traced in the daily encroachments of the Federal Executive, and in the gradual disappearance of almost every public right and constitutional liberty for the establishment of which Washington and his comrades resisted to the death the whole might of Great Britain.—The Times' Correspondent.

FRANCIS FORD, Manufacturer,
MANCHESTER: Three and Six Cord Spool
Thread, Cotton Balls, Knitting and Embroidering
Cottons. Imported by WALTER AND MOORE,
Norfolk, Va.; F. RIMAILLO AND NEYREY,
New Orleans.

R. D. RUSDEN, MANCHESTER,
ENGLAND. American Drills of all kinds,
Denims, Stripes, Shirtings, and all sorts of Manchester Goods.

SEARING AND CO.,
Commission Merchants,
MOBILE AND NEW ORLEANS, C.F.A.
Represented by E. G. BEESLEY, Cotton Broker, 2, Byrom-court, Royal-exchange, Manchester.

ROBINSON & OLIVER,
Commission Merchants,
NEW ORLEANS,
C.S.A.
Represented by
T. ROBINSON & CO.,
India Buildings, Water-street,
Liverpool.

JOHN FRASER & CO.,
CHARLESTON,
South Carolina.
FRASER, TRENHOLM, & CO.,
Liverpool,
Commission Merchants.

REID AND STEWART, Com-
mission Merchants, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.
Represented by Andrew Stewart, 1, Rufford-place,
Liverpool.

HARPER AND CAUGHEY,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA. Represented by J. and A. CAUGHEY,
Tempest Chambers, Tempest Hey, Liverpool.

TO EAST INDIA MERCHANTS.

A GENTLEMAN, in his 30th Year,
who has had nearly 10 Years' experience in
the Manchester Yarn and Cloth Market as a SALESMAN,
also 24 Years' experience in East Indian and
American Cottons, desires to go out to Bombay,
under the auspices of a first class firm, to act as their Cotton buyer.
Address, BOX, J. 19, Post-office, Manchester.

TO SOUTHERN AMERICAN FAMILIES IN PARIS.

A FRENCH LADY,—living with
her mother and her daughter in a pleasant
location close by the Champs-Elysées—offers the comforts of a home and motherly care and attention, together with the advantages of the best
education and excellent music-teaching, for TWO YOUNG CHILDREN, or for a YOUNG LADY
under fifteen.
Address, MADAME DE W., care of Mr. Lagier,
17, Rue de la Paix, Paris.

A. M. GAUTIER, Tailor, 229,
Rue de la Paix, London (and 20, Rue de la Chausée d'Antin in Paris.)

MRS. E. PRESTON,
31, BURY STREET, ST. JAMES, S.W.
Furnished Apartments and Bed Rooms to Let.
References to Hon. Wm. L. Yancey, Hon. J. E.
Macfarland, and Henry Fitzee, Esq.

MR. WILLIAM FREEMAN,
Publisher of THE INDEX, will promptly
attend to all orders from or for the Continent of Europe and the States. Commissions for books and
goods of all kinds undertaken on moderate terms.
102, Fleet-street, London.

WORKS RECENTLY PUBLISHED

BY WILLIAM FREEMAN,
102, FLEET STREET.

SHIFTING SCENES: and Other Poems. By J.
STANLEY BIGG. Fcap. 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.; hand-
somer bound, 5s.
POEMS OF TRUTH AND FANCY. By S. R.
REDMAN. Crown 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.
THE WEARMOUTH ABBOTS. (Second Edition.)
A Tale, illustrative of Saxon Christianity. Fcap.
8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.
London: William Freeman, 102, Fleet Street.

Crescent Mutual Insurance Company, New Orleans.

OFFICE:
Corner of Camp and Commercial Place.
TWELFTH ANNUAL STATEMENT.

Amount of Premiums for ten months ending 30th April, 1861	831,876 14
Profits for ten months to 30th April, 1861	257,238 27
Assets, 30th April, 1861	1,442,959 95

The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of THIRTY PER CENT., after paying interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved to redeem forty per cent. of the issue of 1858, payable as follows:—
Twenty per cent. 10th June, 1861.
Twenty per cent. 10th September, 1861.
Scrip Certificates for the year 1861, deliverable on and after the 12th day of August next.

THOMAS A. ADAMS, President.
G. W. SPATT, Secretary.

Citizens' Mutual Insurance Company of New Orleans.

The Board of Trustees, have resolved to pay an interest of SIX PER CENT. in cash on the outstanding certificates of profits to the holders thereof, or their legal representatives, on and after the second Monday in February next; also, to declare a dividend of Twenty per cent. (20 per cent.) on the net earned premiums of the Company, for the year ending 30th November, 1861, for which certificates will be issued on and after the second Monday in February next.

TRUSTEES.

Geo. W. West, Vice-President.	M. Mason.
D. Johnson.	R. P. Hunt.
A. Mittenberger.	Martin Gordon, jun.
J. Lewis.	C. A. Oliver.
Jas. A. White.	A. Gault.
Douglas West.	Maria Augustin.
	Omer Gaillard.

Now ready, in 1 vol. 8vo. price 10s. 6d. cloth.

THE SOUTH VINDICATED:

Being a Series of Letters written for the American Press during the Canvass for the Presidency in 1860, with a Letter to Lord Brougham on the John Brown Raid, and a Survey of the Result of the Presidential Contest, and its consequences.

BY
THE HON. JAMES WILLIAMS,
Late American Minister to Turkey.
WITH AN INTRODUCTION
BY JOHN BAKER HOPKINS.
London: LONGMAN, GREEN, and Co., 14, Ludgate Hill.

Price 6s. Annual Subscription, prepaid, 21s. Post free.

THE HOME AND FOREIGN REVIEW, No. II. (OCTOBER, 1862.)

CONTENTS.

1. PERRAUD ON IRELAND.
 2. POOR RELIEF IN ENGLAND AND FRANCE.
 3. GENERAL AVERAGE.
 4. HAVIL.
 5. VICTOR HUGO'S "MISÉRABLES."
 6. THE EARLIEST EPOCHES OF AUTHENTIC CHRONOLOGY.
 7. DOLLINGER'S "HEATHENISM AND JUDAISM."
 8. MANUSCRIPTS AT CAMBRIDGE.
 9. CARDINAL WISEMAN AND "THE HOME AND FOREIGN REVIEW."
 10. CONTEMPORARY LITERATURE.
 11. CURRENT EVENTS.
- WILLIAMS AND NORGATE, Henrietta-street, Covent-garden, London; and South Frederick-street, Edinburgh.

European and Confederate States Advertising Agency.

THE object of this Agency is to effect a direct trade alliance between the European and the Southern Press, through the medium of advertising. The most practicable mode of introducing the Merchants, Manufacturers, Capitalists, Insurance Companies, &c., of Foreign Countries, to the Southern Trade, is by an organised, classified, and liberal SYSTEM OF ADVERTISING. Trade, like time and tide, waits for no man. The commerce of the world will not pause in ruinous inaction, but will commence its irresistible ebb and flow the moment peace is established. One of the most dangerous, corrupting, and insidious means to be used by the North will be the medium of advertising in Southern papers. Advertising Agencies are already organised in every Northern city, and only bide their time. We must see to it that our papers are so filled with Foreign Advertisements and the advertisements of Southern Importers, Dealers, and Manufacturers, that there will not be space left in any Southern newspaper for the advertisement of a single Yankee notion. Then will our papers present to their readers a faithful mirror of Dealers, Manufacturers, &c., in the Old World, and of our business men at home, and thus attach to Southern interest that mighty lever "the Press," and disrupt the tie which, by means of Northern advertising, has had so much influence in binding the South to the North, and its enemies. Through the medium of a liberal advertising patronage, our Southern editors can be maintained against the stagnation in their business, which proceeds from interrupted or disorganised trade.

The object of this Agency is threefold:—
1st. To advertise European Merchants, Manufacturers, Hotels, Railroads, Insurance Companies, &c., &c., in Southern papers.
2nd. To advertise Southern business, property, &c., in European journals.
3rd. To advertise home industry and Southern enterprise in our own papers, and thereby build up the cities of our Confederacy, instead of those of our enemies.

Our arrangements abroad are all completed. We now address you this preliminary Circular, to ask you to send us duplicate copies of your paper, accompanied by a private letter (which shall be strictly confidential), stating your terms of advertising, &c.
We will soon appoint agents in each important sea-port and inland city of Atlantic, and previous to the 1st of January, 1863, on account of its geographical position. We respectfully ask for this enterprise your hearty co-operation and assistance, and guarantee, in return, strict integrity in all business transactions.

By order of the Board of Directors,
WILLIAM H. BARNES,
SUPERINTENDENT.
Atlanta, Ga., August 24, 1861.

Louisiana Mutual Insurance Company.

Office:
Iron Building, corner Camp and Natchez Streets.
Amount of Premiums for the year ending 28th February, 1861 699,328 70
Amount of Profits for the year ending 28th February, 1861 213,759 74
Amount of Assets for the year ending 28th February, 1861 $66,420 98
The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of THIRTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent. interest on outstanding Scrip, and have ordered the redemption of Fifty per cent. of the Scrip Issue of 1859.

Interest and redeemable Scrip payable on and after the second Monday of May next.
Certificates of Scrip for the year 1861 deliverable on and after 1st June, 1861.

CHARLES BRIGGS, President.
R. P. JANVIER, Secretary.
New Orleans, March 20, 1861.

Home Mutual Insurance Company of New Orleans.

OFFICE: 128, Camp Street.
Amount of Premiums for year ending 31st December, 1861 433,725 47
Amount of Profits for year ending 31st December, 1861 282,908 38
Amount of Assets on 31st December, 1861 1,358,306 77
The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of FIFTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent. interest on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved to redeem the Scrip of 1857.
Interest and redeemable Scrip, payable in cash on and after 10th February next.
Certificates of Scrip, for the year 1861, deliverable on and after 15th March, 1862.

Merchants' Mutual Insurance Company of New Orleans.

At a meeting of the Board of Directors held this day it was resolved to declare a Scrip dividend of TWENTY PER CENT. on the net earned premiums of the last year, and also to pay Six per cent. interest on the outstanding Scrips of the Company. Scrip Certificates to be issued on and after the first day of August next.

Geo. Campbell.
John Pemberton.
P. Mason.
P. Pont.
C. Bonold.
G. Mittenberger.

PAYNE, HUNTINGDON AND CO., NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Cotton Factors.

MOSES GREENWOOD, NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Cotton Factor and Commission Merchant.

McDOWELL, WITHERS, AND CO., MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A., Commission Merchants.

GARLAND GOODE, MOBILE, Cotton Factor and Commission Merchant.

BOYKIN AND McRAE, Cotton Factors and Commission Merchants, MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

MILLER AND BATIE, Exchange Brokers, MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

R. AND D. G. MILLS, Cotton Factors and Commission Merchants, GALVESTON, TEXAS, C.S.A.

ROTCHFORD, BROWN, AND CO., Cotton Factors, NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A.

R. W. RAYNE, NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Commission Merchant, offers facilities to European Consignors of Boots and Shoes to supply the markets of Tennessee, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Alabama. Specifications furnished of goods suitable to these markets.

ANDREW LOW AND CO., Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.

CHARLES GREEN, Commission Merchant, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.

H. D. WEEDE AND CO., Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.

JAMES CHAPMAN, Commission Merchant, CHARLESTON.

N. A. HARDEE AND CO., Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.

J. W. ANDERSON AND CO., Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.

R. N. GOURDINE AND CO., Commission Merchants, Charleston.

J. H. ASHBRIDGE AND CO., Shipping and Commission Merchants, NEW ORLEANS.

Office—No. 80, Tower-buildings West, Liverpool.
Agents—Liverpool and New Orleans Mail Steam Navigation Company.

S. A. PLUMMER AND CO., Importers and Dealers in Hardware, PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA, C.S.A.

H. O. BREWER & CO., MOBILE, ALABAMA, General Commission and Shipping Merchants.

WARWICK AND BARKSDALE, GALLEGO FLOUR MILLS. This immense establishment of capacity to manufacture 1000 barrels of Flour per day, purely for South American Market. RICHMOND.

JOSEPH R. ANDERSON, TREDEGAR IRON WORKS. Manufacturers of Locomotive and other Engines, all descriptions of Machinery, Billed Cannon, &c. RICHMOND.

DUNLOP, MONCURE, & CO., General Commission Merchants, RICHMOND.

A. G. MILWAINE, AND CO., Commission Merchants, Tobacco, Cotton, Grain, and other produce, PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA.

C. W. WHITE, Commission Merchant, ST. THOMAS, WEST INDIES.

HAMILTON AND GRAHAM, Importers, Wholesale Dealers in Dry Goods, &c., PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA.

H. LEVY AND SON, Commission Merchants, MOBILE.

BRITISH AND NORTH AMERICAN ROYAL MAIL SHIPS.

NOTICE.
These Steamers call at CORK HARBOUR on both Outward and Homeward Passages, to receive and Land Mails.

Freight by the Mail Steamers to Halifax and Boston, and to New York, £3 per ton, and 5 per cent. primeage.

PARCELS.—Parcels containing samples of Goods on board will be taken free of freight by the Mail Steamers.

Freight on other Parcels 5s. each and upwards, according to size.

Parcels for different Consignees, collected and made up in Single Packages, addressed to one party for delivery in America, for the purpose of evading the payment of duty, will, on examination in America, by the Customs, be charged with the proper Freight.

Dogs not taken on any terms.

The British and North American Royal Mail Steam-Packet Company, draw the attention of Shippers and Passengers to the 23rd section of the New Merchant Shipping Act, which is as follows:—

"No person shall be entitled to carry in any ship, or to require the master or owner of any ship to carry therein, aquaritos, oil of vitriol, gunpowder, or any other goods which, in the judgment of such master or owner, are of a dangerous nature; and if any person carries or sends by any ship any goods of a dangerous nature, without distinctly marking their nature on the outside of the package containing the same, or otherwise giving notice in writing to the master or owner, at or before the time of carrying or sending the same to be shipped, he shall, for every such offence, incur a penalty not exceeding £100; and the master or owner of any ship who refuse to take on board any parcels that he suspects to contain goods of a dangerous nature, and may require them to be opened to ascertain the fact,

The Index,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS,
LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

Published every Thursday Evening.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

Subscriptions, Twenty-six Shillings per annum. Stamped, Thirty Shillings per annum.

Nos. I. to XXIII. NOW READY.

Office:—102, Fleet-street.

In this great metropolis, on the native soil of free speech and a free press, every interest—political, social, religious, literary, scientific, benevolent, commercial, however remote, however small the class to which it addresses itself—has long had its recognized representative in Journalism, through which it seeks to obtain a share of the public attention. The one solitary exception has heretofore been in the case of the Confederate States of America. Engaged in a life-and-death struggle against a vastly superior foe—hemmed in on all sides, quite as effectually by the deserts of the Far West and of Mexico, as by the enemy's armies and navies—they suffer even more from that intellectual blockade which excludes them from communion with the rest of mankind, than from the commercial difficulties of obtaining their much needed supplies. The disruption of the American Union—despite repeated warnings—started Europe without at once awakening it to a full consciousness of the reality and importance of the event. So little had the internal politics of America entered into the routine of European thoughts, that even now—when the effects are undeniable and irrevocable—the causes still remain a mystery and a riddle to by far the greater portion of the intelligent European public. When the catastrophe occurred, the Northern States had the ear of the Governments and of the peoples; and so zealously have they retained it, so ingeniously and persistently have they pleaded their cause, so imperfect and distorting was the medium through which alone the South's voice could be heard, that Europe may fairly be said to have listened to but one side of the quarrel. It is true that the respectable portion of the English press has treated the weaker party in that spirit of fair play upon which every Englishman prides himself; and, as the struggle progressed, has evinced a painstaking study of a perplexing subject, which stands in honorable contrast to the flippancy and indecorum of American Journalism. But this has not supplied the want, so long and keenly felt, of some organ of Southern interests and Southern opinions, to which the Statesman, the Journalist, the Merchant, and the public at large might look for reliable intelligence of the progress of events, and for valuable indications of the manner in which the South itself views and weighs the importance and bearing of those events.

This want it is one of the principal objects of "THE INDEX" to supply as far as possible. The measure of success which may reward the effort will necessarily depend upon the co-operation of the friends, and of the private, as well as official, representatives of the South in Europe. This co-operation has been most generously accorded us. There is a large amount of Southern intelligence which reaches Europe through various private channels. Still more important information is obtained from Northern sources, which finds no outlet through the muzzled press of those States. Much of such valuable material has already been placed at our disposal; and we have a reasonable prospect of making "THE INDEX" the receptacle and depository of all, or nearly all, that is available in the United Kingdom and on the Continent. Our arrangements are such that our friends may rely on this respect upon a scrupulous and sound discretion, and the inviolable sanctity of private communications.

While we have thus frankly explained one of the principal objects of "THE INDEX," it may be necessary to state—in order to prevent a possible misapprehension—that it is not the sole object. Literature and General News—in fact, every ingredient of a Weekly Journal—will command our earnest attention; and it will be our unremitting endeavour to make "THE INDEX" worthy of that liberal patronage which is promised us in advance. "THE INDEX" will be represented by competent Correspondents at the different capitals of the Continent, at Washington, and at Havannah. It is our design, also, that "THE INDEX" should partake of the character of a Magazine, without departing from its proper sphere as a Review of current events.

For the leaders and literary contributions, we shall enjoy the valuable aid of the pens of gentlemen already favourably known to the public.

The Cotton Market will monopolize much of our space, and is entrusted to hands theoretically and practically familiar with the subject and all questions bearing upon it.

It is superfluous to add that "THE INDEX" is necessarily committed to the advocacy of the principles of Free Trade.

Subscribers will be furnished with handsome Covers for each Half-Yearly Volume.

A full list of the original "INDEX" Subscribers and a carefully prepared Table of Contents will accompany the concluding number of each Volume.

Subscriptions and Advertisements to be sent, and Post-office Orders made payable to

WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102, FLEET ST., E.C.

Printed by HENRY F. MACKINTOSH, of 11, Grace-court, Fleet-street; and Published for the Proprietors by WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102, Fleet-street, London E.C.—October 2, 1862.

THE INDEX

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS, LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

OFFICE:—102, FLEET STREET.

Vol. I—No. 24.]

LONDON—THURSDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 9, 1862.

[PRICE 6D.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK
America	369
England	370
Europe	371
COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET—
Liverpool Letter	372
Manchester Letter	372
LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH—
Private Letter	372
FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE—
New York	373
Washington	373
LEADERS—
Aspect of the Abolition Edict	376
The Condition of the Federal Army	377
The Factory Folk	378
Manifesto of the Republicans of Italy	379
Editorial	379
AMERICAN CONFEDERACIES	379
REVIEWS—
Blackwood:—Ten Days in Richmond	381
Fraser:—The Two Constitutions	382
A Novel:—A Bad Beginning	382
LETTER TO THE EDITOR:—
The Decree for a Servile War	383
ADVERTISEMENTS	384

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

For a moment the war news is less interesting than the political movements. Mr. Lincoln has issued a proclamation—not of emancipation, as it has been hastily called, but rather, of servile war against those States which on the 1st of January, 1863, shall refuse to submit to the Federal yoke. A careful perusal of this curious document will at once show that it is simply a decree of vengeance, to which emancipation is only incidental and contingent.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.
PROCLAMATION.

Washington, Sept. 22.

I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States of America, and Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy thereof, do hereby proclaim and declare, that hereafter, as heretofore, the war will be prosecuted for the object of practically restoring the constitutional relations between the United States and the people thereof, in which States that relation is, or may be, suspended or disturbed; that it is my purpose, upon the next meeting of Congress, to again recommend the adoption of a practical measure tendering pecuniary aid to the free acceptance or rejection of all the Slave States, so called, the people whereof may not then be in rebellion against the United States, and which States may then have voluntarily adopted, or thereafter may voluntarily adopt, the immediate or gradual abolishment of slavery within their respective limits; and that the efforts to colonize persons of African descent, with their consent, upon the continent or elsewhere, with the previously obtained consent of the Governments existing there, will be continued; that on the 1st day of January, in the year of our Lord 1863, all persons held as slaves within any State, or any designated part of a State, the people whereof shall then be in rebellion against the United States, shall be then, thenceforward, and for ever free; and the Executive Government of the United States, including the military and naval authority thereof, will recognize and maintain the freedom of such persons, and will do no act or acts to repress such persons, or any of them, in any efforts they may make for their actual freedom; that the Executive will, on the 1st day of January aforesaid, by proclamation, designate the States and parts of States, if any in which the people thereof respectively shall then be in rebellion against the United States; and the fact that any State, or the people thereof, shall on that day be in good faith represented in the Congress of the United States by members chosen thereto at elections wherein a majority of the qualified voters of such State shall have participated shall, in the absence of strong countervailing testimony, be deemed conclusive evidence that such State and the people thereof have not been in rebellion against the United States.

That attention is hereby called to an Act of Congress, entitled "An Act to make an additional Article of War," approved March 13, 1862, and which Act is in the word and figure following:—

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, that hereafter the following shall be promulgated as an additional article of war for the government of the army of the United States, and shall be obeyed and observed as such:—

"Article.—All officers or persons in the military or naval service of the United States are prohibited from employing any of the forces under their respective commands for the purpose of returning fugitives from service or labour who may have escaped from any persons to whom such service or labour is claimed to be due, and any officer who shall be found guilty by a court-martial of violating this article shall be dismissed from the service.

"Section 2.—And be it further enacted that this Act shall take effect from and after its passage."

Also to the ninth and tenth sections of an Act entitled "An Act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862, and which sections are in the words and figures following:—

"Section 9.—And be it further enacted that all slaves of persons who shall hereafter be engaged in rebellion against the Government of the United States, or who shall in any way give aid or comfort thereto, escaping from such persons and taking refuge within the lines of the army, and all slaves captured from such persons, or deserted by them, and coming under the control of the Government of the United States, and all slaves of such persons found on (or being within) any place occupied by rebel forces, and afterwards occupied by the forces of the United States, shall be deemed captures of war, and shall be forever free of their servitude, and not again held as slaves.

"Section 10.—And be it further enacted that no slave escaping into any State, territory, or the district of Columbia, from any of the States, shall be delivered up, or in any way impeded or hindered of his liberty, except for crime or some offence against the laws, unless the persons claiming said fugitive shall first make oath that the person to whom the labour or service of such fugitive is alleged to be due is his lawful owner, and has not been in arms against the United States in the present rebellion nor in any way given aid and comfort thereto; and no person engaged in the military or naval service of the United States shall, under any pretence whatever, assume to decide on the validity of the claim of any person to the service or labour of any other person, or surrender up any person to the claimant, on pain of being dismissed from the service."

And I do hereby enjoin upon and order all persons engaged in the military and naval service of the United States to observe, obey, and enforce within their respective sphere of service the Act and sections above recited.

And the Executive will in due time recommend that all citizens of the United States who shall have remained loyal thereto throughout the rebellion shall, upon the restoration of the constitutional relation between the United States and their respective States and people (if the relation shall have been suspended or disturbed), be compensated for all losses by acts of the United States, including the loss of slaves.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

Done at the City of Washington, this 22nd day of September, in the year of our Lord 1862, and of the Independence of the United States the 87th.

By the President,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD, Secretary of State.

Mr. Lincoln, it will be perceived, has no objection to slavery, either in theory or practice. He regards it as a blessing to be enjoyed by "loyal" States—a benefit of which "disloyal" States are to be deprived. What Mr. Lincoln does object to is the presence of the black man. In this he faithfully represents the bitter animosity of the North to the negro. He desires to banish the coloured race from the continent—to deprive them of their home and country. Mr. Lincoln forgets that the negro has a strong attachment to the land of his birth, and is not willing to be deported; or, if he remember it, thinks that to transport negroes to places remarkable for their insalubrity is as good a fate as the black man ought to expect from his Abolitionist friends. But what we desire to direct attention to in the above proclamation is, that it does not in any way profess to be opposed to slavery in the abstract, but, on the contrary, will protect the system in "loyal" States. It treats the slaves as property which the "rebels" are to have taken from them. We need not stop to remark that according to the Constitution of the United States, the President has no more right to emancipate slaves than he has to suspend the Writ of Habeas Corpus in England. In issuing this proclamation, he has most distinctly and unequivocally violated the letter and spirit of the Constitution, but by this time the people of the North are used to seeing their laws and Constitution trampled upon by the Lincoln Government.

Well, how does Mr. Lincoln confiscate the property of the rebels? Does he tell them that when he has conquered the South he will free the slaves? Not at all. Does he tell the South that hereafter, where his armies penetrate, where they have possession, though but for a few hours, he will liberate the slaves? Not so. He declares the slaves on the 1st of January, 1863, "thenceforth and for ever free," and that the Government of the United States, and the military and naval forces of the United States "will recognize and maintain the freedom of such persons, and will do no act or acts to repress such persons, or any of them, in any efforts they may make for their actual freedom." We wish our readers to consider well these words, and to compare these statements. What do they mean?

What do they amount to? The slaves are invited to rebel against their masters. Three months' notice is given them, and at the end of that time, they are told, if they make any efforts for actual freedom—that is, if they will massacre the white population, for the black man can do nothing else for his actual freedom—the armies and fleets of the United States, so far from opposing them, will in no way repress such act or acts, but will even assist them. There is no obscurity about this passage of the proclamation; its intention is clear and unmistakable; and we dare not trust our pen to criticise the conduct of a Government which, beaten by an enemy greatly inferior in numbers, and, till lately, in resources, seeks to gain a triumph by stirring up a servile war. We will only say this, that it is worthy of a Government that confides in B. F. Butler, and gives promotion to Turchin.

Mr. Lincoln refers to those citizens who have remained loyal throughout the "rebellion," and guarantees to pay them for their slaves, but who will guarantee Mr. Lincoln's ability to pay?

Happily the proclamation for a servile war in the South will not have much influence. The negroes will not hear of it, or certainly not regard it. They have been faithful during this war, and have refused the opportunity offered them by such men as Hunter. Where the Federal armies are some disturbances may be expected, but the decree comes out after the Federal armies have been driven, for the most part, from the Southern territory. We say, advisedly, if Mr. Lincoln had been under the guidance of Southern advisers he could not have issued this decree at a time when it could do so little harm to the South.

The New York Times, in commenting on the proclamation, says:—"The wisdom of the step taken—we refer at present to that clause in the document which declares free the slaves of rebel States after the 1st January—is unquestionable; its necessity indisputable. It had been declared by President Lincoln, that as soon as this step became a necessity he should adopt it. Its adoption now is not a confession that the military means of suppressing the great rebellion have proved a failure; but simply that this is a point at which any other legitimate appliances that can be called in shall also be availed of. Slavery is an element of strength to the rebels, it left untouched; it will assuredly prove an element of weakness—it may be of total destruction—to them and their cause, when we make such use of it and its victims as lies in our power." Despite this, the reason, why other legitimate appliances may be called in to aid the North is the failure of military measures; and we beg to remind our readers of the change of tone that has come over Northern advocates, both in Europe and America. Formerly we were told of the overwhelming superiority of the Federals; that it was twenty millions to six millions, and that the South must succumb. Now we are told the South cannot be conquered whilst the slaves do the work at home. Grant that in the Confederate States there are three and a half millions of slaves, and that these, added to the whites, are equal to twelve millions. Still the Federals have twenty millions; and it is five to three; pretty good odds in favour of the North. Or are we to understand that slave labour is so much more productive than other labour? Or that unless the North is more than two to one she has no chance against the South? Supposing out of the twenty millions of Northerners four millions had to attend to agriculture, and we set these against the slaves of the South, it still leaves the numbers sixteen millions to eight millions. We are quite aware that the North is not strong enough to conquer the South, but the plea set forth that the South succeeds because of the agricultural help derived from her slaves, is absurd.

Why did Mr. Lincoln issue this proclamation? On September 13, he had delivered to the Chicago Emancipation Committee a reply to their letter concerning emancipation. He therein stated that he did not favour an emancipation proclamation, as it would be inoperative if issued, and if the slaves were armed their arms would fall into the hands of the rebels. On September 22, only nine days later, the emancipation proclamation was published. It will be in vain to tell us that the decree of the 22nd is not the Abolitionism pure and simple demanded by the Chicago Committee; for it is, at all events, as much as that committee could expect, and it has been received with the most enthusiastic delight by the ultra-Abolitionists. Why, then, such a sudden change in policy? It is evident Mr. Lincoln's opinions were not so altered in nine days, and that he acted from pressure, or, from a new view of surrounding circumstances. The New York World ascribes the change to a fear of foreign intervention. Now, from the 13th to the 22nd September nothing happened to make intervention appear more imminent; and even Mr. Seward cannot imagine that Christian Governments will be less inclined to interfere because the North confesses it has no chance of conquering the South except by stirring up a servile war. The true explanation of this sudden change of policy upon the most momentous question that has come before the Washington Government is the exigencies of the position of the Lincoln Cabinet. It was not in favour with the Republicans, it was not esteemed by the Democrats; it was denounced by the Abolitionists. It was found difficult to raise troops to continue the war, and still more difficult to maintain the Presidential authority. It became known to the Government that the Abolitionists were preparing to place Fremont at the head of affairs; and under the circumstances it was thought better to conciliate the Abolitionists, who have at once accepted Mr. Lincoln's action, and given him their allegiance vice Fremont. Whether this agreement will be lasting, or whether it will compensate for the enmity of the Democrats, we cannot say. It is not impossible that the Democrats may accept the situation, and that the world may once more behold the power of terrorism to hold a nation in subjection.

The Border States have already, as far as they have had the opportunity, protested against the proclamation; but this is no loss to the North, for the Border States have long been thoroughly Southern. But more important to Mr. Lincoln is the address of the Governors of sixteen States approving the decree. We give the text of the telegram announcing this adhesion:—

The Governors of sixteen Union States assembled on September 24, at Altoona (Pennsylvania), and adjourned on the 25th to Washington, where they presented an address to President Lincoln, expressing their determination to support his constitutional authority, approving the emancipation proclamation, and suggesting the expediency of raising a reserve force of 100,000 men.

The Governor of Maryland objected to sign the address approving the emancipation proclamation.

So far, Mr. Lincoln has been successful. He has been serenaded at Washington, on which occasion he made a speech, saying "he issued the proclamation after full deliberation, and under a heavy sense of responsibility. He trusted in God that he had made no mistake. It was now for America and the world, he said, to judge the proclamation, and it may be, to take action upon it." It is evident the speaker was not quite truthful, because of the change of policy in nine days; and there is something repulsive in his "trusting in God he had made no mistake" in seeking to subjugate a free people by bringing on them the unspeakable curse of a servile war. However, it is not fair at any time to criticise an after-serenade speech. Besides the approval of the Governors and serenaders, the

New York Republican State Convention expresses profound satisfaction.

But how can we find out the real feeling of the North with regard to the proclamation? The press is muzzled; the liberty of speech, as well as the liberty of the press, is gone. No man who is not ready to be immured in a cell for months without trial will express an opinion against any act of the Government. Still, there are two circumstances which enable us to form an estimate of the public sentiment.

Two days after the proclamation was issued, "President Lincoln suspended the Writ of Habeas Corpus, and declared martial law throughout the United States with respect to all persons arrested for aiding the rebellion, or hindering the draft." That is, he has placed the personal liberty of every citizen of the United States at the disposal of the military, for any one may be arrested and kept in prison without trial, upon the charge of aiding the rebellion, or hindering the draft. Why was this done? To place the entire country under martial law is a bold proceeding, seeing there is no invasion or revolution in the Northern States. Mr. Lincoln had heard of, or feared, active opposition to his proclamation, and by making the personal liberty of his subjects contingent upon his nod or favour, he seeks to strike terror into the hearts of those who might dare to oppose him. The suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, and the declaration of martial law throughout the United States, is a proof that the project of a servile war in the South is by no means universally popular.

Another sign of the measure not commanding confidence is the panic in Wall-street. On the evening of Sept. 22 (before the proclamation was issued) gold was 17½ premium; on the evening of Sept. 29, seven days later, gold was 23½ premium. The Journal of Commerce expresses the opinion of the mercantile community when it suggests that the proclamation can only lead to a continuation of the war.

The New York Herald, though obliged to assent to the action of the Government, counsels a remodeling of the Cabinet.

The Louisville Journal declares, though the assurance was hardly necessary, that Kentucky will never acquiesce in President Lincoln's proclamation.

Mr. Foote, of Tennessee, has offered the following resolution in the Confederate House of Representatives:—

Resolved, by the Congress of the Confederate States of America, That the signal success with which Divine Providence has so continuously blessed our arms for several months past would fully justify the Confederate Government in dispatching a commissioner or commissioners to the Government at Washington city, empowered to propose the terms of a just and honourable peace.

This was before the issue of Mr. Lincoln's proclamation.

The war news that has come to hand this week is of a less exciting character than usual. It certainly disposes of the alleged Federal triumphs. We learn from Southern sources that the Confederates at Antietam Creek numbered 60,000 men. Not only did the Confederates retire in perfect order, but a portion of the army remained in Maryland for some time after the main body had crossed the Potomac. Nor have the Federals been able to follow their enemy. The report of their crossing the river was false; they made several attempts to do so, but were repulsed. At the latest date, McClellan was reported to be constructing a pontoon-bridge, to enable his army to pass into Virginia.

The detailed accounts of the surrender of Harper's Ferry, and the quantity of booty taken, proves that the capture of that place was well worth the expedition into Maryland; and it is also manifest, but for that movement, which drew McClellan's forces from the support of Harper's Ferry, it could not have been captured with such a small force and without loss. The Southern journals state that the Confederates took forty-six pieces of artillery. The Federal General White has been placed under arrest, pending an investigation of the circumstances attending the surrender of Harper's Ferry.

The Confederates are reported to have destroyed the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad between Harper's Ferry and Cumberland.

The detailed accounts of the battle of the 17th are sickening. They leave little doubt that 30,000 were killed and wounded.

According to Northern accounts of the surrender of Mumfordsville, the Confederates captured about 4000 Federal soldiers.

The following is reported via New York:—

The Federal General Rosecranz defeated the Confederates under General Price, at Juka, Mississippi, on Sept. 19. The Federal loss was estimated at between 4000 and 5000 killed and wounded; that of the Confederates was believed to be heavier. General Price was retreating southward.

The reports as to General Bragg's movements are contradictory. Some assert that he was about to attack Louisville, and others that, in conjunction with General Kirby Smith, he would first encounter General Buell's army. The Confederates were within a few miles of Louisville.

The Governor of Louisiana has threatened General Butler with retaliation if the misconduct of the Federal troops should be continued outside the limits of the city of New Orleans. General Butler replied that if the threat was carried out he should also retaliate. We do not doubt it. The Federal Commander is quite capable of wreaking his vengeance on women and defenceless citizens. We also learn by telegraph that—

At New Orleans General Butler has ordered all foreigners to present themselves, with the evidence of their nationality, to the nearest Provost-Marshal to be registered, as in the course of ten days it may be necessary to distinguish disloyal from loyal citizens, and honest neutral foreigners.

What is to be done to the "disloyal" is not stated. Are they to be murdered as was Mr. Mumford?

It is said that naval expeditions are fitting out at Port Royal and Pensacola, and that the Federals intend to attack the forts of Mobile. These are merely rumours.

The Governor of New York State issued an order for a draft of 40,000 men, or at least 10,000, to make up the President's call for 300,000 men. Bounties of £90 and even £100 have not been sufficient to attract recruits; yet it is reported that a further draft will be ordered to bring the Federal army up to 1,000,000 men. Certain it is that but a remnant of the old 700,000 men remains; and a large levy will be required to make up a million. One enthusiast at a war meeting proposed to raise 3,000,000 men, and settle the affair.

We shall be curious to see whether Messrs. Horace Greeley and Wendell Phillips, who are always preaching bloodshed, will, in the face of Mr. Lincoln's proclamation, still skulk at home whilst the victims of their fanaticism are perishing in the field.

The last Northern reports state that the army is going into winter quarters, and that the measure has been strongly denounced by the Federal press.

We also learn that:—

General Davis shot General Nelson, commanding at Louisville, killing him instantly. The affair occurred through a personal dispute at Gathouse.

ENGLAND.

The weekly increase of pauperism in the distressed districts has again reached 6000. Of this amount Manchester contributes 1000, and Ashton-under-Lyne 1100. There are 800 new paupers in Blackburn. The total number is now above 190,000: representing probably 150,000 pauperized, and 100,000 more thrown out of work, by the American blockade. President Lincoln and his Cabinet have much to answer for before God and man; and "the bill" which, according to Mr. Hosea Biglow, will be sent by Heaven to the individual citizens of every nation engaged in a war of aggression, will be heavy enough in this case to appal even the conscience of an American—accustomed as he is to gigantic figures.

The Lord Mayor's Committee received last week £3200, and distributed £3000.

There exists in Manchester an Association with the special object of procuring the abolition of the Indian import duty on cotton, cloth, and yarn, which amounts to 5 per cent. ad valorem, and which is supposed by some persons to operate injuriously against the cotton manufacturers of Lancashire. This Society has just published a letter on the subject, which it has elicited from Mr. Laing. That gentleman very properly regards the question from an Indian point of view. If the duty is beneficial to India, it ought to be retained, whether or no it be agreeable to Manchester; if its repeal would serve the interests of the Indian population, and is compatible with the necessities of the Indian Treasury, it ought to be repealed, even though Manchester had no interest in the matter. Now, the Indian Government is not in a condition to part with half a million of money, which is the actual produce of the tax. It cannot, with due regard to the safety and quiet of the empire, reduce the large European force which is at present kept there; it cannot diminish its civil expenditure; it cannot obtain from the Home Government a fairer adjustment of the burdens which are shared between them. It cannot diminish expenditure; it cannot hope for a large increase of revenue; and, if it could, the cotton duty is not the first which ought to be reduced or abolished. There is the income-tax, imposed for five years, which is endured with patience only in the belief that at the end of that time it will cease. In this country, much as the income-tax is detested, it serves to adjust the burden of taxation fairly, and is not likely to be done away with. But in India it works ill, and ought as soon as possible to be dispensed with. There is also an export duty of 3 per cent. on rice, which is exceedingly objectionable in principle; and the rice grower has a claim to relief prior to that of the English manufacturer. Moreover, if the duty on cotton manufactures, which is only 5 per cent, were reduced or repealed, there would be an immediate demand for the repeal of other duties, also levied on English manufactures, which are as high as 10 per cent; and this would involve a loss to the Indian Exchequer of above £2,000,000 sterling per annum, which it could not possibly endure. The only possible reason for giving a preference to the cotton manufacturer must be sought in the fact that there is a native competition with his wares, which is in some sense protected by this duty. Now the manufacturer in India already enjoys a valuable natural protection, which gives him a considerable advantage to counterbalance the inferiority of labour and dearth of capital in that country. He buys his cotton and sells his cloth without having to pay for either the freight between England and India, and he has, therefore, a protection to the amount of the double freight. Mr. Laing admits that it is hard to add to this protection that of a 5 per cent. customs duty. He might also have said that, as it is not the desire of the Indian Government to foster Indian manufactures at the expense of English, and as the revenue will fall off in proportion as the duty has that effect, whenever the tariff becomes seriously injurious to the English manufacturer, it will have ceased to be the interest of the Indian Government to maintain it. But he concludes with a rather curious suggestion. It is the interest of India to maintain the duty. It is said to be the interest of England to abolish it. Then let England offer an equivalent. About £70,000,000 will be required, from first to last, for the completion of the railways now in progress or in prospect in our Eastern dominions; and on this capital the Indian Government has guaranteed interest at 5 per cent. Let the English Government guarantee only 4 per cent.; that interest, with the Imperial security, will be amply sufficient, and the Indian Exchequer will be relieved from a liability to the extent of 1 per cent., or £700,000 a year; the English Exchequer will incur no risk, for the railways are certain to pay more than 4 per cent.; and the cotton duty might then be repealed. There are not a few persons, we may remark, who would go further than Mr. Laing, and guarantee the whole of the Indian debt, hereby saving India at least a million a year of actual expenditure. If India were lost to us, we should practically have to pay her debt; and therefore we risk nothing by a formal undertaking to do so, while we enable her to borrow at 3½ instead of 5 per cent. We cannot pretend to guess how Mr. Laing's proposition will be received in Manchester, but we do not think that it will find general favour in England.

Last Sunday witnessed a renewal of the Garibaldi-Papist riot in Hyde Park. This time there were three parties to the affray—the Garibaldists, the Irish, and the police. The former began the quarrel, inasmuch as if they had not attempted to renew their meeting the Irish would have had no opportunity of displaying their pugnacity, and no mischief would have been done. But, except in being present at all, they were the least to blame of all concerned. They were endeavouring to hold their adjourned meeting, when a mass of Irish labourers attacked and drove them from the mound which served for a platform. Aided by about a dozen soldiers, the Garibaldists became in their turn the assailants; and it then appeared that the Irish were armed with heavy sticks, which gave them a fearful and very cowardly advantage. They were beaten, however, in spite of their superiority both in numbers and weapons, and several times routed by their antagonists. The soldiers behaved well; they fought fairly, and did not attempt to use their arms. One Italian used a knife, but no other of the party followed the example. At last a small body of troops were sent to bring in the military truants, and these cleared the mound and kept possession until the police relieved them. The conduct of the police was utterly inexplicable, and in the last degree disgraceful—we speak not of the men, who obeyed orders, but of those who gave them orders to do nothing. 400 men were in the park—a force amply sufficient to have dispersed the assemblage, and prevented any serious disturbance; but they confined themselves to making isolated arrests. Sir George Grey, probably, deserves the credit of this piece of management. On a previous occasion he ordered the police to disperse a peaceable meeting with brutal violence; and the severe censures which his misconduct on that occasion provoked seem to have determined him for the future to let the rabble have their way. The office of Home Secretary is really of sufficient importance to be filled by a man of some degree of capacity and common sense—but, during his whole official career, its present occupant never displayed either the moral courage or the practical judgment which are absolutely required by the duties of the post. The most unaccountable pardons that ever purported to emanate from the mercy of the Crown have evinced his utter want of firmness; the most extraordinary acts of administrative perversity, of which any Minister was ever guilty have demonstrated his unseasonable obstinacy. But his name covers a multitude of sins; and while his party remains in office, no one hopes that a Whig so highly connected will suffer the penalty of his imbecility and wrongheadedness, in the shape of exclusion from further opportunities of mischief.

Mr. Gladstone has been fileted at Newcastle, and delivered a rather remarkable speech. He glorified the French Treaty, under which our total exports to France have risen from nine and a-half to twenty-one millions sterling, and our exports of British produce and manufactures from four and three-quarters to ten and a-half millions. He expressed his admiration of the conduct of the Lancashire operatives, under the severe distress inflicted on them by the American blockade. On the great topic of the day, he spoke as follows:—

"I for one, exercising my own poor faculties as I best could have never felt that England had any reason connected with her own special interests for desiring the disruption of the American Union. I can understand those who say that it is for the general interest of nations that no State should swell to the dimensions of a continent. I can very well understand the arguments of those who think that it is not particularly to be desired, in the interests of the negro race, that the American Union should be reconstituted. But I confess that, for reasons which I need not now explain, I do not think that England has had any interest in the disruption of the Union, and my own private opinion has been that it would be rather for the interest of England if that Union had continued. I am aware that that is not the opinion generally entertained, but at any rate we must all feel that the course which Her Majesty's Ministers have endeavoured to pursue—namely, that of maintaining a strict neutrality,—has been a right course, and has expressed the general sense of the community. Where two parties are greatly exasperated with one another it is not at all unlikely that he who desires to maintain a strict neutrality between them will offend both, because the state of mind in which his conduct will be judged of by either is not one in which you can fairly expect from them perfectly impartial conclusions. But what we may expect is that our honest observance of neutrality up to this date will be recognized after this unhappy struggle shall have ceased, and when all the circumstances shall be calmly reviewed. (Hear.) I must confess, however, that it appears to me that if either party has a right to find fault with us it is the Confederate rather than the Federal party. If we have deviated at all from neutrality, our deviation has been against the Confederates, and not in their favour. The course we have taken has been this:—We have preserved a perfect neutrality, but we have permitted the export of arms and warlike stores. We permitted it to both parties,—to the Confederates, whose ports were blockaded, and to the Northerners, who have been able to import whatever arms and stores they pleased. (Hear, hear.) I believe that that course has been right and just, and the statement of the fact proves that at any rate we have not had a bias influencing the policy of this country against any fair claim to consideration on the part of the Northern States. (Hear.) But now, gentlemen, I would for a moment make an appeal to you on behalf of the people of the Northern States—I mean so far as regards our appreciation of their position. Great allowances are to be made for them. Greater allowances are to be made for heat and exaggeration in the state of public opinion in that country under present circumstances than perhaps could ever before fairly be claimed for any other nation. Only consider what their previous history has been. They have never drunk the bitter cup of misfortune, disappointment, and mortification. They have had but to will that a thing should be done, and it was done. Their course has been a course of prosperity and advancement without example and without a single break. Well, it is not in human nature that a people who have been subjected to an experience so flattering and so soothing to human self-love as that should at once learn with a perfect good grace to accommodate and submit themselves to the necessities of their condition. It is easy for us to do so when we suffer. We have suffered before. We have gone through the very agonies of this dismemberment against which the Northern people of the United States are now striving. We have gone through it and now know that it was not a bad thing for us after all. (Hear, hear.) But they have not gone through it, and I say let us bear with them all we can; let us maintain towards them a kindly temper; let us not allow ourselves to feel the smallest irritation when we see ourselves adversely criticized on the other side of the water; and let us be very cautious about indulging in adverse criticisms upon them on this side of the water. Depend upon it that that course, steadily pursued, will bear its reward. We know quite well that the people of the Northern States have not yet drunk of the cup—they are still trying to hold it far from their lips—the cup which all the rest of the world see they nevertheless must drink of. We may have our own opinions about slavery; we may be for or against the South; but there is no doubt that Jefferson Davis and other leaders of the South have made an army; they are making, it appears, a navy; and they have made what is more than either—they have made a nation. (Loud cheers.) I cannot say that I have viewed with any regret their failure to establish themselves in Maryland. It appears to me too probable that if they had been able to establish themselves there the consequences of their military success in that aggressive movement would have been that a political party favourable to them would have obtained power in that State, that they would have contracted actual or virtual engagements with that political party, and that the existence of those engagements, hampering them in their future negotiations with the Northern States, might have created a new obstacle to peace. (Hear.) Now, from the bottom of our hearts we should desire that no new obstacle to peace should start up. We may anticipate with certainty the success of the Southern States so far as regards their separation from the North. (Hear, hear.) I cannot but believe that that event is as certain as any event yet future and contingent can be. (Hear, hear.) But it is from feeling that that great event is likely to happen, and that the North will have to suffer that mortification, that I earnestly hope that Englishmen will do nothing to inflict additional shame, sorrow, or pain upon those who have already suffered much, and who will probably have to suffer more. (Hear.) It may be that a time might arrive when it would be the duty of Europe to offer the word of expostulation or friendly aid towards composing the quarrel. If it be even possible that such a time should arrive, how important that when that word is spoken it should address itself to minds not embittered by the recollection that unkind things have been said and done towards them in Europe, and, above all, in England, the country which, however they may find fault with it from time to time, has we know the highest place in their admiration and esteem. (Cheers.)

Speeches to the same effect have been delivered by Mr. Locke King, and Mr. Alcock, the Liberal members for Surrey.

The Times of Saturday reported the proceedings of the meeting of the Bath and Wells Diocesan Society, under the presidency of Lord Auckland, Bishop of the Diocese. Attention was called by the Right Rev. Chairman to the superiority of French popular education over that of England, both in regard to quantity and to cheapness. The Report of the Society was read. It contained some severe reflections on the recent measures of the Educational Committee of the Privy Council, which were evidently devised in a spirit of hostility to the Established Church. Grants for Church schools had been refused to parishes where it was shown that large Dissenting schools existed. Attempts had been made to force on Church schools what is called a "conscience clause," which would enable the parents of children attending such schools to exclude from the school course of study the Catechism of the Church, and practically all religious teaching whatever. The mingled, alarm, dislike, and contempt which Mr. Lowe has excited among all the friends of religious education found strong expression in the Report and in the speeches of both lay and clerical orators.

Mr. Herman Merivale C. B., one of the highest permanent officers of the Colonial Department, has read before the British Association for the Promotion of Science, now sitting at Cambridge, a very valuable paper on the utility of colonization. He explains the great importance of emigration to a country so densely peopled as the United Kingdom; the value of the security given to the emigrant by the protection afforded to the colony by the mother country, and the consequent encouragement given to the diffusion of a population which, if pent up at home, might become miserable, discontented, and dangerous. The essay affords a complete though indirect reply to the extravagant theories of Mr. Goldwin Smith and other politicians of the same materialist school.

The Iona, a fine iron steamship, well known to Highland tourists when she plied between Glasgow and the north-west coast of Scotland, was some time ago purchased by persons favourable to the Confederate cause, for the purpose of running the blockade. She left Glasgow on Thursday, and proceeded to Gourrock Bay to adjust her compasses previously to her departure for America. She was there run into by the Chanticleer, a fine new vessel which was returning from her trial trip preparatory to going out to her station in China. The Chanticleer first grazed with her starboard the right paddle-box of the Iona, then struck her about a dozen feet nearer the stern, carrying away her after funnel and mainmast and cutting her right through the centre, to within two feet of her left side. The collision took place at ten minutes past 7, and the two vessels remained in contact for half an hour, hanging to each other. It was apparent, however, from the damage done to the Iona that she would soon sink. Accordingly the whole of the crew were removed to the Chanticleer, and the two vessels were then separated. Not long afterwards the Iona went down in water 150 feet deep. She was heavily laden with stores for the Confederate Government. The damage done to the Chanticleer was inconsiderable.

EUROPE.

ITALY.—Garibaldi and his followers have been amnestied, nominally at the request of the Princesses Clotilda and Maria Pia. The deserters from the Royal army are excepted. This is hard measure. Those who deserted to join the Italian hero in 1860 won not merely pardon, but glory; those who committed the same fault in 1862 might reasonably plead their example, and hope at least for mercy.

Conforti, Minister of Grace and Justice, has resigned, and Ratazzi fills his post ad interim. The resignation is attributed to a motive highly creditable to the ex-Minister. Many judicial appointments in Sicily had been given, as was only just, to Garibaldians or extreme Liberals. After Aspromonte, the Cabinet proposed to get rid of these men, not on any charge of misconduct, but simply on account of their opinions. Conforti held that judicial offices are non-political; and refused to sanction the very dangerous precedent of dismissing a magistrate on merely political grounds. We do not vouch for the truth of this story; but as the amnesty, of which he was a staunch advocate, has been conceded, we know of no other reason for Signor Conforti's resignation than that above stated.

Signor Mazzini, for a few months Triumvir of Rome, and for thirty years the prophet of Italian unity, has just published a letter in which, in the name of the Republican or National party, he repudiates all further alliance with, or allegiance to, the Italian Monarchy. The letter is very long; full of that eloquent declamation in which Italians exceed all other nations, and in which the writer surpasses all other Italians; but its purport may be told in a very few words. The Monarchy has done nothing for Italy. Central Italy was revolutionized and annexed by the people. Sicily and Naples were won by the party of action, under the leadership of Garibaldi. Under the same leadership, Rome and Venice would ere now have been won, if Monarchy, crouching to the foreigner, had not stopped the way. The Royal bullet that wounded Garibaldi has severed the last tie between the Crown and the nation, and the party of action is free to take its own course, without or against the Royal Government. Signor Mazzini is not quite accurate as to facts; and in his speculations as to what might have been done, he is utterly regardless of possibilities. The sad, terrible lesson, expressed by the first Napoleon in the celebrated phrase that "Providence is always on the side of the heaviest battalions," is one which he is unable to learn, even after repeated experience of its truth. The Austrian Quadrilateral, which is to fall before the moral force of an awakened people, defied that moral force when embodied in the armies and expressed by the artillery of France and of Piedmont. The French, who are to be driven from Rome by a popular uprising instigated by Mazzini and headed by Garibaldi, proved themselves strong enough, fourteen years ago, to take Rome from the Government of which the former was the chief, and from the army of which the latter was the general. Believing intensely in the justice of Heaven, the Italian exile forgets, not only that he is not an infallible interpreter of the Divine will, but also that Divine justice is proverbially tardy in its operation. Heaven is patiens quia aternus; Mazzini is one of the most impatient of mortal men. He despairs of and renounces the Kingdom of Italy because it has not in two years possessed itself of two provinces defended by two of the greatest military Powers in the world. Cannot his very intensity of faith teach him patience? Cannot the terrible calamities which have resulted from his own precipitancy teach him to tolerate the slow and cautious steps of those who have taken his task out of his hands? Is there, in very truth, something in long exile which deprives men of the power to understand not only the affairs of their own country, but the teachings of history, the warnings of experience, and the universal "logic of facts?" Are the leaders of Italian liberalism, in the field and in the council, doomed to afford one more memorable and melancholy instance of the well-known "Quem Deus vult perdere?"

BELGIUM.—The Independance Belge stated that the command of the Northern armies had been offered by President Lincoln to General Changarnier, and refused by him. The General has contradicted the story. We cannot but think that the North has in General McClellan as good a Commander-in-chief as it is likely to find. It is more gratifying to national vanity to depreciate generals than to confess to want of soldierly quality in their armies; but we doubt whether the best of European officers could win great victories with the Federal troops.

The Prussian Chamber of Deputies, by an overwhelming majority, has approved the resolution submitted to it by the Committee on the Budget, demanding the immediate presentation of the Budget of 1863, and declaring the expenditure by Ministers of money not voted by the Chambers to be unconstitutional. Amendments were moved, in the hope of bringing about a compromise, but without success.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, October 8.

Our last report left the market in a quiet state, which lasted till Saturday, the sales each day ranging from 2000 to 3000 bales; Surats, owing to the large quantities coming on the market, were rather easier, but American and long-stapled cotton were firm. At noon, on Saturday, the Australasian was telegraphed off Queenstown, and her news arrived at 4 p.m. Great excitement was created, when it became known that Lincoln had issued a proclamation for the abolition of slavery in all the rebellious States, after January 1, 1863—the most diverse opinions were expressed, as to its probable effect on the cotton market, many persons believed that it would lead to another rush of speculation, and a large and rapid advance, considering it fatal to all hopes of conciliation or compromise; others, again, regarded it as the precursor of discussions in the North which would split up the Union, and thus accelerate a peace. Some few hundred bales were sold in the afternoon after the news arrived, at rather higher prices.

On Monday, the market opened with a very unsettled feeling, many persons expecting a business of 20,000 or 30,000 bales, while others thought it would scarcely hold its ground. As the day went on, however, it became evident that a fresh current of speculation had been started, though not so strong as the sanguine had expected; the sales summed up 10,000 bales at $\frac{1}{4}$ advance for Surats, and $\frac{1}{4}$ d. to $\frac{3}{4}$ d. for American, for which the demand was very lively. Yesterday a good steady business was done, reaching 7,000 bales at full prices. To-day the "Bohemian" news are to hand announcing that the Convention of Governors at Altoona had endorsed President Lincoln's proclamation, thereby lessening the chance of dissension breaking out in the North. The news gave increased tone to the market, and prices are again rather dearer, the demand running chiefly on good Surats; the sales reached 10,000 bales and quotations may be given as follows:—28 $\frac{1}{4}$ d. for Middling Orleans, 27 $\frac{1}{4}$ d. for Mobile, 27 $\frac{1}{4}$ d. for Bowed, 22d. for Fair Sawginned Surats, 19d. for Broach, 18d. for Omrawuttee, 17 $\frac{1}{4}$ d. for Dhollerah, and 17 $\frac{1}{4}$ d. for Comptah. For Cotton to arrive there has been a good demand, and 17 $\frac{1}{4}$ d. is freely offered for Fair Dhollerahs due within the next two months, and 18 $\frac{1}{4}$ d. for Broach.

It is not to be denied that the news recently received from America is of the deepest importance. It has become the fashion with a large portion of the English press to treat in a flippant, sarcastic tone every measure emanating from the Northern Government, and they have done their best to ridicule this last movement as futile and unavailing. This view has been hastily adopted by many persons, imperfectly acquainted with American politics, and thus a very erroneous impression has been diffused among commercial circles of the true import of this measure. But those who are most intimately acquainted with the character of the revolution that is now running its course in America, take a very different view of the subject. To them it is a step of vital importance, and carries with it consequences appalling to contemplate. There is too much ground for believing that it marks the triumph of the extreme anti-slavery party, and the irrevocable commitment of the North, to a war of abolition, with all its fearful concomitants. The fact that sixteen governors of the Free States have heartily endorsed the proclamation of Lincoln, sufficiently shows that he will have the support of the influential part of the Northern people; and though there is sure to be much dissatisfaction among the democratic party and the wealthy commercial class, who have thriven on the Southern trade, it seems very unlikely that it will be able to offer effectual resistance to the policy just inaugurated.

It is hardly possible now to see what basis for negotiation remains between North and South. The former has undertaken to destroy that institution which the South clings to as the very life-blood of its system. It has initiated a policy which, if successful, will kindle the flames of servile war, and involve the Southern States in indescribable anarchy and bloodshed. With such a prospect before them, it may be expected that the hitherto of the Confederates will pass all bounds, and the war will become tenfold more bloodthirsty than before.

Hitherto, the manufacturing interest has been buoyed up by the hope of the re-opening of the Southern trade—not greatly impaired in value—but now it is needful to face the dismal contingency of its possible extinction.

It may be expected that when the gravity of the crisis is fully appreciated, another period of great excitement will supervene in the markets for cotton and cotton goods.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday, October 7.

We have again to report another week of extreme dullness in our yarn and cloth market, for notwithstanding the small rate of production in these staples, stocks are very little, if at all, lower than they were a month ago.

In ordinary times when the demand is slow, holders, as a rule, are inclined to accept offers a little under quotations, but at present there is not the slightest disposition shown to give way on the part of any one but to wait for a better demand, which is generally thought must set in soon, owing to the probability of the American struggle being prolonged.

Export yarns have been less enquired for than usual, especially those qualities suitable for the Continent, our German friends asserting that there is a general disposition at present on the part of their clients to close their works for a time, the present state of things being very unsatisfactory to them.

Home trade yarns continue very firm, but the amount of business done in them has been very small.

Cloth of all kinds continue to be held for extreme quotations, as the amount of production has been reduced to a very low ebb, and it is reported here that in Ashton-under-Lyne, there will not be one hundred looms at work, after the expiration of another week.

To day there have been enquiries for some of the inferior makes of 8 $\frac{1}{2}$ lb. shirtings, for which 17s. 6d. was offered, but we hear of no sales.

The general tone of to-day's market has disappointed many who expected to find a better business doing, in consequence of the President's proclamation (brought us by the Australasian) tending to the inducement of a belief that the Federals do not in tend to relax in their endeavours to subdue the South, during the next three months at least.

LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH.

PRIVATE LETTERS.

The following letter has been forwarded to us from Liverpool. It is written by a well informed gentleman residing in New York:—

New York, Sept. 23.

As I write, we have very little additional from the "victorious" army of McClellan. The victories were capped on Saturday by a rumour that "Stonewall," with his entire army, had surrendered themselves as prisoners; but as there don't seem to be any great fuss in the papers over this most important event, I incline to the belief that the report must be premature, and that the "Dare-devil," as the World calls him, is not yet ready to surrender.

There is another report not confirmed, and that is the one asserting that the Federals have crossed the Potomac in pursuit of the rebels, and that there was every probability of their being pursued to the doors of Richmond, which the Federals would enter as conquerors. The Federals under Porter, who commanded the only column not in the awful battles of Tuesday and Wednesday, did attempt in all their fresh strength to follow the wary foe, but no sooner had the Federals landed on Virginian soil than they were driven back across the Potomac into Maryland, thoroughly defeated.

Here ends the pursuit of the rebels for the present, and a writer, in reviewing the eventful week, speaks only the truth when he says, "The rebels have suffered but little at our hands, and, counting in the moral annihilation of 12,000 of our troops at Harper's Ferry, we can scarcely claim a victory. Lee's retreat over the Potomac was a masterpiece, and the manner in which he combined Hill and Jackson for the envelopment of Harper's Ferry, while he checked our columns at Hagerstown Heights and Crampton Gap, is probably the best achievement of the war." Another writer says, "During their march into Virginia the Confederates saved all their trains, and lost but two guns, one of which they spiked." But why was not the "audacious and insolent" enemy pursued? The truth is out. The Administration had not men enough for the undertaking! Beaten, dispirited, demoralized, and starved, as the rebel army was said to have been, the great North had not the men to follow the "ragamuffins" up; and what would really have been a victory (the bagging or capture of a large portion of the army) was not accomplished.

Halleck, it is said, was uncertain how to act. The crossing of the Potomac may have been all in the rebel programme for an attack upon Washington via Arlington, and not a man around the capital must leave his post until the enemy lets a little daylight upon his plans and purposes. The rebels lead the way, and the grand armee of the North follows!

Many persons have supposed that there was an immense army around Washington independent of McClellan's troops. Such is not the case. The large number of reinforcements that are said to have been arriving were in fancy only, and Halleck himself told a distinguished person a few days since that the reason why the rebel army was allowed to leave Maryland was because the Government had not troops enough to prevent it. The renewal of Wednesday's terrible struggle, on Thursday, by the Federals, was also not attempted for fear of defeat, as McClellan had not men enough to risk another encounter.

Report says the Governors of the Northern States are holding the troops back—but why is this? They (the Governors) are to meet in convention to-morrow to "deliberate upon the condition of affairs," and meanwhile the troops raised under the last call are withheld. That there is something in the wind is apparent, but to know what that something is we must wait the proceedings of the convention.

From Kentucky we hear that the victorious Bragg was believed to be marching upon Louisville, and the general in command of that city had ordered all the women and children to leave immediately; Jefferson Ferry had been seized for military purposes, the stores were closed, and the work of preparation for defence was everywhere visible. Buell is said to be after Bragg, but if so, he leaves Morgan in Cumberland Gap at the mercy of the foe, and cut off from help from any quarter. It is evident we shall soon have stirring times from this section. Some have thought that Bragg would never dare to have attacked Louisville (a city of 70,000 inhabitants), and they still think he will not; but his friends say that this city was down in his memoranda of operations, and if so, he will undoubtedly try the movement on.

The vessel that ran the blockade at Mobile on the 4th proves to have been the Ovieto, under command of Captain Bullock. Captain Bullock is just the man for such lucky hits, as he knows every wave of the Southern waters, and what he undertakes is done. Commander Preble, who failed to "sink or capture" the rebel craft, has been cashiered, though there are hundreds of cases of a far greater dereliction of duty, wherein the offender has not even been censured. There is a report that a vigorous attack will shortly be made upon Mobile; but the latest advices we have from there (5th inst.) assert that her citizens are ready, and that they will defend the place to the last—if need be, to the sacrifice of every life. Nothing more is said of the reported attack upon Charleston, and it was doubtless a canard.

An incident that will attract attention is the proclamation of Mr. Lincoln freeing all the slaves in the rebellious States on the 1st of January, 1863. Startling, is it not? Very; yet of no more real consequence than the old buttons on a cast-off pair of breeches. The better policy would be first to secure the cage, and then the bird; but, perhaps, this they intend to do. They will have to be more fortunate, however, than they were last week, when, during the flush of battle, a despatch was sent—"Lee and Jackson will be captured to-morrow!" But were they? They have since spoken for themselves.

So with the rebellious States; the Federals must not be too sure that they will "occupy and possess" them all by the New Year, and without this occupation, in all their length and breadth, this proclamation is a mere waste of breath—not worth the paper it is written upon. To think of dealing with a matter over which one has no control is regarded as little better than madness; yet the Washington authorities imagine themselves capable of liberating 4,000,000 human beings, upon whom they have not the slightest claim. They will be laughed at by all sensible men at the North, while in the South the proclamation will receive only ridicule and contempt. They will defy its words, and scorn its threats.

Slavery is entirely a local institution of the States, and the Northern Government has no more right to meddle with it than 1 have to transfer Lord Palmerston's property to the Emperor Napoleon.

We have New Orleans' advices to the 13th. The political news is of no consequence.

In this market cotton is, for the moment, dull, and nominally 54 to 55, for middling. Gold higher and quoted at 18 prem.; Exchange at London, 29½ to 30.

NEW ORLEANS MARKETS.

[From the National Advocate, September 13.]

There were no arrivals of produce reported yesterday from the coast, other than two or three small droghers. The stock of sugar declines daily, and the supply of molasses is much reduced. Without sugar, without cotton, and no tobacco arriving, what has our community to give in exchange for Northern productions and Western produce? Where is our basis for business? Not even the ordinary articles of tar and rosia are there a dozen dray loads in the city.

A very large portion of the receipts of Western produce and provisions from the North, particularly flour, pork, beef, bacon and grain, consist of an accumulation of old, inferior, unmerchantable and mixed lots, apparently remnants that have long been in store and excluded from the market by the regular trade. The supply of sugar and molasses is light and with a fair demand prices have tended in favour of sellers, while freights have continued dull and ruled at still lower rates.

SUGAR.—The supply is light and meeting with a fair demand, firmer prices have been realized, the sales embracing about 350 hhds. in several lots at 9c. for Low Fair, 9½ for Fully Fair, 9½ for Prime and 4½c. per lb. for Cistern Bottoms.

MOLASSES.—The supply is light and with a good demand prices have advanced. About 1000 barrels sold in several lots at 25c. for Fermenting in store, 31c. for Prime Plantation Fermenting and 34½ to 35c. for Choice Reboiled.

FLOUR.—Good Superfine to Choice Extra is selling slowly in a retail way at $5 to $7 per barrel. 500 barrels sour sold to-day at $4 37½c. per barrel.

CORN.—We heard of no sales by the regular trade to-day. The last reported were at 65 to 70c. at wholesale and 85c. per bushel at retail.

OATS.—We have heard of no sales of any amount to-day. The last reported were at 70c. at wholesale and 85c. per bushel at retail.

BRAN.—The last retail sales reported were at $2 60c. per 100 lbs. A day or two since a lot of Inferior sold at auction at $1 80c.

CHEESE.—Northern may be quoted at the reduced rates of 12½ to 13c. per lb. at wholesale and 15c. at retail. 264 boxes Northern sold at auction at 9 to 11c. per lb.

BUTTER.—The supply is very light; it is retailing at 30c. per lb. 216 firkins sold at auction at 23 to 24c. per lb.

WHISKY.—Rectified is retailing at $1 50c. to $1 75c. and that mixed with Louisiana rum at $1 to $1 20c. per gallon. 10 barrels Old Rectified sold at auction at $1 60c. per gallon.

LARD.—We have heard of no sales to-day. Prime in kegs is selling at wholesale at 16c. and retailing at 17 to 18c. per lb. Twenty-six tierces sold at auction at 13c. and 23 barrels at 14½c. per lb.

BEEF.—Good Northern, in half-barrels, is held by dealers at $14. 92 barrels sold at auction at $10 50c. to $13 per barrel.

HAY.—Good Northern may be quoted at wholesale at $40 to $42 per ton. It is retailing at $50; 111 bales sold at auction at $41 per ton.

PORK.—We have heard of no private sales of any moment to-day. 50 barrels of Mess sold at auction at $15 37½ per barrel.

BACON.—We quote at wholesale 5 to 6½c. for Shoulders and Sides, and 10 to 12c. for Sugar Cured Hams; at retail 7 to 8c. for the former and 12 to 15c. per lb. for the latter; 214 tierces Shoulders sold in lots at auction at 4½ to 6c. and 6½ to 6¾c. and 105 tierces Sugar Cured Hams at 9 to 10 and 11½c. per lb.

COFFEE.—The supply is light and in few hands. Rio is retailing at 25 to 30c. and Java at 35 to 40c. per lb.

FREIGHTS.—There is a limited business doing at $2 50c. per hhd. of Sugar on sailing vessels for Northern ports, and $1 50c. per barrel for Molasses; $16 per hhd. of Tobacco for Havre at which rate a vessel was taken; 50 shillings per ton for Oil Cake to Liverpool, and $65 per 1000 for staves for Bordeaux.

In addition to the above stated articles the following were sold at auction: 460 barrels Potatoes at $4 75c. to $5 and $6 50c. per barrel; 35 barrels Eggs, 65 to 75 dozen to the barrel, at $10 50c. to $12 per barrel; 50 barrels Onions at $10 25c., and 120 barrels Corn Meal, at $3 per barrel; 10 barrels Beans at $3 75c. to $4 25c. per bushel; 300 boxes Soap, at $4 75c. to $5; and 50 boxes Lemons, at $7 to $7 50c. per box; 350 boxes Starch, at 9½ to 10½ and 13½c. per lb.; 200 dozen Brooms at $2 85c. to $3 10c. per dozen, and 20 half-barrels Shad, at $3 50c. per half-barrel.

Foreign Correspondence.

(From our Commercial Correspondent.)

NEW YORK, September 23.

Very great alarm prevails in Wall Street, in consequence of the enormous amount of Government scrip of the various kinds now afloat. Mr. Chase seems to be filling up every channel of credit, and there will soon be an overflow. The bankers and money brokers until recently discounted freely contractors' bills, with Federal securities as collateral, but they have taken fright, and seem indisposed to continue such operations. Every holder of "green backs" is desirous of changing them for something that has value, and hence the rise in railway and other stocks, while United States loans are neglected. Mr. Chase's interest-paying securities cannot fall below par, so long as the inconvertible legal tender notes circulate, but all other stocks and bonds must appreciate during the temporary period of inflation, until the force of circumstances brings specie again into use as currency. Exchange and gold are advancing in value, and, to hazard a suggestion, it may be stated that the steamer leaving here on October 4, will carry out quotations for the former of 40 and for the latter of 30 per cent. The Federal interest due in specie on November 1, is $7,000,000, and it is likely that the high rate of premium will cause the authorities of Washington to prohibit the exportation of the precious metals.

The collection of Federal taxes is postponed until January 1, when, probably, neither that or the emancipation scheme will go into effect.

The Democrats are gaining ground, and will, no doubt, elect a majority of their candidates in October and November.

The estimated losses in the recent battles in Maryland including Harper's Ferry, are immense on the Northern side, and on the Confederate unknown. Official reports are purposely kept back. McClellan's army is so badly cut up, that the fight cannot be renewed.

WASHINGTON, September, 23.

I wrote in my last that just as I was closing my letter we received accounts of the retirement of Lee across the Potomac. We have now full information relative to the severe battle of Wednesday last, and its results. It appears to have been a desperately contested affair. I have conversed with intelligent men who witnessed it, and it is conceded that at nightfall no advantage had been gained by either side. The losses were enormous. The Federals cannot have suffered less than 15,000 in killed, wounded, and missing; that of the Confederates is not known. Thursday was devoted to the burial of the dead, and taking care of the wounded. Friday, it was generally believed, would witness a renewal of the contest, but upon pushing forward his skirmishers, McClellan discovered that the entire body of the Confederates had safely crossed the Potomac. On Saturday McClellan made two efforts to cross the river, but was repulsed with loss. The Confederates occupy the Southern bank of the river in force, and appear determined to remain there. If Lee remains in his present attitude McClellan will not be able to go forward, and will be always threatened in his flank or rear. McClellan's army was so badly cut up in the late fight that it cannot do much, and the new regiments are not in a condition to be used to any advantage. Some of the new regiments that were carried into this late battle suffered terribly. The public are undoubtedly disappointed at the military aspect on the Upper Potomac, and the reflecting and judicious see very clearly that no essential advantage has been gained by the Federal forces, and that if Lee retreats further up the valley, he gains strength as he retires, whilst the Federals become weakened.

The news from the West is quite as important as that from Virginia. I wrote you in my last that, in my opinion, the surrender at Mumfordsville opened the way to Louisville. The public attention does not appear to have been attracted to it, but to-day we hear that Bragg and Kirby Smith are rapidly approaching the city. Nelson will meet them, and endeavour to check their advance; should he be defeated, Louisville must fall into their hands. The fate of this city will be decided within the next three days, and if captured by the Confederates, will give them the command of the valley of the Ohio. Buell is coming up from Tennessee, but he will be too late to take part in the coming fight; and if Bragg is victorious, he will then probably capture Buell's army, as the latter will have no way of escape. The capture of this large Federal force will be so severe a blow to the Government as almost to paralyze them. However, all this on my part is, at present, speculation; if, however, you hear that Louisville has been captured, you may feel pretty certain to hear afterwards that Buell's army has been either captured or dispersed.

But transcending all other events in its importance, is the proclamation just issued by the President, proclaiming general emancipation. You will find a copy of it in one of the newspapers sent you by this steamer. It does not propose to go into effect until Jan. 1, 1863, and then will not take effect in States which shall be represented in Congress. This document is one of the most important that has ever been issued by any ruler. If it could be executed it would result in all the horrors of San Domingo. It would place every woman and child in the Southern States at the mercy of the negroes; and it consigns all that rich country to ruin and desolation. I wait with anxiety to learn the opinion of Europe in reference to it. Irrespective of its inhumanity, its consequences in arresting the annual production of the great staples of commerce, must cause a revolution in all the commercial countries of the world. The manufactures of Europe, with all their affiliated and dependent interests, are threatened with a terrible peril. I write this immediately upon the publication. I have not yet heard any expression of opinion in regard to it, but I think that it must create at once decided expressions of opposing sentiment. I believe that the Democratic party will take ground against it; and certainly it will cause the solidification and union of the people of the Border Slave States against the Federal Government. We approach an intensity of the great crisis which is upon us, and nobody can tell what each succeeding day may develop.

WASHINGTON, September 19.

We are in the midst of terrible fighting on the Upper Potomac. The contests now transpiring there far exceed in desperation and carnage any that have yet taken place. The retreat of Pope to Washington, although accompanied by severe loss and the demoralization of his army, perhaps was a disappointment to Lee, who possibly counted upon its entire capture. When the Union forces had succeeded in reaching their fortifications, and placed themselves under cover of their gunboats, they were safe. The Confederate army was now upwards of 100 miles from their base of supplies, and suffering for provisions. It, therefore, was necessary that they should get into a country where these could be obtained. It was, no doubt, under this necessity, and with a view of testing the temper and determination of the people of Maryland, as also to capture the Union forces in Northern Virginia in and around Harper's Ferry, that Lee sent forward his advancing columns across the Potomac. As you already know, these entered Frederick, and from thence went to Hagerstown, within six miles of the Pennsylvania State line. Whilst in this neighbourhood the Confederates obtained all the provisions that could be found, and sent them southward. The people of Maryland responded very feebly to the movement that had been made. The Unionists stood aloof or run away, and those who had been warmly sympathizing with the Secession movement appeared constrained and uncomfortable. The women were very demonstrative. A few recruits were obtained. In the meantime Pennsylvania had been thoroughly aroused; and 50,000 men had been concentrated to prevent any advance into the state. McClellan was coming up rapidly from Washington with an army of not less than 80,000, composed mainly of the veterans of the war. This force would soon strike in the rear of Hagerstown, and Miles was at Harper's Ferry, with 15,000 men, ready to intercept the retreat of the Confederates. The force of the latter at this time on Maryland soil was probably 30,000. Jackson and Hill now determined to abandon any further advance towards Pennsylvania, and to capture Miles at Harper's Ferry. The former therefore moved rapidly from Hagerstown to Williamsport, crossed the river into Virginia, whilst Hill came down on the Maryland side. Their advanced guard was seen on Friday coming up the Maryland heights. The possession of this position was the important point. After a desperate fight the Confederates drove away the Federal column, and then invested the Ferry completely. The fight went on all day Saturday and Sunday mainly with artillery, and the loss on either side was very trifling. Miles found that he was surrounded, and must surrender unless McClellan could come up and drive away his besiegers. On Saturday night his cavalry, about 2000 in number, managed to get away and cut their way through an unguarded point. They carried the news of his peril, and that he must surrender unless the Confederates were driven away. McClellan was now at Middletown with his army, about twenty miles from the Ferry, but between him and the Confederates was the South Mountain, which had to be crossed, and on which the Confederates were strongly posted. On Sunday he tried to cut his way through this obstacle. The position was occupied by a small force of the Confederates under Longstreet. The battle was fought all day, and at night the Federals got possession of the crest of the mountain, after severe loss, among whom was one of the best generals in the service, General Reno. On Monday morning McClellan was ready to move forward to the relief of Miles, but it was too late. At the very hour that he was ordering his army to move forward, Miles was capitulating to Hill and Jackson. This surrender has been the most important in extent of this war. The Confederates captured not only the position of Harper's Ferry, but the enormous number of 11,583 prisoners, with all their equipments, guns, ammunition, &c. Fifty pieces of artillery, some of them 20-pound Parrots, 72,000 rations and an immense amount of quartermasters' stores of every description. Miles was mortally wounded after hoisting the white flag, and has since died. The bulletin that will announce this success will scarcely have been exceeded in its military importance by any, except such as were issued by Napoleon in his earliest victories. So close, however, were McClellan's columns towards its relief, that the paroled prisoners had not marched the miles before they were met by the Union army. The conquest of Harper's Ferry having been completed by the Confederates, the Federal troops marched towards Sharpsburg, to attack a body of the Confederates at that point. On Tuesday afternoon the armies came in sight of each other, and a battle commenced, which was desperately contested until night, and with no apparent advantage to either side. On Wednesday, Jackson came up from Harper's Ferry, and united his forces with the Confederates, whilst McClellan received a reinforcement of 30,000 men. The battle commenced at daylight, and was fought throughout the whole day. It was undoubtedly the most severely contested of all the battle-fields. We have no despatches from McClellan, and have merely to rely upon the vague and contradictory reports that come from the parties who have straggled in from the field. On Wednesday night the combatants rested in their positions, not very different from those they had occupied in the morning. Perhaps the Federals had gained something in some quarters, but the entire battle-field had been fought over more than once, its ground alternately being held by either party. The Federal loss has been very severe. We know that General Mansfield has been killed, and Generals Hooker, Dana, Sedgwick, and Dureza, wounded. Such has been the carnage, that it is only the names of the most prominent that are sent over the wires. As to the numbers lost, thus far it is all conjecture. I think 15,000 would not cover the Union losses. We know nothing of the Confederate casualties. The reports that come in are purely imaginary. Unquestionably their loss must be very serious; but they fight on advantageous ground. General Longstreet is reported to be wounded and a prisoner. This is now contradicted, and is probably untrue. The latest and most reliable accounts from the Union side acknowledge that the day's work was indecisive. Such an acknowledgment, and with the absence of any published despatch from McClellan, is to my mind, strongly suspicious of defeat. On Thursday (yesterday) there was no renewal of the engagement. We hear that it must continue to-day, but we know nothing about this. The Confederate forces appear to occupy strong ground between Sharpsburg and the Potomac River. They may be compelled to fall back towards the river and recross it; but all Northern Virginia is now free of Union soldiers; so if they are forced to retire their retreat could not be much molested, as they would leave a desert behind them, and the pursuing column would soon be beyond supplies, and forced to stop. I have thus brought down to the latest moment (9 a.m., Friday morning) the military movements on the Upper Potomac. Many people believe that the fate of the war hangs upon these battles. I do not think so. Victory or defeat to either side can only embarrass; but both parties appear determined to continue the struggle until exhaustion sets in, and when that may come it is difficult to know.

From the West we have nothing definite. Bragg is undoubtedly moving northward in Kentucky. The army that was threatening Cincinnati appears to be retreating. It is probable that it may unite with Bragg and move on Louisville. Buell (Federal) is rapidly coming up from Tennessee to defend this city. There must be within a few days some severe fighting in this direction.

We hear that the steamer 290 has run into Mobile. She is said to have a large cargo of guns and ammunition. The Confederates have made considerable accession of guns and equipments lately by their captures. I suppose that Lee has captured, since he moved from Richmond, not less than 20,000 prisoners, 100 pieces of artillery, 30,000 muskets, rifles, &c., &c., with millions of dollars worth of stores, ammunition, &c., &c. The history of his campaign thus far has been the most brilliant ever recorded, except those of Napoleon's Italian campaigns of 1796 and 1800. I have no doubt that Europe will appreciate all that he has done. Voluntary enlistments still continue, and the requisition for 600,000 men will be filled without drafting. In addition to this, at least 100,000 men have gone into the field from this State alone, to defend the State in case of invasion.

Since writing the foregoing we have news from Kentucky of the surrender of Mumfordsville, with 5000 Federal troops, with all their munitions of war, equipments, &c., &c., to the Confederate army under Bragg. This is another great Confederate victory, and very important, as it opens Louisville to the Confederate army. Kirby Smith and Bragg can now unite and in three days be at Louisville with 60,000 men. I can see nothing to prevent its falling into the hands of the Confederates, with all its supplies and materiel.

As I write, we are in receipt of news that the battle has been renewed this morning at Sharpsburg; and we shall hear something definite, probably, by to-night or to-morrow morning, and it will go out by this steamer.

Exchange to-day is dull at 122. Gold fluctuates violently from 116½ to 117½—it changes every hour.

Everything is, of course, in a state of great excitement whilst the military news is so important. We are living in wonderful times, and even are getting old more rapidly than was ever known. Every man is kept in a strain of excitement.

The surrender of Mumfordsville includes ten pieces of artillery and various other munitions of war.

2 p.m.

The city is in a blaze of excitement at the despatch just received from McClellan, announcing that he has gained a decided victory, and that the Confederates are crossing the Potomac. He says Pleasanton is driving them across. I think that the truth is that Lee finds it well to put the river between himself and the Union forces. Everything depends upon whether McClellan can follow after him. The retrograde movement of Lee was what I expected.

PROVOST MARSHAL AND CELL No. 4.

(From the New York Evening Express of Sept. 12.)

Provost Marshal and Cell No. 4 is described by a "World" sufferer. The writer vouches that his statement of facts is true of the horrors of Cell No. 4.

THE PROVOST MARSHAL'S OFFICE.

The Provost Marshal's office is located at the corner of Broome and Elm-streets, in the building known as Police Headquarters, the entrance being upon the Broome-street side. Ascending a short flight of stone steps, you reach a hallway, and at the second door to the left an officer stands to direct you to enter at the next door beyond, as the crowd must go in at one door and out at the other.

THE IMPORTANCE OF THE OFFICE.

Previous to the appointment of the Provost Marshal to his present office, he received a telegram from Secretary Stanton to repair to Washington. He did so. Upon his return he related the following incident:—

"When I arrived there I sent in my name to the Secretary, who at once ordered that I should be admitted. When I came in, Secretary Stanton took two chairs and placed them so that we could sit face to face, near together. He told me to sit in one, and he occupied the other. Said he, 'Mr. Kennedy, I sent for you because I wanted to know you, and because I believe you to be a live man like myself. We shall have a good deal of business together, and I like to know the man that I am to entrust my orders to.' 'And I tell you, gentlemen,' said the Provost Marshal, 'Secretary Stanton is a live man.'"

When the document finally came from the Secretary of War empowering the General Superintendent to act as Provost Marshal, the reporters were called in and handed a copy of the first order issued by him in his new capacity to captains of all the precincts, announcing the fact of his appointment and giving them some directions how to proceed under the new regime.

Taking one of these papers from the hands of a reporter, the Provost Marshal looked it over carefully, and handing it back to the clerk, exclaimed:—

"Here! give him one properly signed."

The clerk had omitted to write "General Superintendent Metropolitan Police and Special Provost Marshal" after the name.

SCENES IN THE OFFICE.

Of the large number of arrests made by order of the Special Provost Marshal a small proportion only have been mentioned in the public prints. Such as he has seen proper to give have been published, and those only. It is impossible, therefore, to describe many of the scenes that transpired in the office. One or two will suffice as a sample.

CASE OF MR. PLUMB.

Upon the morning of the arrest of Mr. D. Plumb, of the firm of Plumb and Co., mercantile agency in Broadway, the reporters were notified that two important arrests were to be made by the Provost Marshal's guard—a prominent Abolitionist and a rank Secessionist were to be brought up together.

After some two hours' patient waiting the accused parties appeared in charge of the officers. The Provost Marshal arose as they entered. In answer to Mr. Plumb's inquiry, which he made as became an American citizen, "Why am I under arrest?" the official assumed a very grave countenance, adjusted his eye-glasses, surveyed the accused from head to foot, and proceeded to read the affidavit against him.

Mr. Plumb (smiling).—Why, sir, I thought this was all settled; you have had me here once on this same charge, and I thought you were satisfied about it—I think I can set the matter right.

Provost Marshal.—Very well; we shall see, sir.

Mr. Plumb.—Can I have an opportunity to do this?

Provost Marshal.—Well, sir, you can make your written affidavit in the matter, and I will forward it to Washington, together with the affidavits against you, but you must remain here until directions are received concerning your case.

The Provost Marshal sprung the bell communicating with the detective office. Sergeant Young appeared. Mr. Plumb was about to speak, but, before he could do so, the Marshal said:—

"This officer will take you in charge and afford you facilities for making an affidavit. You must remain in custody for the present. That's all, sir."

A wave of the hand, and he was delivered over to the officer, who conducted him down stairs to the basement through the detective office, the sitting room, into the bedroom occupied by the officers, and directly by the ominous cell doors that stared blank for a victim as they passed. He was afterwards brought out to the detective office and furnished with writing materials.

THE ALLEGED SECESSIONIST.

As the folding doors closed after Mr. Plumb, the Provost Marshal took up another affidavit, and turning to the reporter said:—

"Here we have another case upon exactly the other extreme. A Secessionist, who says he would fight for the South." The same ceremony of reading was gone through with, but this party was more demonstrative than Mr. Plumb.

"I can prove every word of that affidavit false, if I have opportunity. I can go and get witnesses that will show me to be a loyal man."

Provost Marshal.—You will remain here for the present; you can make your affidavit and it will be forwarded to Washington. Meantime I shall hold you.

"But, sir, one of these witnesses against me is a mere boy who has worked for me."

Provost Marshal.—No matter, sir. I have no doubt you could do very well if you had that boy to manipulate, but I do not mean you shall see him. I believe what he has said.

Before any reply could be made, the imperative "that's all, sir!" was uttered, the bell was sprung, and the officer appeared and took his charge below.

REFUSING TO GIVE A NAME.

Upon another occasion an individual was brought in for refusing to give his name to an enrolling officer.

Provost Marshal.—What is your name, sir?

Unknown.—Well, I declined to give my name there, and I think I shall here.

Provost Marshal.—Oh, you think so. Now I'll tell you what I think. I think you'll give it before you've been here a great while.

He sprung the bell again.

"Here is a man who won't give his name. Take him down, and give him No. 4. He will probably give his name before many hours."

The young man, who was not above twenty years of age, seemed like a person hardly compos. He was pale-faced and gaunt-looking, was seadily dressed, and had the appearance of having just come off a night's debauch. He was taken down to the detective office, again interrogated, and again declined to give his name.

"Give him No. 4," said the officer in charge; and he was at once seized and hurried off to the fated locality.

NUMBER FOUR.

Horror of horrors! Possibly no place since the black hole of Calcutta, or the prison hulks of the revolution, could compete with cell No. 4 at police headquarters.

Under the reign of the Provost-Marshal it became part and parcel of the machinery of the office, and was used as occasion called to hold fast the worst class of the prisoners arrested, or such as were considered the most flagrant cases.

Passing through the outer room of the detective office in the basement, you come into the sitting-room—a close, badly-ventilated chamber—the larger half of which is underground. Midway in the room at the right is a small half-glass door cut in a partition, through which you enter upon a narrow corridor facing four small cells. These are numbered, beginning at the south end, one, two, three, four, the latter being at the extreme right as you enter the corridor, which is scarcely wide enough to admit the passage of a man.

The sides of cell No. 4 are sealed up with boards to the top. It is about three feet wide by six in depth. A stationary board fifteen inches wide is put up on the right hand for a sleeping pallet, and a three-cornered pine block, fastened at one end of the board, serves as a pillow—there being neither bed clothes, mattress, or straw. A water waste and dipper in one corner complete the furniture of the cell. The sides of the place are thickly coated with whitewash in the vain effort to purify it. The door is composed of iron bars about one inch in width, and a quarter of an inch in thickness, arranged crosswise, so as to intersect each other at every two and a half inches. At the top is a small aperture eight inches square.

The entire place swarms with vermin. In Dog days, when the cell door was shut, and the door and window leading to the outer apartments were closed, the atmosphere was stifling in its character, while the vermin ran riot over the unfortunate victims; who could neither lie down nor sit down, from very agony, sometimes imploring, in heaven's name, to be let out, if only for a few moments. In the hottest weather of the season three persons have been confined in this cell at once, two of them sitting on the board and the third lying at full length on his face upon the floor, and all evidencing untold horror and misery.

Sergeant Young has often given directions to have the prisoners taken out at night, and allowed them to lie round on the floor of the outer room.

HOW THE UNKNOWN FARED.

The individual above alluded to who would not give his name, was put in No. 4. The door of the cell was shut and bolted and the outer door closed also, although it was one of the hottest days of the season. In fifteen minutes his cries were heard, the door opened, and he was found in a profuse perspiration, with the vermin crawling over and tormenting him.

"For God's sake, let me out of this," he said, "and I will do anything you want."

The man or beast that No. 4 cannot tame is beyond the reach of the most ingenious torture. Every delinquent who is alluded to as an atrocious villain, is wished no worse fate than incarceration within its walls. "No. 4" is a by-word among the officers and frequenters of headquarters, and is promised, as a sort of bugbear, to such inmates of the detective office as behave themselves unruly.

One of the individuals who had been arrested for some criminal offence, upon reading an account in the paper of a rebel victory, laid the paper down as if in disgust, and remarked, "That's the way with our boys, just prick 'em, and they run." The words were reported up stairs, and the order came down:—

"Place him in No. 4. He will be pricked where he can't run."

The history of this awful receptacle for prisoners can never probably be fully told; and we have only briefly sketched it to show some portion of the machinery used in conducting the business of the Provost Marshal's office.

That will do for one day, and henceforth, cell No. 4 is historical. No wonder, on such a record, a citizen feels degraded enough to say, that American citizenship has no immunities. The Editor says that:—

"There is no ignominy to which, in these parts, it is not exposed. We are simply indebted to the sovereign grace of the Provost Marshal if we breathe this upper air at all. 'In the palace lives a man who can cut my head off,' says Quemay, describing the guarantees of Louis Fifteenth's monarchy. At the corner of Elm and Broome-streets, sits a man who can put us in No. 4, snuff up our own condition.

"Torquemada tortured, but he did it in a clean, gentlemanly way. He was content with ingenious applications of wood, and irons, and fire and water. Fanatic as he was, he never degraded his cause by making loathsome vermin the ministers of its vengeance. It has been reserved for Provost Marshal Kennedy to bring into requisition this new sort of peine forte et dure—the old anguish made all the more tolerable by an overpowering disgust."

The Provost Marshal, it ought to be said, is not the principal of this torture, but the agent. Would it not be more fair and manly to hold up the principal, rather than the agent.

THE ENGLISH PRESS ON MR. LINCOLN'S EMANCIPATION PROCLAMATION.

(The Times, Oct. 7.)

It is rarely that a man can be found to balance accurately mischief to another against advantage to himself. President Lincoln is, as the world says, a good-tempered man, neither better nor worse than the mass of his kind—neither a fool nor a sage, neither a villain nor a saint, but a piece of that common useful clay out of which it delights the American democracy to make great Republican personages. Yet President Lincoln has declared that from the 1st of January next to come every State that is in rebellion shall be, in the eye of Mr. Lincoln, a Free State. After that date Mr. Lincoln proposes to enact that every slave in a rebel State shall be for ever after free, and he promises that neither he, nor his army, nor his navy will do anything to repress any efforts which the negroes in such rebel States may make for the recovery of their freedom. This means, of course, that Mr. Lincoln will, on the 1st of next January, do his best to excite a servile war in the States which he cannot occupy with his arms. He will run up the rivers in his gunboats; he will seek out the places which are left but slightly guarded, and where the women and children have been trusted to the fidelity of coloured domestics. He will appeal to the black blood of the African; he will whisper of the pleasures of spoil and of the gratification of yet fiercer instincts; and when blood begins to flow and shrieks come piercing through the darkness, Mr. Lincoln will wait till the rising flames tell that all is consummated, and then he will rub his hands and think that revenge is sweet. This is what Mr. Lincoln avows before the world that he is about to do. Now, we are in Europe thoroughly convinced that the death of slavery must follow as necessarily upon the success of the Confederates in this war as the dispersion of darkness occurs upon the rising of the sun; but sudden and forcible emancipation resulting from "the efforts the negroes may make for their actual freedom" can only be effected by massacre and utter destruction. Mr. Lincoln avows, therefore, that he proposes to excite the negroes of the Southern plantations to murder the families of their masters while these are engaged in the war. The conception of such a crime is horrible. The employment of Indians sinks to a level with civilized warfare in comparison with it; the most detestable doctrines of Mazzini are almost less atrocious; even Mr. Lincoln's own recent achievements of burning by gunboats the defenceless villages on the Mississippi are dwarfed by this gigantic wickedness. The single thing to be said for it is that it is a wickedness that holds its head high and scorns hypocrisy. It does not pretend to attack slavery as slavery. It launches this threat of a servile rebellion as a means of war against certain States, and accompanies it with a declaration of general protection to all other slavery.

Where he has no power Mr. Lincoln will set the negroes free; where he retains power he will consider them as slaves. "Come to me," he cries to the insurgent planters, "and I will preserve your rights as slaveholders; but set me still at defiance, and I will wrap myself in virtue, and take the sword of freedom in my hand, and, instead of aiding you to oppress, I will champion the rights of humanity. Here are whips for you who are loyal; go forth and flog or sell your black chattels as you please. Here are torches and knives for employment against you who are disloyal; I will press them into every black hand, and teach their use." Little Delaware, with her 2000 slaves, shall still be protected in her loyal tyranny. Maryland, with her 90,000 slaves, shall "freely accept or freely reject" any project for either gradual or immediate abolition; but if Mississippi and South Carolina, where the slaves rather outnumber the masters, do not repent, and receive from Mr. Lincoln a licence to trade in human flesh, that human flesh shall be adopted by Mr. Lincoln as the agent of his vengeance. The position is peculiar for a mere layman. Mr. Lincoln, by this proclamation, constitutes himself a sort of moral American Pope. He claims to sell indulgences to own votaries, and he offers them with full hands to all who will fall down and worship him. It is his to bind, and it is his to loose. His decree of emancipation is to go into remote States, where his temporal power cannot be made manifest, and where no stars and stripes are to be seen; and in those distant swamps he is, by a sort of Yankee excommunication, to lay the land under a slavery interdiction.

What will the South think of this? The South will answer with a hiss of scorn. But what will the North think of it? What will Pennsylvania say—Pennsylvania, which is already uneasy under the loss of her best customers, and not easy under the absolute despotism of the present Government at Washington? What Boston may say or think is not, perhaps, of much consequence. But what will New York say? It would not answer the purpose of any of these cities to have the South made a howling wilderness. They want the handling of the millions which are produced by the labour of the black man. Pennsylvania desires to sell her manufactures in the South; New York wishes to be again broker, banker, and merchant to the South. This is what the Union means to these cities. They would rather have a live independent State to deal with than a dead dependency where nothing could be earned. To these practical persons President Lincoln would be, after his black revolution had succeeded, like a dog-stealer who who should present the anxious owner with the head of his favourite pointer. They want the useful creature alive. The South without its cotton and its sugar and its tobacco would be of small use to New York, or even to Philadelphia; and the South without the produce of its rice and cotton, and its sugar and tobacco, would be but a sorry gain, even if it could be obtained. If President Lincoln wants such a conquest as this, the North is, perhaps, yet strong enough to conquer Hayti. A few fanatics, of course, will shout, but we cannot think that, except in utter desperation and vindictiveness, any real party in the North will applaud this nefarious resolution to light up a servile war in the distant homesteads of the South.

As a proof of what the leaders of the North, in their passion and their despair, would do if they could, this is a very sad document. As a proof of the hopelessness and recklessness which prompt their actions, it is a very instructive document. We gather from it that Mr. Lincoln has lost all hope of preserving the Union, and is now willing to let any quack try his nostrum. As an act of policy it is, if possible, more contemptible than it is wicked. It may possibly produce some partial risings, for let my armed power publish an exhortation to the labouring class of any community to plunder and murder, and there will be some response. It might happen in London, or Paris, or New York. That Mr. Lincoln's emancipation decrees will have any general effect bearing upon the issue of the war, we do not, however, believe. The negroes have already abundantly discovered that the tender mercies of the Northerners are cruelities. The freedom which is associated with labour in the trenches, military discipline, and frank avowals of personal abhorrence momentarily repeated does not commend itself to the negro nature. General Butler could, if he pleased, tell strange stories of the ill success of his tamperings with the negroes about New Orleans. We do not think that even now, when Mr. Lincoln plays his last card, it will prove to be a trump. Powerful malignity is a dreadful reality, but impotent malignity is apt to be a very contemptible spectacle. Here is a would-be conqueror and a would-be extirpator who is not quite safe in his seat of government, who is reduced to such straits that he accepts a defeat as a glorious escape, a capitulation of 8000 men as an unimportant event, a drawn battle as a glorious victory, and the retreat of an invading army which retires laden with plunder and rich in stores as a deliverance. Here is a President who has just, against his will, supplied his antagonists with a hundred and twenty guns and millions of stores, and who is trembling for the very ground on which he stands. Yet, if we judge only by his pompous proclamations, we should believe that he had a garrison in every city of the South. This is more like a Chinaman beating his two swords together to frighten his enemy than like an earnest man pressing on his cause in steadfastness and truth.

(The Morning Herald, Oct. 7.)

Notwithstanding all this, and notwithstanding his own solemn oath of obedience to the constitution, Mr. Lincoln has ventured on an act of high-handed usurpation such as would hardly be dared by any monarch of a consolidated empire whose subjects enjoy even the semblance of a Parliamentary Government. He has proclaimed, on his own responsibility, a total revolution in the status of more than 3,000,000 persons, and the confiscation of property to the value of some three hundred millions sterling. Such an act has no legal force whatever, and never can have any while the constitution of the United States remains in existence. Nor has its author cared to give it even the faintest semblance of legality. He, whose powers are merely executive, has assumed to make law by mere proclamation. He has not even condescended to go through the form of summoning the Federal Congress to enact, with legal ceremony, the manumission of the slaves of rebel States. He does not say a word, he probably does not entertain a thought, of calling Congress together as early as possible to relieve him by an act of indemnity, if not from the legal consequences of his act, yet at least from some part of the terrible responsibility attaching to this monstrous violation of the law. The act is, therefore, as nakedly and grossly illegal as any official act possibly could be. It would not have had any legal effect even if it had been perpetrated by Congress. The flagrancy and openness of its unconstitutionality would have been less striking; but in such a matter neither a presidential ukase nor an act of Congress would be of any more value than an enactment by the British Parliament confiscating all lands in the State of New York, or a proclamation of Lord Palmerston's suspending the habeas corpus in Missouri. The Federal Legislature, like the Federal Executive, has but limited powers, and to interfere with the internal affairs of the individual States is expressly forbidden to it. Not only, then, has Mr. Lincoln done that which he had no right to do, but he has done that which the whole Federal Government and the whole of the people adhering to it have not the right and cannot confer the right to do. And if ever the Constitution were restored and the Union resumed, any slave who should claim his freedom under the present proclamation would find his case summarily dismissed by any Federal judge whatsoever; and an appeal to the Supreme Court would only result in the formal condemnation of President Lincoln's present act as unconstitutional, if not treasonable. Legally, therefore, even under the legal fiction which supposes the Union to be still unbroken, the proclamation is altogether void and of none effect.

Politically, it is worse than void. The "rebel" States are beyond the jurisdiction of the President, except in the few places where a Federal garrison occupies some Southern town, or a Federal army, encamped on Southern soil, trembles for its own safety, and exercises no power whatever, beyond the range of its guns. Butler, no doubt, may deprive the citizens of New Orleans of their slaves as well as of their other property; and if there were any hope that the slaves would be better treated by their deliverers than by their masters, we might overlook the legal wrong, in consideration of the substantial justice done. At Norfolk, a few negroes may exchange the homes to which, on the whole, they have been well treated and contented, for a life of misery and brutal ill-usage, amid the rabble of the Northern cities. But this is all. The negroes of the South, with these few exceptions, will remain as they are, the slaves of the citizens of the Confederate States, held as slaves under the laws which the States have retained from colonial times, and under those which the Confederacy has inherited from the late Union. The effect on their condition will, we earnestly hope, be simply none—we hope so, because the only effect which the proclamation could possibly have, would be to render that condition worse by far than it ever yet has been. It is the belief of those who instigated, and those who approve the proclamation, that it will be followed by a general negro insurrection, or at least, by a series of isolated negro revolts. If it were so, the crime of President Lincoln would be among the most infamous recorded in history, and his name would rank in the world's annals with that of Nana Sahib. For a negro insurrection would out-do the worst horrors of the Indian mutiny; it would make a Meerut of every plantation, a Cawnpore of every undefended village; and it would end in a fearful retribution, costing hundreds of lives, and leaving the condition of the slave in the South infinitely worse than it was even in our own West Indian possessions. The negro is capable of lust and rapine; he may be excited to incendiarism and to murder; but he will never make a stand in arms against the white man. Revolt would be crushed; vengeance would be taken; and a reign of terror would be inaugurated. Or, failing insurrection, the suspicions of the masters might be aroused, and their yoke thereby rendered cruel and galling. This is the only effect which could possibly be produced in the South by the President's proclamation; and, therefore, we are glad to know that the Southerners, who have long expected it, believe that it will be as null in practice as in law; that the negroes will remain contented, and the masters confident in their attachment, as heretofore.

If Mr. Davis had himself directed the course of his rival, we do not think he could have dictated a measure more likely to divide the North and to unite the Border States firmly with the rest of the South; or one more calculated to weaken the Federal Government and to strengthen the hands of the domestic adversaries who are already beginning to conspire for its overthrow.

(The Morning Post, Oct. 6.)

Abraham Lincoln, finding his authority waning, even where it is still nominally recognized, has determined to vindicate it where it is entirely ignored. He has failed to subjugate the Southern States by his legions, and in his extremity has decided on effecting his purpose by a scratch of his pen. On and after the first day of January, 1863, he decrees that the 4,000,000 of slaves at present kept in subjection in the Southern States shall be free. The President wills it, and of course all must obey. On reading his proclamation, one can only regret that so zealous and powerful an Abolitionist should have seen fit to limit the sphere of operation of such unparalleled beneficence. Why are the slaves of the Southern States thus signally favoured, and those of Africa left still in thralldom? Why has not the President of the United States of America enfranchised the slaves of the entire universe.

It is scarcely possible to treat seriously of this singular manifesto. If not genuine, the composition would be entitled to no little praise as a piece of matchless irony.

(The Standard, Oct. 7.)

President Lincoln, under the constitution of the United States, has no power to issue any such proclamation. Neither does Congress possess the power; and during the last session it was never once proposed that Congress should assume the power. The proclamation has, therefore, no legal force. President Lincoln might as well have issued a proclamation to the effect that on and after the 1st of January, 1863, debtors should abstain from paying creditors, or that "then, thenceforward, and for ever," there should be no more buying and selling, or any more wearing of shoes and stockings. Still of late he has done many things which admittedly he had no right to do; and it may consequently be thought that he is as much justified in meddling with slavery as with the liberties of the Northern people. But—and let this be marked—President Lincoln distinguishes between slavery interference and interference with American liberty. At once he suspends "the writ of habeas corpus, and declares martial law throughout the United States with respect to all persons arrested for aiding the rebellion or hindering the draft;" but only on the 1st of January, 1863, is there to be emancipation. Northern apologists will, of course, say that it is magnanimity, giving another chance to the misguided Southerners before their doom is sealed. We deny this; and, instead of magnanimity, pronounce the delay unstatesmanlike and unworthy. We see in it nothing but craven fear lest France and this country should think the time had come for them to intervene. It is, we believe, an appeal to France, and this country against the logical consequences of Federal incompetence and military overthrow. Had President Lincoln been sincere about emancipation, or possessed sufficient nerve to accept or resist the pressure recently put upon him, no such proclamation would have appeared. Either he would have gone straight and manfully to the mark, as in the case of the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, or he would not have said a word about slavery. As the proclamation stands, it is the wretched makeshift of a petty-foggish lawyer. President Lincoln is aware that by January 1, 1863, Congress will have resumed its sittings, so he puts off the slavery question for Congress to deal with. This is the step President Lincoln has taken; the sham with which he attempts to deceive England and Europe.

(The Daily Telegraph, Oct. 7.)

Its real significance may be summed up in a single sentence. It is a wide-world proclamation that the President and his accomplices have come to the end of all plausible expedients, and that they have undisguisedly fallen back upon the most extravagant yet most common-place "dodge" of the faction that placed them in power. In doing so they not only abandon the pretence of acting for the whole public of their country, but mock the sacrifices of their fellow-citizens in blood and treasure by rendering the restoration of the Union impossible.

(The Daily News, Oct. 7.)

President Lincoln's Proclamation on Slave Emancipation has not, as far as at present appears, the importance which some persons in England are disposed to attach to it. Like most of the acts of the Executive of the United States, it is feeble and halting. It was right and wise to declare free the slaves of rebels; it should have been done outright and not as a conditional threat, to take effect three months after date. Had it been issued a year ago, or when the Federal armies advanced on leaving winter quarters, it would have saved the Government of the Union much discussion, and would in all probability have seriously crippled the enemy. Now it cannot take effect before the Federal armies are ready to advance and execute the projected movement upon the Slave States. Had it been issued when President Lincoln had the support of an united and enthusiastic public, its effect in imprinting a policy on the war would have been incalculable. Issued now, when the pro-slavery party in the North is taking courage, it may prove but one more element of weakness. Mr. Lincoln's great mistake from the first has been not to perceive that revolution could only be met by revolution. No doubt it was the mistake also of a majority in the North; but a year ago the people would have followed a leader who knew his own mind. The issuing of the proclamation will prove a wise or a vain act, according as it is backed with more or less energy in the field. There is, however, one kind of praise which, although not very complimentary, may be given to it. The Proclamation cannot make matters worse. It cannot aggravate the condition of the negroes. At the South the black man will still be valued, as he always has been, for use as long as he remains in his master's power. As to those who have escaped or may escape, the Confederate Government cannot use them worse than they do now. At Harper's Ferry there were a mixed multitude of free negroes and escaped slaves when the place was taken. Jackson—"the Puritan Jackson," as we have seen him s'yed—swept the whole lot off, and sent them into slavery. After the last of Pope's battles, a party of negroes went out under the protection of a flag of truce to bury the dead. When they had performed their work a corps of Confederate infantry advanced upon them and made them all prisoners and slaves, and a shout of exultation burst up from the whole South, the chivalrous South, at this treacherous violation of the laws of war. This truculence must be provided against in future. If Mr. Lincoln affects to give liberty to men, he must give them arms with which to defend that possession, and give them officers. To make soldiers of all the blacks who show their courage and energy by escaping is the surest, perhaps the only way, to prevent servile war.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

OUR friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any rate, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HORZE, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 2s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. Advertisements to be forwarded to the publisher at 102, Fleet-street.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 9, 1862.

Aspects of the Abolition Edict.

PRECISELY as we predicted, the North has played its last card. The proclamation of emancipation to the slaves in every State or part of a State which shall be in rebellion after the 1st of January next is a desperate measure; but it is one for which all who had carefully watched the current of American events must have been fully prepared. We do not attribute the credit or discredit of the step to the President personally. He has defined his own position in regard to it more clearly than he perhaps intended. Some time ago, when discussing with the representatives or pretended representatives of the Border States his scheme of emancipation by transportation, with an indemnity to the consenting States, he warned them that he had been vehemently pressed to take upon himself the responsibility of proclaiming general emancipation, and that he might at any time be compelled to yield to this pressure. More lately, in a correspondence with Mr. Greeley, of the New York Tribune, he declared that if he could restore the Union without freeing a single slave, he would do so; and if he could not restore it without setting free all the slaves, he would set them free. So recently as September 13th he wrote to the Emancipation Committee of Chicago, to state his objections to the very steps which he has now taken; objections perfectly sound, if not indicative of any brilliant foresight or strong sense of duty. A proclamation of emancipation, he remarked, would probably be altogether devoid of efficacy; and an attempt to arm the slaves against their masters would only result in putting arms into the enemy's hands. It is clear, therefore, that when the campaign in Maryland began the President was still disposed to refrain from any violent and wholesale interference with slavery. Had that campaign really issued in a Federal victory, he would probably have adhered to that determination. But the indecisive result of the bloody struggle drove him to despair of success by any legitimate military operations; and "yielding to pressure," he issued his decree for the emancipation of all slaves in every State which shall be in rebellion three months hence—that is, in all human probability, of all slaves except those of Delaware and Maryland. We need not inquire closely into his motives, or those of his immediate advisers. It is possible that, by the President and his Cabinet, the proclamation was intended rather as a sop to Europe than as a measure of American policy. Mr. Seward may have recommended it as a means of preventing the possibility of French and English intervention. It may have been believed that England would be deluded by the pretence of Abolitionist intentions, would accept in good faith the specious promise of a crusade against slavery, and would submit for the future to see her weavers starved and her ships illegally seized, without a murmur. This may have been the hope of the Cabinet, or of some of its members; we hardly think that it was so. The Federal Government has shown, by appointing the notorious Captain Wilkes to the West Indian command, a disposition rather to defy than to conciliate Great Britain. It is possible that there was a hope that the awful threat of an anti-slavery war might frighten the South into submission. It is certain that a large number of Northern Republicans expect, by exciting servile revolts, to withdraw thousands of officers and men from the Confederate army for the defence of their own homes. But whatever may have been the immediate motive which led to the issue of this proclamation, it clearly emanated from no feelings of justice or generosity towards the negro race. The only boon which Mr. Lincoln ever offered to that race was transportation—transportation either to the barbarism of Liberia, or to the wilds of Central America. And now he offers liberty, not where he can give it, but exactly where he can not. He does not promise to liberate the slaves in those States which are still occupied by Federal troops and subject to Federal rule, but only to emancipate those who are beyond his reach—those who are held in servitude under the laws of States which have both practically and formally ceased to be members of the Union. He offers emancipation, not as a President, but as Commander-in-chief of invading armies; not as Great Britain gave it to her black subjects in the West Indies, but as she and others have tendered it is to those districts which they have assailed in war. With this sort of Abolitionism no honest man can have any sympathy whatever.

In the first place it must be noted that the proclamation has no legal effect whatever. The President has no legislative power; he is simply an executive officer, whose authority is strictly limited by law, and who, in overstepping the bounds imposed by law, not only exposes himself to impeachment, but renders his acts null and void. He has assumed in this case to make law, which he cannot do, and which he is punishable for attempting; he has violated his oath of office, and set the Constitution at naught in the most flagrant manner. Without even the sanction of Congress, he has legislated on a point over which Congress has no control. A declaratory amendment to the Constitution expressly denies to the Federal Government that right of interference with the internal affairs of the States which Mr. Lincoln has now assumed. And therefore, even if his decree were invested with the form and authority of an Act of Congress, no honest lawyer in America would pretend to consider it of any effect; and on the first case which should arise under it, the Supreme Court would assuredly pronounce it null and void. Legally, therefore, the Presidential ukase is just as valid as would be a decree of the Czar, or an Act of Parliament, pretending to bind the citizens of Ohio or Massachusetts. Constitutionally, it is an act of high treason; at common law, it is a simple nullity.

Mr. Lincoln has indeed asserted, with that amazing ignorance of American history which distinguishes the Republican party, that the States derive their existence from the Union, have no status but what the Union bestows upon them, and when they break away from this have no rights or legal position whatever. As a matter of fact, this is not the case; but if it were so, it would only justify him in treating the seceded States, when conquered, as subject provinces—not in assuming to legislate for them while as yet they enjoy a de facto independence. The right to punish rebellion when it has been suppressed does not justify the exercise by a belligerent of civil jurisdiction over a country with an organized Government and a vast army in the field, whatever may be the legal status of that Government and that army. In such a case, confiscation becomes pillage, executions for treason are justly regarded and retaliated as murders; and the pretence to abolish slavery stands on precisely the same footing. Conquest might give the North the rights of a conqueror over the institutions, the property, and the lives of the conquered; while the contest is waged on equal terms, the assumption of legislative authority over the hostile territory is as much an outrage on the laws of war as we have shown it to be a violation of the constitutional law of the Union. Mr. Lincoln and the Federal Congress have never possessed the right of sovereignty over the Southern States in virtue of the law; they have not yet acquired that right by conquest; and in pretending to exercise it, whether by the arrest of citizens, or the confiscation of property, or the emancipation of slaves, the Government have put themselves outside the pale of international law, as they had already put themselves outside the pale of the Constitution—and they expose themselves to immediate reprisals; as, if law be ever restored in the North, they have incurred the risk of ultimate impeachment.

As regards the South generally, the proclamation will be practically what it is legally—"void and of no effect." It will not induce a single man to quit the ranks of the army for the defence of his house and family against the imaginary danger of servile insurrection. Where they have been left to themselves, the slaves have no desire whatever to rise upon their masters, and "assert their manhood" and inaugurate their freedom by the murder of women and children. There is no more chance of such an event than of an insurrection of the English peasantry to slaughter the families and sack the houses of their landlords. True, the slaves are more excitable, less intelligent, and in every way inferior to European labourers; but they are, at the same time, in more intimate relation with their masters, more closely cared for, equally well fed, clothed, and lodged; more contented in dependence, and more attached to those on whom they depend. They do not like work, perhaps, but they have no desire for liberty; they love their masters, and they have an instinctive hatred of the Yankees. Where no Federal camp has been placed as a missionary station of Abolition, their loyalty is as reliable as any sentiment of an ignorant and impressionable people ever can be. But where Federal troops have been for some time stationed; where they have gathered round them an idle mob of negro camp-followers; where they have seduced the female servants of Southern families, and inveigled them into their quarters; where they have preached revolt and spread demoralization—there the worst mischiefs may be apprehended. The troops are expressly forbidden from repressing any efforts which the slaves may use to secure their freedom, even if those efforts should consist in arson, midnight massacre, and all, or more than all, the horrors which have made the names of Delhi and Cawnpore infamous to remotest posterity. The Nana Sahib of New Orleans, expressly in view of such a possibility, has disarmed the white population of that city; and the protest of the foreign inhabitants showed that they considered the danger serious, if not immediately imminent. In Norfolk, in New Orleans, and perhaps in the neighbourhood of the Federal army in the West, there may be reason to apprehend outrages which it makes man's blood run cold to contemplate. But these outrages cannot affect the issue of the war; they will lead to no general insurrection or extensive series of servile revolts; they will not weaken the Southern army by a single regiment; they will but lend a fiercer fervour to its courage, and add the thirst of vengeance to the nobler and more generous feelings which have hitherto stimulated the Confederate soldiery to endurance and to victory. They will prolong and embitter the struggle; they may bring about a war of extermination; but they will not avert the inevitable separation which, in all but legal form, is already accomplished, or serve to retain for the North a single acre of Southern territory.

The extreme Abolitionists of the North and West are, of course, frantic with delight. The Tribune invokes a blessing on the President; the pulpits and platforms of New England will, no doubt, resound with his praises. The flagging zeal of the Western States, which contain at once the stannest Abolitionists, and the best fighting elements that remain to the North, will be revived. Recruiting may, perchance, prosper; drafting may become popular. The Republican party, led, as are all parties in times of revolution, by its tail, will probably give its unanimous approval to the President of its choice—provided he too submits to be ruled by the most violent leaders of the violent section which now controls the party, and threatens to dominate the North. The cue has been given by the Governors assembled at Altona, Pa., and by the Republican Convention of the Empire State; and it will probably be taken up in every quarter. The revolution and the revolutionary leaders will be in the ascendant; the Federal Government will be swept along with the tide, or thrust aside by it; the war will be directed by self-constituted war committees, and the command will be in the hands of men like Fremont and Mitchell, who are neither soldiers nor patriots, but known fanatics and suspected criminals. Such a war may be as long as the wars waged by the Convention and the Directory; but against the veterans of the South, led by such generals as the South has found in her hour of need, revolutionary fury can but expend itself in vain.

We do not suppose that the Constitutional party and the respectable classes of the North—the men who regard the law, or the men who value the security of their wealth, and have hitherto hoped for the restoration of their trade—will submit to ruin, commercial and political, without an effort to save themselves and their country. Those who loved the Union for its own sake will not care to fight against Secession under the flag of Abolition. Those who desired to restore the Union for the sake of Southern trade will not fight to turn the South into a barren wilderness. Supported by all who have anything to lose—by all who in the hour of national frenzy retain any calmness of mind or sobriety of thought—the Democratic party will, no doubt, make a desperate attempt to regain the helm; but it can hardly hope to succeed. The time is past when sober counsels might have prevailed; and the only result of an effort to enforce them must be the destruction of the moderate party, and the inauguration of a reign of terror which shall cause the comparative gentleness of Cameron, Seward, and Stanton to be remembered with regret. Unless Europe should interfere—and interference seems now less probable than ever—it must be feared that we are destined to witness a protracted struggle, constantly increasing in bitterness and ferocity, and leading only to the utter exhaustion of both the belligerents—possibly to the enslavement, and certainly to the ruin, of the aggressor.

The Condition of the Federal Army.

THE fortune of the war has ceased for the moment to engross the attention of Europe. Just now the political action of the Washington Government overshadows every other question, and it happens that Mr. Lincoln has chosen a time for the promulgation of his decree of emancipation when there is a pause in hostilities; not an absolute truce, either by compact or by circumstances, for both east and west the crack of the rifle, the roar of artillery, the muster of troops, and the daily additions to the inmates of the hospitals, attest the continuation of the deadly conflict. But compared to the past few months, from the 17th to the 29th Sept., the date of the latest advices, there was quiet and repose. We hear only of skirmishes and preparations for the coming campaign. It is one of those pauses which the friends of humanity might hope would induce reflection and make peace possible. It is a season when men might well ask themselves for what they are fighting. The battle-field of September 17, where miles of ground were covered with the dead, dying, and wounded; where 30,000 men were killed and maimed; where the badly wounded were left to perish, and only those likely to recover removed to the crowded sheds, where the surgeons were busy day and night in amputating legs and arms, and, according to an eye-witness, “a large hole was quickly filled with the amputated limbs”—surely such a scene might have induced reflection, and have inclined the most ardent warrior to peace, if it could be attained without dishonour. But not a word of peace is spoken except in the Confederate House of Representatives, where the member for Tennessee proposed a resolution that commissioners should be sent to Washington to offer to negotiate on equitable terms. Europe will not think less kindly of the South because, in the flush of victory, her first thought is for the cessation of war, though her benevolent intentions are frustrated. The answer to the humane proposition is given before an envoy can be despatched or appointed. Mr. Lincoln and his friends are not tired of bloodshed. Two hundred thousand dead from disease and wounds, and as many crippled, have not checked the lust for dominion or for vengeance. Peace! Listen to the answer of the Washington Government:—“True, you are the victors. You have driven us from your territories; our great army has melted away; enormous bounties scarcely induce our people to enlist. But we will go on; we will not hear of peace; we will do our best to stir up a servile war in your midst; we will strive to rouse the savage nature of the now docile negro, and if, in getting his “actual freedom,” he murders your wives and children, we will protect him. If we cannot conquer you in the field, though we are two to one, we will do our best to make your country a howling wilderness.” So the war must go on; and God defend the right! In the battles to come the men of the South will not fight less manfully—will not feel a less cheerful dependence on the favour of Heaven, because the first use they wished to make of victory was to proffer peace to their implacable enemy.

The truth about the Maryland episode is oozing out slowly but surely. New York is no longer so jubilant, Wall-street is no longer so confident. General McClellan's victories are nowhere, except in his despatches. On the 11th of September he left Washington at the head of an immense army, to prevent the Confederates carrying out their rumoured intention of invading Pennsylvania. He met a small force of the enemy on the 13th, which kept him employed until the 17th; when the Confederates being reinforced, an engagement ensued, which on account of the slaughter, if for no other reason, ought to be memorable. Who gained that battle? The Confederates had not more than 60,000 men engaged, yet they wounded thirteen Federal generals, and after fighting from morning till night, remained in front of the enemy. The Federal commander was so prostrated that he could not, until the morning of the 19th, make a movement to ascertain the position of his foe. He knew not whether he had gained a victory or had been thoroughly defeated. A few hours later he heard that the Confederates were crossing the Potomac in good order, with all their equipment and wounded. Then he indites a despatch, and claims a great victory, and declares the Confederates are being driven across the Potomac. If any one will be at the pains to read McClellan's Maryland despatches, he will find they are as mendacious, though not so flaming, as the despatches of Pope. We do not desire to disparage General McClellan unnecessarily, but the facts extort this observation. It is quite possible that McClellan was deceived by his generals of division, or his despatches may have been edited at Washington. The affair on September 17 was clearly not a Northern victory. The Federals have not been able to follow their enemy; and when the last mail was despatched to Europe, the Northern army had not only been driven out of Virginia, but could not re-enter that State.

But the North has lost considerably by the Maryland expedition. The capture of Harper's Ferry is of vast importance in its material, moral, and strategic aspect; as we may gather from the quantity of stores taken by the Confederates, and the anger of the Federal people at the disaster. This Southern triumph was achieved with little or no loss, which could not have been the case if McClellan had not been engaged in Maryland, and therefore unable to despatch succours to the beleaguered garrison. The capture of Harper's Ferry is one of the most solid gains of the campaign, and was due to a well devised and admirably executed plan.

The present position of the Northern armies is plain enough, and yet inexplicable. McClellan has not more than 150,000 men under his command, and a portion of that force consists of the new levies. In the West the rapid movements of Buell, and his inability to prevent or even delay the progress of the Confederate arms, is a sufficiently indicate that those who say he has 160,000 men at his disposal exaggerate his means. What, then, has become of that great army of the North? We asked this question some weeks back, and we repeat it now because the disappearance of that host is forced upon our notice. There is only one explanation, and that is—that when we are told with bated breath by the friends of the North, that 200,000 men have perished, and a like number have been crippled, either in limb or health, since the Washington Government called all the earth to witness the vastness of its armaments—which, whether it pleased Heaven or no, must crush the South—they tell us no more than the truth. What, then, is the great result of the campaign? Not that the invader has been driven out of Virginia; not that his power has been crushed in Tennessee; not that he has had to abandon other States on which he had a hold at the commencement of the campaign; not that his fleets have been defied by the nascent navy of the South; not that he has been beaten on every field where he has been unaided by his fleets; not that the armies of the East and West have only been saved from capture or annihilation by seeking the shelter of gunboats; not that the Confederates have taken from their enemy costly and imperial equipments and munitions of war—these gains, we admit, are severally and conjointly immense—but the great result, the crowning and so far decisive triumph is, that the armies of the United States have ceased to exist; for what now keeps the field, besides the new levies, is but a remnant of those seemingly invincible legions that were in being last spring.

We learn, by telegram, that the Federal army is going into winter quarters, and that the Federal press strongly opposes this proceeding. Now, we think, the merest tyro in military science will perceive that, if General Halleck and General McClellan have recommended and insisted on such a suspension of hostilities as is involved in the army going into winter quarters, they have acted not only with sound discretion, but upon the most palpable compulsion. Ever since the battles of June it has been known that the North could not carry on the war without fresh troops; yet, in spite of the most urgent appeals to patriotism, unheard-of bounties, and threats of drafting, it has taxed all the influence and energies of the Government to get together 300,000 men. But if at the end of June 300,000 fresh troops would have been sufficient, we must remember that since then disaster after disaster has fallen upon the North, and this number of recruits is now but an instalment of the whole number necessary to place her in a position to carry on hostilities. There is good reason, indeed, for the apparently extravagant demand for an army of a million of men. The South is now vastly stronger both in her organization, in her discipline, and in her equipments, than she was when 700,000 men were sent forth to subjugate her. It is, then, we repeat, but reasonable for the North to ask for more than 700,000 men to accomplish the task which that number failed to do under much more favourable circumstances. But the new levies being indispensable for carrying on the war, must not some time be allowed for their collection and organization? Mr. Lincoln may put his foot down as heavily as he will, but he cannot conjure up an army ready equipped and fully disciplined. Grant that the draft is to be rigidly enforced, and that its enforcement, owing to the fanatical ardour of the Abolitionists, does not give rise to any serious disturbances, and that within a few weeks the railroads from every part of the Union are freighted with recruits; what then? Is General McClellan to launch an undisciplined rabble against the veteran troops of the South, commanded by generals whose genius is worthily compared to that of the greatest captains of ancient or modern times? If he did so, or if General Halleck sanctioned such conduct, suffered the raw recruits to be led, not to fight but to be slaughtered, these generals would deserve the hearty execrations of their countrymen. Hostilities will not altogether cease; but unless battles are forced on the North by the Confederates the programme of the Federal army going into winter quarters will be carried into effect.

Yet, it must be confessed, it is not without cause that the Federal press denounces the proceeding. It is quite as aggravating, quite as disheartening, as it is necessary. What happened last year? McClellan was called to the command of the Army of the Potomac. He refused to operate until he had changed that mob of recruits into an army. Month after month was devoted to drilling and organization, until at length the most fastidious martinets were enchanted with the perfection of the work; and, as we all know, not only Northern, but European military critics, whilst fully admitting the devotion of Southern troops and the military capacity of Southern commanders, predicted that this Army of the Potomac could not fail to conquer. The winter was passed in drilling, the spring was spent in besieging fortifications defended by wooden guns; and, when the summer came—the Southern summer, which never comes without bringing in its train fever and pestilence—McClellan commenced the real work of the campaign; and that Southern summer witnessed a series of Federal disasters unparalleled in the annals of any other nation. The winter is the season when the Northern troops can best carry on war in the South; but, by a singular fatality, the ensuing winter, like the last winter, must be devoted to preparation; and so, perhaps, when Yellow Jack puts in his annual appearance in 1863, the Federal armies may be just ready, as they were in 1862, to do battle with the Confederates. The North has been fighting when she should have rested; she is about to rest when she should fight. We do not wonder at the discontent manifested by the Federal Journals, but ere long they may be still more chagrined. Certainly they will have far greater cause for dissatisfaction if the South, by refusing to allow the retirement of the Federal army into winter quarters, should force the Federal commanders to drill their recruits on the field of battle.

The Factory Folk.

THE patience of the hundreds of thousands of families deprived of work, and almost deprived of bread, by the American blockade, has been the theme of just and well-earned praise from all parties and all organs of opinion. It has been greater than was expected, even by those who knew them best. But it has not excited among those who were in some degree acquainted with their modes of thought and habitual temper, that surprise which has been manifest in the admiration of those who judged the factory operatives from a distance, and by comparison with other classes of the labouring multitude. There was a time when no such forbearance and good feeling could have been hoped for; a time when the factory population was ignorant, passionate, and violent; when it saw in every depression of trade a conspiracy of the masters to lower wages, and degrade the status of the labourer; and occasionally avenged its imaginary wrongs by armed attacks on the mills, by riots, and even by deliberate assassinations. That time has long since gone by. Strikes have become infrequent; when they do occur they are brought about, not by the voluntary act of the workers, but by the wanton and interested intermeddling of the Trades' Unions; and though they are still marked by serious violations, alike of the law of the land, and of the rules of equity and honesty, yet they are seldom disgraced by those acts of atrocious and brutal violence which were formerly common, and which still distinguish strikes in most other trades. The deliberate assassination of recusant masters or independent workmen is now confined to Sheffield, with its short-lived, reckless, drunken population—it is unknown in the factory districts. But during the present crisis the people have abstained, not merely from turbulence, but even from murmurs. There have been no political demonstrations, to urge upon a neglectful Government its duty towards its suffering subjects, and to enforce at once the rules of international law, and the rights of an injured and innocent population. There has been no discontent with the masters. It has been understood and willingly admitted that they were wholly guiltless in the matter; that they had been heavy losers before they closed their mills, and must be losing enormously by their closure; and that no foresight or precaution of theirs could have averted the calamity. Even where the masters have grossly neglected the duties of Christian neighbourhood, as in some few instances has been the case—where they have sold their stocks of cotton, shut up their mills, and left their workpeople to starve without any assistance of theirs, while they devoted their capital to profitable speculation—though the unkindness has been bitterly felt, there has been no violent outburst, no open ebullition of indignation. These masters will have in future the refuse of the labour-market, and will find their hands always less willing, less reliable, and more disposed to strike than those of their neighbours; and this moral retribution will be the whole extent of the vengeance they have to fear. They have done as they would with their own; and the people do not dispute their right to do so.

The condition of the factory operatives, in ordinary times, has been as much misunderstood as their temper and character by those who have never lived among them. Miserable as they are now, their misery is not greater than was once their prosperity. Now, they would be thankful for the wages of a Dorsetshire labourer. Time was when their incomes rivalled those of the small farmer, or the curate of a country parish. A good deal of sentimental compassion has always been wasted upon them. Lord Shaftesbury—while the people on his father's estate were starving on a miserable dole of 7s. or 8s. per week, oscillating between labour and pauperism, and scarcely better off than are the Lancashire sufferers in this their extreme distress—busied himself with virulent denunciations of the millowners, and obtrusive pity for the misery of their "white slaves." In London he earned credit as a diligent philanthropist; in Lancashire his name was coupled with an epithet which we shall not, even in quotation, attach to the title of an English nobleman. The lead of the hero of Exeter Hall was followed by scores of other staccato-operators on both sides of the Atlantic; and even now the echo of his malicious misstatements has not died away. But the truth is, that no large class of labourers in any part of the world, except in a new country where land is abundant and prolific, were ever so well paid as the factory hands of Lancashire. A family having two children between nine and thirteen and two over thirteen, where the father was an overlooker or a mechanic, might earn as much as £200 a year, and incomes ranging from 25s. up to 60s. a week were the rule among the families employed in the cotton mills. For these earnings they worked ten hours and a half (children under 13 five and a half) five days a week, and seven and a half on Saturdays. Nowhere else do labourers, not belonging to the most highly skilled class of artisans, earn such ample incomes by such moderate work. Except from a few mechanics and so forth, there is no severe physical exertion required in a mill; and ten hours and a half of work under shelter, when that work consists merely of directing the movements of admirably-adapted machinery, is, as the world goes, well paid by wages which suffice to keep the workers always well fed, well housed, and well clothed. And of late years so brisk has been the demand for labour, that the complaint began to be heard that the "hands" were too independent; and that dismissal was hardly felt as a penalty for misconduct. Such was the condition of the operative families of Lancashire before the madness of American Democracy, and the pacific weakness of the English Government, turned their prosperity to wretchedness, and their comfort to desolation.

Of course, factory life has its drawbacks, and some of these are serious. The atmosphere of a mill, though not actually unwholesome, is less conducive to robust health than that in which the agricultural labourer works. A proof of this was given by the reply made to a question put to some of his hands by a millowner whose works, situate in a country village, have been stopped by the Cotton Famine. The men spent much of their time in their little allotments of garden ground, or in walks with their families; and be asked how they felt their appetites affected by the change of life. The answer was, that they could do with coarser food, but they wanted more of it than when working in the mill. Again, owing to the lightness of the labour, women and children are more largely employed than men. The mother of a family works in the factory; she earns from 8s. to 15s. a week, and her earnings cannot be spared; therefore is she forced to neglect her home, and leave her little ones in charge of an elder child, still too young for the mill. The home is consequently uncomfortable—the more so that, having been bread-winners all their lives, the women of this class are mostly bad housewives—and, especially in towns, the children are not well looked after. Again, boys and girls of sixteen or even younger can earn their own living, and somewhat more; they become too early independent, grow impatient of contributing to the family income, and aiding in the nurture of their younger brothers and sisters; rebel against parental control, and are eager to start in life on their own account. Nor can the promiscuous association of the factory be always devoid of evil effects. Nevertheless, on the whole, the factory folk are a happy, home-loving, and moral people—more so, at the least, than English peasants. They were, perhaps, at one time open to the charge of unthrift. They were used to live from hand to mouth, and generally to be in debt. They suffered sharply sometimes for their imprudence, when work was slack and cotton was dear; but in general they lived comfortably; and the less wealthy among their employers used to say that the Sunday dinner of their hands was generally better than their own; that the workman would have his duck and green peas, or his bit of choice fish, when they were just coming into season, and so dear that the capitalist could not yet afford them. We are inclined to think that much of this unthrift was owing to the want of a tangible object and easy investment for savings; for the operatives have always found money in abundance for any scheme that at once attracted their feelings as a class, and promised them advantages as individuals. Tens of thousands were subscribed by them to be wasted by that reckless and half-insane dreamer, Robert Owen; the safer and less extensive plans of the co-operative societies have never failed for lack of funds—nay, in 1860 we feared that they were being pushed too rapidly by an influx of money, with which the societies hardly knew how to deal. There can be little doubt that the factory operatives were fast becoming a rich and saving class when the Cotton Famine came to sweep away their little accumulations, and to teach a terrible lesson of thriftlessness and improvidence.

Again, they are, for their rank in society, an educated class. The Legislature, stimulated to meddle with the cotton factories by the zeal of ignorant and unscrupulous agitators, did a good deal of mischief by its interference; but it did one thing so good as amply to atone for more than all the mischief. The "Half-time" clause ought to be extended to every trade in which children are employed, many of which are far less healthy and far more laborious than cotton-spinning. That clause prescribes that every child employed in a factory, under the age of thirteen, shall only spend half the day in work, and the other half in a school, proper securities being taken for the quality of the schooling. It is found that these children learn as much, or almost as much, in three hours' schooling as others in six; which is not surprising to any one who knows the incapacity of children for prolonged mental work. In the meantime they are learning a profitable trade, and helping to earn their own livelihood. The consequences of this admirable arrangement have been in the highest degree satisfactory, and the children of the operatives receive, as a rule, as good an education as is enjoyed by any families of the working-class in England.

There is much in the social and political tone and conduct of the operatives of the cotton districts which is disagreeable and unfortunate; but nothing, we think, for which they can be seriously blamed. They have never been, as a class, in contact with a real social aristocracy. Very many of the mill-owners are gentlemen by birth and education; but the majority are self-made and half-educated men, or their sons, and not a few of them have risen from the ranks of the operatives themselves. In a country like this, where aristocratic ideas and traditions pervade all classes, and modify insensibly and unconsciously their feelings on all subjects, a new man is looked on with less favour and more jealousy by the class from which he sprang than by that to which he has risen; and masters, who were once no better than themselves, are not treated by the workmen with the respect which their skill and success have deserved, nor do they always treat the labourers so well as men do who have never known what manual labour is. Hence, perhaps, arises that want of deference towards those above them in the social scale which marks the manners of the Lancashire operatives; and the sturdy assertion of independence which makes them often brusque and discourteous, though very seldom insolent or offensive. To a stranger, a Lancashire workman is never respectful, but when sober he is very seldom rude. Towards men of a higher class, for whom he has a personal regard, he bears himself as becomes a man, at once with dignity and deference. Still, it must be admitted that his manner is not prepossessing. He has the boorishness natural to uncultivated Englishmen, without the habit of respect for superiors which modifies that boorishness in the agricultural labourer. In politics he is generally a vehement Radical, and most often an admirer of John Bright. But he is never for "peace at any price," and has adopted extravagant notions of aristocratic injustice and tyranny simply because they have been inculcated by those who on other points express his political views. Mr. Bright is a Democrat from personal hatred to those whom he feels to be his betters; the operative who cheers him is a Democrat because, as a matter of abstract right, he holds that all men were born free and equal. Mr. Bright is always on the side of his country's enemy; the Lancashire operative is an ardent, if not a judicious, patriot. Mr. Bright would not spend a sixpence of English money for any object not directly profitable to himself or to Manchester; the operative would gladly pay a double duty on tea and sugar to defray the expense of a war with France and Austria at once for the liberation of Italy. There is nothing mean, selfish, or malignant about the Radicalism of the mill-hands. The "Manchester School" has no true disciples among them. They have no desire for a scheme of taxation devised to plunder the landowner and the fundholder for their benefit. They never clamour for the sacrifice of Imperial interests or Imperial duties to the requirements of the cotton-trade. Their views on home politics are governed by certain theories of political justice which are sufficiently absurd, but honestly and sincerely held by them; their wishes in regard to foreign affairs, by sympathies often mistaken but always generous. And while the leaders in whom they put their trust are among the least respected of English politicians, there is no class or order of men of whom England may more justly be proud than of the factory folk of South Lancashire.

Manifesto of the Republicans of Italy.

It is not without a pang that one reads the spirit-stirring appeals of Joseph Mazzini. Few men excel him in vigour of style, or earnestness of reasoning; none in consistency of faith, or the dogged pertinacity which is a foretaste of success to enthusiasts; and yet how lamentable has been his life-long failure, and how thoroughly well deserved. The utter and complete overthrow, by the practical demonstration of our senses, of all the highflown eulogiums on the farsightedness, the honesty, and the truth of an enlightened people, self-governing and self-governed, which the last twelve months have held up in America to the gaze of the civilized world, though it has told with unerring effect upon the politicians of Europe, and been silently accepted by the Governments, has but raised new hopes and roused to greater exertions the fanatic priesthood of Republicanism. The poetic rhapsodies of Victor Hugo, and the more staid and manly defiance of Mazzini, echo the same strain of trust in the many-headed monster whose advent to power has resulted, in every single instance in history, in every country, and in every clime, in the total subversion of all law and order, and the blind refuge in despotism of a people ruined and decimated by the self-styled Friends of Mankind. It is strange how little the soundest reasoning, the clearest details of history, and the most solemn warnings of those whose accents dominate for centuries over the past tumults of nations, affect the judgment of living actors—nay, more strange that the experience of daily life, the rules of action which practical knowledge of affairs force upon every man of business, should utterly fail to commend themselves to the minds of those who thus assume to rule the destinies of their fellow-men. Did ever any body of men agree, without external force, upon a measure affecting the public good? Ask the engineers who promote the draining of lands, the making of roads, canals, harbours, or any of the thousand works, not only of undeniable public utility, but of immediate and surpassing remuneration? Ask the Boards of Health whether the men who die by thousands from the noxious poisons which surround them are grateful for the removal of that which is their death, and the substitution of that which is life, and health, and enjoyment. And yet these are matters of daily experience, and of momentous personal interest to even their lives as well as their property. How, then, can theorists be so blind to the teaching of every fact in history as to suppose that men would be more sure in judgment or sound in action on a matter which so little affects the well-being of the individual as the form of government which the nation adopts. But the stern terms in which the earliest historian of popular madness described the passions of party strife might be accepted entire and without a modification at this day. It is fortunate for England that she has seen and profited by the throes of volcanic action in other countries, wasting the fairest and most civilized portions of Europe, demoralizing and enslaving her noblest and most enlightened peoples; and the lesson which the unbridled license of the Republican party in America has indelibly fixed on the memory of a people so nearly connected in blood, in sympathy, and in commerce as Great Britain, is not likely to be disturbed by the imagery of the poet, however enticing, or the stern fanaticism of the enthusiast, however powerful and exciting. But although these bold fallacies fall unheeded on the ear of Englishmen accustomed for centuries to social order, we must not on that account judge them harmless among the fiery denizens of countries yet smarting from such rule as the Bourbons of Naples; and it is the more incumbent on us to note how easily perverted to evil is the soundest form of policy when assailed by empiricism. The whole of Europe has hailed with acclamation the entry of the Piedmontese people among the family of nations. Her steadiness in adversity, the clear and firm statesmanship of her leaders in politics, and the daring and gallantry of her bersaglieri in war, have laid the foundation on which the King, Parliament, and people, have raised a constitutional monarchy which has won the admiration of Europe; and yet Mazzini only sees it as An institution condemned by logic, by history, by the traditions of the country, by the sentiment of civil equality which exists among us. Monarchy has, in the space of two years, recreated all those obstacles to unity which the first uprising of our people had cancelled in a moment. Strong in the assent of 22,000,000 of citizens, she in her cowardice has remained yoked to the policy of a foreigner, who does not, cannot logically, desire to see us strong in national unity. Surrounded by the enthusiasm and love of an entire people, she attained no other conception of Government save that of repression. She has engendered antagonism between provinces, classes, army, and people, which, if not stilled in time, will prove tremendous in their consequences; she has inaugurated in Italy, young and exuberant with new life, a system of corruption borrowed from the monarchies of declining nations. To-day, only two years after the dawn of life in Italy, monarchy governs as Louis Philippe governed after eighteen years of strife—by state of siege, by the systematic violation of individual liberty, by the negation of the rights of the press and the duty of association, by cavalry charges, by infamous battles, impudently rewarded, between brothers and brothers; and all this in order to maintain the country in a provisional state which brands dishonour on our brow, hinders legislative assessment, fetters commerce and all industrial development, perpetuates dismemberment, leaves foreign influence predominant, sows despair and distress, gives opportunities for subterfuges and reactionary attempts, fans the worst passions, drains our finances uselessly, and condemns us to all the dangers and evils of a revolution without giving us any of its advantages.

And again, he ventures to assert, as the consequence of the creation of the Kingdom of Italy, that—

Dead is every hope of concession or of true Italian work from an institution which, impotent to guide, is only able to repress brutally and tyrannically the holiest and most legitimate aspirations of a people which demands its own monarchy; but will not, cannot, create the nation—impelled by a sentiment of its approaching doom, it dissolves rapidly that portion of the nation created by the toil of others.

While of himself and his friends he dares to proclaim—

Despite the stupid calumnies of a corrupt and venal press, history will record that out of reverence to the sentence of the people, erring though it was, out of love to Joseph Garibaldi, in order not to neglect a single chance of concord, we brought to the feet of a monarchy—noted only for deceptions, greed, and persecutions—plans, hopes, presentiments, memories, our power for agitation, the goodwill to Italy created by us in Europe, our influence over the working-classes, and over thousands of youths, believers in our doctrines.

Now, not only is the whole of this tirade palpably and wickedly false, but the inference is logically absurd; for if the people, the working-classes, the thousands of youths, with the goodwill of Europe to back them, created by Mazzini, could achieve such triumphs, would they for one moment suffer "national dishonour," "fettered commerce," "drained finances," "internal despair and distress," and all the horrors thus impudently laid to the charge of the men who led the nation to glory? But it is useless to waste words on such men. Theirs is the fire that burns instead of vivifying—they turn the fertilizing stream that should irrigate the fields into a raging torrent. Many enemies as poor dejected Italy has had in her long catalogue of tyrants, there is none more dangerous than Joseph Mazzini; the more so that he assumes the garb of a friend.

THE completeness of the despotism of the Washington Government is well understood in Europe. The liberty of the press, and the liberty of the subject, have been formally and actually suppressed. Mr. Lincoln has avowedly trampled on the Constitution, and has become, together with his Cabinet, the irresponsible ruler of the Federal States. Some surprise has been expressed at the ready submission of the people of the North to the loss of freedom; but that surprise would be much greater if the harshness and even barbarity of the Lincolnite tyranny were fully known. The savage lawlessness of the Northern commanders and troops in their treatment of the women, children, and unarmed citizens of the South, has in some degree been initiated by the Washington despotism in its conduct to its own citizens. As a sample of the cruelties practised on the Northerners by their own Government, we direct attention to an article in another part of our impression, entitled "Provost Marshal and Cell No. 4," which we reproduce from a New York paper.

American Confederacies.

LORD BROUGHAM, in writing some years ago on the Government of the United States, made use of the following remarks:—"There is not, as with us, a Government only and its subjects (to be regarded); but a number of Governments, of States having each a separate and substantive, and even independent existence; originally thirteen, now six-and-twenty, and each having a Legislature of its own, with laws differing from those of the other States. It is plainly impossible to consider the Constitution, which professes to govern this whole Union, this Federacy of States, as anything other than a treaty, of which the conditions are to be executed for them all; and hence there must be certain things laid down, certain rights conferred, certain provisions made, which cannot be altered without universal con-ent, or a consent so general as to be deemed equivalent for all practical purposes to the consent of the whole."

The territory comprising the Republican States of North America has been, for the most part, governed, as far as other nations were concerned, under the Confederate system. Even the Indian nations were united under various Confederacies, and as early as 1643, the "United Colonies of New England" were formed for the purpose of repelling the depredations of the Indians and the Dutch. This "union" was continued until 1666, when the "commissioners," who had begun to usurp their delegated authority, were disbanded. In May, 1690, the Provisional Government of Massachusetts addressed a circular letter to all the colonies as far south as Maryland, to meet at New York, for purposes of mutual protection; but delegates from Massachusetts, Connecticut, and New York only attended; they adjourned after agreeing to furnish troops for the invasion of Canada. In 1696, New York and Massachusetts called for some system of co-operation, by which all the colonies might be made to contribute their proportion towards the common defence; they suggested a Captain-general to be appointed by the King, with power to call out and command the entire colonial militia; but such military dictatorship would not have been relished by the people in America. Penn proposed, as a counter project, a colonial congress of twenty members, to be chosen annually by the Assemblies, with a President, to be appointed by the King, to be empowered during war to provide for the common defence, and, in peace, to regulate commerce and adjust colonial disputes, of which several had already existed, especially on the subject of boundaries. But the Peace of Ryswick caused these plans to be laid aside. Courts of Admiralty, were, however, established among the colonies, similar to the United States and the Confederate Courts, very much against the wishes of some of them.

In 1753, the French, having made incursions upon the soil of Virginia and Pennsylvania, on the banks of the Ohio, Lord Holderness, who was then Secretary of State, requested their Governors to repel the invaders; he also addressed a circular letter to all the colonies, proposing a Convention, at Albany, of committees from the several Assemblies, to renew the treaty with the Six Nations, whose friendship at this crisis was of great importance. Agreeably to this recommendation, New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and the four New England colonies, sent delegates, and the meeting took place in June, 1754; an ill-feeling between the Governor and Assembly of Virginia prevented any deputation from that colony. While the treaty with the Indians was under consideration, the Convention was invited by the members from Massachusetts to consult whether it was not advisable that there should be an union of the colonies for general defence; the question having been decided in the affirmative, a committee, consisting of one delegate from each colony, was appointed to draw up a plan of union. The suggestion of Franklin, the delegate from Pennsylvania, was adopted. It proposed a Grand Council of forty-eight members; seven from Virginia, seven from Massachusetts, six from Pennsylvania, five from Connecticut, four each from New York, Maryland, and the two Carolinas, three from New Jersey, and two each from New Hampshire and Rhode Island: the Council to undertake the defence of the colonies, to apportion quotas of men and money, control colonial armies, &c., &c. Its head was to be a President-General, appointed by the Crown, with the veto power. The Colonial Assemblies rejected the proposition on account of its giving too much power to the Crown. The Board of Trade also disapproved of it, but suggested that there should be a Grand Congress of Governors, and certain select members of the Councils, with power to draw on the British Treasury, which was to be reimbursed by taxes under Act of Parliament. This was unpalatable, and Massachusetts specially instructed her delegates "to oppose everything that shall have the remotest tendency to raise a revenue in America for any public uses or services of Government."

The next Congress was held at New York on October 7, 1765, at the instance of Massachusetts, to take into consideration the Stamp Act which had been passed a few months before by Parliament. Committees from nine colonies met; the Assemblies of Virginia and North Carolina not having been in session since the call, no delegates were appointed; the same was the case with New York, but that colony was represented by a Committee of Correspondence, appointed at a previous session, who saw fit to attend. New Hampshire was unrepresented, in consequence of some misunderstanding with her Governor. After a session of three weeks, "A Declaration of Rights and Grievances" was agreed to, when the Congress adjourned. The Stamp Act, however, thus resisted, never went into operation; under the influence of Pitt the bill was repealed.

In spite of the Parliamentary claim of power to bind the colonies in all cases whatsoever, the repeal of this obnoxious measure produced throughout America a great burst of loyalty and gratitude. Virginia voted a statue to the King; New York voted statues to the King and Pitt; Maryland voted a statue to Pitt and a portrait of Lord Camden. Faneuil Hall was adorned with full-length pictures of Barre and Conway. Pitt became more than ever a popular idol; resolutions of thanks to him and others were agreed to by most of the Assemblies. After this exultation died away new discontents sprang up. The "Sugar Act" remained in force, and Charles Townshend, who had been made Chancellor of the Exchequer, brought forward a fresh scheme in January, 1767, for taxing the colonies, in the form of heavy duties on the importation of teas and other articles—an indirect instead of a direct tax.

John Dickinson, of Pennsylvania, published some able letters upon the subject, which had a wide circulation both in England and America; he argued that taxes on commerce were just as bad as any other taxes, and that, no matter how trifling they might be, no one could tell to what length such a precedent would be pushed. The newspapers began to teem with essays upon the subject. A public meeting was held at Boston on October 28, 1767, to encourage "industry, economy, and manufactures," when a committee was appointed to obtain subscribers to discontinue the importation of foreign goods. This example was presently imitated in Providence, New York, and Philadelphia, and it was eagerly followed in Connecticut. In January, 1768, the General Court of Massachusetts addressed letters to the King and members of Parliament in reference to the matter; and co-operation of the Colonial Assemblies was invited for mutual defence of colonial rights, to which they gave a hearty response. These remonstrances had, in a measure, the desired effect; in April, 1770, the tariff bill was repealed, except on the single article of tea, which, however, with the "Sugar Act," was quite sufficient to keep up discontent, as they involved the whole principle of Parliamentary taxation. The Americans managed to do without tea; the authority of Parliament was, therefore, practically nullified. The East India Company at this period (July 1773) had great influence with the Government; and with its concurrence several cargoes of teas were despatched to the principal American ports. As soon as this project became known on the western side of the Atlantic steps were taken to counterwork it. A public meeting of the citizens of Philadelphia, held on October 2, denounced "as an enemy to his country," "whosoever shall aid or abet in unloading, receiving, or vending the tea." A committee waited on the reputed consignees "to request them, from a regard to their own characters and the public peace and good order of the city and province, immediately to resign their appointments." The Messrs. Wharton gave a satisfactory answer, but another firm refused to commit themselves until the vessels arrived; shouts of applause were given for the former and groans and hisses for the latter. The names of three well-known firms in Boston began to be noised about as the intended consignees, and sundry anonymous notes were sent to them. A town meeting was held at that city on November 5, 1773, ratifying the resolutions passed at the Philadelphia meeting, and calling upon the agents of the East India Company to resign. Meetings were again convened on the 17th and 18th of November for the same purpose. On the 19th, the consignees, becoming alarmed at the state of public feeling, asked the "Governor and Council" to take charge of the teas; but before they came to any decision one of the ships arrived. On the 28th, they declined taking control of the property. This was succeeded by a mass meeting the next day in all the neighbouring towns, as well as on the 30th, when the Sheriff ordered the people to disperse. They declined doing so, and the ships-of-war in the harbor had no warrant to interfere in a purely municipal matter. The consignees offered to keep the tea in store until they heard from England; but this was not acceded to, and the master and owner of the vessel were constrained to promise to carry it back. The owner of the ship was not, however, much disposed to carry out the agreement extorted from him, and the Governor resolved that no clearance should be granted until the cargo was landed. After thirty days the vessel would be liable to seizure for non-payment of duties. Two other ships presently arrived, and were placed in the same position. The people re-assembled on December 14; the owner was sent for, and, with a committee, he demanded a clearance, which was refused by the collector, and the Governor declined, for that reason, giving a permit to pass the ships of war and forts. This had been anticipated; a band of fifty men dressed like Indians boarded the vessels, and in two hours threw overboard 342 chests of tea. The ship bound to New York was driven by stress of weather to the West Indies, and reached her port on April 21, but she was started soon on her homeward voyage; while that destined for Philadelphia was stopped four miles below the city, when the captain was persuaded to return to England. A fourth vessel was wrecked near Cape Cod, and the fifth arrived at Charleston on April 21. The teas were landed, stored in a damp cellar, and soon became worthless. These occurrences were announced to Parliament on March 14, 1774, by Lord North, who introduced the famous Boston Port Bill, which met with slight opposition, in consequence of the friends of the colonists being silenced by the audacity of the Bostonians. Another bill soon followed "for better regulating the Government of Massachusetts Bay," amounting to an abrogation of its charter. Sundry other bills were passed of a similar character. Burke brought in a motion to repeal the tax, but the Ministers were resolved to "terrify the colonies into submission." Public meetings were held upon the matter in Rhode Island, when the idea of a Continental Congress was suggested; the Connecticut Legislature made the same recommendation; New York agreed to the proposition, and requested Boston to fix the time and place of meeting. Similar views were held by the Philadelphians, who, at a public meeting on May 26, suggested the policy of paying the East India Company for what tea had been destroyed. The inhabitants of Annapolis, Baltimore, and other counties in Maryland, were equally as strong in their expressions.

The Virginian House of Burgesses, in session, took the matter into consideration, and appointed June 1, the day on which the Boston Port Bill was to go into operation, to be observed as a fast. This suggestion was adopted in Philadelphia and many other places, and gave a sensible exhibition of the public feeling. Lord Dunmore dissolved the Virginian Assembly on May 26; but most of the members met the next day, and resolved that an attack upon one colony was an attack upon all, threatening ruin to the rights of all, unless repelled by the "united wisdom of the whole" and a committee was appointed to communicate with the other colonies on the expediency of a General Congress. A "General Court" was convened at Salem, Massachusetts, when resolutions were passed, recommending an entire abstinence from the use of British goods, and requesting the Governor to appoint a fast; and, if he refused, to appoint one themselves; also that "a meeting of committees from the several colonies in this continent is highly expedient and necessary, to consult upon the present state of the country, and the miseries to which we are and must be reduced by the operation of certain Acts of Parliament; and to deliberate and determine on wise and proper measures to be recommended to all the colonies for the recovery and re-establishment of our just rights and liberties, civil and religious, and the restoration of union between Great Britain and America, which is most earnestly desired by all good men." The 1st September was designated as the time, and Philadelphia the place, of meeting.

During June public meetings were held throughout the colonies, when resolutions were passed agreeing to discontinue the use of foreign goods. On the 3rd of that month Connecticut appointed delegates to the Congress; New Hampshire on the 8th; Rhode Island on the 15th; New Jersey on the 25th; South Carolina on the 6th of July; Maryland and Pennsylvania on the 21st; New York on the 23rd; Virginia and Delaware on the 1st of August; North Carolina on the 25th. Many of these appointments were informal, on account of the Governors, who were loyalists, not only refusing their concurrence, but opposing the movement as being contrary to law. Governor Wright, of Georgia, was the only functionary who had influence sufficient to stem the current; that colony, therefore, did not select delegates. The Congress convened at Carpenter's Hall, Philadelphia, on Monday, September 5, and dissolved on Wednesday, October 26, 1774, having on the 4th of October passed a "Declaration of Colonial Rights;" on the 20th formed "Articles of Association;" on the 21st adopted addresses to the people of Great Britain and the Colonies, setting forth their grievances, and on the 22nd issued a recommendation for a new Congress, to be held on May 10, 1775. In accordance with this advice, delegates, regularly appointed, met at the State House at Philadelphia, and adopted the following Articles of Confederation:—

ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION AND PERPETUAL UNION, entered into by the DELEGATES of the several colonies of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, &c., &c., in GENERAL CONGRESS, met at Philadelphia, May 10, 1775.

Article 1st.—The name of the Confederacy shall henceforth be, The United Colonies of North America.

2nd. The United Colonies hereby severally enter into a firm league of friendship with each other, binding in themselves and their posterity, for their common defence against their enemies, for the security of their liberties and properties, the safety of their persons and families, and their mutual and general welfare.

3rd. That each colony shall enjoy and retain as much as it may think fit of its own present laws, customs, rights, privileges, and peculiar jurisdictions, within its own limits; and may amend its own constitution, as shall seem best to its own Assembly or Convention.

4th. That for the more convenient management of the general interests, delegates shall be elected annually, in each colony, to meet in General Congress, at such time and place as shall be agreed on in the next preceding Congress. Only when particular circumstances do not make a deviation necessary, it is understood to be a rule, that each succeeding Congress is to be held in a different colony, till the whole number be gone through, and so in perpetual rotation; and that accordingly the next Congress after the present shall be held at Annapolis in Maryland.

5th. That the power and duty of the Congress shall extend to the determining on war and peace, the entering into alliances, the reconciliation with Great Britain, the settling all disputes between colony and colony, if any should arise, and the planting new colonies where proper. The Congress shall also make such general ordinances thought necessary to the general welfare, of which particular Assemblies cannot be competent, viz., those that may relate to our general commerce or general currency, to the establishment of ports, the regulation of our common forces: the Congress shall also have the appointment of all officers, civil and military, appertaining to the general Confederacy, such as general treasurer, secretary, &c., &c.

6th. All charges of war, and all other general expenses to be incurred for the common welfare, shall be defrayed out of a common treasury, which is to be supplied by each colony, in proportion to its number of male polls between 16 and 60 years of age: the taxes for paying that proportion are to be laid and levied by the laws of each colony.

7th. The number of delegates to be elected, and sent to the Congress by each colony, shall be regulated from time to time by the number of such polls returned; so that one delegate be allowed for every 5000 polls. And the delegates are to bring with them, to every Congress, an authenticated return of the number of polls in their respective colonies, which is to be taken for the purposes above mentioned.

8th. At every meeting of the Congress, one-half of the numbers returned, exclusive of proxies, shall be necessary to make a quorum; and each delegate at the Congress shall have a vote in all cases; and if necessarily absent, shall be allowed to appoint any other delegate from the same colony to be his proxy, who may vote for him.

9th. An Executive Council shall be appointed by the Congress out of their own body, consisting of twelve persons, of whom, in the first appointment, one-third—viz., four—shall be for one year, four for two years, and four for three years; and as the said terms expire, the vacancies shall be filled up by appointments for three years, whereby one-third of the members shall be chosen annually, and each person who has served the same term of three years as councillor shall have a respite of three years before he can be elected again. This Council, of whom two-thirds shall be a quorum, in the recess of the Congress, is to execute what shall have been enjoined thereby; to manage the general continental business and interests; to receive applications from foreign countries; to prepare matters for the consideration of the Congress; to draw up, pro tempore, continental offices that fall vacant, and to fill up the general treasurer for such moneys as may be necessary for general service, and appropriated by the Congress to such service.

10th. No colony shall engage in an offensive war with any nation of Indians, without the consent of the Congress or Great Council above-mentioned, who are first to consider the justice and necessity of such a war.

11th. A perpetual alliance, offensive and defensive, is to be entered into, as soon as may be, with the Six Nations—their limits ascertained, and to be secured to them—their lands not to be encroached on, nor any private or colony purchase to be made of them hereafter to be held good, nor any contract for lands to be made, but between the Great Council of the Indians at Onondaga and the General Congress. The boundaries and lands of all the other Indians shall also be ascertained and secured to them in the same manner; and persons appointed to reside among them in proper districts, who shall take care to prevent injustice in the trade with them; and be enabled, at our general expense, by occasional small supplies, to relieve their personal wants and distresses; and all purchases from them shall be by the Congress, for the general advantage and benefit of the United Colonies.

12th. As all new institutions may have imperfections, which only time and experience can discover, it is agreed that the General Congress, from time to time, shall propose such amendments of this Constitution as may be found necessary, which, being approved by a majority of the Colony Assemblies, shall be equally binding with the rest of the Articles of this Confederation.

13th. Any and every colony from Great Britain upon the Continent of North America, not at present engaged in our association, may, upon application and joining the said association, be received into the Confederation—viz., Quebec, St. John's, Nova Scotia, Bermudas, and the East and West Floridas; and shall thereupon be entitled to all the advantages of our Union, mutual assistance, and commerce.

These articles shall be proposed to the several Provincial Conventions or Assemblies, to be by them considered; and if approved, they are advised to empower their delegates to agree and ratify the same in the ensuing Congress; after which the Union thereby established is to continue firm, till the terms of reconciliation proposed in the petition of the last Congress to the King are agreed to; till the Acts since made, restraining the American colonies and fisheries, are repealed; till reparation is made for the injury done to Boston by shutting up its port; for burning Charleston; and for the expense of this unjust war; and till all the British troops are withdrawn from America. On the arrival of these events, the colonies are to return to their former connection and friendship with Great Britain; but on failure thereof, this Confederation is to be perpetual.

This second Congress adjourned over on August 1 to September 5, having appointed George Washington Commander-in-Chief; no quorum was present until September 13, and it continued in session at Philadelphia, with occasional adjournments, until December 12, 1776, when it agreed to meet in Baltimore on the 20th of that month. On July 2, 1776, the colonies that had become "united" by the "Articles of Confederation" became States by the resolution of Congress. On February 27, 1777, the delegates adjourned at Baltimore, to meet at Philadelphia on March 12. On September 18 they withdrew to Lancaster, Pennsylvania, where they convened on the 27th of that month, but retired to Yorktown, Pennsylvania, where they held their deliberations from September 30, 1777, to June 27, 1778, and on July 7 they resumed their meetings at the State House, Philadelphia, until May 7, 1783, when they withdrew to Princeton. Congress having adopted the second "Articles of Confederation" on November 15, the several colonies, in giving their approval, "seceded" from the "first" Articles of Confederation in the following order:—New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and South Carolina, on July 9, 1778; North Carolina on July 21; Georgia on the 24th; New Jersey on November 26; Delaware on May 5, 1779, and Maryland on March 1, 1781. While at Princeton, the question of a permanent residence for Congress was raised, and excited a good deal of local feeling. One party was in favour of a Federal city on the Delaware; another named the Potomac; Maryland offered to cede Annapolis for that purpose; New York volunteered Kingston, on the Hudson. The Council of Pennsylvania, anxious to bring Congress back to Philadelphia, apologised for their timidity, which was the cause of its removal from that city. It was finally agreed that, so soon as a suitable site could be obtained, two Federal cities should be erected, at which the sessions of Congress should be alternately held; one near the Falls of the Delaware, the other near the Falls of the Potomac; and that until they could be built, the meetings should be held at Trenton, in New Jersey, and Annapolis. Congress then convened at the latter place, and, after a recess of five months, the annual session was opened at Trenton on November 1, 1784, when a resolution was carried appointing commissioners to lay out a Federal city near the Falls of the Delaware; and stating that it was "inexpedient" to attempt at this time to erect public buildings in more than one place; voting $100,000 towards the same; and that the sessions should, in the meanwhile, be held at New York. The want of funds, and obstinate difference of opinion in Congress, prevented anything effectual being done towards the building of the proposed Federal city. In 1788 this matter was again introduced, but was postponed until the new Congress under the Constitution should go into operation; and the "Continental" Congress expired on March 3, 1789. The respective "secessions," from the "second" Articles of Confederation, occurred as follows:—Delaware, December 7, 1789; Pennsylvania, December 12; New Jersey, December 18; Georgia, January 2, 1778; Connecticut, January 9; Massachusetts, February 7; Maryland, April 28; South Carolina, May 23; New Hampshire, June 21; Virginia, June 27; New York, July 26; North Carolina, August 7, 1789; and Rhode Island, May 29, 1790. It will be observed that Rhode Island and North Carolina were not in the "Union" at the election of Washington, nor did New York cast any vote for the first President under the new order of things.

In 1814 the New England States met in convention at Hartford, and came near withdrawing from the Federal compact; in 1833 South Carolina changed her determination to do so, in consequence of her demands in reference to a reduction of the tariff having been met. In 1860 one Abraham Lincoln was elected President by a sectional party, with the avowed intention of interfering with the rights of the States. When South Carolina withdrew from the league on December 20 of that year, she was followed by Mississippi on January 9, 1861; Alabama on the 11th; Florida on the 12th, Georgia on the 19th; Louisiana on the 28th; and Texas on February 1.

On February 4, 1861, delegates from these seven States met at Montgomery, Alabama, and formed a Provisional Government, under the style of the Confederate States of America, which was changed to one of a permanent character on February 22, 1862, having in the interim the accession of Virginia, which State withdrew from the old Union on April 17, 1861; Arkansas on May 6; Tennessee on May 8; North Carolina on May 20; Missouri on November 28, and Kentucky on December 10. The Confederate Congress adjourned from Montgomery in May, and reassembled at Richmond in June, 1861.

The foregoing sketch of American history proves that Secession is no new thing; that the States, although ever holding their own individual organizations, have made changes from time to time in their external arrangements. The Federalists, while ignoring the body of the Constitution, affect great fondness of its preamble, which states, "We, the people of the United States;" and attempt to argue thereby that it formed a consolidated Union; they omit to tell us that the original draft mentioned the names of the several States, but they were stricken out and the word "united" inserted, as it was not known which nine States would accede to its provisions. The word "people," moreover, is used in the plural; in that day there was no such term as "peoples." And it is very strange that no allusion is ever made to the preamble that precedes the Amendments to the Constitution passed immediately after the first meeting of Congress under its authority. The following is the exact text:—

The Conventions of a number of States having, at the time of their adopting the Constitution, expressed a desire, in order to prevent misconstruction or abuse of its powers, that further declaratory and restrictive clauses should be added; and as extending the ground of public confidence in the Government will best ensure the beneficent ends of its institutions, therefore, Resolved, &c.

Nothing whatever is said, either in the Constitution, or its Amendments, about Secession, but the action of all the States shows clearly that they retained that right, and although it is not expressed, it is certainly implied in Article 10th of the Amendments, viz., "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." The Union was only to be "perfect" as long as it lasted; unlike the two prior compacts, the word "perpetual" was purposely omitted in the Constitution of 1787.

Reviews.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE FOR OCTOBER.

TEN DAYS IN RICHMOND.

WE have rarely, if ever, met with a more interesting article than the first one in the current number of Blackwood, which gives an account of "Ten Days in Richmond;" not a dry, meagre diary of events, but a graphic picture of scenes and impressions, and a simple recital of facts. The ten days included those in which was fought the Seven Days' Battle; a most exciting time to visit Richmond, but for a seeker of excitement it was better to visit New York or Washington. We remarked last week that the Southerners were calm, and this is confirmed by the paper we are referring to. The author thereof arrived in Richmond on Thursday, June 26. All the afternoon the booming of cannon and the roll of distant musketry were audible; as the evening closed in, it became louder; as night drew on, the flash of bursting shells might be plainly discerned from the house-tops. Surely at such a crisis even the calmness of Southerners would give way to anxious distraction, if not to panic; but it was not so.

These various sounds and sights, however, though they might distract the attention of a stranger, seemed to excite neither surprise nor anxiety among the inhabitants. The soldiers on furlough or sick leave, who crowded the steps of the hotels, were smoking or conversing listlessly. The ladies were sitting out in front of their houses apparently unconcerned at what was passing, and only intent on supplying the want of an evening breeze by an assiduous use of the fan.

Every one appeared used to the war. For a month McClellan had been within five miles of the city in point of distance, and, as the Northern papers fondly believed, within a few days of it in point of time. The citizens had become so habituated to the alarms of war, that an engagement within hearing of Richmond produced, perhaps, less excitement there than it did next morning at New York.

We know, indeed, that this heroic serenity was afterwards disturbed, but not from the proximity of danger. So long as the enemy was at hand, and his artillery menaced the destruction of the city, the patient endurance of the people was unconquerable; but when the enemy was beaten back, and, still later, when the Northern hosts were cowering behind the fortifications of Washington, there was a scene in the streets of Richmond which the heart may feel, but the pen cannot describe. Then might be seen groups of persons, of both sexes and all ages, returning thanks unto the Lord of Hosts for deliverance from the hands of their enemy.

The contributor to Blackwood, who, we should observe, dates from "Washington, July 27, 1862," enters rather fully into the state of the Confederate army. The general appearance of a corps of Southern troops does not at first sight favourably impress a stranger. The men are variously and roughly clothed; some are without coats, and some, in June last, were reduced to strange substitutes for hats.

A closer scrutiny, however, showed that essentials were well provided. Besides his musket and cartridge-box, every man had a canteen; most men a blanket and a haversack. A more suitable equipment for summer service in Virginia could hardly have been devised.

And the suitable equipment of the Confederate soldier is due to his own valour.

The blockade prevents the South from furnishing herself from the arsenals and stores of Europe, yet it was necessary for her to defend her independence. The only resource for her ill-armed soldiers was to close with the enemy, conquer him, and appropriate his costly equipments. This has been done so effectually that at present the Confederate army is well supplied with all the materiel and ammunition of war, whilst the North begins to find it more difficult to arm recruits than to raise them. Since the period to which the following passage relates, the Confederate captures have been literally imperial in their dimensions; leave alone the vast quantity of stores that have been destroyed by the Federals themselves, to prevent them falling into the possession of their enemy:—

What gives peculiar interest to the Confederate soldier's dress is the individual history which attaches to each separate article. From the blanket he sleeps on to the cartridge he shoots with, almost everything has been appropriated from the enemy at one time or another. This rifle was exchanged for the old flint-lock on the field of Manassas; that cauten was taken at Shiloh; the grey mare yonder, with McClellan's saddle, was captured in the cavalry charge at Williamsburg; these boots were taken out of the Yankee stores at Winchester. The negro who is following with the sancepan and the extra blanket, being wiser than his master, has consulted comfort rather than prejudice, and prevailed upon himself to wear a Yankee uniform, in consideration that the former proprietor was a full colonel.

Entire batteries pass down the road with "U. S." in prominent white letters on the caissons. It is no exaggeration to say that a great part of the Confederate army has been equipped at the expense of the United States. Flint-locks and fowling-pieces have been exchanged for good Minie rifles.

The discipline of the Southern army would not show to advantage on the parade-ground, or on the march, but at the sound of the first shell and the commands of the officers, the men rapidly and easily form "into a line so close and compact that the sight of it would give joy to a martinet's heart." The want of what may be called soldierly order is compensated for by the high standard of individual intelligence. Yet it must not be supposed the discipline of the Confederate army is loose; on the contrary, the Southern military code is remarkable for its severity. The only laxity is that the drill-sergeant is not supreme, and so that the soldiers are good at fighting little regard is paid to their style of dressing. The efficiency, however, of the Confederates is not the result of any system, but of the devoted patriotism of the men. The Confederate soldiers are de facto volunteers, who are ready to make any sacrifice for the noble cause in which they are engaged.

The great strength and power of the Southern army lies in the individual resolution of the men. Every private feels a determination, not only to carry his regiment through the fight, but to see his country through the war. Boys of fifteen are to be seen by the side of grey-haired men. Men who could not obtain arms have been known to fall in with the rear rank, and go into action on the chance of picking up a musket on the first opportunity. It has been described how, at the commencement of the war, all the wealthiest men crowded into the ranks; there has been time for the first enthusiasm to wear away, and yet there are no signs of any flinching from the contest. Scores of names could be mentioned of men who, after having served out their first term of enlistment (twelve months), spent a week with their relations, and then returned to volunteer for three years or for the war. Indeed, no man who shrunk from the war could ever again venture to address a lady.

The last sentence is literally true. The Southerner who has had the opportunity of fighting for his country, and has not done so, must henceforth hold his manhood cheap.

The battle of June 27 is well told from an observer's point of view —

To the south of the river, on the spur of a low, sloping hill, was assembled a knot of officers taking observations of the fight, and round about them a group of eager and curious civilians. Below the hill on which they stood were large, flat, marshy fields, through which that deep and sluggish brook called the Chickahominy, winds along, half hidden by the brushwood on its banks. Immediately opposite was the house and farm known as Gaines Mill. Far away to the right, on an open and comparatively level space among the sloping woodlands, were drawn up a large body of Federal troops. The woods prevented a complete view of the Federal position, and totally hid the line along which the Confederates were expected to advance to the attack.

The fight continued until the friends could not be distinguished from the foes.

There was a long suspense, until a loud wild cheer from the line along which the Confederates had been advancing announced, beyond a doubt, that the position had been carried. The fire slackened, and gradually, as the cloud of smoke drifted away, it revealed the broken and scattered bodies of the enemy rapidly moving off. It was not for some time, however—not till long after dark—that the firing ceased.

The enemy had abandoned the field with all his dead and wounded, and was making the best of the night to cross to the southern or right bank of the Chickahominy.

The retreat of the Federals had been hasty. Knapsacks, coats, blankets, muskets, spades, &c., were left in such profusion that in a few hours after the fight cart-loads of captured property were en route for Richmond. In one place there was a large pile of freshly-baked biscuits.

But the most striking feature of the abandoned camp was that it had the appearance of having belonged to a besieged not a besieging army. Here were carefully constructed sand-bag batteries, with raised platforms of timber for the guns inside; while without, in the ditch, a number of fine saplings had been thrown, with their ends pointing outwards, so as to act like a palisade. Here also were long lines of breastworks connecting one battery with another. In another position were extensive rifle pits.

The Confederate camp, on the contrary, had lain in the open woods, and it was only on a few prominent positions that earthworks or rifle-pits had been thrown up.

Great efforts were made to overtake the Federals before they could reach the shelter of their gunboats. The divisions under Generals Longstreet and A. P. Hill went towards Charles City, and General Jackson having repaired Bottoms Bridge, crossed over on Sunday night and Monday morning. In this pursuit the Confederates lost a large number of troops.

The country for about twenty-five miles below Richmond towards Charles City, is a forest, alternating in tracts of pine and oak, according to the soil, interspersed with frequent clearings of from fifty or sixty to some hundred acres in size. It is only on the rich lands by the banks of the James River that there is anything like an open country. It was, therefore, easy for McClellan's rear-guard to cover their retreat by posting artillery at some large clearing on the skirt of the woods, with an open space to play over, keeping their infantry supports under cover of the woods immediately behind. The Confederates were thus obliged to advance through the opposite woods under the shells from the Federal batteries, and then charge across the open space in front of the enemy's guns. It was in engagements of this kind that the Confederates suffered their most severe losses.

Notwithstanding the favourable nature of the ground, the Federals were in great peril. On the afternoon of Monday the 30th, they were attacked on the flank of their line of retreat in just such a position as above described. The Confederates charged their batteries, driving them, as usual, from their guns, of which they captured fifteen. Three hours more daylight to allow Magruder's division to have pressed the advantage gained by this charge, and the greater part of McClellan's rear-guard, together with the whole of his reserve artillery, must have fallen into the hands of the Confederates.

Though we have already quoted so abundantly, we cannot resist the temptation to give our readers the following graphic description of the Confederate camping after the day's pursuit:—

The smoke of the musketry was still hanging about the tree-tops when the camp fires were lit; the dry pine-sticks soon blazed up merrily, and the fitful firelight, gleaming out among the dark stems of the trees, showed the soldiers gathering together in different groups. The events of the day were told over; the prospect of catching the Yankees to-morrow, before they got under cover of their gunboats, was hopefully discussed. One man was inquiring concerning his captain—he had fallen—had he been killed or wounded? Another had found the colonel's hat, and was asking whether he had been seen since the advance through the wood; a third wished to hear of his son, who was serving in another regiment; while another again had no questions to ask; he had lost all his four brothers in the fight of Friday. A feeble-looking lad near by, while stirring some indescribable mixture in a frying-pan, was humming, in a hoarse voice, the popular air—

"The despot's heel is on thy shore, Maryland, my Maryland."

He was evidently one of the Maryland exiles.

Frequent groups of Federal prisoners, under the escort of a couple of men, were passing towards the rear. They contrasted strangely in their neat blue uniforms with the rough-looking soldiers who stopped to look at them as they passed, greeting them with a smile, and the words, "On to Richmond."

All the while the regiments coming up from the rear to relieve those which had been in the engagement were slowly winding by. They had been marching two days under a hot sun, and it was now midnight. "Push on, boys—push on!" said an officer behind the column. "Yes," cried one of the privates, "push on, boys—push on!" and then in the morning pitch right in: that's the way to get our country back." It was one of the Virginian regiments.

The whole of the affair is thus summed up:—

On Thursday, June 26, he was within five miles of Richmond; on Thursday, July 3, he was over thirty miles from Richmond.

He left in the hands of the Confederates 51 pieces of cannon, 10,000 prisoners, and 37,000 small arms, besides some stores and other property saved from destruction.

From what we have selected our readers will find that this article is worth a careful perusal; but we can assure them that when they have possessed themselves of Blackwood, and read "Ten Days in Richmond," they will be still more persuaded of the value of the contribution, and will not think we have devoted too much space in directing attention thereto.

FRASER'S MAGAZINE FOR OCTOBER.

NORTH AND SOUTH: THE TWO CONSTITUTIONS. BY A WHITE REPUBLICAN.

In the September number of Fraser, "A White Republican" gave a popular and able resumé of the controversy from the first until after the battles before Richmond, and this month we have from the same pen an excellent review of the two Constitutions. To admit the goodness of the contribution does not simply assent to all the propositions contained therein, but there are few from which a conscientious inquirer after truth can dissent. We are aware that many persons will not have aught to do with the constitutional issue. They say it is useless to discuss the right or wrong of Secession, since an appeal has been made to the sword. This is not entirely true; for though the dispute has to be decided by warfare, it is important for the South to vindicate her conduct and the righteousness of her cause. To a high-spirited nation an unsullied reputation is priceless, and the Southerners stoutly deny that they violated the Constitution to which they formerly owed allegiance. It is not, we say, a little thing for the South to feel and know that she is engaged in the defence of national rights and social liberty against the attempted domination of a Government that has all along shown itself tyrannical, and which has, by its latest act, proclaimed itself the abject creature of a fanatical mob. It may, however, be urged that at present it is unnecessary to discuss the constitutional question, and further, that no men out of the Northern States, and by no means all the men in the Northern States, believe that Secession was a violation of the Federal compact; or, at all events, that the North has a constitutional right to try to keep the South in the Union by force of arms. There is some force in this suggestion, and we do not recommend the perusal of "The Two Constitutions" because it defends Secession, but rather, that "A White Republican" says as little as possible about the constitutional justification of the dissolution of the late Union. It is impossible to glance over the United States' Constitution, and especially, to read the history of its adoption, without making a few references to the right of Secession; for the text of the Constitution, and the discussions that ensued in respect to it, as well as its tardy acceptance by some of the States, are so many solemn protests of the inviolability of State rights; and these are incompatible with the idea of Secession being unlawful.

After examining the Constitution of the United States, "A White Republican" points out those clauses which have been most grossly violated by the Washington Government. He particularly notes Articles I. and IV. of the Amendments of the Constitution; the first of which guarantees freedom of speech and of the press; and the latter, the sanctity of home; forbids unwarrantable searches, and expressly declares that "no warrants shall issue, but upon probable causes, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the person or things to be seized." For a Constitution to be violated under the pressure of invasion, or insurrection at home, is not without precedent; but in the United States we have the case of a country passing under a despotic rule in the beginning of a foreign war; no one can say there is a reasonable excuse for the suspension of the Writ of Habeas Corpus throughout the Federal States.

Some of the differences in the two Constitutions are declaratory. For instance, the preamble of the Confederate Constitution is like that of the United States, except the supplication for Divine guidance, and the clause which distinctly recognizes the sovereignty and independence of each State. So with slavery. The slave trade is peremptorily forbidden; and with regard to slaves the same rights are secured as under the old Constitution, except that they are more forcibly stated:—

The great departures, and, we will add, the great improvements, consist in extending the term of the President's office to six years instead of four, prohibiting his re-election; and the retention in office of all Government employés, except Cabinet and Foreign Ministers, during life or good behaviour.

"A White Republican" is justified in saying that the change in administration will be far greater than the change in the written Constitution. He concludes his survey of the Confederate Constitution by declaring that he knows not where, if the principle of self-government is good, to look "for anything wiser or freer in the shape of an organic instrument of government."

Conservative, yet elastic, it restrains, without oppressing, and protects, without infringing, the equal rights and liberties of an equal people. It is eminently calculated in every provision and feature to "establish justice, ensure domestic tranquillity, and to secure the blessings of liberty to present and future generations;" a combination and a form of Government that the proudest citizen of the Confederacy may be equally proud to administer or support, to execute or obey.—ESRO PERPETUA.

A NOVEL.*

THE art of novel writing has in England been sedulously cultivated, and with the most marked success. In this department of literature we are far in advance of the rest of the world. Germany is great in metaphysical novels that are long and wordy, and of which the chief glory is to be so obscure as to be incomprehensible even to their authors. But have we not, in "A Strange Story" and "Sartar Resartus," works that would be idolized by those who esteem the mysticism of their writers as the greatest proof of genius? The French novels of Eugene Sue and Alexandre Dumas are, we admit, specialties which have been caricatured but not copied by English authors, nor is it likely that such a class of fiction will ever become popular in this country. But in France novels are not the staple of authorship, as they are with us. Not many years since we had a Chancellor of the Exchequer and a Colonial Secretary, both eminent for their political ability and their parliamentary eloquence, whose passport to fame had been the production of popular novels. Nor is novel writing indigenous to the Anglo-Saxon race, but rather to England; for America has not excelled in story-telling as she has excelled in other intellectual pursuits. We have several distinct schools of fiction, of which Sir Walter Scott, Sir E. Bulwer Lytton, Messrs. Disraeli, Dickens, Thackeray, Kingsley, and James, the sisters Brontë, and the authoress of "Adam Bede" are the founders. Any one who examines the plots of the works of these authors will find much to admire in the ingenuity with which the same facts, we might almost add the same thoughts, are invested with an appearance of novelty. The possible incidents—we mean, the fundamental incidents—of a novel are few in number, and are constantly repeated; just as the same notes of music are repeated. The demand for novels in England is due to our peculiar domestic and insular character. We require amusement and recreation as well as other people, but we do not like to seek it in public. The novel just meets this requirement and condition. The circulating library sends the theatre to our homes; and when there is so much outcry about the decay of the English drama, it should be remembered that our novelists are, to all intents and purposes, dramatists. Indeed, so dramatic in the style and plot are the novels of our most esteemed authors that they can be presented on the stage without any considerable alteration, except omitting the descriptive parts, which serve the place of scenery.

"A Bad Beginning" is an average specimen of the sea-side novel—that is to say, it belongs to that class of fiction which may be read listlessly and forgotten as soon as read. The story is so loosely constructed that the second volume might be read before the first without loss of interest, and the characters are so lightly drawn and so feebly developed that they never speak for themselves, but are evidently the puppets of the author. We cannot commend the book before us, but we may express an opinion that the writer of it—who, we presume, is a lady, from the ignorance evinced of the manners and customs of men—can do better than add to the multitude of those novels to which no amount of friendly puffing can give vitality.

The heroine of a "A Bad Beginning" is a young lady beautiful in person, accomplished in mind, and whose benevolence of disposition is almost a fault, and certainly very wearisome. What a comfort it is we do not meet with such a paragon as Cécile in real life! This young lady's papa is so terribly henpecked as to be an object of utter contempt, and her mamma is under the evil passion of jealousy on account of her daughter's charms, and who is, consequently, secluded from society. A M. de Molin, a gentleman worn out with Parisian dissipation, and who has the noble brow that fashionable novelists delight in, is appointed Prefect of a department; being on the look out for a wife, visits the parents of Cécile, and, by a bribe of 10,000 francs, induces Madame to give him her daughter, although she had previously fixed upon M. de Molin as a lover for herself. The rest of the story, so far as the heroine is concerned, may be told in a few words. She is neglected by her husband, who considers any display of affection as undignified. A wicked sister-in-law, who is partial to gambling, intrigue, and secret poisoning, succeeds in separating Célie from her husband, and bringing her to death's door. At the right moment the schemes of the wicked sister-in-law are exposed, and she is punished for her crimes by being drowned. The husband seeks and finds his ill-used wife, prays for forgiveness, and is forgiven; and in the last chapter but one of Vol. II. Célie and her husband are left fondling each other in the most sensational manner, declaring that they had never known happiness till that moment." But "A Bad Beginning" was not intended to have a happy ending, and so in the last chapter—which, by the way, does not occupy quite two pages and a half—the cooing couple are killed off in a most business-like manner. One of the supernumeraries of the story is travelling with some ladies, opens a packet of letters, and announces that Molin has been killed by a railway accident. In the next paragraph we are informed that Célie did not long survive her husband, and the whole winds up with the exclamation of the faithful nurse, "She was too holy for earth!" This conclusion is as comic as though at the end of a comedy the principal dramatis personæ were brought before the curtain on biers. It is the most curious anti-climax we ever met with. Probably the suddenness thereof arises from the authoress intending to produce a third volume, and, being persuaded to give up that design, was nevertheless resolved to kill her heroine.

* A Bad Beginning: A Story of a French Marriage. In two volumes. (London: Smith, Elder, & Co.)

"A Bad Beginning" shows how inveterate are national prejudices. The description of French society is ridiculously unreal, for if it were true that nearly all the men and women were utterly and unblushingly depraved, it would not hold together for a year. The authoress has read a few works relating to the immorality of Paris, and has regarded them as fair types of French life in general. It is not usual for scions of French noble houses to sell their sisters' honour and happiness for a thousand francs, half to be paid down and half in a fortnight. Possibly our authoress did not consider that 1000 francs is only £40 sterling, or she would have fixed upon a larger amount. Nor is it usual for French mothers to hate their daughters, or in the delirium of fever, to exclaim:—

My child? I have not lost her—I tell you I have married her—
Her Soul! I had no charge of it. Mothers have only to do with their children's bodies.
Sold! 'tis false—she was not—I had a right to do what I liked: she was my own.
I will not answer for her Soul—girls have none. My mother never taught me I had a Soul. What have Souls to do with marriage? I hate her; I have always hated her. Begone, I say, I will not come—I have still years to live.

After these utterances the lady screams and dies. Thus to burlesque death-bed scenes in novels is, we submit, extremely bad taste. We are not quite justified in using the word "burlesque," for from first to last "A Bad Beginning" has not the most distant connection with actual life; whereas a burlesque is an exaggeration, or a satire, of the actual.

THE DECREE FOR A SERVILE WAR.

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

SIR,—Mr. Lincoln has sent forth a decree which, if it were not as powerless as it is infamous, would be the berald to the South of servile war and its attendant horrors. Europe is not taken by surprise. Politicians have foreseen for months past that, as a last resource, the Lincoln Cabinet would fraternize with the ultra-Abolitionists; yet now this has been done the civilized world is staggered at the impolicy and enormity of the act. How, sir, are we to treat this affair? Can we discuss gravely an edict, promulgated by a Government trembling for its existence, for the desolation and annihilation of its triumphant foe? Yet can we treat lightly an edict that is intended by its authors to arouse the savage nature of the negro, and to make the South a huge San Domingo? If, sir, we are serious, we may be sneered at for being duped by Lincolnite braggadocio; yet if we laugh at the ludicrous spectacle of the cowering, wounded hunter offering to sell the skin of the lion which he has not even the means of pursuing, we may be charged with levity in jesting about a deed that, for atrocity of conception and design, and, let me add, in the bold and naked avowal of its malignant objects, is without precedent in history. This proclamation is, indeed, too puerile to excite laughter, and, but for its evil intent, would be too far beneath contempt to merit notice, however brief, however scornful. A great crime, be it ever so senseless in its object, or ever so bungling in its execution, commands comment and notoriety; and so this decree of the Lincoln Government will receive an amount of public attention, of which it is practically unworthy.

No one will, we presume, deny that Mr. Lincoln has, by proclaiming emancipation, most distinctly violated the Constitution which, in March 1861, he swore to observe and defend. Even the New England clergy, who commend a Sharp's rifle as the best evangelist, and who clamour for an "anti-slavery God," and an "anti-slavery Bible," will not pretend the President of the United States has acted constitutionally; but, on the contrary, will rather glory in his illegal conduct. The ultra-Abolitionists, who will not give the black man a home in the North, and who hate the negro worse than they do the English, must admit that Mr. Lincoln has acted contrary to the letter and the spirit of the law, and that he has completely broken the Federal compact; though, of course, these fanatics will exceedingly rejoice at such a bold proceeding. "We grant," may say the New England clergy and their disciples, "that Mr. Lincoln has no constitutional right to decree the emancipation of the slaves on January 1, 1863, but the end justifies the means." What end? What will be the probable results of this decree?

Mr. Lincoln will gain the support of the Abolitionists. Will this compensate him for the smothered enmity of the Democrats and the coldness of the moderate Republicans? One effect of the President becoming the undisputed member of a party will be the further disunion of the Northern States. I cannot, I dare not, believe that the bulk of the people of the North, even though they may, through fear and panic, acquiesce in it, sympathize with the policy of the Government. I do not prophecy any outburst of popular indignation. The atrocities of Butler and Turchin, at first protested against, were soon condoned, and so the prospective desolation of the South, except that it means ruin to the West and to New York, would no doubt soon be regarded as a very proper and acceptable measure. Still, this emancipation decree is testing the patience of the people to the utmost; and so felt Lincoln, for he simultaneously suspended the Habeas Corpus Act throughout the United States. He simultaneously announced a sham freedom for the negroes, and a state of political and social slavery for the people of the North.

Is the proclamation likely to shorten the war? Northern emissaries have been busy for years in trying to stir up the negroes to revolt, and they have utterly failed. I do not mind letting the New England clergy and their disciples into the secret of their failure to induce the slaves to murder their masters. The fact is, the negro hates the Northerner almost as passionately and vindictively as the Northerner hates the negro. During the war many efforts have been made by such men as Butler, Mitchell, Pope, and Hunter, to enlist the negro on the Federal side, but all in vain. The negro has approved himself faithful under the most trying circumstances. He has often risked his life in assuming the rôle of the "intelligent contraband," and misleading the credulous Northern commanders; but he has never yet given the enemy a tithe of valuable information. The negro has been left with the women and children of the South, but he has not deserted from his post; notwithstanding the proximity of the enemy's troops. The savage conduct of Turchin, Mitchell, and Butler, has never found an imitator amongst the black population. Suppose Mr. Lincoln's proclamation could be circulated amongst the slaves, why should it do more than the Abolitionists and the Federal commanders have been able to do? To the slaves it will be a dead letter, a sealed book. I do not say that here and there Mr. Lincoln may not get at some discontented slaves. In a labour population of three millions and a-half there are always to be found men ready for insurrection against their employers. What good will come from a few isolated massacres of women and children, beyond the gratification of the New England clergy?

Assume, for argument sake, that the four millions of blacks were incited to revolt, and Mr. Lincoln and his coadjutors were from hour to hour receiving the joyful intelligence of every homestead in the South being a little Cawnpore; that the Southern women were being slaughtered after suffering tortures worse than death; that the hated blacks were being killed by the hated Southerners; that the North has its malice duly gratified; and that under such circumstances the armies of the United States were triumphantly marching through the Confederacy, what would be the gain to the North? Or rather, who can calculate the loss? What would the Western farmer do with his grain? What goods would there be to freight the ships of New York? The desolation of the South by a servile war would be such an unmitigated evil, that if the Northern people were not assured of the utter impolicy of Mr. Lincoln's proclamation, they would not tolerate its publication for an hour. But if it does not stir up a servile war, how can it weaken the South or help the North?

The ultra-Abolitionists, and perhaps Mr. Lincoln, believe in the efficiency of this measure; else why should they so zealously advocate it? Did it never occur to them that if there were the remotest probability of their wicked purpose being brought about, the South might still turn the tables on the North? That the slave will rather obey his master than the stranger, is unquestionable. If the Southerner had any idea that he was on the eve of a servile war, might he not determine to enroll his slaves, and lead them into the North? Happily the Southerner will not be called upon to defend himself against a servile war.

Yet Mr. Lincoln's proclamation will produce some fruit. I do not refer to widening the gulf between the North and South, for that would be impossible or unimportant, since it is already impassable. Nor do I regard its influence on the Border States as being of paramount importance, because those States are thoroughly Southern, though the servile war decree will confirm the waverers, if any such exist. It will prolong the war by indisposing the Confederates to negotiation or to claim a peace with the Lincoln Government, and I think it cannot fail to embitter the war. The South will no doubt act with dignified forbearance, but still, we must not expect them to show much consideration to an enemy that, failing to conquer them in the field, seeks to stir up a servile war. Surely it was needless to embitter the contest, and the war might have been continued without resorting to such an extremity.

Mr. Lincoln's proclamation ought to produce an effect upon European Governments. It is a frank confession of defeat. It is not dictated by any anti-slavery opinion. In the loyal States slavery is to be retained and protected, and if any States will submit to the North before the New Year, they will be counted loyal. The object is political, not philanthropic. The wording of the proclamation amusingly admits the weakness of the Government. Mr. Lincoln solemnly decrees that on the 1st of January, 1863, all the slaves in "rebel" States "shall be thenceforth and for ever free," and yet in the same paragraph he promises aid to such persons "in any effort they may make for their actual freedom." It is a comfort that Mr. Lincoln knows that there is some difference between emancipation by his decree and actual emancipation. The Washington Government by this proclamation says, in effect, to European Governments, "We promised to put down this rebellion, and we have failed. We have used up our foreign population, and our native citizens will not fight, even with the inducement of unheard-of bounties. Under these circumstances, though it is (including the slaves) nearly two to one, we intend to stir up a servile war in the South, and so conquer our enemies." Unconsciously the Lincoln Cabinet has advanced one of the strongest possible arguments for the recognition of the Confederate States; and, at the same time, done its best to disgust the European public. Even the ultra-Anti-slavery party in England will look with abhorrence upon the attempt to use emancipation as a tool to promote a servile war in the South.

THIRD ALABAMA REGIMENT.

Captain R. M. Sands, of the Cadets, gives the following revised statement:—

Killed and wounded of the 3rd Alabama Regiment, at the Battle of Krew's Farm, July 1:—

	Killed.	Wounded.	Missing.	Total.
Co. A, Mobile Cadets	4	26	0	30
B, Gulf City Guards	5	11	7	23
C, Tuskegee, L. In	5	15	2	22
D, Southern Rifles	4	11	1	16
E, Washington L. In	3	15	3	21
F, Metrop. Guards	1	13	2	16
G, Lomax Sharp Sh.	0	3	0	3
H, Lowndes Bea'd's	3	9	7	19
I, Wash. S. Guards	3	16	6	25
K, Mobile Rifles	1	14	0	15
L, Dixie Eagles	3	10	2	15
	32	143	30	205
Sergeant Major Whiteman (wounded) making a total of 206.
Total aggregate of regiment				359
Co. A took in	42	Co. G took in	18
B "	31	H "	27
C "	37	I "	51
D "	30	K "	28
E "	41	L "	28—359
F "	26	Field and Staff	3
				362
		Total killed, wounded, &c		206
		Left after battle		151
		The Mobile Register.

THE BOOTY AT HARPER'S FERRY.—The Montreal Advertiser gives an account of the surrender of Harper's Ferry, in which it is stated that the garrison numbered 15,000 men, besides 3,000 negroes, to do the work; and that the place was wonderfully strong. The same journal says the booty taken by the Confederates "was immense, over fifty pieces of cannon, only seven of which were injured; 10,000 stand of arms; equipments complete for 20,000; men a large supply of ammunition; commissariat and hospital stores valued at $1,000,000; 500 horses and mules, and a large waggon train.

FRANCIS FORD, Manufacturer,
MANCHESTER, Three and Six Cord Spool
Thread, Cotton Balls, Knitting and Embroidering
Cottons. Imported by FOSTER AND MOORE,
Norfolk, Va.; F. RIMALHO AND NEYREY,
New Orleans

R. D. RUSDEN, MANCHESTER,
ENGLAND, American Drills of all kinds,
Denims, Stripes, Shirtings, and all sorts of Manchester Goods.

SEARING AND CO.,
Commission Merchants,
MOBILE AND NEW ORLEANS, C.F.A.
Represented by B. G. BRESLEY, Cotton Broker, 2, Byron-street, Royal-exchange, Manchester.

ROBINSON & OLIVER,
Commission Merchants,
NEW ORLEANS,
C.F.A.
Represented by Jos. T. Robinson & Co.,
No. 3, India Buildings, Water-street,
Liverpool.

JOHN FRASER & CO.,
CHARLESTON,
South Carolina.
FRASER, TRENHOLM, & CO.,
Liverpool,
Commission Merchants.

REID AND STEWART, Com-
mission Merchants, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.
Represented by Andrew Stewart, 1, Runford-place,
Liverpool.

HARPER AND CAUGHEY,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA. Represented by J. and A. CAUGHEY,
Tempest Chambers, Tempest Hey, Liverpool.

TO EAST INDIA MERCHANTS.
A GENTLEMAN, in his 30th Year,
who has had nearly 16 years' experience in
the Manchester yarn and cloth markets as a SALESMAN,
also 24 years' experience in East Indian and
American Cottons, desires to go out to Bombay,
under the auspices of a first class firm, to act as their Cotton buyer.
Address, BOX J, 19, Post-office, Manchester.

TO SOUTHERN AMERICAN FAMILIES IN
PARIS.
A FRENCH LADY,—living with
her mother and her daughter in a pleasant
location, close by the Champs-Elysees—offers the
comforts of a home and motherly care and attention, together with the advantages of the best
education and excellent music-teaching, for TWO YOUNG CHILDREN, or for a YOUNG LADY
under fifteen.
Address, MADAME DE W., care of Mr. Largier,
17, Rue de la Paix, Paris.

A. M. GAUTIER, Tailor, 229,
Regent Street, London (and 20, Rue de la Chaussee d'Antin in Paris.)

MRS. E. PRESTON,
31, BURY STREET, ST. JAMES, S.W.
Furnished Apartments and Bed Rooms to Let.
References to Hon. Wm. L. Yancey, Hon. J. E.
Macfarland, and Henry Hotze, Esq.

MR. WILLIAM FREEMAN,
Publisher of THE INDEX, will promptly attend to all orders from the Continent of Europe and the States. Commissions for books and
goods of all kinds undertaken on moderate terms.
102, Fleet-street, London.

WORKS RECENTLY PUBLISHED
BY
WILLIAM FREEMAN,
102, FLEET STREET.

SHIFTING SCENES: and Other Poems. By J.
STANLEY BIGG. Fcap. 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.; handsomely bound, 5s.
POEMS OF TRUTH AND FANCY. By S. R.
REIDMAN. Crown 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.
THE WEARIMOUTH ABBEY. (Second Edition).
A Tale, illustrative of Saxon Christianity. Fcap.
8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.
JESUS THE SOUL'S NEED. By C. A. PORTER.
Royal 32mo. paper, 8d.; cloth, 1s.
PROGRESS: or, The International Exhibition.
By the REV. W. ANDERSON, Author of "Self-made Men." Royal 32mo. paper, 3d.
THE FATHERS OF THE WISLEY FAMILY.
By the REV. S. BEALE. Crown 8vo. cloth, 1s. 6d.
THE TRUE THEORY OF A CHURCH: or, The Right of Principle of Christian Confession, Elucidated and Developed by the REV. F. G. HORTON.
Crown 8vo. sewed, 1s.
DECISION AND CONSISTENCY. Exemplified
and Honoured in the Life of Daniel and his Three Friends. By THOMAS COLEMAN, Author of "Two
Thousand Confessors." Fcap. 8vo. cloth, 2s. 6d.
GOLD OR GRACE: WHICH IS THE BEST?
By the REV. SAMUEL WALKER, Curate of St.
Matthew's, Gosport. Crown 8vo. sewed, price 2d.
HOW THEY GOT THERE. By the REV. W.
BARKER. Being an Answer to "How Did They Get There?" Crown 8vo. sewed, price 2d.
IN THE PRESS.
ESSAYS, CRITICAL, BIOGRAPHICAL, AND MIS-CELLANEOUS. By S. F. WILLIAMS.
PUNCH IN THE PULPIT. (Second Edition).
TO BE, OR NOT TO BE? or, Man's Present and Future Condition Considered.
JESUS, OUR ARK.
THE MODEL CHURCH. The Nature, Constitution, Government, and Characteristics of the Christian Church in New Testament Times. By
the REV. L. B. BROWN, of Berwick-on-Tweed.
London: William. Freeman, 102, Fleet Street.

Merchants' Mutual Insurance Com-
pany of New Orleans.
At a meeting of the Board of Directors held this
day it was resolved to declare a Scrip dividend of TWENTY PER CENT. on the net earned premiums of the last year, and also to pay Six per cent.
interest on the outstanding Scrips of the Company. Scrip Certificates to be issued on and after the first day of August next.
DIRECTORS.
Geo. Campbell,
John Pemberton,
P. Maspero,
F. Pouta,
G. Brouh,
G. Mittenberger.
J. N. Nevins,
S. O. Nelson,
C. H. Stocomb,
B. F. Voorheis,
R. O. Vincent.

THE EDINBURGH REVIEW.
No. CCXXXVI.
Will be published on THURSDAY NEXT.
CONTENTS.
1. SOLAN CEMENTS.
2. THE HERCULEAN PAPYRI.
3. THE MUSULMANS IN SICILY.
4. THE SUPERNATURAL.
5. THE ENGLISH IN THE FAR EAST.
6. THE LEGEND OF ST. SWITHUN.
7. MRS. OLIPHANT'S LIFE OF EDWARD LEVING.
8. THE MAUSOLEUM OF HALICARNASSUS.
9. HOPS AT HOME AND ABROAD.
10. FEEGE EUGENE OF SAVOY.
11. THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION.
12. LORREMAN and Co. Edinburgh: A. and C. Black.

Prices 6s. Annual Subscription, prepaid, 21s.
Post free.

THE HOME AND FOREIGN
REVIEW, No. 11. (October, 1862).
CONTENTS.
1. PERRAUD ON IRELAND.
2. POOR RELIEF IN ENGLAND AND FRANCE.
3. GENERAL AVERAGE.
4. HATTI.
5. VICTOR HUGO'S "MISERABLES."
6. THE EARLIEST EPOCHS OF AUTHENTIC CHRO-NOLOGY.
7. DOLLINGER'S "HEATZGENIUM AND JUDAISM."
8. MANUSCRIPTS AT CAMBRIDGE.
9. CARDINAL WISEMAN AND "THE HOME AND FOREIGN REVIEW."
10. CONTEMPORARY LITERATURE.
11. CURRENT EVENTS.
12. WILLIAMS AND NORGATE, Henrietta-street, Covent-garden, London; and South Frederick-street,
Edinburgh.

ALBION CHAPEL, corner of LONDON WALL and MOORGATE. The Rev. Dr. Scott, late of New Orleans and San Francisco, will preach (D.D.) in this Chapel on Sunday, October 12, at Eleven and half-past Six. The subject for the Evening—"YOUNG MEN responsible for their Influence on Society."

European and Confederate States
Advertising Agency.

THE object of this Agency is to
effect a direct trade alliance between the European and the Southern Press, through the medium of advertising. The most practicable mode
of introducing the Merchants, Manufacturers, Capitalists, Insurance Companies, &c., of Foreign Countries, to the Southern Trade, is by an organised,
classified, and liberal system of advertising.
Trade, like time and tide, waits for no man. The commerce of the world will not pause in ruinous inaction, but will commence its irresistible ebb and
flow the moment peace is established. One of the most dangerous, corrupting, and insidious means to be used by the North will be the medium of advertising. The Southern Press, and the Southern Advertisers, are already organised in every Northern city, and only bide their time. We must see to it that our papers are so filled with Foreign Advertisements
and the advertisements of Southern Importers,
Dealers, and Manufacturers, that there will not be
space left in any Southern newspaper for the advertisement of a single Yankee notation. The time will our papers present to their readers a faithful
mirror of Dealers, Manufacturers, &c., in the Old World, and of our business men at home, and thus attach to Southern interest that mighty lever "the Press," and disrupt the tie which, by means of Northern advertising, has had so much influence in
binding the South to dependence upon its enemies.
The Southern Press, and the Southern Advertisers, are already organised in every Northern city,
patronage, our Southern editors can be maintained
against the stagnation in their business, which proceeds from interrupted or disorganised trade.
The object of this Agency is threefold:—
1st. To advertise European Merchants, Manufacturers, Hotels, Railroads, Insurance Companies, &c.,
in Southern papers.
2nd. To advertise Southern business, property,
&c., in European journals.
3rd. To advertise home industry and Southern enterprise in our own papers, and thereby build up
the cities of our Confederacy, instead of those of
our enemies.
Our arrangements abroad are all completed. We now address you this preliminary Circular, to ask
you to send us duplicate copies of your paper, accompanied by a private letter (which shall be strictly confidential), stating your terms of advertising, &c.
We will soon appoint agents in each important
sea-board and inland city. Atlanta, at present, is selected for the Central Office, on account of its geographical position. We respectfully ask for this enterprise your hearty co-operation and assistance,
and guarantee, in return, strict integrity in all
business transactions.
By order of the Board of Directors,
WILLIAM H. BARNES,
SECRETARY-DEPT.
Atlanta, Ga., August 24, 1861.

Louisiana Mutual Insurance Company.
OFFICE:
Iron Building, corner Camp and Natchez Streets.
Amount of Premiums for the year ending 28th February, 1861..... 699,528 70
Amount of Profits for the year ending
28th February, 1861..... 213,739 74
Amount of Assets for the year ending
28th February, 1861..... 896,429 98
The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of THIRTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent.
interest on outstanding Scrip, and have ordered
the redemption of Fifty per cent. of the Scrip Issue
of 1859.
Interest and redeemable Scrip payable on and after the second Monday of May next.
Certificates of Scrip for the year 1861 deliverable
on and after 1st June, 1861.
CHARLES BRIGGS, President.
R. P. JANYIER, Secretary.
New Orleans, March 20, 1861.

Home Mutual Insurance Company of
New Orleans.
OFFICE..... 78, Camp Street.
Amount of premiums for year ending
31st December, 1861..... 438,725 17
Amount of Profits for year ending 31st
December, 1861..... 282,908 38
Amount of Assets on 31st December,
1861..... 1,398,306 77
The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of
FIFTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent.
interest on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved
to redeem the Scrip of 1857.
Interest and redeemable Scrip, payable in cash on
and after 10th February next.
Certificates of Scrip for the year 1861, deliverable
on and after 15th March, 1862.
A. BROTHUR, President.
JAMES H. WHEELER, Secretary.
New Orleans, January 11, 1862

PAYNE, HUNTINGDON AND
CO., NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A.,
Cotton Factors.

MOSES GREENWOOD, NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Cotton
Factor and Commission Merchant.

McDOWELL, WITHERS, AND CO., MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A., Com-
mission Merchants.

GARLAND GOODE, MOBILE,
Cotton Factor and Commission Merchant.

BOYKIN AND McRAE, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

MILLER AND BATIE, Exchange
Brokers, MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

R. AND D. G. MILLS, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
GALVESTON, TEXAS, C.S.A.

ROTCHFORD, BROWN, AND
CO., Cotton Factors, NEW ORLEANS,
LOUISIANA, C.S.A.

R. W. RAYNE, NEW ORLEANS
LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Commission Merchant, offers facilities to European Consignors o
Boots and Shoes to supply the markets of Tennes see, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Alabama. Specimen tations furnished of goods suitable to these markets.

ANDREW LOW AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

CHARLES GREEN,
Commission Merchant, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

H. D. WEEDE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

JAMES CHAPMAN,
Commission Merchant, CHARLESTON.

N. A. HARDEE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

J. W. ANDERSON AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

R. N. GOURDINE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Charleston.

J. H. ASHBRIDGE AND CO.,
Shipping and Commission Merchants, NEW ORLEANS.
Office—No. 89, Tower-buildings West, Liverpool.
Agents—Liverpool and New Orleans Mail Steam
Navigation Company.

S. A. PLUMMER AND CO.,
Importers and Dealers in Hardware,
PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA, C.S.A.

H. O. BREWER & CO.,
MOBILE, ALABAMA,
General Commission and Shipping Merchants.

WARWICK AND BARKSDALE,
GALLEGO FLOUR MILLS.
This immense establishment of capacity to manufacture 1000 barrels of Flour per day, purely for
South American Market. RICHMOND.

JOSEPH R. ANDERSON,
TREDEGAR IRON WORKS
Manufacturers of Locomotive and other Engines,
all descriptions of Machinery, Rifled Cannon, &c.,
RICHMOND.

DUNLOP, MONCURE, & CO.,
General Commission Merchants,
RICHMOND.

A. G. MILLWAINE, AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Tobacco, Cotton,
Grain, and other produce, PETERSBURG,
VIRGINIA.

C. W. WHITE,
Commission Merchant,
ST. THOMAS, WEST INDIES.

HAMILTON AND GRAHAM,
Importers, Wholesale Dealers in Dry
Goods, &c., PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA.

H. LEVY AND SON,
Commission Merchants, MOBILE.
Crescent Mutual Insurance Company,
New Orleans.

OFFICE:
Corner of Camp and Commercial Place.
TWELFTH ANNUAL STATEMENT.
Amount of Premiums for ten months
ending 30th April, 1861..... $31,876 14
Profits for ten months to 30th April,
1861..... 237,238 27
Assets, 30th April, 1861..... 1,422,559 95
The Trustees have declared a Scrip Dividend of
THIRTY PER CENT., after paying interest at the
rate of Six per cent. per annum on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved to redeem Forty per cent.
of the issue of 1858, payable as follows:—
Twenty per cent. 10th June, 1861.
Twenty per cent. 9th September, 1861.
Scrip Certificates for the year 1861, deliverable on
and after the 12th day of August next.
THOMAS A. ADAMS, President.
G. W. SPATT, Secretary.

Citizens' Mutual Insurance Company
of New Orleans.
The Board of Trustees, have resolved to pay an interest of SIX PER CENT. in cash on the outstanding certificates of profits to the holders thereof,
or their legal representatives, on and after the
second Monday in February next; also, to declare a dividend of Twenty per cent. (20 per cent.) on the
net earned premiums of the Company, for the year
ending 30th November, 1861, for which certificates
will be issued on and after the second Monday in February next.

TRUSTEES.
Geo. W. West, Vice-
President.
D. Jamison,
Ar. Mittenberger,
J. Levey,
Jas. A. White,
Douglas West
M. Masson,
R. P. Hunt,
Martin Gordon, Junr.
Cesaire Olivier,
A. Bohn,
Muma Augustin,
Omier Gaillard.

The Index,
A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS,
LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

Published every Thursday Evening.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

Subscriptions, Twenty-six Shillings per annum.
Stamped, Thirty Shillings per annum.

Nos. I. to XXIV. NOW READY.

Office:—102, Fleet-street.

In this great metropolis, on the native soil of free speech and a free press, every interest—political social, religious, literary, scientific, benevolent
commercial, however remote, however small the
class to which it addresses itself—has long had its recognized representative in Journalism, through
which it seeks to obtain a share of the public attention. The one solitary exception has heretofore been in the case of the Confederate States of America. Engaged in a life-and-death struggle against a vastly superior foe—hemmed in on all sides, quite as effectually by the deserts of the Far West and of Mexico, as by the enemy's armies and navies—they suffer even more from this intellectual blockade which excludes them from communion
with the rest of mankind, than from the commercial difficulties of obtaining their much needed
supplies. The disruption of the American Union—
despite repeated warnings—startled Europe without at once awakening it to a full consciousness of the reality and importance of the event. So little had the internal politics of America entered into
the routine of European thoughts, that even now—
when the effects are undeniable and irrevocable—
the causes still remain a mystery and a riddle to by far the greater portion of the intelligent European public. When the catastrophe occurred, the Northern States had the ear of the Governments
and of the peoples; and so zealously have they retained it, so ingeniously and persistently have
they pleaded their cause, so imperfect and dis-
torting was the medium through which alone the South's voice could be heard, that Europe may fairly be said to have listened to but one side of the quarrel. It is true that the respectable portion of the English press has treated the weaker party in
that spirit of fair play upon which every English-
man prides himself; and, as the struggle progressed, has evinced a painstaking study of a perplexing subject, which stands in honourable contrast to the flippancy and indecorum of American Journalism. But this has not supplied the want, so long and keenly felt, of some organ of Southern interests and Southern opinions, to which the Statesman, the Journalist, the Merchant, and the
public at large might look for reliable intelligence
of the progress of events, and for valuable indications of the manner in which the South itself views
and weighs the importance and bearing of those
events.
This want it is one of the principal objects of
"THE INDEX" to supply as far as possible. The measure of success which may reward the effort will necessarily depend upon the co-operation of the
friends, and of the private, as well as official, representatives of the South in Europe. This cooperation has been most generously accorded us.
There is a large amount of Southern intelligence
which reaches Europe through various private channels. Still more important information is obtained from Northern sources, which finds no
outlet through the muzzled press of those States.
Much of such valuable material has already been
placed at our disposal; and we have a reasonable
prospect of making "THE INDEX" the receptacle
and depository of all, or nearly all, that is available
in the United Kingdom and on the Continent. Our arrangements are such that our friends may rely on
this respect upon a scrupulous and sound discretion, and the inviolable sanctity of private
communications.

While we have thus frankly explained one of the principal objects of "THE INDEX," it may be necessary to state—in order to prevent a possible
misapprehension—that it is not the sole object.
Literature and General News—in fact, every ingredient of a Weekly Journal—will command our earnest attention; and it will be our unremitting
endeavour to make "THE INDEX" worthy of that
liberal patronage which is promised us in advance.
"THE INDEX" will be represented by competent Correspondents at the different capitals of the Continent, at Washington, and at Havannah. It is our design, also, that "THE INDEX" should partake of
the character of a Magazine, without departing
from its proper sphere as a Review of current
events.

For the leaders and literary contributions, we shall enjoy the valuable aid of the pen of gentlemen already favourably known to the public.

The Cotton Market will monopolize much of our space, and is entrusted to hands liberally and practically familiar with the subject and all questions bearing upon it.

It is superfluous to add that "THE INDEX" is
necessarily committed to the advocacy of the principles of Free Trade.

Subscribers will be furnished with handsome
Covers for each Half-Yearly Volume.

A full list of the original "INDEX" Subscribers
and a carefully prepared Table of Contents will accompany the concluding number of each Volume.

Subscriptions and Advertisements to be sent, and
Post-office Orders made payable to

WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102, FLEET ST., E.C.

Printed by HENRY F. MACKINTOSH, of 15,
Crane-court, Fleet-street; and Published for
the Proprietors by WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102,
Fleet-street, London E.C.—October 9, 1862.

THE INDEX

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS, LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

OFFICE:—102, FLEET STREET.

Vol. I—No. 25.]

LONDON—THURSDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 16, 1862.

[PRICE 6D.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK—
America	385
England	386
Europe	387
COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET—
Liverpool Letter	387
Manchester Letter	388
LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH—
The Confederate Congress	388
FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE—
New York	388
Paris	388
Berlin	389
THE REIGN OF TERROR	390
LEADERS—
Mr. Gladstone on America	392
The "Westminster" on the Slave States	393
Mr. Seward's Despatch	394
Confederate Finances	395
Southern Retaliation	395
THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA	396
THREE MONTHS IN THE CONFEDERATE ARMY—
The First Fight	397
Luxurious Living	398
REVIEW—
Imperialism in France	398
ADVERTISEMENTS	400

should sooner take place than the acknowledgment of Southern independence, is not calculated to allay the excitement in Wall-street. New York has been fighting to arrest the loss of Southern trade, not to consummate the ruin of the North and South. The New York World of October 4 "thinks that the proclamation will add to the horrors of the war, and make it twice as difficult to conquer the South, and events will prove the proclamation to be the greatest mistake of the war." The intelligence from the South fully confirms this opinion. Mr. Lincoln's last move has prepared the people of the Confederate States for a long and bloody war. The Confederate journals, which are the organs of public sentiment, have long since repudiated all thoughts of European intervention, and they now bid the people prepare for a renewed and still more sanguinary contest.

The Richmond Enquirer says that President Lincoln's proclamation will simply drive the negroes to their destruction. They are cheerful and happy now, but Lincoln plots their death, for their insurrection is their swift destruction. Released from authority, the negro is a savage, and the same ignorance which drives him to destruction stimulates him to excess. Our military operations are henceforward to assume a grave character. Lincoln's new problem destroys all terms between us, and the next campaign will be a tremendous one, both for the character and the magnitude of the hostilities.

According to the New York telegram, the Confederate Congress "has denounced President Lincoln's proclamation for emancipating the negroes as a gross outrage on the rights of private property—an invitation to servile war that ought to be held up to the execration of mankind. The raising of the black flag and retaliatory measures, even to the extent of a war of extermination, are counselled." That the edict should be denounced is quite feasible, and it has already been execrated by the civilized world. It is also to be expected that the threat of a servile war will put an end to the hope of Mr. Foote's proposition of peace proposals being entertained. We cannot be surprised if some retaliation should be proposed in the conduct of a war with an enemy who has so far outraged humanity as to propose a servile war as "a military act." We must receive with reservation the rumour about raising the black flag, and decreeing a war of extermination. If such things have been mentioned in the Confederate Congress, we may be sure they will not be in any degree adopted without cautious, cool, and mature deliberation, and we hear they have been referred to the Judiciary Committee. It is certain Mr. Lincoln has embittered the contest, and no man can blame the South for taking signal retaliation. Such a course is demanded by the interests of humanity. For this case there is no precedent. Never before has a Government proclaimed a servile war as "a military act." That infamy has been reserved for Mr. Lincoln and his Cabinet.

We subjoin the text of Mr. Lincoln's proclamation suspending the Writ of Habeas Corpus :—

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.—A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas, it has become necessary to call into service not only volunteers, but also portions of the militia of the State by draft, in order to suppress the insurrection existing in the United States; and whereas disloyal persons are not adequately restrained by the ordinary processes of the law from hindering this measure and from giving aid and comfort in various ways to the insurrection; now, therefore, be it ordered:—

1st. That during the existing insurrection, and as a necessary measure for suppressing the same, all rebels and insurgents, their aiders and abettors, within the United States, and all persons discouraging volunteer enlistments, resisting militia drafts, or guilty of any disloyal practice, affording aid and comfort to the rebels against the authority of the United States, shall be subject to martial law, and liable to trial and punishment by courts-martial or military commissions.

2nd. That the Writ of Habeas Corpus is suspended in respect to all persons arrested, or who are now, or hereafter, during the rebellion, shall be imprisoned in any fort, camp, arsenal, military prison, or other place of confinement, by any military authority or by the sentence of any court-martial or military commission.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed. Done at the city of Washington, this 24th day of September, in the year of our Lord 1862, and of the Independence of the United States the 87th.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

By the President,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD, Secretary of State.

The war news is of an unimportant character. It was expected that there would be a battle between General Lee and General McClellan, and there are several contradictory reports as to the movements of these generals. Some assert the Federals had crossed to the south bank of the Potomac, and that they were proceeding in the direction of Winchester to meet the Confederates, whilst other rumours are to the effect that General McClellan has not made any considerable advance, but is engaged in watching General Lee, "who is making mysterious movements about Harper's Ferry."

Some Southern accounts of the battle of Antietam have come to hand. The Richmond Enquirer claims it as a Confederate victory. It says:—

The Federal force was estimated at 150 000 men. General Jackson commanded the left of the Confederate line, General Hill the right, and General Longstreet the centre. It is admitted that the Federal artillery was used with fearful effect, and that upon the whole the battle was the most severe of the entire campaign.

The following is a list of Confederate commanding officers killed and wounded in the engagement:—General Starb, of Mississippi, commanding Jackson's division, killed; Brigadier-General Branch, of North Carolina, killed; Brigadier-General R. H. Anderson, wounded in hip, not dangerously; Brigadier-General Wright, of Georgia, flesh wounds in breast and leg; Brigadier-General Lawton, in leg; Brigadier-General Armistead, in the foot; Brigadier-General Ripley, in neck, not dangerously; Brigadier-General Ransom, of North Carolina, slightly.

The Richmond Whig estimates the entire Confederate loss at the battle of Manassas at 5000, and in all the Maryland engagements as not exceeding 7000.

The official account of General McClellan of the battle of Antietam is rather amusing. He admits the Federal loss to have been 12,469, and at South Mountain 2325, making a total loss in the two battles of 14,794. Any one acquainted with Federal arithmetic as applied to Federal losses will think us very moderate in multiplying McClellan's estimate by two. The Federal commander then proceeds to give the Confederate loss, which he places at 30,000, or about one-half the entire army engaged in the Maryland battles. But the most remarkable part of his despatch is the account he gives of the Federal booty:—

From the time our troops first encountered the enemy in Maryland until he was driven back into Virginia, we captured 13 guns, 7 caissons, 9 limbers, 2 field forges, 2 caisson bodies, 39 colours, and 1 signal flag. We have not lost a single gun or a colour. On the battle-field of Antietam 14,000 small arms were collected, besides the large number carried off by citizens and those distributed on the ground to recruits and other unarmed men, arriving immediately after the battle. At South Mountain no collection of small arms was made, but owing to the hasty pursuit from that point, 400 were taken on the opposite side of the Potomac.

Now, when we remember that the Federal losses were so considerable, that, so far from McClellan having gained any advantage, he was afraid even to claim a victory until, two days after the fight he heard that the Southern troops were recrossing the Potomac in perfect order, and, according to his own admission, carrying with them all their stores and all their wounded, except 300, the above account appears one of the most clumsy falsehoods ever published. We do not believe that General McClellan wrote this despatch. If he had sat down to compose a mendacious account of the Maryland expedition, he would have had some regard for possibility and con-

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

The emancipation edict of Mr. Lincoln is more than a nine days' wonder. No amount of so-called humanitarianism can disguise the ugly nature of the business; indeed, the Washington Government seems anxious to make it distinctly understood that the sole object of the proclamation is a military diversion in favour of the North; that it is to incite the negroes to a servile war. It may at first sight seem curious that the Lincoln Cabinet should be so frank, but, in this respect, their conduct is not altogether impolitic. Provided there is a feast of blood in the South, the maddened fanatics of New England care not if it is brought about by a flimsy pretence. It is, moreover, just the kind of emancipation the Abolitionists desire. They hate the negroes as much, if not more, than they hate the Southerners. By a servile war they hope to get rid of the white population, and so to reduce the coloured population as to be able to transport the remnant. So far, then, Mr. Lincoln has been able to please the Abolitionists. By his repudiation of any Abolition motive he has, to some extent, been able to ward off the anger of the Democrats. He pledges his Government to protect slaves in loyal States, and that the measure is merely for the restoration of the Union. He thus modifies the opinion of a section of the Democrats; and to further conciliate the element of the Northern population that cares not for any principle but that of plunder, he propounds a scheme of Southern colonization. He proposes forthwith to portion out the South amongst the Northern soldiers and volunteers. The scheme is to be first tried in Florida. The only obstructions to Mr. Lincoln's plan are the power of the Confederates, and the influence of the Southerners over the slaves. If, contrary to all expectations—if, we may say, contrary to apparent possibilities, the slaves should evince the slightest disposition to revolt, the tables would be immediately turned on the North, and the slaves, led by their masters, would gladly wreak their vengeance on the hated Northerners. We assume that there is not any prospect of Mr. Lincoln's atrocious plans so far succeeding as to render such a defence and retaliation necessary.

Still, there is no confidence in Mr. Lincoln's scheme in the North. The declaration of General Wadsworth that the devastation of the country sistency, though he might have cared nothing about the truth.

General Beauregard, in an order dated September 24, officially announced his assumption of the command of the department of South Carolina and Georgia as follows:—

In entering upon my duties, which may involve at an early day the defence of two of the most important cities in the Confederate States against the most formidable efforts of our powerful enemy, I shall rely on the ardent patriotism, the intelligent and unconquerable spirit of the officers and men under my command to sustain me successfully. But to maintain our posts with credit to our country and our own honour, and avoid irremediable disaster, it is essential that all should yield implicit obedience to any orders emanating from superiors in authority.

We have no definite intelligence of the movements in Kentucky. Louisville was still expecting to be attacked. The stores were closed on September 24, and unenrolled persons were compelled to work in the entrenchments. It is said that General Buell's army has moved towards the centre of Kentucky.

The telegraphic intelligence has this curious item in reference to New Orleans:—"General Butler has ordered all persons refusing to take the oath of allegiance to have their names registered as enemies of the United States. Those taking the oath will be recommended for pardon." It is rather too bad to order people to sign their own condemnation. Those who take the oath of allegiance are only to be recommended for pardon; what, then, must be the fate of those who refuse the oath?

The sixth resolution of the platform of the New York Republican State Convention is characteristic:

Resolved—That our young and noble free Republic should be proud of the distinction that her only enemies are the savages of the West, the rebels of the South, their sympathizers and supporters at the North, and the despots of Europe.

Enemies enough, we should think—in the West, in the South, in the North, and in Europe. This resolution reminds us of the juryman whose opinion differed from the rest of the jury, and he complained of the obstinacy of the eleven dissentients.

The following extract from the New York Journal of Commerce shows the anxiety to evade the draft:—

Persons who cut off their forefingers or pull out their front teeth to avoid the draft, will find that they are not exempt. Though they may have unfitted themselves for the infantry, they will do very well for the artillery, and will be assigned to that arm of the service. For a particularly timid man the prospect of this change is not an agreeable one. General Anthon, the energetic superintendent of the enrolment in this city, has devised an ingenious punishment for persons who seek to escape the [draft] by giving fictitious residences out of town. In all cases where an individual doing business here claims to reside elsewhere, General Anthon has caused inquiries to be made into the truth of the statement. If the alleged residence proves to be fictitious, the person so misrepresenting will be subjected to a compulsory arrest and sent to the army, if he does not hasten to make the necessary correction at the enrolment office. The three copies of the lists for New York and Brooklyn will be completed early in October.

Yellow fever prevails at Key West, and in other places.

Notice has been given that after November 1 next no foreign invoice will be received for entry at the New Custom-house, unless certified by Consuls' certificates at the place of shipment abroad.

Mr. Lincoln has visited and reviewed the army. Whether he made a stump speech, as on the occasion of his reviewing the Federal troops after the seven days' fight, is not stated.

General White and Colonels D'Utassy, Trimble, and Ford, were under arrest at Washington, on charges of misconduct at Harper's Ferry.

A Nassau letter of the 6th September gives the following account of the Oreto receiving her armament:—

One fine Saturday night in the month of August, a few weeks ago, at an hour when sailors were likely to be enchain'd by Bacchus, a mob of discharged sailors and others were employed to tranship cargo from a schooner into the Oreto. I am credibly informed that about half an hour after they got on board the Oreto she put to sea, and in about three hours afterwards overtook the British schooner Prince Alfred, said to have been lately purchased for and on account of Mr. John B. Lafitte.

"What schooner is that?" said Captain Maffitt, of the Oreto.

"The Prince Alfred," was the answer.

"Don't you want a tow?" cries Maffitt.

"Yes," is the ready response.

"Then take down your sails," comes from the Oreto, and accordingly a hawser is passed, and the Oreto towed the Prince Alfred to Green Cay, a small island forming one of the Bahama group. On the next day, being the Sabbath, but for which the Oreto had no regard, the men began to take out of the Prince Alfred her cargo and to put it on board the Oreto. They discharged six 32-pounder broadside guns and two 68-pounder pivot guns, lots of stores, shot, shell, and powder. This took six days to do, when the Oreto, having these guns mounted on her deck, weighed anchor, hoisted the Confederate flag, her crew manning the rigging and giving three cheers.

The New York Shipping and Commercial List refers as follows to an arbitrary order from the Post Office Department respecting postage-stamps:—

A notice has emanated from the Post Office Department directing postmasters not to recognize postage-stamps which have become soiled in any way! Considering the fact that the public never asked for postage-stamps as currency, and only consented to accept them as such when it became evident that the Government would provide no other immediate substitute for the silver change which was drawn from circulation by the great increase of Government paper money—against which a united press and a united public vainly remonstrated—the Post Office notice can be regarded in no other light than as an act at once arbitrary and unjust. The inability of the Government to supply the new currency sufficiently fast to meet the public necessities renders it obligatory on the public to continue to use the regular postage stamps as currency, though the large numbers of applicants for the new currency unmistakably demonstrates the disfavour with which they are universally regarded. In view of these facts, the proclaimed determination of the Government officials to repudiate stamps which have become soiled by handling simply, and in the absence of the least evidence that they have been used for postage, is an outrageous infringement of the contract by which the people were induced—reluctantly enough—to recognize this most deplorable currency, which has already caused so much trouble and vexation, and which must result in actual loss to almost every individual. The new Tax and Excise Law, which went into effect on the 1st inst., caused the office where the stamps were offered for sale to be literally besieged on Wednesday, until the supply was entirely exhausted which occurred in a few hours. We understand that the press on which they were being printed in Philadelphia became disarranged or broken, so that another batch will not probably be forthcoming under a week.

A meeting of the Southern Club was held at Liverpool on Thursday last. The Hon. Chas. S. Morehead, ex-Governor of Kentucky, delivered an able address, which is to be reprinted as a pamphlet. Mr. James Spence presided. On Monday the hon. gentleman was entertained at a dinner given by the Southern Club, on which occasion the usual loyal and several appropriate toasts were proposed.

The following circular, by Mr. Seward, addressed to all the diplomatic and consular agents of the United States, is published in the Paris papers:—

Department of State, Washington, Sept. 23.

Gentlemen—You will receive by the mail which will carry you this despatch, evidence which will convince you that the aggressive movement of the rebels against the States remaining faithful to the Union, is arrested, and that the forces of the Union, strengthened and reanimated, are again ready to undertake a campaign on a vast scale. If you consult the newspapers you will easily perceive that the financial resources of the insurrection decline rapidly, and that the means of raising troops have been exhausted.

On the other side, you will see that the financial situation of the country is good, and that the call for fresh troops, without which the material force of the nation would be seriously crippled, is being promptly responded to. I have already informed our representatives abroad of the approach of a change in the social organization of the rebel States. This change continues to make itself each day more and more apparent. In the opinion of the President the moment has come to place the great fact more clearly before the people of the rebel States, and to make them understand that if these States persist in imposing upon the country the choice between the dissolution of this Government, at once necessary and beneficial, and the abolition of slavery, it is the Union and not slavery that must be maintained and proclaimed, in which he announces that slavery will no longer be recognized in any of the States which shall be in rebellion on 1st of Jan. next. While all the good and wise men of all countries will recognize this measure as a just and proper military act, intended to deliver the country from a terrible civil war, they will recognize at the same time the moderation and magnanimity with which the Government proceeds in a matter so solemn and important.

I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant,
WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

ENGLAND.

The distress in Lancashire continues to increase. There are now above 4500 paupers more than last week, of whom 1000 are in Ashton-under-Lyne, and 1500 in Manchester. Contributions are coming in liberally; but they are not adequate to the relief of the frightful misery which overwhelms the suffering districts.

Stockport has now 20,000 persons in the receipt of parochial and charitable relief. Blackburn 34,000. In Preston 28,000 receive aid from the Relief Committee. A malignant fever has broken out in that town; the result of misery and want of proper food. The following is the report of Mr. Farnall, the Special Commissioner of the Poor-Law Board:—

Manchester, October 13.

My Lords and Gentlemen,—My tabular report for this week in twenty-four unions in the cotton manufacturing district shows you that there is an increase in the number of persons receiving parochial relief, as compared with the number so relieved last week, of 4540 persons.

There are now 168,038 persons receiving parochial relief in the unions adverted to; in the corresponding week of last year 43,335 persons were so relieved; there is, therefore, an increase of 124,703 persons in the receipt of parochial relief, or 287.5 per cent.

The total weekly cost of out-door relief is now £10,029 10s. 2d.; in the corresponding week of last year it was £2268 9s. 7d.; there is, therefore, an increase of £7761 0s. 7d., or 342.2 per cent.

The average percentage of pauperism on the population of these unions is now 8.7 per cent.; in the corresponding week of last year it was 2.3 per cent.

The average amount of out-door relief per head per week in these unions is now 1s. 3½d.; the lowest amount is 11½d., and the highest is 2s. 0½d.

On the 4th instant, I reported to you that during the four preceding weeks the increase of persons in the receipt of parochial relief in the above unions was 23,333 persons; this fifth report gives an additional increase of 4540 persons, so that in five consecutive weeks 27,873 persons have become paupers in these unions.

Last week I informed you that I had received authentic reports from the honorary secretaries of thirty-one local committees formed in the cotton manufacturing district for the distribution of charitable aid. I have now received similar reports from twelve other local committees, and I am therefore enabled to state that, in the forty-three districts adverted to, the number of operatives and workpeople usually employed is 314,357; that of this number 75,765 were, when the reports were dated, in full work; that 116,749 were working short time; and that 121,843 were wholly unemployed; and further, that the loss of wages in these forty-three districts amounted to £102,494 per week. I have not received any report on these points from the townships of Preston and Macclesfield, nor from a few other localities of less importance, so that these places are not included in the return which I now present.

It will be a source of satisfaction to you to know that the local committees in the forty-three districts comprised in this report, assure me that crime is not on the increase, and that the health of the workpeople is equal to the average.

Mr. Gladstone, is still, as Americans would say, "on the stump" in the North. He has been received with great honours throughout the colliery districts, which have benefited enormously by the French treaty. Ill-natured persons have suggested that he should extend his visit to Coventry, which it has utterly ruined. However, for the present, he is enjoying a series of triumphs; and delighting the ears of his audiences by his masterly discourses on free trade. He responded heartily to the complaints made to him of the exclusive navigation laws of foreign countries, and expressed hopes that time and experience would lead to their modification. The Chamber of Commerce of South Shields presented to him an address of welcome, in the course of which they assured him that they would regard with great satisfaction the employment of every peaceful means of interposition between the American belligerents. At York he was received with the same honours which had attended him elsewhere; and there he reiterated his expressions of regret at the obstinacy of the war, and its disastrous effects on the liberties and prosperity of the North.

With regard to the case of our brethren in America, I for one confess that I can hardly express the disappointment and pain with which I witness what is now proceeding on that great continent. I have never been one of those who have believed that the New World was to be an improvement upon the Old. It may be because our local and municipal and insular ideas in England to a certain extent bind us down to what is English, and tend to make us not wholly impartial judges of the institutions and manners of other people; but I must confess that while at all times rejoicing that America was a free country, I have felt that there was something in the freedom of America that was not quite of the genuine ancestral staple of the freedom of England. (Cheers.) We have now lived to a period when that freedom itself seems to be in danger. Every packet almost brings us the account of measures which show that in the desperate agonies of the conflict that rages civil and political rights are inevitably offered up a sacrifice to the necessities of the time. And there rises in the mind, along with regret for the un-aspersion of human feeling, the question, if possible, yet more painful because it reaches further into the future, how after this tremendous conflict—how, after this overthrowing of force and of military power over and above the reign of law and order, is America hereafter to return to a state of things in which at any rate, whether we may or may not prefer English views of freedom to hers, she did afford perfect guarantee to individual liberty, property, and life. I earnestly hope that that question may be answered and answered in a favourable sense; but I think we must feel that the longer this terrific struggle continues the more doubtful becomes the future of America, the more difficult will it be for her to establish that orderly and legal state of things, now it is too plain, for the moment at least, superseded, in which we saw and were accustomed to see with delight at once the best security for the extension of her material prosperity and power, and likewise the best hope of her continuing to retain that resemblance and that deep attachment to England which I for one believe she never yet has lost.

The meeting of the Herts Agricultural Association was enlivened by an excellent speech, chiefly on agricultural topics, by Sir E. Bulwer-Lytton. The Right Hon. Baronet glanced at the results of "fancy farming," so expensive and so unprofitable to those who are denominated "gentlemen farmers," and who are said never to make money. He spoke at some length of the importance of utilizing the sewage of our towns, and of giving back to the land what is taken from it; instancing as a proof of the consequences of neglect to do so the desertion of large tracts in Virginia and Maryland, once among the most fertile districts in those States.

The authorities have at last made up their minds to preserve the peace of Hyde Park. Sir R. Mayne, Chief-commissioner of Police, has warned off the mischief-making orators and turbulent crowds that have threatened to take possession to the exclusion of peaceable persons bent on exercise or recreation; and we gather, from the terms of his order, that the open-air preachers, Christian and infidel, who have of late years established themselves there, are to share the fate of the Garibaldian missionaries and Irish candidates for the honours of martyrdom. Some thousands of roughs assembled in the park on Sunday; but the police were in force, pickets of soldiers occupied the gates, and excluded everybody who wore a uniform, and the weather, more powerful than either soldiery or police, declared itself most strongly against the intending rioters. Cardinal Wiseman, Catholic Archbishop of Westminster, has issued a remarkable pastoral, exhorting his Irish "sons" to remain quiet and abstain from violence and sedition, and his spiritual daughters to keep their husbands and brothers out of mischief by the feminine blandishments which he enumerates with amusing precision and minuteness.

On the 10th, the East Berkshire Agricultural Society held their annual meeting. Its chief interest lay in some remarks made by Mr. Walter, M.P. (the reputed proprietor of the Times) on the dwellings of agricultural labourers. Mr. Walter alluded to an essay on this subject to which he had recently awarded a prize of £50, offered by a benevolent gentleman in the country, and mentioned one of several very strong cases showing the moral depravity consequent on the inadequate accommodation afforded by the cottages of the poor, which had come under the personal observation of the author of the essay. A labourer, an honest, hard-working man, had brought up a family of ten children without parish relief. This man would, most probably, have been entitled to one of the prizes of the Society; but what became of his family? He had two fine daughters of seventeen and eighteen years of age. These were seduced, and went away altogether, and their fall could be distinctly traced to their having been brought up like pigs in a cottage of three rooms, the whole family living together. Many such cases came to the knowledge of every clergyman having charge of an agricultural parish. Prizes were awarded to labourers for bringing up large families without parish relief, and to young women for steadiness and honesty in service; yet the conditions of the habitations in which they were brought up, herded together in this filthy and abominable manner, were overlooked. The improvement of such cottages was the duty of the landlord, and the landlord showed by his neglect of such duty that he stood fully as much in need of encouragement as the labourer to whom he held out prizes and patronised at these societies. He proposed, accordingly, to offer a gold medal, to be given triennially by this Society, to the landlord who built a specific number of cottages of a specific number of rooms!

EUROPE.

FRANCE.—M. Fould, the French Minister of Finance, has presented to the Emperor a very important and very complicated report. The peculiar method in which the finances of France are managed renders it no easy matter for Englishmen to comprehend these documents; and it is next to impossible to glean from them any information which their author may desire to conceal. The present report presents a much more hopeful aspect than that addressed by the same Minister to his Sovereign when he was called to office to restore order to the crippled finances of the country. There was then a "deficit" of at least forty millions sterling, accumulated during several years; and it appeared that since 1852 the annual deficiency had been at the rate of about ten millions. By certain peculiar operations on the public debt, and especially by the conversion of the Four-and-a-half into three per cents., M. Fould has reduced the "deficit" or floating debt by about six millions sterling; and he has contrived this year to provide, at least, the shadow of a surplus. His Budget, as originally voted by the Chambers, would have shown a surplus of about £172,000; but the war in Mexico and other contingencies enhanced the expenditure by above £8,000,000. The deficiency thus created has been met to a certain extent by augmentations of taxes, producing above £2,650,000; by taking up money from the sinking fund, the dotation de l'armée, and the balances of certain loans to the amount of £1,800,000 more, and by payments from Spain of £1,000,000, and from China of £400,000, a total of about £5,850,000, from which must be deducted a falling off of £160,000 in the Algerian revenue, leaving only £5,690,000 available. Add to this the balance of £172,000 on the original Budget, and there appears a sum of £5,860,000 to meet extraordinary expenses amounting to £8,000,000, leaving a deficit of £2,140,000, or more. By "annulments of credit," the Minister hopes to obtain £1,400,000; and by the postponement of payment of a portion of the dividends on the debt (under a new arrangement) to January 1, 1862, an equal sum; giving him a surplus of some £650,000. But it is clear, from this statement, that M. Fould is not yet able fairly to meet the year's expenditure with the year's revenue. However, he promises for 1863 a surplus of some £330,000; and the French public appears to be satisfied with his promise. The report has produced a good effect on the Bourse.

GERMANY.—The constitutional conflict in Prussia has reached a crisis. The Budget, as amended by the Deputies, with the vote of censure on the Ministers which they had passed, was submitted to the Upper House, and both the censure and the Budget were rejected by an enormous majority. The Budget originally proposed by the Ministry was then submitted and carried, the Upper House thus taking on itself to vote supplies which the representatives of the people had refused. The various sections of the Liberal party in the Chamber hereupon assembled to decide on the course to be pursued, but no decision was adopted. The Chamber met next day (Monday), and the President notified to it the vote of the Upper House. That vote was pronounced by the Chamber to be unconstitutional, and therefore null and void. No voice was given against this decision, six members opposed to it having seceded. On Monday evening the Government closed the session, the speech from the throne being read by the President of the Ministry. In that speech the King expresses his regret that the debates on the Budget of 1862 have not led to any satisfactory conclusion, and remarks:—

That Budget, as amended by the Lower House, having been rejected by the Upper House, the Government finds itself compelled to carry out the Budget as it was originally laid before the Lower House, without taking cognizance of the conditions imposed by the Constitution. The Government, although conscious of the responsibility arising out of this deplorable state of things, is also mindful of its duties to the country, and therein finds authorization for deferring, until the legal settlement of the Budget takes place, the expenditure necessary for the preservation of existing institutions and the development of the welfare of the country. It feels convinced that this course will hereafter receive the sanction of the Chambers.

ITALY.—The news of Garibaldi is bad. The following is the report of his Italian medical attendants:—

From the general course of the illness and from all our foregoing observations, we think we may anticipate a favourable success, notwithstanding the degree of ankylosis which may manifest itself; but we are still of opinion that the wound is serious.—1. Because the important articulation of the foot with the leg is open, and the internal ankle is fractured; 2. Because the presence of the bullet is not disproved; 3. On account of the arthritic disposition of the sufferer; all circumstances which might give rise to morbid complications of such a nature as to prolong and even to aggravate the complaint. As to the cure, we deem it expedient to persevere in the treatment hitherto followed.

SERVIA.—The Powers which signed the Treaty of Paris in 1856—Russia, France, Great Britain, Austria, Prussia, Italy, and Turkey—have, through their representatives at Constantinople, drawn up a protocol settling the affairs of Servia. The rebels are to raze their military works; the Porte is to dismantle all fortifications constructed during the present disturbances. The Turkish suburb of Belgrade is to be given up to the Servians, who are to indemnify the proprietors. The Porte retains the citadel and reserves the right of enlarging the esplanade. The Servian Government is to make good all losses incurred by Mussulmans in retiring to the citadel. The new circuit of the esplanade is to be marked out by a mixed military commission, in which Servia will not be represented. The fortifications of two other fortresses held by the Turks in Servia are to be demolished. No garrison greater than is necessary to defend the fortifications is to be maintained there; the troops are not to be used in aggression on the privileges of Servia, and the Servian and Turkish authorities are not to encroach on each other's functions. All foreign corps in the Servian service are to be disbanded, and Servia is expected not to maintain a larger force than is necessary for the preservation of internal tranquillity. These terms are guaranteed by Italy and the five Powers. Will they guarantee the submission of the Servians?

AFRICA.—There are worse things than the slave trade still tolerated on the African coast. The following is the narrative given to the Commander of H.M.S. Griffin by a Dutch merchant of a visit which, under compulsion, he paid to his Dahomian Majesty, and the scenes he witnessed:—

July 1.—Received by the King, who was seated outside the palace on a raised dais, surrounded by Amazons. He saluted the King in European style. The King at once got up and shook hands with him, said he was very glad to see a Dutchman, and continued talking in Portuguese for about ten minutes. He was then ordered to return to his house and keep inside three days.

July 5.—He was brought to the market-place, where he was told many people had been killed the night before. He first saw the body of Mr. William Doherty (a Sierra Leone man), late a missionary and church catechist at Ishagga. The body was crucified against a large tree, one nail through the forehead, one through the heart, and one through each hand and foot; the left arm was bent, and a large cotton umbrella in the grasp. He was then taken to the market, where the King was seated on a raised platform, from which he was talking to the people much "war palaver," and promising them an attack upon Abbeokuta in November. Cowries, cloth, and rum were then distributed. In front of the market-place rows of human heads, fresh and gory, were ranged, and the whole place was saturated with blood, the heads evidently belonging to some of the Ishagga prisoners who had been killed during the night, after having been tortured in the most frightful manner.

Until July 10, Mr. Euschart was ordered to remain quiet in his house, and not to move or look out after sundown.

July 10.—The ground shook violently—evidently, from the date, the effect of the earthquake felt at Accra. Mr. Euschart was at once brought to the market-place, where he found the King again seated on the raised platform surrounded by Amazons; the King told him that the ground shaking was his father's spirit, complaining that "Customs were not made proper." Three Ishagga chiefs were then brought before the King, and told they were to go and tell his father that "customs should be better than ever." Each chief was then given a bottle of rum and a head of cowries, and then decapitated. Two ty-four men were then brought out, bound in baskets, with their heads just showing out, and placed on the platform in front of the King; they were then thrown down to the people, who were dancing, singing, and yelling below; as each man was thrown down he was seized and beheaded, the heads being piled in one heap and the bodies in another; every man who caught a victim and cut off the head received one head of cowries (about 2s.). After all were killed Mr. Euschart was conducted home.

July 11.—Taken to another part of the town where exactly similar horrors were being perpetrated.

July 12.—All the platforms were taken down, and the programme appeared to be firing guns, singing, and dancing all day; there were no more public sacrifices for ten days, but it is supposed many took place during the nights.

July 22.—Taken to see the "Grand Customs" at the Palace of the late King, at the gate of which two platforms had been erected; on each platform sixteen men and four horses were placed; inside the house was placed another platform, on which were placed sixteen women, four horses, and one alligator. The men and women were all Sierra Leone people captured at Ishagga, and were dressed in European clothes, each group of sixteen men seated, or rather bound, in chairs placed round a table on which glasses of rum were placed for each. The King then ascended the platform, where he adored the Dahomian fetish, and seemed to make obeisance to the prisoners, whose right arms were then loosed to enable them to take up the glass to drink the King's health. After the King's health had been drunk, the effects of the late King were paraded and worshipped by the people as they passed; a grand review of the troops then commenced, and as each marched past the King harangued them, and promised the sack of Abbeokuta in November. Nearly the whole of the troops bore firearms; a few select corps had rifles, but the greater part were armed with flint lock muskets. The artillery consisted of about twenty-four guns (12-pounders). The number of troops altogether could scarcely be less than 50,000, including 10,000 Amazons, all apparently well-disciplined troops. After the review was over, the prisoners were beheaded, their heads being hacked off with blunt knives; at the same time the horses and alligator were despatched, particular care being taken that their blood should mingle with that of the human prisoners.

CHINA.—A despatch from the Hon. F. Bruce, British Minister at Peking, narrates a disturbance which occurred on May 14, at Woo-chang-foo. A party of Englishmen intruded themselves into the pavilion of the Chinese Prefect while a public "examination," the nature of which is not explained, was going on. They were civilly received by the authorities, but were attacked and roughly handled by the mob. The Ambassador rebuked their intrusiveness, and declined to interfere; and his action has been approved by the Foreign Office.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, October 15.

Our last report left the market buoyant and hardening in price, under the influence of Lincoln's proclamation of emancipation. Middling Orleans worth fully 28d., and Fair Dhollerah 17½d. to 18d. per lb. On Thursday, however, the tone was checked by the report of Gladstone's speech at Newcastle. In it the Minister stated his conviction that the South now constituted a distinct nation, and could never be re-united to the North. This statement was interpreted by part of the press to betoken approaching recognition, and the impression gained ground both at Manchester and here that something would speedily be done. The market accordingly was damped, and the sales fell to 4000 bales. On Friday and Saturday the feeling deepened with sales of 2000 to 3000 bales and some anxiety to sell was shown among holders. Surats were sold at 17d., for Fair Dhollerah or a full ½d. decline.

On Monday the Arabia's news was to hand, and its scope was considered in favour of the market. The war fever seemed, if possible, to be growing in intensity, and fresh venom was evidently infused into the strife by the President's proclamation. Our market opened with some symptoms of improvement which were strengthened by a report that telegrams from Bombay announced 4s. advance in goods, but it proved that this quotation was a mistake for four annas or 6d. per piece, and subsequent telegrams confirmed the smallness of the advance. In Calcutta the rise in goods was quoted at 1s. This news was very disappointing to holders, for it was the response to the heaviest advance on this side, amounting in Manchester to 4s. or 5s. per piece, and it left the Indian markets still 20 per cent. below the prices current in Manchester. Much dependence had been placed upon these advices, and it was hoped that they would have stimulated the market for goods, and infused new life into the trade. The mainstay of our market accordingly was broken, and since then its course has been steadily downwards. On Monday the sales were 3000 bales without much notable decline, but yesterday they fell to 1000, and to-day they scarcely reach that amount, and considerable pressure is shown in some quarters. The recent heavy arrivals of Bombay ships have increased the depression, there being up this week already 60,000 bales. Sales have been made to-day of Fair Dhollerah at 16½d., and at that price it is difficult to proceed. Business being almost suspended, and it is hardly possible to give quotations. Middling Orleans may be put nominally at 26d., Fair Broach at 18d., and Omrawuttie at 16½d. per lb., and in cotton afloat, Dhollerah has been sold to-day at 16½d., nearly due.

A variety of circumstances have conspired for the moment to depress the market. The stock is swelling to a degree that no one anticipated a month ago. It seems likely that it will reach 300,000 bales; a figure sufficient for the moment to allay the fear of absolute famine. Manchester, on the other hand, opposes a stubborn inactivity to the wishes of speculators, though the production of goods is supposed to be reduced to one-sixth of its former amount, the demand remains unaccountably supine without any immediate prospect of a revival. Under these depressing circumstances, consumption has completely broken down, the mills are closing up at a rate hitherto unknown in this crisis, and the general impression in Manchester is, that not more than 8,000 or 10,000 bales per week is now using. It is probable that this estimate is quite too small, still it is evident, that with so narrow a foundation for bona fide demand; the market cannot be sustained here under large speculations without a strong speculative feeling which for the moment is quenched.

So far as America is concerned, each mail only deepens the impression that the country is drifting into inextricable chaos and anarchy, but the eye of the commercial public is diverted at present from this side of the picture, and fixed on the deadlock to which our manufacturing system has come.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday, October 14.

The quietness which has pervaded our market for several weeks past still continues, and the amount of business transacted since this day week may be set down at almost nil.

In the early part of the week there were some enquiries for shirtings and printers, and offers were made at prices varying from 6d. to 1s. per piece under quotations, more, it is supposed, to test the strength of the market than to effect business.

Friday was an extremely quiet day, there being no enquiries for anything at all, the speech delivered by Mr. Gladstone, at Newcastle, having put a damper upon any disposition for business in either yarn or cloth which might have been previously manifested.

To-day the disappointment caused by the tameress of the telegraphic advices received yesterday from India, has been intense, a considerable advance in the prices of all kinds of goods having been looked for, as it was generally expected that we should have received news in response to the excitement which prevailed in our market during the week ending August 30, when shirtings advanced close upon 4s. per piece. The Bombay telegram, which is dated 27th ultimo, advises us of the receipt of our mail news of September 3, and telegraphic advices of 10th idem, the latter taking out news of the reaction which had set in here.

Although our market is so excessively quiet, we can report no weakness on the part of holders, as they remain firm at extreme quotations.

LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH.

Private letters from New York announce the death, in a recent engagement, of the Hon. John Forsyth, late United States' Minister to Mexico, and more recently, one of the Commissioners sent by the Confederate Government to Washington, to propose terms of peaceable separation. The death of such a man would be a serious loss to his country, but his nearest friends in Europe discredit the intelligence, as at latest advices he was detained by civil duties in Mobile, and had not entered active military service. It is considered by them more probable that the announcement refers to his son, Colonel Charles Forsyth, of the 3rd Alabama Regiment, or to his brother, Colonel Robert Forsyth, both of whom were in the recent great battles.

THE CONFEDERATE CONGRESS.

On the 26th September, a message was received from the Senate, stating that the Senate had agreed to the report of the Committee of Conference in relation to the Bill "further to provide for the public defence."

Mr. Miles, of South Carolina, from the Committee of Conference, reported that the committee recommended that the House concur in the report of the Committee of Conference. He said he was deeply impressed with the importance of speedy and harmonious action in relation to the subject before the House. It was found impracticable in the Committee of Conference to embody the features which were distinctly the features of the House Bill. The bill now reported was substantially the Senate Bill, with some slight, but very essential, amendments.

Mr. Boteler, of Virginia, obtained the floor. Mr. Foote hoped the gentleman did not rise to call the question. If he did, he appealed to him by every consideration of courtesy and patriotism not to do it.

Mr. Boteler replied that he was blind to any appeal to courtesy, and to everything but the welfare of his country, at the present moment. Whatever his will might have been, his patience was exhausted, and many an hour had been lost already in discussion. He had recently returned from the army of the Potomac, and he had heard the appeals of soldiers made again and again asking when reinforcements were coming. It was now time that the eternal talk on this Bill should cease. It was an easy matter to vote down the question if gentlemen did not desire to sustain it, but he was impelled by a sense of public duty. He did call the question upon the Bill, and he should adhere to it.

The call of the question having been sustained, the yeas and nays were ordered on the passage of the Bill, and were recorded as follows:—

Yeas.—Messrs. Baldwin, Barksdale, Batson, Boteler, Breckinridge, Chambers, Chilton, Collier, Conrad, Conrow, Curtin, Dargan, Dawkins, De Jaraett, Dupre, Elliott, Fester, Freeman, Gardinier, Garland, Garrett, Geary, Goode, Graham, Gray, Harbridge, Heiskell, Hilton, Holcomb, Holt, Johnson, Kenan, of Georgia, Kenan, of North Carolina, Kenner, Lander, Lyon, Machen, McRae, Meneses, Miles, Moore, Munnerlyn, Pugh, Ruhl, Reel, Royston, Russell, Sexton, Swann, Tibbs, Vest, Wilcox, Wright, of Texas, and Mr. Speaker—54.

Nays.—Arrington, Bell, Boham, Boyce, Bridgers, Chambliss, Clapp, CLOPTON, Curry, Davidson, Davis, Farrow, Foote, Gartrell, Hanly, Harris, Hebert, Jones, Lyons, Marshall, McDowell, McQueen, Perkins, Preston, Smith, of Alabama, Strickland, Trippe, Welsh, and Wright, of Georgia.—29.

So the Bill was passed.

Mr. Kenan, of Georgia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the Bill had been passed. The measure just passed struck out the only adjustment, looking to peace, between the State and Confederate Governments, by which the House Bill had authorized the President to make a requisition on the Governors of the States for the troops needed. Was it proper at a time like this to create dissension and collision in any State of this Confederacy? Where could be the objections to this feature of the Bill? He would always sustain the Government, but there had always been dissension upon the Conscription Law. In the State of Georgia it had been declared to be null and void, because it was unconstitutional. He had no doubt but if the President were to make requisitions upon the Governors they would be complied with. He could tell gentlemen now there was danger of dissension between the Government and States in this confederacy. He hoped it could be avoided, but he greatly feared it would come. Therefore he appealed to the House to consider the vote by which they passed the Senate Bill.

Mr. Foote said that he was very happy that the gentleman from Georgia had found that opportunity to address the House which the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Boteler) had so ungraciously refused him. The gentleman from Virginia had been away some time, and now came back to lecture the House on its legislation, and ungraciously and discourteously refused to listen to any appeals whatever. (Cries of "order.") The House had been informed by a member of the state of things in the State of Georgia. That member had said that there was danger of a collision between the States and the Confederate Government. He would tell the House that a similar state of things existed elsewhere. There had been facts reported which showed it. Why should the House be restricted to the edict, and be dictated to as to what course it should pursue by a party of Consolidationists in the other legislative branch of the Government? Mr. Foote said that he spoke of some who were then outside the hall, and not in the other branch of the Government. It was well known that some time since he had emphatically declared, in unequivocal language, that there was danger existing, and now they had it from the lips of a high-toned gentleman from Georgia, making magnanimous disclosures in relation to the condition of the country, and appealing to them not to involve this country in civil war. By the Bill of the House the country would have been quieted, and an abundance of soldiers procured for the war. Let all the Consolidation men of this day, and all the Federalists of the old Government, cry out; let those who had always been enemies of State rights, and those who voted against paying back the fine of General Jackson, all Consolidationists and Federalists, utter their sentiments in a voice of thunder; let them come on. He was done; he had had his say; he had expressed his opinion, and he called the question. (Laughter.)

The House refused to reconsider.—yeas, 24; nays, 53.

Mr. Boteler said that he was much obliged to the gentleman from Tennessee for the reply made to his call for the question. He had stated in his remarks that in the exercise of his right, and impelled by a sense of duty, he had done what he thought proper. There was no one in the House who felt the remarks of the gentleman less than he did, and the best reply he could make to them was to recall the action of the gentleman on this very Bill. The gentleman had seized every opportunity to talk and speak on this very bill, upon this and every occasion, and he ought to be one of the last members to complain. He was induced to pursue the course of action which he had done because he had been, as he said, among the camps, and had been appealed to again and again to say when the reinforcements were coming, and he could not give an answer because he did not know when the eternal talk would end and action be taken. The gentleman from Tennessee, then, had no cause to lay the charges against him which he did. But of him he would say that if we were about to send an ambassador abroad, he would certainly advocate the sending of the gentleman from Tennessee, for then it could be said of this Government Ex pede Herculem, "from the size of the foot (Foote) we recognize a Hercules." (Laughter.)

On the 29th ult.—

Mr. Semmes, of Louisiana, submitted the following joint resolution:—

"Resolved,—By the Congress of the Confederate States that the proclamation of Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States of America, issued at the city of Washington in the year 1862, wherein he declares 'that on the 1st day of January, in the year of our Lord, 1863, all persons held as slaves within any State or designated parts of a State, whereof the people shall be in rebellion against the United States, shall be henceforth and for ever free,' is levelled against the citizens of the Confederate States, and, as such, is a gross violation of the usages of civilized warfare, an outrage on the rights of private property, and an invitation to an atrocious servile war, and therefore should be held up to the execration of mankind, and counteracted by such severe retaliatory measures as in the judgment of the President may be best calculated to secure its withdrawal or arrest its execution."

Mr. Clark, of Missouri, moved that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. He was in favour of declaring every citizen of the Southern Confederacy a soldier, authorized to put to death every man caught on our soil in arms against the Government.

Mr. Semmes, of Louisiana, said that the resolution had not been drawn without reflection. The question of retaliation was exclusively an executive one, to be regulated by circumstances. But it was proper that the legislative department of the Government should express its approval of the retaliation contemplated by the resolution.

Mr. Henry, of Tennessee, said that the resolution did not go far enough. He favored the passage of a law providing that upon any attempt being made to execute the proclamation of Abraham Lincoln we immediately hoist the "black flag," and proclaim a war of extermination against all invaders of our soil.

Mr. Phelan, of Mississippi, said that he had always been in favour of conducting the war under the "black flag." If that flag had been raised at Manassas a year ago, the war would have been over now.

Mr. Yancy, of Alabama, moved that the pending resolution, together with the resolutions submitted by him some time since relative to retaliation, &c., be referred to a select committee of three, and be made the special order for Wednesday next.

Mr. Burnett, of Kentucky, moved that all of said resolutions be referred to the Committee on Judiciary. This was agreed to.

ANOTHER ORDER BY GENERAL BUTLER.

Headquarters Department of the Gulf,
New Orleans, Sept. 18, 1862.

GENERAL ORDER.

I.—All transfers of property or rights of property, real, mixed, personal or incorporeal, except necessary food, medicine, and clothing, either by way of sale, gift, pledge, payment, lease or loan, by an inhabitant of this department who has not returned to his or her allegiance to the United States (having once been a citizen thereof) are forbidden and void, and the person transferring and the person receiving shall be punished by fine or imprisonment, or both.

II.—All registers of the transfer of certificates of stock or shares in any incorporated or joint stock company or association, in which any inhabitant of this department who has not returned to his or her allegiance to the United States (having once been a citizen thereof) has any interest, are forbidden, and the clerk or other officer making or recording the transfer will be held equally guilty with the transferer.

By command of

MAJOR-GENERAL BUTLER.

George C. Strong, A. A. G.

A private letter, dated New Orleans, Sept. 19, inclosing the above, says:—

Our Banks to-day, under the new order, are not paying cheques, or transferring stocks, or, in fact, doing anything. They will not even give parties their boxes without taking what they call the oath.

Foreign Correspondence.

(From our Commercial Correspondent.)

NEW YORK, October 3.

The period of inflation has at last been reached; bonds, stocks, merchandize, and even real estate, are advancing in value for paper money. Every million of dollars issued from the Treasury Department increases the size of the bubble in a greater degree than the last, but this state of affairs cannot continue long. Government securities (!) of course do not partake of the rise, their fixed rate of interest being higher than the current discount in the street, makes the bonds slightly above the par of the green backs. Repudiation has commenced; the small end of the wedge has to be driven in first, and postage-stamps act as this instrument; they can no longer be called "post" notes; for all those that have been used as currency are not permitted to convey a letter through the mails, nor do the Washington authorities propose to redeem them. What the issue will be no one can tell, the chances are that they will "stick" on the hands of the innocent public.

It is thought that but a very small amount of specie has been deposited on ten days' call with the sub-treasurer, but that the banks have secretly loaned Mr. Chase several millions of dollars to pay the interest due on the 1st inst. The gold being disbursed among the community, has found its way to the bullion dealers, and a temporary decline in the premium has taken place. Next week the rise will be rapid beyond doubt.

Importations continue heavy. Notwithstanding the high tariff, the country is bare of goods.

PARIS, October 14.

If Tacitus really believed in the "wise saw" he laid down some sixteen centuries ago, that that people was indeed happy whose history offered no features of interest, the Roman estimate of happiness differed very considerably from that existing in Paris, A.D., 1862. We Parisians are not happy when we have nothing interesting to talk about, and the past week having been a very dull one, a decided gloom has pervaded our manner of viewing things.

The anticipations of a revival of political activity, in consequence of the Emperor's return, have not, so far, been verified, and hence a certain amount of disappointment.

Only two Cabinet Councils have as yet been held at St. Cloud. At one it is said the American question was mooted, but without any decision being come to. An attempt was made by M. Thouvenel, who is a warm partisan of the cause of Italy, to ascertain whether there was any prospect of the Emperor stating his intentions on the subject, and, if we are rightly informed, it was met with a very curt rebuff. It is high time, however, the Government should speak out on the Italian question. The public are "half-sick of shadows" as Tennyson hath it, and most thoroughly so of the endless speculation which has been going on on the subject, which seems quite as eternal as the city it refers to is reputed to be.

M. Fould has published in the Moniteur a report to the Emperor, in anticipation of his usual financial statement. His Excellency deals largely in that kind of prospective finance, which has been adopted in France; probably out of a wish to make up for the unsatisfactory state of present circumstances by glowing anticipations of a golden future. Judging, however, the document from the figures quoted, M. Fould appears to have contrived, by dexterous financial manipulations, by shifting over to next year burthens which belong to this one, to make, at all events, both ends meet on 31st December next. His hope that he will be able to enter upon the financial year 1863 with a reserve of eighty millions of francs to meet "unforeseen contingencies," must not be too confidently relied on. If he really is enabled to balance the receipts and the expenditure, he will have done that which no financier has been able to accomplish.

Next to M. Fould's report, which has hardly excited that amount of attention, which so important a political document deserves we have to record a warning to the Courier du Dimanche, for an article of M. Prevost Paradol, on the Roman question. The article was a criticism—by no means ill-natured, but replete with all the powers of quiet sarcasm and quiet irony which distinguish the style of that very able writer—of the wavering policy of the French Government. It consists of a dialogue between a champion of the Papacy and a partisan of Italian unity, each of whom finds in the policy and the despatches of the Government convincing arguments in favour of his views—that the Government means never to desert the Pope, and that the troops will shortly be withdrawn from Rome. The sly hits which the writer deals en passant at the Government constitute the offence, but they are so witty and so delicate, that though it is by no means difficult to suppose that they must have occasioned considerable annoyance, the excessive zeal of M. de Persigny can alone account for his coming down with so smashing a sentence as that which he uses to describe the article—excitation à la haine et au mépris du gouvernement. All that the writer infers is that the Government is in a state of great perplexity, and is reluctant to break with the clerical party by sacrificing the Pope, or with the Liberal party by destroying Italian unity, which owes its existence to the arms and influence of France.

There has also been a talk of the revival of the Venetian question, and of a forthcoming war with Austria. The only fact which can be quoted in corroboration of this rumour is a speech of the new Prussian Premier, M. de Bismark openly directed against Austria. M. de Bismark being well known as an advocate of a French alliance, quid nunc, lost no time in getting up a neat little plan of a Prusso-Franco-Italian alliance, with a special view to the speedy demolition of the Austrian empire. If any idea of the kind was ever contemplated by any of the Powers mentioned, the manner in which M. de Bismark's attempt to break the liberties of his country, and to transfer the control of the public purse from the elective to the hereditary branch of the Legislature, must have been disappointing. The whole of the Liberal party throughout Germany is up in arms against the attempted coup d'état, and if the Berlin Cabinet should persevere in its despotic policy, it may easily, at the cost, that there is danger in trying to establish a despotism without the genius that can excuse, and the courage and resolution that alone are able to enforce it. King William and his advisers are likely to have their hands full enough at home, not to have much time left to think of "Germanic hegemony" and aggressive war against a neighbour who is both more liberal and more powerful than themselves.

The "emancipation" proclamation of President Lincoln has, as we anticipated last week, been commented on by the various papers, not according to its merits or demerits, but according to the bias of the various prints. The thick and thin partisans of the North are loud in its praise—the France, the Pays, and the Constitutionnel, greatly exaggerating its power, set it down as an atrocious attempt to excite a servile war. The most remarkable of the articles which have appeared on the subject is one in the Constitutionnel, which, endorsing the dilemma of Mr. Gladstone, that President Davis had made a nation of the South, argues that the time has arrived when its recognition can no longer be with any propriety withheld. The question, it is understood, is under the serious consideration of the French Government, but the decision it may arrive at will mainly depend upon the course pursued by England.

The report of General McClellan on the battle of the 17th is severely criticised by those papers which have ever shown themselves the most constant and bitter opponents of the South. The Presse of this (Tuesday) evening says:—

The absence of details concerning the battle of the 17th ult. would lead one to suppose that the advantages of McClellan are by no means so great as he at first represented them to be. All that we can gather from the official reports of the generals is, that after two days' fighting they lost 14,700 men. As for the military operations usually described in such documents, they are not even made the subject of a passing mention, as though it were feared extraneous matter would lessen the effect of that grim enumeration of killed and wounded. Is it not at least injudicious to tell the public all that an army has lost without saying a word of what it has achieved? On the other hand, we find that the Confederates, whom McClellan described as "dispersed and demoralized," still hold on the Potomac the position they occupied on September 18. Nay, more—they appear determined to maintain themselves on the frontiers of Virginia, and make Winchester the basis of their operations. In short, if McClellan has, as he asserts, triumphed on the 17th, we may remind him of what was said to Hannibal:—"You don't know how to turn your victory to account."

The Bourse has been quiescent for the last week, but to-day a tremendous fall of 1 per cent. took place in Rentes, and a regular panic ensued. The "Bull" party, however, confidently predict a tremendous rise for the end of the month.

(From our own Correspondent.)

BERLIN, Oct. 13.

It would be difficult to exaggerate the gravity of the political situation in Prussia, but, on the other hand, the immediate result of the present conflict between King and Lords on the one side and the House of Deputies on the other is less likely to be a sudden catastrophe than at a distance it may seem to threaten. If the King, confiding in the support of the Feudal party, should unhappily be induced to attempt a coup d'état, then indeed a fire will be kindled which will spread through all Germany, and in which more than the parchments of the feudal lords may be consumed. But the unready German mind will hesitate long before it proceeds to such extremities, and the King will have ample time for reflection and repentance allowed him. But in this view of the case the Prussian people is considered only in the general, and no account is taken of an element it contains, which, from its position, may at any time exercise (as it did in 1848) a powerful influence on the fortunes of the country; I mean the Berlin gamin, a creature as volatile, as witty, and almost as mischievous as the Parisian. In a Government such as the Prussian still is, and must long continue to be, whatever the progressive encroachments of the popular element, the personal character of the King is too important not to demand careful study by those who would judge of events. As his character is little understood in England, I shall employ this letter in sending you a short sketch of his public history. Eclipsed by the brilliant precocity of his elder brother, James I. of Prussia—but whom Goethe admired as a boy, and of whom it was said in later life that he should have been a professor of Æsthetics—the present King's education was totally neglected. He was made a mere soldier, and while still a boy, after earning the iron cross of valour on the field of battle in the last days of the empire, he was sent to the Court of Russia, where he passed many years of his youth. He came back to Germany a military martinet, although he proved in Baden, during 1840, that he had not been born a general. His avowed predilection for absolute doctrines, perhaps also his unbending deportment, rendered him so unpopular in those troubled times that his brother was obliged to send him into honourable exile on a mission to England, where he remained for several months. His first words on his return, after the settlement of the present Constitution, were to the effect that while living in a constitutional country he had studied and had learned to admire the working of the system. These expressions, coming from one who had never been known to conceal his opinions, whose rough candour had always formed a contrast to his elder brother's fantastic insincerity, were accepted by the Liberal party as meaning more than he perhaps intended. While the last years of the late reign were employed in the attempt to render illusory the Constitution which had been forced upon the King in 1848, the Prince of Prussia remained aloof from public affairs; while it was known that he devoted to their study all his honest but slow faculties. The favourable impression which he thus created was still further confirmed by his conduct in assuming the regency. He did so, not as the Queen and the Court party had desired, as his brother's delegate, but as next heir, in virtue of the Constitution and in presence of the assembled Parliament. The Liberal party, confident in the strong respect for duty which the Regent had always displayed, gave him their cordial support, and excused his unwillingness to grapple with several important questions which were urged upon his Government, on the plea that, acting as his brother's representative, delicacy forbade him to adopt measures which he knew that brother would not have sanctioned. At this time the Prince Regent, whose property had been confiscated only ten years before, whose palace had been gutted, who had been obliged to seek shelter from the fury of the mob in the residence of a private friend, had become the most popular man in Germany. The well-known speech at his coronation gave the first blow to this trustful admiration, and since then the King has seemed to lose no opportunity of squandering the treasure of popular confidence which the Regent had amassed. The ministers who served him have left him or been dismissed, and the moderate Liberals, who were his warmest friends, are now the opponents of his policy. Still it would be unfair to tax him with duplicity. Even in his present attitude, the soldier's bearing is discernible. He knows only his consigne—the Constitution—and he sticks to it faithfully, all the more stubbornly that he finds others understand it differently from himself. The soldier knows only the letter of the law. For the King, the Constitution means a certain number of words written on certain sheets of parchment or paper, and which, like a penal enactment, must be interpreted in the narrowest sense. He says to himself that there is a Constitution in France, and to this he looks for the exegesis of that of Prussia, forgetting the difference of races, and not appreciating the difference of men and time. The year of grace 1862 in Prussia is in France the year '73 of the great Revolution. The Deputies, and with them the great majority of Prussians—all but the Feudal party, which is almost confined to the members of the House of Lords—understand by a Constitution something quite different from a penal statute. For them, it is a Bill of Rights, rather than an Act of Grace, at all events to be explained in the widest sense. It is the title-deed by which they claim the leadership of Germany. They look not to France, but to England; and seeing by what steps the English Parliament became supreme, they imitate it by clutching at the purse-strings. The Army Estimates are the bone of discord, the Deputies pleading economy for cutting them down, the King's Government the defence of the country for maintaining them as proposed. The House of Lords has thrown out the amendment of the Deputies, and passed the bill as prepared by the Government; and while I write the Deputies are discussing resolutions to stigmatize the Lords' interference as unconstitutional. Theoretically, there is something to be said for both sides. A scattered territory, such as that which makes up the Prussian monarchy, must depend on the efficiency of its army for its safety. Its existence is due to this policy, from which its sovereigns have never deviated since the time of the Great Elector, and which they have pursued without imposing upon their subjects any exorbitant taxation. On the other hand, experience has proved that the command of the public fortune is the only legitimate source of influence which the popular branch of the Legislature can pretend to; the Deputies are, therefore, in the right when they endeavour to secure it. The issue of the struggle is probably far off; but the first step will probably be the dissolution of the newly-elected House of Deputies. Such a measure would be of bad augury, for it recalls the first steps of the Revolution of 1830. Charles X. was not less conscious of his right than the King; he dissolved a newly-elected chamber, but, before he issued the fatal decrees of July, he spent hours of every day in studying the charter. The King of Prussia may study the Constitution with similar results. His people are less impulsive than the French, and his heir is understood to be opposed to the present course of the Government. The throne may not be in danger, but the moderation with which the Liberals have put forward their claims is the best proof that they feel themselves strong enough to enforce them.

In my next I shall send you a review of the present state of Germany, with the two great parties which agitate it, and the thirty Governments hesitating between them while they dislike them both.

EPPING FOREST INCLOSURES.

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

Sir,—May I beg the favour of your insertion of the enclosed notice of motion, by Mr. Torrens, M.P., for an inquiry into this subject, which appears upon the notice paper of the House of Commons, for next session.

I am, Sir,

Your obedient servant,
JUSTITIA.

Leytonstone Road,
October 15.

MR. TORRENS.—WOODS, FORESTS, AND LAND REVENUES. —To call attention to the reports of the Commissioners of Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues for the years 1856, 1857, 1858, 1859, 1860, and 1861, reporting that the Commissioners had sold the rights of the Crown in various parcels of land, situate within the forests of Epping, Woodford, Waltham, and Wanstead; and to move for a Select Committee to inquire what steps either have been or ought to be taken to preserve the rights of recreation and resort to the forests exercised from time immemorial, by the inhabitants of the eastern parts of the metropolis, as well as the rights of the poorer foresters, which they have long enjoyed, of pasture, cutting wood, and recreation or other rights; and with the view of obtaining compensation (either from the Crown, or from those persons who have benefited by the possession or purchase of the various lots particularized in the reports of the Commissioners), for those who had enjoyed or have been deprived of rights of the kind referred to, also for those officers of the forest who, by the sale of the rights of the Crown within the forest, have been deprived of any emolument or perquisites.

THE REIGN OF TERROR IN NEW ORLEANS.

The following letter, written by a lady at New Orleans to a friend in London, was printed in the Times, on October 14 :—

New Orleans, Sept. 1, 1862.
(Fifth month of the reign of terror.)

My dear Mr. —,—Shortly after the opening of the port of New Orleans, I received a kind letter from you, which, bearing a date a year old, nevertheless gave me much pleasure. As all letters are subject to military supervision, I did not answer it until I thought I had found a safe opportunity of sending a letter unseen by the authorities. Thinking I had found such an one I wrote you a volume, giving a detailed description of the taking of New Orleans, and the treachery which led to it; I also enclosed copies of orders and acts of General Butler, upon which the Northern press have made no comments, preferring to appear ignorant that such acts of barbarism are sanctioned by their Government, to criticising them. I only heard a few days ago that the person to whom I entrusted the package had found it necessary to destroy it to prevent its falling into the hands of the Government. I cannot tell you how disappointed I felt on many accounts. There were several inhuman threats made in the official journal of General Butler to make New Orleans a second St. Domingo, if there was any attempt to retake it. . . . I cannot again undertake the recital of the universal mutiny in the forts Jackson and St. Philip; the garrison spiking the guns and firing upon any officer who appeared upon the parapets. . . . As war absorbs all my thoughts, I shall naturally write of nothing else; in fact, we never speak of anything else. The excitement and expectation we are constantly in are enough to wear out body and mind. For three weeks past we have daily, I may say hourly, expected New Orleans to be attacked by the Confederates. The Yankees have thrown down every house in the remote suburbs, including the town of Carrollton, and thrown open the country to the lake, that the Confederates may have no shelter from their fire, and may be seen many miles off. They sleep under arms, and are prepared at all times for an attack. In the meantime, Butler refuses every one a pass to leave town unless they take the oath of allegiance, and amuses himself by telling all the women who apply for passes that while he is fighting the enemy in the suburbs he will deliver the town to the mercy of 20,000 negroes, and adds that he will leave the town a heap of ashes if obliged to evacuate. He finds that the women are not to be shaken in their devotion to their country's cause by the threat of rapine and murder, and is thoroughly exasperated with the sex. He says the women were the entire cause of secession, that they tabooed and sent to Coventry every man who would not fight, and that even if they took the oath he would not give them passes. It is true that we recognize no man who has remained at home and is able to serve in the army. You cannot conceive the horrible position we are placed in here. I will endeavour to give you a faint sketch of what we have to expect. In the first place, we are now subject to the caprices of our servants. Imagine an army where the officers were punished with fine and imprisonment for even enforcing ordinary discipline, such as preventing their soldiers leaving for days at a time, or resenting not only impertinence but personal violence! This is the case with us; we are invariably told that the testimony of a "loyal negro" is preferable to that of a rebel, and no assertion they make against their masters is too absurd to obtain credence. In the presence of these facts we are disarmed, not being permitted the smallest weapon to defend our houses or persons. Foreseeing that many would not comply with this order, Butler excites theupidity of the slaves first, by offering a reward for every weapon they may find, and next by offering liberty (which they have already) if they will denounce their masters. This has proved such an inducement to perfidy, that many have hidden weapons in the house, and then denounced their master and mistress. Some of our most respectable citizens have been sentenced to one year's imprisonment with hard labour, dragging a ball and chain, for having retained, some a sword-cane, others a revolver, or bowie-knife. While we are unarmed, Butler arms all the free coloured population, while Phelps drills the negroes in camp to be ready at a moment's warning to be armed. Is it not dreadful? They endeavour to excite the revengeful passions of the slaves by continually reminding them that the hour of retaliation is come. You hear the creatures in the streets boasting they will "wade knee deep in the white man's blood."

The fear of fire is now added to all these horrors. Three days ago all the operators of the fire telegraph were removed on the ground that they had not taken the oath. The first day the Yankees had possession two large fires broke out in the heart of the business part of the city; the flames had made great havoc before the telegraph gave the alarm, and the citizens who ran to extinguish the flames were kept back by the military. Since then, fire alarms continue, and we feel apprehensive that they intend gradually to burn the town.

You have heard of the "brilliant victory" of the Yankees at Baton Rouge. Notwithstanding "the victory" they had to evacuate the place; in doing so they blew up the State-house, removed the State library and Washington statue; laid the town in ashes; threw open the doors of the Penitentiary, and turned out about 500 convicts, who are now loose on our community. Here also the gaols were thrown open, and murderers and felons were turned loose, a great number of slaves among them. Don't think this exaggeration. I assure you I write nothing but facts, which I can vouch for.

The navy boasts of doing nothing against the usages of civilized warfare. In returning from Baton Rouge they endeavoured to destroy the towns of Bayou Sara and Donaldsonville; finding their shells did little damage, they landed the crews with buckets of tar, with which they smeared the houses and then set them on fire; and boasted in their official paper that they had only left a few sticks where these towns formerly stood. The mayor of Bayou Sara had informed them that guerrillas were near; they left hurriedly, but returned when the guerrillas had departed, and in return for the mayor's kindness laid the town in ashes. It is hard to believe that such things take place in a civilized country; but, nevertheless, every word I have written is true. The fact is, we are such a mendacious nation that I hesitate to write many things which would be considered American exaggeration, to express it in polite terms.

You have heard of the imprisonment of Mrs. Phillips. She is a charming woman, with a large family of children, all of them unaccustomed, many of them very young, and thus deprived of a mother's care. When called before Butler, he simply asked her if she did not smile when the funeral procession of Captain de Kay passed her house? She replied, "It was possible; as she was in good spirits that day." Without further trial he sentenced her to close confinement on Ship Island for an indefinite period. Upon her husband endeavouring to speak for her, he told him that he would have him gagged if he opened his mouth again. Poor Mrs. Phillips has been more than two months on that desolate sand-bank, without a hope of release. She is in a wretched shanty, which neither keeps out rain nor sun; she has had to pass the entire night sitting under an umbrella; she receives a soldier's rations, she was allowed a servant, but this poor woman is not permitted to leave the room, and has to share the close confinement of her mistress. Mrs. Phillips being dangerously ill a short time ago, her husband was permitted to visit her. She had concealed from him her wretched condition; they gave her neither a bed nor chair; she took one of each with her, which comprises the furniture of her wretched prison. She had been ill for a week, during which time her servant could not cross the threshold of her door, and no one entered to see if they required anything; a little arrowroot, cooked over a piece of tallow candle, was all she could procure. Finally, she sent for an officer, and explained to him her helpless condition, and the absolute necessity there was of her having hot water for hot applications. He left her, promising to send her some immediately. In four hours after some was sent. She had had time to die of her agony. Mrs. Phillips had already been imprisoned in Washington, with two lovely daughters, on suspicion of corresponding with the enemy. Though every search was made in their house, even the soiled linen looked through, without any proof against them, they were still retained prisoners till, through the influence of friends, they were released on condition of their selling everything they owned within three days, and leaving Washington. They unfortunately came to New Orleans, where the brute Butler follows the example of his Government in persecuting her. I have not a doubt he had orders to seize the first opportunity of punishing her. There are other ladies who have been imprisoned on equally trivial pretences; but it is useless to cite them. One of our first creole ladies, a Madame Le Beau, near seventy years old, was denounced by a little pet negro boy, eight years old, as having hidden arms. When called before Butler he was most insulting to her, called her that — woman, and sentenced her to a year's imprisonment on Ship Island, but released her on condition that her son would take the oath of allegiance. A nephew of the same lady was sentenced to a year's imprisonment, and hard labour with ball and chain, for having thrown his arms in the river instead of delivering them to the authorities. Judge Andrews, one of our best citizens, was sentenced to two years' hard labour, ball and chain, on Ship Island, for having shown at his club a small brooch in the form of a cross, which he laughingly said "was made of the bone of a Yankee." This was six months before the Yankees came here. A Mr. Keller was sentenced to the same punishment for having in the window of his bookstore a skeleton marked "Chickahominy." To-day a poor druggist has been sent to Ship Island for three years' hard labour, ball and chain, for having endeavoured to smuggle some quinine across the Yankee lines. His property is also confiscated. He swears he is innocent, and it is said to have been done by a Yankee spy. If I were to undertake to tell you all the iniquitous judgments they would fill a volume; I only mention those people whom I know personally.

Sept. 7.
Since writing the above we have undergone excitement and anxiety of various kinds. First, the continued sound of cannon at Canatlon led us to believe the attack by the Confederates had begun. It was only the death of some officer and the practising of artillery.

On the 23rd of this month the Confiscation Act comes into force. The Government organ, the Delta, has spread consternation through the community by publishing the construction to be put upon the terms "aid, abet, or countenance the rebellion." According to their construction, there is not one citizen of this republic who will not be liable to the confiscation of his property. Butler says it will particularly reach the women, and that they should be turned out of their homes and made to work for their daily bread, thus depriving them of the time or disposition to be turning up their not very pretty noses at Union soldiers.

To give you an idea of the alarm and despair among the timid and wavering is more than I am able to do. We all know what the reasonable construction of the law would be, but Butler has unlimited power and will use it. He is applauded by the populace in the North for his merciless treatment of "Southern rebels." He has an eye to the next Presidency, and is elated and flattered by the popularity his course seemingly gives him, and he will spare nothing. He has no family pride, no honour to uphold. He is of the populace. His brother, Colonel Butler, who is at the head of the Commissariat Department, was formerly a negro trader; he has realized a colossal fortune by speculating upon our miseries. He made us pay $40 a barrel for flour, and when the port of New Orleans was open to commerce he would not permit the Government to buy boats to bring any vessels up the Mississippi, and the owners of cargoes gladly sold to him at his own price rather than lose them altogether, of which they were in danger by passing many weeks at the mouth of the river. Thus, for some time, he continued to keep the market in his own hands, he being in partnership with his brother, the General. At the same time, through the newspapers, he appealed to the bad passions of the poor, assuring them that the richer classes were the entire cause of the dearth of provisions and of their miseries. Confiscation has few terrors for us. We had long since made up our minds to lose all for our country. The worst feature of it is that we shall not be permitted to go into the Confederacy where friends abound, but must starve in the streets of this wretched town. There is a worse fear haunting us every hour; the black population! There is no longer a doubt that they are armed, and we are defenceless. Last night they had a Union meeting of the free blacks; slaves, of course, composed the majority. I hear they discussed the wholesale massacre of the white population. It is enough to render us maniacs to live as we are now doing. The European nations by merely recognizing us would have given us a different position. I do not know what to make of England. Certainly the whole legislation of the North is ruinous to English commercial interests. Fear of the power of the North seems to have paralyzed her. She is wrong if she imagines the present struggle is going to exhaust the North. When their debt becomes too burdensome they will by an act of Congress wipe off the national debt. What to them is national honour? Who knows anything of the rulers after they have passed away? They are obscure individuals placed in power by the populace. Scarcely one of them knows who his great grandfather was; many have never heard of their father. Springing from the dregs of European population, what do they care for sustaining either their own or a nation's honour? Had England and France recognized us, and enabled us to break the blockade and get arms, we should have desired nothing more.

We have had everything to contend against. We always depended upon the North and England for all manufactured articles, and, therefore, had no manufactures. Cotton and sugar being most profitable, we cultivated little else. Our ports have been blockaded; we have been thrown entirely upon our own resources. The war has been carried on in the most highly cultivated, and most thickly inhabited portions of the country. The ruin and devastation of the Northern hordes have never been equalled by a civilized people. Have you read the Northern accounts of the terrible retribution for what they choose to term the murder of General McCook? Seventy-five innocent men, who were pursuing their peaceful avocations, were hung, sixty houses burnt, while the women and children were turned roofless and penniless upon the world. McCook was a brute, who committed many outrages in Nashville; among others, he caused a clergyman, a Mr. Elliott, who was President of the Female Academy at Nashville, to be stripped and publicly whipped. It is said he was shot by the brother of a young lady who was at school at Nashville, and who had been insulted by McCook. You remember a dear friend of mine, whom you knew when you were here; she told me that she saw last Sunday, while standing at her street door, three Yankee officers cross over the street, one of them walk up to a young boy of 19, who is paralyzed, a Mr. —, and slap him on the face, and curse him as a d— Southern rebel, and use other language I could not write, to which the poor cripple made no answer. He then put his hand on his revolver and threatened to shoot him, though inside the door stood a young lady who would have been shot had he fired his pistol. As soon as Mr. —'s agitation permitted him to speak, he demanded the officer's name; the coward replied, "I do not give my name to d— rebels." He then walked off, but, evidently being encouraged by the other two officers, he returned and administered another slap. Three weeks ago the cowardly miscreants scarcely dared look us in the face, but now they know we are unarmed and they can insult us with impunity. I could multiply to hundreds the insults we are daily subjected to, but should only tire you. You must excuse my excited, incoherent style, but I am half mad with a thousand contending feelings. We meet our friends but to hear of new indignities, new dangers, with which the monster Butler is surrounding us. What is loss of life and property to the other evils which threaten us? You English ought to feel some compassion, as the events of the Indian war must still be fresh in your memories.

You have never read of such exalted patriotism as the women possess. To give one's life for one's country, is quite natural, but they profess their readiness to starve for theirs, which, from present prospects, there is probability of their doing, should Butler carry out his threats. They never lose their faith in our final triumph, and in the many panics which we have been and are still passing through, they have preserved their self-possession and bravery. . . . For two years all social intercourse has almost ceased, and we have been thrown on our own resources. While part of the army was quartered near the town, the officers came often to us, and served to enliven our narrow circle; but since the taking of the town we all shut ourselves up in our houses, rarely going out for exercise. Not a Yankee officer has penetrated into the interior of a family here, save with a search warrant to look for silver or arms. We have been very anxious to leave New Orleans on many accounts, but could not get a pass unless we would perjure ourselves by taking the oath of allegiance to the hated Yankee Government, and have preferred running the risk of being massacred here, to going upon such terms. Perhaps you will think this "exaltation"—fanaticism. You know we have it in our characters naturally, and the present state of affairs has not weakened it.

If I had anything but war to write about I would do so; alas! there is nothing else. Do take pity on us, and write to us from your peaceful happy England. If we are living, it will give us infinite pleasure to hear from you; if we are dead, you will have the reflection that your labour was not lost, inasmuch as it was a request the fulfilment of which I shall, doubtless, be aware of in the spirit land. . . . There is one consolation in living through scenes like these—when death comes we welcome it; in your happy country, with what horror do you look upon it! We are all in mourning; the exception is to find a person in colours. The entire nation has some one to mourn. — has followed the army for six months to watch her dear boys, whom she has nursed through wounds and sickness. Do you remember little —, in Washington? He made his arrangements to run away and join the Southern army. He is not yet sixteen. He has been prevailed upon to abandon it for the present.

Believe me, your friend,

AFFAIRS AND OPINIONS IN NEW YORK.

The following letter has been forwarded to us :—

New York, Sept. 30.

The excitement in the stock market continues, and prices jump up several per cent. at a bound on nearly everything, except Government's, and these are neglected to take care of themselves; gold, silver, and exchange are also rising, and bid fair to reach still higher points before the topmost round is gained.

The reason of all this is the irredeemable paper currency which now forms our only basis of circulation. The Government is supported by paper issues, ranging all the way from one cent. up to $5000; and half a dozen presses cannot grind out the paper fast enough. Of course, this glut of "money" inflates first the stock market, and then spreads to certain staple articles; real estate bringing up in the rear, though as yet it has suffered no violent upward spasms. It is being looked after, however, and many shrewd persons are picking up such lots of desirable property as offer at low rates—paying for the same in paper.

The main objection to real estate appears to be the taxes which now bid fair to eat up even the property itself in a few years. A large majority of the stores and tenements are, of course, occupied, but not one in a dozen brings a paying rent, while there are acres of building for which the owners are content to accept just what the occupants are disposed to pay. Our large hotels which have heretofore brought in a rental of from $20,000 to $60,000 per annum are now, I hear, not paying enough to cover taxes and other incidental expenses; and there are hundreds of stores and buildings which do not bring in a cent. When the tax gatherer goes round, many of these will have to be sold to meet his demands.

Real estate, therefore, is not a favourite with investors, but State and railway bonds—the bonds of old and reliable corporations—and diamonds are. All these are in brisk demand, and bring enormous prices compared with their intrinsic value in silver and gold. The only money it is now possible to get is the irredeemable paper money of the Government, and there are thousands who turn this "money" into something more reliable, because of the certainty they feel that the paper, like the old continental, is absolutely worthless. Inflation, therefore, is the order of the day, and must continue to be as long as the war shall last, when the bubble will be pricked—the gas will escape—and an unparalleled crisis be everywhere witnessed.

It is doubtful whether the recent inflation would have been so rapid but for the issue of the proclamation freeing the slaves; that at once gave an impetus to the desire to secure something tangible against the day of final shipwreck—for the wreck of the Union, under such a proclamation, was regarded as certain as the alternation of the seasons.

Speaking of the proclamation, the Richmond papers publish it without comment. Whether they regard it as unworthy of notice, or whether they are reserving their remarks until they see the effect upon the Northern mind, I do not know; but if they are wise, they will treat it with silent contempt.

A very serious result to the Administration from the issue of this proclamation has been the almost total cessation of enlistments, while from the ranks already in the field there come mutterings of discontent and threatened insubordination! These men say they want to fight "for the Union," and not its destruction, and if the war is to be one for the abolition of slavery, they will throw down their arms at once. The Government has endeavoured to suppress these sentiments of the troops, but they have leaked out nevertheless, and the authorities must make the best of it. With regard to fresh enlistments, as stated above, they have almost entirely ceased—and this too in districts where they have been going on most rapidly. The letter of the Governor of Massachusetts, some time ago, stating that if the President would issue a proclamation of emancipation, the streets would swarm with eager recruits, is now proved to have been all fudge, for instead of this uprising to wipe out slavery, the people shun the recruiting station as if an untamed lion was there. This letter of the Massachusetts Governor, and expressions to the same effect from other States, show how hollow are the pledges put forth by the Abolition leaders, who speak merely for themselves, and a few in league with them, and not for the immense host they profess to represent. It is clear from this that a majority of the people—even in the most radical States—are opposed to the crusade against slavery, else they would be found supporting and making good the promise of those who assumed to speak for them. Or, it may be, they do applaud the movement for the overthrow of the South, but prefer it shall be at the sacrifice of other lives, and not of their own. This is not impossible. Three-fourths of the material in the Northern army now is composed of Democrats or Conservative Republicans, while the Radicals stay at home in comfort—many of them engaged in plundering the hard-earned property of those now away in the field! This is Radicalism.

The sacking of General Taylor's plantation in the South by Union troops is one of the most damnable and sacrilegious acts I ever read of. General Taylor, you are aware, was once President of the United States. He sleeps in his coffin, but his son still lives, a true Southerner. The Vandals approach the plantation, turn loose all the negroes, plunder the mansion of its most sacred relics of the venerable departed, even his private papers, destroy all they cannot carry away, and by driving off all the slaves, leave 700 acres of sugar to rot in the fields! And these acts perpetrated at the home of an ex-President, not of the South, but of the United States, and a general who in past wars shed immortal lustre upon his country's arms. But his son was a "rebel."

"All quiet on the Potomac," is again becoming a familiar phrase. There is some hinting about winter quarters for McClellan's jaded forces, in order that they may be re-invigorated for a fresh campaign, and also to give opportunity for a thorough drill of the new recruits. There is nothing to confirm this, however, and the rumours may be unfounded.

I was surprised to see the Liverpool cotton market decline 2d. per lb. under an impression that there would be peace after Bull Run. No. 2 had been administered to the rebels. Let me assure you, beyond the shadow of a doubt, that this Administration does not want peace, and, if retained in power, it will continue the murder of the innocents until the very last hour of its existence. The people of the North want peace, but their rulers do not. So does the South want peace, but it wants it only on the condition of final and eternal separation. It wants no more patched-up compromises—it wants no more Northern domination; but a Government of its own, and laws in accordance with its own institutions. This is the true position of each side, and you can readily judge how remote are the chances of peace.

Cotton remains nominally as before—say 56 for middling. The highest premium paid on gold was 24, but it closes this evening at 123½. Silver was sold at 18 prem.

Exchange on London, 34 to 34½ for £1.
A friend in New Orleans writes, under date of the 19th:—"Exchange, 150, with some asking 160. Gold, 132½ to 133. No cotton to be seen."

THE RIGHT OF SECESSION.

THE Hon. William Rawle, one of the ablest members of the Philadelphia bar, when it was an honour to belong to that body "that could not be puzzled," has given his views on the subject of secession. He was a friend of Washington, and filled the office of District Attorney under him. In the year 1825, he published notes on the Federal Constitution made in antecedent years, in which he treats of the doctrine of secession. Under the head of the "Permanence of the Union," in his views of the Constitution, speaking of the clause under which the United States are to guarantee to every State in the Union a Republican form of government, and to protect them against invasion, on the application of the Legislature; or the Executive, when the Legislature cannot be convened, against domestic violence, he says:—

"The Union is an association of the people of the Republics: its preservation is calculated to depend on the preservation of those Republics. The people of each pledge themselves to preserve that form of government in all. Thus each becomes responsible to the rest that no other form of government shall prevail in it, and all are bound to preserve it in every one."

"But the mere compact, without the power to enforce it, would be of little value. Now, this power can be nowhere so properly lodged as in the Union itself. Hence, the term guarantee indicates that the United States are authorised to oppose, and, if possible, to prevent every State in the Union from relinquishing the Republican form of government; and as an auxiliary means, they are expressly authorised and required to employ their force, on the application of the constituted authorities of each State, 'to repress domestic violence.' If a faction should attempt to subvert the government of a State, for the purpose of destroying its Republican form, the paternal power of the Union could be thus called forth to subdue it."

"Yet it is not to be understood that its interposition would be justifiable, if the people of a State should determine to retire from the Union, whether they adopted another or retained the same form of government, or if they should, with the express intention of seceding, expunge the representative system from their code, and thereby incapacitate themselves from concurring, according to the mode now prescribed, in the choice of certain public officers of the United States."

"The principle of representation, although certainly the wisest and the best, is not essential to the being of a Republic; but to continue a member of the Union, it must be preserved, and therefore the guarantee must be so construed. It depends on the State itself to retain or abolish the principle of representation, because it depends on itself whether it will continue a member of the Union. To deny this right would be inconsistent with the principle on which all our political systems are founded; which is, that the people have in all cases a right to determine how they will be governed."

"This right must be considered as an ingredient in the original composition of the general government, which, though not expressed, was mutually understood; and the doctrine heretofore presented to the reader in regard to the indefeasible nature of personal allegiance, is so far qualified in respect to allegiance to the United States. It was observed that it was competent for a State to make a compact with its citizens, that the reciprocal obligations of protection and allegiance might cease on certain events; and it was further observed, that allegiance would necessarily cease on the dissolution of the society to which it was due. The States, then, may wholly withdraw from the Union, but while they continue they must retain the character of representative Republics."

"The secession of a State from the Union depends upon the will of the people of such State. The people alone, as we have already seen, hold the power to alter their constitution. The Constitution of the United States is, to a certain extent, incorporated with the constitutions of the several States, by the act of the people. The State Legislatures have only to perform certain organic operations in respect to it. To withdraw from the Union comes not within the general scope of their delegated authority. There must be an express provision to that effect inserted in the State constitutions. This is not at present the case with any of them, and it would, perhaps, be impolitic to confide it to them. A matter so momentous ought not to be intrusted to those who would have it in their power to exercise it lightly and precipitately upon sudden dissatisfaction, or causeless jealousy, perhaps against the interests and the wishes of a majority of their constituents."

"But in any manner by which a secession is to take place, nothing is more certain than that the act should be deliberate, clear, and unequivocal. The perspicuity and solemnity of the original obligation require correspondent qualities in its dissolution. The power of the general Government cannot be defeated or impaired by an ambiguous or implied secession on the part of the State, although a secession may perhaps be conditional. The people of the State may have some reasons to complain in respect to the acts of the general Government; they may, in such cases, invest some of their own officers with the power of negotiation, and may declare an absolute secession in case of their failure. Still, however, the secession must, in such case, be distinctly and peremptorily declared to take place in that event, and in such case—as in the case of an unconditional secession—the previous ligament with the Union would be legitimately and fairly destroyed. But in either case the people is the only motive power."

"To withdraw from the Union is a solemn, serious act. Whenever it may appear expedient to the people of a State, it must be manifested in a direct and unequivocal manner. If it is ever due indirectly, the people must refuse to elect representatives, as well as to suffer their Legislature to reappoint senators. The senator whose time has not yet expired must be forbidden to continue in the exercise of his functions."

"But without plain, decisive measures of this nature, proceeding from the only legitimate source—the people—the secession of a State is not complete, nor their executive or judicial powers in any way impaired; and they would not be obliged to desist from the collection of revenue within such State."

"As to the remaining States among themselves, there is no opening for a doubt."

"Secession may reduce the number to the smallest integer admitting combination. They would remain united under the same principles and regulations among themselves that now apply to the whole; for a State cannot be compelled by other States to withdraw from the Union; and, therefore, if two or more determine to remain united, although all the others desert them, nothing can be discovered in the Constitution to prevent it."

These are opinions deliberately expressed, not in reference to any particular suit, or any particular action, but the result of the general reflections of a highly educated legal mind as to the Constitution of the United States; and these, too, of a man eminently conservative in his character, and entirely unambitious, who eschewed political life, refused an office of the highest honour under the greatest man our country has ever produced, and belonged to a party that certainly was not indisposed to carry the Federal powers to the utmost extent that the Constitution justified.

KING CORN.

(From the Mobile Register.)

King Cotton is dethroned, and the old aboriginal Maize, the American giant cereal, is enthroned in his stead, and right regally does King Corn bear his dignity, as one born to the position. He wields his tall sceptre over millions of acres, and his tasseled crown and broad leaves wave and nestle in the wind like the plumes and spears of legions of old Indian warriors, new risen from their sepulchral mounds, and rushing to do battle for their native South, as of yore they did against invaders. King Corn was the Indian King, and at his planting, at the fullness of his grain, and at the ripeness of the ear, they paid festive honours with regal pomp to his useful majesty. The "green corn dance" was the most prominent of festivals among the aborigines of the South. If the King smiled benignly upon his subjects, plenty and rejoicing was in the lodges of Creeks, Cherokees, Chickasaws, Choctaws, Alabamians, Uchees, Natchez, and Seminoles; squaws and papposes fattened on green corn in its season, and on abundant hominy; while the warriors could go forth upon the war path with their pouches amply stored with "cold flour," two ounces of which would enable them to endure the most rigorous exertion for twenty-four hours, and at that rate of consumption sustain them in health and strength through long and incessant marches and battles—indeed, through campaigns of many weeks.

Corn is a war King; Cotton is a peace King. In war the great ends of militant men are to subside, to fight and to triumph. In peace, the great ends are wealth and the pursuit of happiness. In our great greed for profits, we dethrone King Corn and set up in his place King Cotton, like a golden calf; but now, in our hour of trial and distress, we have cast him down and reared in his stead the lusty and generous ally who is to help in fighting our battles by filling the crib and the smoke house and the commissary warehouses with the essential articles of provision for man and the war horse. Cotton is a staple of industry, corn of consumption. Staples of industry render a nation wealthy, but dependent on commerce; staples of consumption render it independent and self-sustaining. The only drawback to satisfaction which the reflecting mind finds in our magnificent monopoly of cotton production is that the condition of the enjoyment of this magnificent heritage will be the enervating luxury and extravagance which will follow in its train. However, these influences can affect but a portion of the race—the denizens of cities mostly—while the great agricultural space of the country will always yield such robust and hardy champions as are now valiantly fighting out this war of patriotism.

King Corn is now in the majesty of his youthful vigour. Never were such fields of grain seen upon the face of the earth. Go where you will throughout Alabama, and, if all accounts are correct, throughout the whole wide domain of the South, the broad acres which in former years bore the sturdy cotton plant are now covered with tall, strong stalks of the corn. Wide leaved, green and luxuriant, with stems like tree trunks, you can almost see and hear it grow, and it seems to rejoice in the important part it is called to play in the war for the South. Bending beneath the regular Southern breezes, King Corn points his pinnated foliage northward like spears at the charge, as if he really were a warrior rushing to the battle against the invaders. This figure may seem somewhat poetic to occur in prose, but it has commended itself and been remarked by more than one prosaic observer who has dashed through on the cars, the boundless fields that laugh and sing with the glad promise of unprecedented harvests. With plenty of corn we shall have plenty of meat—beef and pork. The producers of the country everywhere are giving the same unusual attention to their stock that they are to corn, and there is every reason to believe that the number of hogs which will be fattened for slaughter the coming autumn will be almost as unprecedentedly large as the corn crop will be.

MR. MASON ON THE EFFECTS OF RECOGNITION.

The following letter is in reply to a request from Mr. Boon, the Secretary of the committee of the Stalybridge Meeting, for Mr. Mason's opinion as to the effect recognition would have in terminating the war; and also for any other information that might strengthen the arguments of the speaker in favour of recognition:—

September 19, 1862.

Sir,—I have had the honour to receive your letter of the 17th instant, informing me of a projected meeting to be held at Stalybridge, in Cheshire, of the ratepayers of the town, who are to have under consideration the question of recognition of the Confederate States of America, and asking my opinion as to the effect that such recognition would have in bringing about a peace, and any other information I may deem pertinent to the subject.

As a citizen of those States, I do not feel at liberty to refuse your request under the circumstances stated, when perhaps otherwise to offer my opinions might be deemed intrusive; it is, certainly, a settled principle of international law, that when a new nation or empire is brought into existence as a separate and independent power, other nations are at liberty, without giving cause of offence, to recognize it as such, and to receive it as an equal in the family of nations; and to entitle it to such recognition, it is only required that sufficient evidence be exhibited of stability and permanence in the new Government coupled with the power to sustain itself in its new position.

In the case of the Confederate States, I think it may be confidently submitted that the facts which have transpired since their separation from the United States, both in the Cabinet and in the field, come fully up to such requirements. It has existed as a perfectly organized Government, in full and unimpeded operation, for more than eighteen months; and as to its ability to sustain itself, its career in arms, against vastly superior forces, may challenge the judgment of the world. The present population of the Confederate States comprises about twelve millions of people.

I think I may confidently assume as the public judgment of Europe, that the separation of these States from the late United States is final and for ever, and that in no possible contingency—even could the war be continued to their extermination—can they ever be restored to the repudiated Union.

Under such circumstances, how far it may be deemed incumbent by other Governments publicly to acknowledge the existing fact of such final separation, and thus to recognize the new power, is for those Governments to determine. Fortunately for us, our people have shown themselves not only self-reliant, but worthy of that reliance. We have fought our battles unaided and alone, and, until recently, uncheered by the nations looking on. For the future we have no fears, nor would the recognition to which you refer be of any value to us, except so far as it might tend to bring the war to a close—a war to be waged henceforward hopelessly by our enemy, and at which humanity shudders.

In reply to your inquiry as to what effect recognition of our independence would have towards putting an end to the war, I have only to say it would at once and for ever dispel all delusion on the subject in the United States. So long as it is withheld by Europe it is taken as an admission in America that in European judgment there may yet be a restoration of the broken Union, and to that extent our adversaries may be encouraged to persevere. That I am warranted in speaking of this as a delusion I may appeal to the verdict of every intelligent Englishman.

Again, you are aware that the war was commenced and has been prosecuted for the purpose of putting down an alleged rebellion. Our recognition by the European Powers would be the decree of enlightened, impartial, and able observers that a rebellion, if one ever existed, had been brought to an end, and there stood in place of it, as acknowledged by them, a separate, sovereign, and independent State, the equal of any in the line of empire.

It is not in the experience of the world that a war so disastrous in its results to those now waging it against the Confederate States, when they were made to understand that it was no longer conducted against alleged rebels in arms, but against an acknowledged equal political Power, could long be maintained.

Such are my views on the questions you have submitted, briefly, but I hope intelligently, given.—I have the honour to be very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. M. MASON.

To William Boon, Esq.,
54, Devonshire-street, Portland-place, London,

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

OUR friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any rate, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through Henry Horze, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 25s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. Advertisements to be forwarded to the publisher at 102, Fleet-street.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1862.

Mr Gladstone on America.

MR. GLADSTONE'S speech at Newcastle was certainly remarkable, and may be considered significant. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is the first of those who stand in the highest rank of English statesmen that has ventured to express himself with something like frankness and decision on the American question. While it has been utterly impossible for political speakers at agricultural meetings, public assemblies, and gatherings of their constituents to avoid altogether the one great topic of political interest, their language has almost invariably been hesitating, pointless, irresolute, and studiously divested of everything like meaning. If the idea which has been eagerly caught up by the insane vanity of the North, that the policy of England has been dictated by an abject fear of Northern power and prowess, had been founded in sober reality, the bearing of English politicians, when obliged to speak of American affairs, could not have been more timid, cautious, and deferential, than it has actually been. An experience of eighty years might have taught us that forbearance and tenderness are wasted on a turbulent and arrogant Democracy, which is profoundly impressed with its own greatness, and profoundly ignorant of the power of other countries—which has no regard for any rights but its own, and can see in the pacific tone of England only an evidence of weakness and a confession of fear. But the habit of treating the Government and people of a foreign State with a deference which has never been shown to any European Power, and which never is shown by equals to equals, is so ingrained in the nature of English statesmen that even now, when the folly and mischief of such a tone becomes every day more manifest as Northern insolence becomes more outrageous, they still speak of American crimes and errors as men speak of the extravagances of an angry woman or a passionate child—with what may be called the gentleness of contempt. They forbear to vindicate the rights of neutral, so grossly outraged by Federal cruisers under the distinct orders of the Federal Government. They forbear to give expression to the condemnation almost unanimously passed by the public conscience of Europe upon the war of wanton aggression which the North continues to wage, without hope of a final triumph, but with unremitting obstinacy and with ever increasing barbarism. And by persevering in this abstinence from a freedom of speech which is not only an individual right but a national duty, they neglect the moral strength which England enjoys, and which she is bound to exercise; they waive the opportunity afforded them of doing their utmost to check the progress of a war which is disastrous to America, ruinous to the commerce of England, and scandalous to humanity at large. Even Mr. Gladstone, whose authority on such a question would probably be greater than that of any other individual statesman, speaks with a reserve which is neither congenial to his character nor suitable to the subject. But he has spoken his mind on the present aspect and ultimate result of the struggle, and his language deserves our especial attention.

It will not do to judge Mr. Gladstone by the ordinary rules of public life and political etiquette.

He has always shaped his own course with very little regard to the conventionalities of party allegiance or Ministerial propriety; he does and says that which he personally thinks it right to do and say, without scrupulously weighing the effect which his words or actions may have on the party to which he belongs, or the inferences which may be drawn from them in regard to the policy of his colleagues in the Cabinet. The orthodox theory of political combination assumes the existence and requires the appearance of Ministerial unanimity; and orthodox statesmen hold therefore that, at least on affairs of moment in which the Cabinet may be called upon to take action, no Minister has a right to express an opinion by which he and his colleagues are not willing to be bound. But Mr. Gladstone has allowed himself at all times great license in this respect; and we must not, therefore, draw from the logical meaning of his speeches any peremptory conclusions as to the probable action of the Cabinet. It is said that the extreme difficulty of reconciling the conflicting views of the various eminent men from every section of the Liberal party who compose the present Cabinet has led to tacit compromises, which result in leaving the leaders of the Cabinet free to do much as they please in their own departments; that Sir G. C. Lewis is not interfered with in military affairs; that Mr. Gladstone constructs his Budgets much as he pleases, subject only to the obligation of furnishing such funds as the chiefs of departments consider absolutely necessary; that Lord Granville and Mr. Lowe are allowed to mismanage the Educational Office to any extent, so long as they do not provoke a Parliamentary defeat; and that Lord Russell has a paramount voice in determining not merely the details, but the general course of the foreign policy of England. This is possible; but whether or not it be true, certain it is that experience warrants us against forming any hasty opinion as to what the Government is likely to do from what is said by any one of its members on matters not directly within the cognizance of his own department. We feel pretty sure that Mr. Gladstone, and probably a majority of his ablest colleagues, are very far from sharing the prejudice in favour of the North and bitter enmity to the South which has animated the diplomatic course of Lord Russell, and induced him to permit the Federal navy to perpetrate a series of outrages on our flag which we should not have sanctioned. But even if this be true, and even if they may differ with their colleague at the Foreign Office, it is quite possible that his influence may continue to guide the foreign policy of the country in a direction more or less disapproved by the ablest members of both the great parties. And, therefore, Mr. Gladstone's language is significant rather as indicating what the great majority of capable and impartial public men in England think, than as affording a clue as to what the English Ministry intends to do.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer hopes that, when the passions excited by the war have subsided, England will receive credit for the honesty and firmness with which she has acted up to her original pledge of neutrality. Here, in common with almost all English speakers, he unfortunately thinks it necessary to impute to both belligerents feelings and conduct which, as everybody knows, belong only to the North. The Federal Government and the section by which it is supported have shown hostility and ingratitude to England. They have denounced her neutrality as a sham; they have accused her of treachery, of secret machination against them, of hostile intentions of every sort; they have incessantly menaced, insulted, and wronged her. The Confederates have done nothing of the sort. No passions of any kind have affected their bearing towards this country. They have recognized her impartiality, have respected her neutral position, and have uttered no complaint of the unequal operation of measures equally applied to either party. And yet, by Mr. Gladstone's own admission, they have had some cause to complain. Wherever a neutral obligation admitted of two interpretations, or being fulfilled in either of two ways, the alternative most convenient to the North and most unfavourable to the South has always been chosen. By excluding from our ports the prizes of both parties, instead of admitting both, we conferred an enormous advantage on the Power which possessed a large mercantile navy to be preyed on by the enemy's cruisers; which could expect to make no prizes, and which, if it did make any, had its own ports open to receive them. It imposed a terrible and almost fatal difficulty on the nascent marine of the blockaded South; which had neither ports of refuge nor places to which its captures might be conveyed for condemnation or for sale. Yet the Confederate Government made no complaint; the North murmured, blustered, threatened, and at last compelled the English Ministry to grant it a still further advantage by placing severe restrictions on the stay of war-ships of either Power in English ports. Again, we have practically allowed the free export of arms and ammunition to either party; by which we have enabled the North to obtain enormous supplies, while its blockading squadrons off Southern and off British colonial ports were relied on to intercept, and have to a great extent intercepted, those destined for the South. Here, again, the party that we favoured reviled us for our impartiality; the Confederates, who suffered, made no complaint. Mr. Gladstone approves in terms this policy of a neutrality operating altogether in favour of the aggressor; but his argument points clearly and irresistibly to its condemnation, when once we bear in mind that the coupling of both belligerents as unjust and passionate in complaint of England is but a diplomatic form of speech—that, in fact, no complaint has been made but by the North, and that the complaints from that quarter have been couched in the language of insult and of menace.

But the most important sentence of Mr. Gladstone's whole speech is that in which he sums up in a few telling words the achievements of the Confederates:—"Jefferson Davis and the other leaders of the South have made an army; they are making, it appears, a navy; and they have made what is more than either—they have made a nation." It is not quite just to attribute to the statesmen at the head of the Confederate Government, or the soldiers at the head of its forces—great as their talents are, and admirable as has been their policy—that which was, in fact, achieved principally by the spontaneous action of a spirited and intelligent people. But it is quite true that this is what has been done; a magnificent army has been raised from amidst a very limited population, and has performed deeds which in all history have seldom or never been surpassed; a navy has been created by a country which formerly had not a single ship, and that navy has been the terror of the enemy's flotillas on inland waters, and of his commerce on the ocean; above all, there has been created a nation, as strong in national spirit, as resolute in the defence of its national existence, as capable of maintaining the honour of its flag and the security of its dominions, as any nation in the world. Such is the admission of a Minister of Great Britain; what answer will he give if the question should be once more asked in Parliament why that nation is still unrecognized by the British Government?

There is one passage in the speech which seems to demand from us a few words of explanation. Mr. Gladstone does not regret the withdrawal of the Confederates from Maryland, because he thinks that their longer continuance there might have involved them in engagements with political parties in that State, which would have proved an obstacle to the conclusion of peace. The truth is, that the moral obligations of the Confederate States towards Maryland are already so strong that, while they have any chance of being able to assist her, they could hardly consent to leave her to her fate. But these obligations are only an obstacle to peace so long as the Federal Government persists in its preposterous claim to retain by force a State which desires to secede from the Union. That claim withdrawn, if Maryland choose to cast in her lot with the Confederacy, she is free to do so; if she prefer to remain attached to the North, no political engagements or military advantages could give the Confederates any title to her allegiance. All that is demanded on the part of the latter is, that the Border States should be left free to determine their own destiny; and this is a demand to which Mr. Gladstone, the denouncer of a tyranny in Naples scarcely worse than that of Lincoln in Maryland—the warm advocate of the new Italian kingdom, founded on the right of States to choose the rulers and the nationality they prefer—can scarcely intend to discountenance. On no other basis can a lasting peace be made; for only a peace that is just can possibly be durable.

The "Westminster" on the Slave States.

It is a melancholy thing to witness the deterioration of a great intellect—the dishonour of a well-earned reputation. However strong may be our dissent from the views of a distinguished thinker, however bitter the antagonism between ourselves and him, we cannot but witness with deep regret his lapse from the position which his wisdom and ability had won, or his commission of faults and follies utterly unworthy of his character and his capacity. It is therefore with great pain that we have seen the article on the "Slave Power" in the last number of the Westminster Review, attributed, without contradiction, to Mr. John Stuart Mill. No English writer has achieved a higher or more solid fame; few living men have written works so likely to transmit their names to a distant posterity. Very few, indeed, are the political authors who possess the calmness, dignity, and good sense which generally command for everything that proceeds from Mr. Mills' pen the attention and respect of those who most widely differ from the opinions therein set forth. He is the only man who ever advocated what are called the rights of women in such a style as to provoke any other feeling than that of contemptuous disgust. From him, if from any man, we might have expected a rational and truthful statement of that side of the American question which he has chosen to espouse. In general, the partisans of the North in the English press have displayed an ignorance of facts and a violence of temper which might have done honour to the most rabid organ of Abolitionism in New York or New England. They have neither been able to argue coherently nor to write in the language of educated gentlemen; and the untruthfulness of their assertions has only been equalled by the extravagance of their abuse. The exceptions are very rare; but we certainly should have hoped that Mr. Mill would be among them, if his judgment and knowledge did not prevent him from taking the side to which his previous bias was likely to incline him. But not only has he taken up the cause of the North in the spirit of a thorough-going partisan; he has defended it with a want of logic, of temper, and of dignity, such as no one who had read his philosophical writings could ever have anticipated. His passionate hatred of slavery has not only prevented his attempting to inquire into the facts of the case, or the merits of the combatants—it has not only induced him to accept with blind credulity the wildest fictions of the most unscrupulous Abolitionists—it has not only caused him to overlook the utter irreconcilability of those fictions with statistical records of which he could not be ignorant, and of whose truth he could entertain no doubt—but it has deprived him of the power to discern the meaning of the facts on which he himself relies, and the mutual contradictions involved in the arguments he employs. We propose in this article briefly to set forth a few of the most remarkable fallacies, mis-statements of fact, and misapprehension of consequences which are contained in marvellous abundance in his latest production, borrowed mostly from one of the silliest and most untruthful books yet written on slavery—the work of Professor Cairnes, of Belfast—but deriving all the importance they can claim from an endorsement understood to be that of Mr. John Stuart Mill.

1. It is affirmed that slave labour is peculiarly inefficient and wanting in versatility; that it can only be employed in the very simplest processes; and that it can with extreme difficulty be diverted from one purpose to another. To this is attributed the alleged backwardness of Southern agriculture; the alleged confinement of production to three great staples—cotton, sugar, and tobacco—the exhaustion of Southern soils, and the supposed decline of Southern society. And emancipation is stated to be the sure and only remedy. Now, in the first place, it is not true that slave labour is so worthless as Mr. Mill imagines. Slaves can be taught to manage a steam-engine; they are habitually entrusted with the care of all the machinery used upon Southern plantations; and the cultivation of the crops on which slave labour is chiefly expended is more difficult, and requires more care and dexterity, than that of most products of free labour. Secondly, the backwardness of Southern agriculture—that is to say, the absence of high farming, of manure, and all those appliances which are in use in old countries, is attributable to the same cause which is equally in operation in New York and in the West—abundance of land. It does not pay to expend costly labour in renovating cheap land. Thirdly, it is not true that only cotton, sugar, and tobacco are largely grown in the South. She feeds her own population; she exports more grain than she imports; and the confinement of slave labour to the production of the great staples is mainly, if not solely, owing to the fact that these are by far the most profitable modes of employment; and that it is too expensive to be applied to any but the most profitable uses. And if it be true that the Southern soil is exhausted more rapidly than that of the North and West—which is sufficiently disproved by the fact that production is rapidly increasing even in the older cotton States—this would prove, not that slave labour was inefficient, but that cotton and sugar, and tobacco are exhausting crops. Finally, before any charge can be established against the system of slavery on the ground of the inefficiency of the labour obtained under it in the South, it must be shown that the negro is a bad workman because he is a slave, not the slave because he is a negro. Now, the very reverse is notoriously the case. Free or slave, the negro is an inferior labourer to the white man; but the negro slave works both more intelligently and more efficiently than his free brother. The Slave States prosper, while the West Indies sink lower and lower in poverty, misery, and demoralization. Slave labour is defective because it is negro labour; and emancipation would not improve it, unless it could turn the slave into a white man.

2. The Slave States are accused of desiring to "propagate slavery"—to push it into Northern territories, and even into Northern States; where, as the reviewer remarked a few pages before, slavery was abolished because it was found not to pay! It is strange that so absurd and glaring a contradiction should have escaped the attention of so practised a logician. The assertion is altogether untrue. Of course every country contains some foolish men, who, when their blood is heated by insult and excitement, say very absurd things; and there was, we believe, one Southern patriot who talked of calling the muster roll of his slaves on Bunker's Hill. But, as every rational man knows and every honest man admits, the South never coveted Northern territory except for political purposes—to protect herself against Northern ascendancy in the Senate. That protection she no longer needs, and therefore she no longer desires to extend her dominion into the North-west. Such inaccuracies in fact and fallacies in reasoning as are involved in these statements concerning the insufficiency of slave labour, and the desire of slave-owners to carry it from a country where it is immensely profitable to one where it never did and never would pay, are simply astonishing.

3. It is asserted that the South dominated the Union, and seceded the instant that domination was wrested from her. This is not true; and the reviewer had the means of knowing that it is not true. Mr. Williams has conclusively shown by the records of the electoral votes that every President for the last thirty years, except Mr. Buchanan, was elected by a Northern majority—had a majority of the Northern vote. Mr. Buchanan had one-third of the Northern vote. Mr. Lincoln had not one Southern vote. And the North had all along a majority in the House of Representatives, and of late years a majority in the Senate. The South, therefore, never dominated the Union; and she seceded only when an attempt was made to govern her by a President elected by the North alone, and a Congress in which the North was paramount. She seceded, in fact, only when the choice lay between secession and subjection. We are told that she had no aggression to fear. Has the writer forgotten John Brown; and how that midnight murderer of Virginian citizens was honoured as a martyr in New England?

4. The South is accused of aggression in desiring to retain for herself a portion of the Territories. We should like to know on what pretence her citizens with their property could be excluded thence? The State of Virginia alone ceded to the Union the whole territory north-west of the Ohio, out of which have been made the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin; and now we are told that it was an aggression in a Virginian citizen to desire leave to settle, with the property which he held under the laws of his State, in New Mexico or Arizona! The charge of aggression is fortified by an attack on the Supreme Court for its decision in the Dred Scott case, declaring the Missouri Compromise unconstitutional. As the Supreme Court has always enjoyed the highest reputation for legal knowledge and probity, it is somewhat presumptuous in an English writer, not merely to arraign its decision, but boldly to assume that it was not only wrong but corrupt. We shall not commit a similar presumption in defending it. We will merely ask whether Congress would have had a right to prohibit any man from entering the Territories without slaves, and thereby to give the monopoly of the new lands to the South? For if not, it had clearly no right to give that monopoly to the North by excluding slavery. Further, we should like to know Mr. Mills' authority for the assertion that this decision recognized "the right of a slave-master to carry his slaves with him to any part of the Free States and hold them there, any local law to the contrary notwithstanding."

5. We are not very much surprised to find here repeated the old fiction about the "white trash" of the South. But we should have thought that the repeaters of this nonsense would by this time have learned to avoid the fatal precision of figures. To talk of the slaveholders as composing one-thirtieth of the population, and of the rest of the people as a proletariat, is rash indeed. The total population of the South—the fifteen Slave States—is about twelve millions. Of these four millions are slaves; of the remainder, composing probably 1,600,000 families, nearly one-half are owners of "farms," and nearly one-fourth are slaveholders. The authors of the monstrous error repeated by the Westminster Review overlooked the fact that slaveholders and non-slaveholders alike have families; and treated the number of actual owners of slave property—i.e., heads of families—as if it represented the whole of the slaveholding class. We can excuse such a blunder in a Mr. Cairnes or a Mrs. Stowe, but we did not expect to find it reiterated by any writer accustomed to consider the meaning of figures.

6. The last and most extraordinary of the many mis-statements contained in this article which we shall notice, is the assertion that slavery depends on a slave-trade, foreign or internal; that the "frightful mortality" among the slaves in the planting States is such that the slave population is only kept up by recruits from the "breeding State" of Virginia. We have elsewhere expressed our opinion as to the probable fate of slavery in the absence of a slave-trade. But at present slavery depends entirely on the natural increase of the slave population, which throughout the South increases more than 25 per cent. in ten years. Nowhere is the mortality among the slaves greater, or the increase less, than among the white population; nowhere is the import of slaves from Virginia an important element in the increase of the supply of labour which is required by the rapid increase of capital and cultivation. The number of slaves in the United States at the period of the prohibition of the slave trade was less than half-a-million. It is now over four millions. Can this increase be accounted for by the so-called "breeding" State alone?

The reviewer will only allow of two possible or satisfactory issues to the war. He would like, above all things, to see the slaves emancipated, and the Slave States brought back into the Union by force; absolutely subjugated, shorn of all the political influence of which they could be robbed, and flooded, if possible, with an immigration of free whites. He passes over as altogether insignificant what to most rational men appears an insoluble difficulty—the collocation of four millions of negroes with eight millions of whites on a footing of civil, if not of political equality. If the North grow weary of the war before it has accomplished this object—which even he is forced to think is not improbable—then he demands that it shall at least possess itself of the whole country west of the Mississippi—of Missouri, Arkansas, Louisiana, and Texas. That the North has no right whatever to an inch of Southern territory is, of course, a matter of indifference to a writer who understands no other rights or wrongs but those which he attributes to the negro. But we wish that he, and other writers on the same side, would ask themselves how a people which is determined not to be ruled by a foreign and a hated race is to be kept in permanent subjection—what force would be required to keep down either the whole South, or even the region west of the Mississippi, including the vast half-settled State of Texas?—or what would become of the Republican institutions of the North, if it were compelled to maintain such a force for such a purpose?

Mr. Seward's Despatch.

ANY ONE who has read and considered the despatch addressed by Mr. Seward to the diplomatic and consular agents of his Government, in reference to the emancipation proclamation, will not accuse us of harshness, much less of injustice, in designating it as one of the most mendacious documents ever issued by a public officer. We may go further. We challenge any man, however prolific and heated may be his imagination, to compose a despatch that so thoroughly misrepresents the true condition of the United States. The Lincolnite Cabinet and the Federal commanders have already eclipsed all other nations, ancient or modern, in the practice of undisguised mendacity; but, not forgetting Pope's 10,000 "men in buckram," or McClellan's congratulations to his army after its "grand strategic movement," and his Maryland despatches edited by Halleck, or Halleck's account of the evacuation of Corinth, or Mr. Lincoln's assurance to the Army of the Potomac, that it never had been and never would be beaten, or the former achievements of Mr. Seward in the line of diplomatic pantomime, we must admit that the despatch of September 24 is unsurpassed, even if it is equalled. We do not charge the Federal Secretary of State with the intention of deceiving; for the despatch very plainly refutes itself, and besides, it is incredible that he can expect Europe, at his bidding, to believe that black is white, and white is black. There is a great deal of Bourbonism in Mr. Seward's character. We do not refer particularly to his tyrannical abuse of constitutional authority and usurped power, but to his display of that species of determination which is commonly called pig-headedness. Mr. Seward forgets nothing and learns nothing. The experience of the last eighteen months has not altered his opinions. At the commencement of the war he maintained that the North could not fail to crush out the rebellion in so many days; that the resources of the Federal Government were inexhaustible; that the "rebels" were exhausted and ruined; and he says the same things now, and will do so to the end. We do not suppose the diplomatic or consular agents of the United States will act upon Mr. Seward's instructions, feeling it is neither pleasant nor useful to insult the Foreign Ministers of the Courts to which they are accredited, by treating them as arrant fools. Mr. Adams, for example, may be a very bold man, yet we cannot conceive him being sufficiently impudent to formally notify to Earl Russell that the United States is, in all respects, most flourishing, and the Confederate States thoroughly beaten. Still Mr. Seward's despatch will not be entirely labour lost, since its publication cannot fail to direct attention to the actual condition of the United States, and the subject is worth consideration; but for this we should not have thought it worth while to examine and discuss it.

The first part of Mr. Seward's diplomatic circular is as follows:—

You will receive by the mail which will carry you this despatch evidence which will convince you that the aggressive movement of the rebels against the States remaining faithful to the Union is arrested, and that the forces of the Union, strengthened and reanimated, are again ready to undertake a campaign on a vast scale. If you consult the newspapers you will easily perceive that the financial resources of the insurrection decline rapidly, and that the means of raising troops have been exhausted.

By this time Europe understands something of the objects, and can fully appreciate the results, of the Maryland campaign, which is described in the above extract as an unsuccessful aggressive movement "against the States remaining faithful to the Union;" by which expression Mr. Seward formally acknowledges that there are States which repudiate the Union, and that the war is being waged not against Secessionists in the South, but against Sovereign States: and this admission is of some diplomatic importance. Now, what evidence is there that the Maryland expedition failed? If the Confederate commander intended to co-operate with the Southerners in Maryland, he surely would not have confined his advance to that part of the State exceptionally under Northern influence. If it had been intended to make Maryland the basis of operations against Pennsylvania, General Lee would not have sent a small portion, but the main body of his army across the Potomac. If, then, the incursion of the Confederate forces into Maryland was not to free that State forthwith from Northern rule, or to operate against Pennsylvania, what were the objects of the movement? No sooner were the Confederate troops in Maryland than immense quantities of much-needed supplies were purchased from the people, who evinced not simply a mercantile but a most enthusiastic desire to sell, and so benefit the Southern cause. The shoeless soldiers found covering for their feet, and the provisions were procured of which Virginia had been denuded by being the chief battle ground of the war. From day to day these supplies were sent into Virginia—a fact which in itself proves that in entering Maryland, there was no thought of making that first occupation permanent. But how are we to explain the address to the Marylanders, and the nomination of a provisional Governor? So far from these measures aiding the Confederates in obtaining supplies, they were calculated to lessen the opportunity by bringing the Federals into the field. The purchase of supplies was not the sole or the great aim of the Confederates; and, moreover, it was accomplished with a rapidity that would be miraculous, if we did not allow for the energy of the Southern commanders, and the preparation of the Marylanders for the emergency. The main object was to capture Harper's Ferry, with its valuable stores, and to accomplish this with as little loss as possible. So long as McClellan remained in the immediate neighbourhood of Washington, he could assist the garrison of Harper's Ferry, and so make the capture of a place so strongly defended difficult and costly. McClellan, roused by the rumoured advance into Pennsylvania, made a movement that cut off his communications with Harper's Ferry. The day he left Washington, General Jackson left Frederick City, and whilst a small part of the Confederate army was holding the Federals in check, invested and compelled the surrender of Harper's Ferry—a loss which the North feels bitterly. Having succeeded in these enterprises, the Confederate troops were withdrawn from Maryland, but not until they had fought the great battle of September 17, when not more than 60,000 Confederates had to contend against a vastly superior Federal army, formed out of the remnants of the five armies that had been in Virginia, together with some new levies. There is no pretence for the North claiming any advantage in that fight; it was a drawn battle, so far as both armies kept their respective positions; and it was a Confederate victory strategically, and considering the Federal loss. So much for the boastful assertion with which Mr. Seward begins his despatch.

It is a pity the Federal Secretary of State does not mention the papers which the diplomatic and consular agents of the United States are to look to as authorities for the decline of the resources of the Confederates. He cannot refer to Southern journals; and possibly his circular was accompanied by a copy of the New York Herald, which persistently predicts the subjugation of the South, the immediate triumph of the North, and the imminent annihilation of England and France. We shall not enter into the question of Confederate resources. It is enough to observe that they have driven back the armies of the North; that they are well equipped and furnished with all the matériel of war from the spoils taken from their enemy; that the Federals are anxious for the safety of their capital; in short, that the Confederates have gone through a campaign in which their success has been so continuous as to surprise and confound the calculations of lookers-on. With regard to finances, we must remember that as an agricultural country the South is more self-dependent than the North, and suffers less financially. The war, too, has been less expensive to the South; for, being cut off from communication with Europe, she has not been able to follow the example of her enemy and purchase stores and armaments, and has therefore been compelled to take much of what she needed from the Federal armies. The charges of an invaded country are always small compared to the charges of an invading army. The debt of the Confederate States is inconsiderable compared to that of the United States, and its liquidation is, from the riches of the country and the provision made for that purpose, not problematical. By a curious coincidence, the arrival of Mr. Seward's despatch, in which the exhaustion of the Confederates is set forth, and we are told that "the forces of the Union, strengthened and reunited, are again ready to undertake a campaign on a vast scale," was contemporaneous with the telegraphic announcement that the Union forces would go into winter quarters, provided, of course, the Southerners did not interfere with the arrangement.

The charming inconsistency and unblushing falsehood of this despatch reaches its climax in the following sentence:—

On the other side, you will see that the financial situation of the country is good, and that the call for fresh troops, without which the material force of the nation would be seriously crippled, is being promptly responded to.

The good financial position of the country is gold at 22 per cent. premium, paper in place of a specie currency, a huge national debt contracted in less than two years, and, at present, no taxes levied to pay the interest on it and to meet the current expenses of the war; and the anything but distant prospect of national bankruptcy. The alacrity for enlistment does not very well accord with the enormous bounties, the order for drafting and the suspension of the Writ of Habeas Corpus in the case of all persons arrested for hindering the recruiting. Besides, if the Union forces are ready to undertake a campaign on a vast scale, what need is there of the assurance that the call for fresh troops "is being promptly responded to?"

The last part of Mr. Seward's despatch is a confession of military failure:—

I have already informed our representatives abroad of the approach of a change in the social organization of the rebel States. This change continues to make itself each day more and more apparent. In the opinion of the President the moment has come to place the great fact more clearly before the people of the rebel States, and to make them understand that if these States persist in imposing upon the country the choice between the dissolution of this Government, at once necessary and beneficial, and the abolition of slavery, it is the Union, and not slavery, that must be maintained and saved. With this object the President is about to publish a proclamation, in which he announces that slavery will no longer be recognized in any of the States which shall be in rebellion on the 1st of January next. While all the good and wise men of all countries will recognize this measure as a just and proper military act, intended to deliver the country from a terrible civil war, they will recognize at the same time the moderation and magnanimity with which the Government proceeds in a matter so solemn and important.

Here we have a distinct disavowal of any other than a military motive for Mr. Lincoln's proclamation. It is described as "a just and proper military act." In what way can this be so? How can emancipation assist the armies of the United States? Mr. Lincoln promises the slaves that on and after January 1 no effort they make to gain their "actual freedom" shall be repressed; on the contrary, the armies and fleets of the United States are to afford assistance. There is, then, no obscurity about the "just and proper military act." It is intended, if possible, to stir up a servile war. The Washington Government is so "moderate and magnanimous" as to give the slaves three months' notice, that the Federals are on January 1, 1863, to assist the slaves who may choose to undertake "the solemn and important matter" of massacring the white women and children. This is the act that is to command the assent of "the good and wise men of all countries." It is not easy to divine Mr. Seward's motive in making such an admission to foreign Courts through his diplomatic agents. He must know, if he is sane, that the good and wise men of all countries will look with the utmost abhorrence upon the attempt to incite a servile war in the South, and he must also be aware that he could not have admitted more strongly and unreservedly the failure of the North and the triumph of the South, than by confessing the emancipation edict to be "a military act." He says, in effect, to foreign Governments,—"We have essayed to subjugate the South, and we have failed. We are now going to try the experiment of a servile war, and see if by the aid of the slaves we can exterminate the people we cannot conquer." Mr. Lincoln's proclamation and Mr. Seward's despatch are worthy to be associated with the savage decrees of Benjamin F. Butler. The tyrant of New Orleans threatens to place the women of that city at the mercy of the negroes, whom he is endeavouring to excite against the white population. Messrs. Lincoln and Seward threaten the whole of the South with the same calamity. Unhappily for the people of New Orleans, there is some chance of the atrocious design of Butler being carried out. The clergy of New England may possibly be able to gloat over the massacre of the women and children of New Orleans.

Mr. Lincoln's colonization scheme should be mentioned here, because it is the natural development and sequence of the servile war policy. The Northerners do not look with favour upon the desolation of the South; Mr. Lincoln hastens to assure them that if he can, by the aid of the slaves, exterminate the white population of the South, and by means of a servile war thin the coloured population, he is prepared for the emergency. As well as this, the Southern colonization scheme appeals to the cupidity of the Northerners. This scheme we have long foreseen. In THE INDEX of the 29th May an article appeared entitled, "What Does Union Mean?" in which occurred the following passages, which we reproduce on account of their appropriateness to the present juncture:—

This is what is meant by the word "Union," which is the war-cry of the invaders of the South. To the farmer and "farm-hand" of the North, the hungry emigrant from Germany and Ireland, the military adventurers from every clime who officer these armies, it means what the empire of the Incas and the Caziques meant to the followers of Cortez and Pizarro—what Gaul meant to the Helvetians, when, as a nation, they left their rugged mountains to seek more genial homes. The word "Union" means not only the conquest, but the colonization of the South. Wholesale confiscations, wholesale banishments—the despair of the lawful owners—would make lands cheap. The bounty land-warrants to the value of £20 each, to which each of the 750,000 Northern soldiers is entitled, by law at the expiration of the war, would be "located"

—to borrow the American phrase—not in the Western wilderness, but in the rich bottoms of the Mississippi and Alabama, the blooming savannahs of Georgia, or the virgin prairies of Texas. Nor would these new settlers till that soil which it is death to the white man to till. The poor negroes, might, indeed, be "emancipated" in name; but on the pretext of a necessary tutelage or apprenticeship to freedom, their labour for life, or for a long term of years, would be let out by law to the highest bidder, and thus the helpless wretches would be transferred from the indulgent care of their natural protectors, in whose households they were born, between whom and them exists an innate mutual attachment and a life-long acquaintance of each other's virtues and failings, to the harsh rule of mercenary strangers who hate them from instinct, and whose sole interest in them would be estimated in dollars and cents. The name of slavery might thus, indeed, disappear; but those horrible enormities associated with the name which now exist only in the imagination of slanderous novelists, would then have their beginning without any possible end. And these outrages would be committed in the name and with the forms of law. The talent and intelligence of the country once exiled, the mass of its native citizens excluded from the polls by an oath of allegiance which they would deem it a sacrilege to take, the callous, calculating mind of Mr. Seward already foresees, in the future, Northern Legislatures seated in the halls of the State capitals of Alabama, Mississippi, and South Carolina, obsequiously carrying out his edicts in the name of these once sovereign States.

This is what "Union" means to the Northerner; and this also, is what it means to the Southerner. He knows that it means to him, not only such utter political annihilation as few conquests have ever brought with them, but a personal serfdom more galling than ever a proud nation endured. He fights, not only for national independence, but for his personal political rights, nay, for his civil rights as a citizen; for his homestead, that it may not pass into the hands of the stranger; for his wife and his children, that the former should not bear slaves, and that the latter may grow up freemen.

Confederate Finances.

PEOPLE who live in glass houses should never throw stones. After the Federal Government has plunged itself into an indebtedness of nearly two thousand millions of dollars to carry on a wicked and cruel war against the Confederate States of America, without one dollar of taxes collected for the payment of the interest, and when on the eve of bankruptcy, its Secretary of State, Mr. Seward, under date of the 22nd ultimo, in a circular letter to his agents in Europe, makes the following gratuitous remarks:—"If you consult the newspapers, you will easily perceive that the financial resources of the Union are declining rapidly, and that the means of raising troops have been exhausted." Fortunately for the South, the people on this side of the Atlantic pay very little respect to the evidence of Northern newspapers, and, if possible, still less to the assertions of Northern politicians.

A short time since, we gave a sketch of the several acts of the Confederate Congress, in reference to their monetary concerns, and proved that they had been managed with the utmost degree of financial economy. By recent arrivals, we learn that a bill has been introduced into the House of Representatives, of which the following is the first section:—

That on January 1, 1863, there shall be levied and assessed on each person resident in the Confederate States, for the support of the Government and the defence of the country, the following tax, to wit:—"One-fifth the value of all the wheat, corn, rice, rye, oats, potatoes, hemp, flax, peas, beans, barley, hay, wool, resin, tar, pitch, turpentine, cotton, sugar, molasses, and tobacco produced by him in those States during the previous calendar year; also one-fifth of the value of the increase for the preceding calendar year of the horses, asses, cattle, sheep, and swine; and also one-fifth of the profits made in the preceding calendar year by the feeding of swine, sheep, cattle, or mules; also one-fifth of each person's yearly income for the preceding calendar year, from all sources whatsoever, except from the sources hereinbefore described, and except from the interest on Confederate bonds, certificates, or Treasury notes; provided that the said tax so levied and assessed shall be due and payable on April 1, 1863; provided further, that foreigners resident within the Confederate States shall not be required to pay, except from the aforesaid articles produced by or for them, or from incomes or profits derived from business conducted by them within those States; nor shall any tax be levied upon the products of residents, where the total value of such products, during the said year is less than $500; nor shall any tax be levied upon the income of residents, where the total value of such income is less than $500.

This is a wise proposition, and if the war terminates within six months, will put the Government out of debt in five years.

The expenditures up to the 1st of August were as follows:—

War Department	$298,376,549.41
Navy Department	14,605,777.86
Civil and miscellaneous	15,766,503.43
	$328,748,830.70

To which must be added outstanding requisitions upon the Treasury, for which warrants are not yet issued, to the amount of $18,524,128.15, making the aggregate $347,272,958.85. Five millions of dollars, however, have been charged to expenditure, which were paid for the redemption of deposit certificates, and should be deducted from the amount.

The receipts for the same period have been as follows:—

From Customs prior to the repeal of the tariff	$1,437,399.96
Miscellaneous sources	1,974,769.33
Loan Act of Feb. 28, 1861	15,000,000.00
Loan Act of Aug. 19, 1861	24,613,346.61
Treasury Notes Act, March 9, 1861	2,021,100.00
Treasury Notes Act, May 16, 1861	17,347,955.00
Treasury Notes Act, August 19, 1861	167,764,615.00
Call deposits	37,515,200.00
Treasury Notes 7-30 interest Act, April 17, 1862	22,799,900.00
Small notes	846,000.00
War tax	10,168,967.90
Balance of loan from banks	10,539,910.70
	$312,029,164.50

It will be observed that the greater portion of this amount has been received from Treasury notes, which, although, not a legal tender, are made use of as currency for all transactions, and when their amount becomes too large for that purpose, they are converted into interest-bearing stock; and hence there has been very little inflation in prices, except on foreign commodities, the quotations for which are regulated by the inevitable laws of supply and demand. The people of the Northern States are bragging that they will soon have a "national debt" equal to that of this country, but we cannot see the policy of a Confederacy of States incurring a permanent liability, and we are sure that the Southerners will discharge theirs, which is due to themselves, as speedily as possible. A single State may assume to tax future generations for its present expenses, but it would be most unjust, in a combination of sovereignties to adopt that course. Under the operations of the laws of entail and primogeniture, the consolidated debt of Great Britain has answered very well; the gradual cheapening of money induced a reduction of the interest thereon, by which the creditors of the Government involuntarily surrendered in 1822, 1830, and 1842, equivalent to a principal of £100,000,000 sterling, a gentle sort of repudiation submitted to by them. In America, however, where each generation, with a few exceptions, has entire control of its property, and not restricted to the income as here, it is right that it should pay its own expenses in full.

Southern Retaliation.

THE Northern organs are endeavouring to make a little political capital out of what they are pleased to call the savage revenge threatened by the South for Mr. Lincoln's emancipation edict; and these tirades are principally based upon a telegraphic summary of the proceedings of the Confederate Congress. We submit those proceedings, so far from justifying such comments, are characterized by becoming, unsurpassed, and praiseworthy dignity. No one can be surprised that the proposal to promote a servile war, of which the inevitable horrors appal the imagination and defy description, should be met by the Southern press and people with passionate indignation when even foreigners view it with loathing and reprobation. The attempt of the North to make Southern homesteads the scenes of massacres and of atrocities more hideous than death in its cruellest form—scenes that would rival the terrors of Cawnpore—the invitation to the slaves to work out their "actual freedom" under the protection of the Federal forces, which means the slaves are to be protected, and encouraged to torture and assassinate defenceless women and children—are designs too atrocious to be treated with contemptuous indifference. Grant the edict of Mr. Lincoln is as impotent as it is execrable, yet the mere menace is a crime which loudly calls for punishment. We say, advisedly, it would have shamed the Southern manhood if the news of Mr. Lincoln's proclamation had not elicited a general expression of indignation; for it does not so much threaten the men as the women and children of the South. The Confederate Congress would not have represented the feeling of the country if it had not immediately and unhesitatingly taken cognizance of the affair. Let us notice the terms of the proposed resolutions.

The emancipation proclamation is denounced as a gross violation of the usages of war. To this part of the resolution no objection can be offered, for Europe has condemned it in equally strong terms. Next it is suggested, "it should be held up to the execration of mankind," and no fault can be found with this clause, seeing that wherever Mr. Lincoln's proclamation has been published, always excepting the United States, it has been utterly condemned. Retaliation is proposed. Some members favoured hoisting the black flag; and since every citizen in the Confederate States is threatened with ruin and murder by the proclamation, the resolutions recommend that every citizen should be declared a soldier, and thereby authorized to kill any man found in arms against the Government. This seems tons no more than a just measure of self-defence. The North, unable to cope with the armies of the South, declares war against the women, the children, and the civil citizens; and those who are threatened with destruction may surely claim the right to defend themselves. Yet even in the heat of debate the object and limit of retaliation was distinctly defined. Only such reprisals were to be made as would, in the judgment of President Davis, be calculated to secure the withdrawal or to arrest the execution of the proclamation.

Even these constitutional resolutions, which leave the terms of retaliation to the calm judgment of the President, were referred to the Judiciary Committee. Could the British House of Commons have displayed more judicial gravity and propriety? Would not a revolutionary convention have passed such a resolution by acclamation? Under such circumstances, under such provocation, no legislative assembly ever acted with such dignified moderation. If the people of the North were not dead to every noble sentiment, they would be stung to the quick by this proceeding of the Confederate Congress, which stands in such marked contrast to the lawless and infamous conduct of their own Government.

What retaliation the Confederates may determine on, we know not; but it is difficult to conceive any reprisals too severe for the most scandalous outrage ever perpetrated by a civilized Government. We deplore but we cannot deny the stern necessity of Southern reprisals. It is not a question of revenge, but of solemn duty and responsibility. Not to retaliate would be complicity in the guilt. Impunity is an encouragement and a premium for the perpetration of crime. Retaliation may be a poor but it is the only chance of compelling the Federal Government to change its policy, and so avert a war of extermination. The Confederate Government ought not to bear the sword in vain, but should protect the people committed to its charge from any attempt to bring upon them the dire curse of a servile war.

The Southerners confide in the general and tried fidelity of their slaves, but it is not impossible that at isolated places the Federal armies, commanded by such persons as Butler, Mitchell, Turchin, and Pope, may succeed in beguiling the slaves to insurrection, and hounding them on to murder the white population, and to their own destruction. Therefore, though there is no fear of a servile war, and of the clergy of New England and the Lincolnite Government having the opportunity to gloat over the extermination of the Southern population, yet there is cause for some alarm lest in a few districts Northern malice should be gratified; and we cannot blame the South if she declares war to the knife until the so-called emancipation edict is withdrawn.

The District of Columbia.

DR. RUSSELL tells us that while crossing the Delaware in a ferry-boat between Camden and Philadelphia, he observed over the cabin door a weapon inscribed with the words "State Rights' fire axe," and suggests that a hatchet marked "Federal Union" would not have been tolerated on a Southern river; thus making an invidious comparison in favour of the North. If the talented correspondent of our contemporary of Printing-House Square had taken the pains to inform himself, he would have learned that the vessel was built about a quarter of a century ago, when both sections of the late Union appreciated State Rights; that she was named in accordance with that sound American doctrine, and, as customary, all her appurtenances were so labelled. A few years back some enthusiastic Federalist Members of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania expressed great concern that the Union should be without a name, and urged upon Congress the propriety of christening the country "Alleghania." They received, as an answer, that "United States" was the suitable title for a league of independent sovereignties, and the matter was thus disposed of. Politically speaking, the term "nation" does not apply to either the North or the South, any more than Great Republic or Model Republic, which have been erroneous expressions, and, in a measure, productive of evil. Southerners have ever in travelling appended the names of their respective States to their signatures; while Northerners, of recent years, have got into the habit of affixing United States. The political co-partnership under the Constitution of 1787 has never been possessed of sovereignty, which means dominion over the soil, for such was reserved by the creators of that instrument—the individual States—with the slight exception therein provided for. Article I., Section 8, says:—

Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever, over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased, by the consent of the Legislature of the States in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings.

A few years since a treaty was made between an envoy of the United States and the Republic of Switzerland, which gave to their respective citizens a right to hold real estate in either country. The Senate of the United States could not comply with its tenor, in consequence of not having control over the soil of any of the integral parts of the Union, and that clause in the document had to be stricken out. In the case of the North-Eastern boundary, the dispute was left to the umpirage of the King of the Netherlands, whose decision met with the approval of President Jackson, but the State of Maine refused to accede to it, and it became a "vexed question" until disposed of by the Ashburton Treaty. On this occasion, Mr. Webster, then Secretary of State, and acting for the general Government, under the treaty making power in Article II., Section 2, of the Constitution, did not move in the negotiation without the concurrence of the commissioners duly appointed by the Legislature of Maine, who were at his elbow during the transaction. The Senate at first was not inclined to ratify the treaty, but Mr. Calhoun, in an able speech, said that it was no affair of the Washington Government, but exclusively that of the State of Maine, whose agreement they were bound to confirm.

It will thus be seen that the powers of the Government of the United States are very limited, and that the Union, if entire, might with propriety be called the "Thirty-four Nations," as the Iroquois Confederacy of Indians was designated the "Five Nations" until joined by the Tuscaroras, when they became the "Six Nations."

In the article on American Confederacies which appeared in the last number of THE INDEX, we made the following remarks in reference to the United States' seat of Government:—

While at Princetown, in 1783, the question of a permanent residence for Congress was raised, and excited a good deal of local feeling. One party was in favour of a Federal city on the Delaware; another named the Potomac; Maryland offered to cede Annapolis for that purpose; New York volunteered Kingston, on the Hudson. The Council of Pennsylvania, anxious to bring Congress back to Philadelphia, apologised for their timidity, which was the cause of its removal from that city. It was finally agreed that, so soon as a suitable site could be obtained, two Federal cities should be erected, at which the sessions of Congress should be alternately held; one near the Falls of the Delaware, the other near the Falls of the Potomac; and that until they could be built, meetings should be held at Trenton, in New Jersey, and Annapolis, in Maryland. Congress then convened at the latter place, and, after a recess of five months, the annual session was opened at Trenton, on November 1, 1784, when a resolution was carried, appointing commissioners to lay out a city near the Falls of the Delaware; and stating that it was "inexpedient" to attempt, at this time, to erect public buildings in more than one place; voting $100,000 towards the same; and that the sessions should, in the meantime, be held at New York. The want of funds, and obstinate difference of opinion in Congress, prevented anything effectual being done towards the building of the proposed Federal city. In 1788, this matter was again introduced, but was postponed until the new Congress under the Constitution should go into operation.

In accordance with this deferment, and the terms of the new league that had then been entered into by eleven of the States, the question was again revived on September 3, 1789, when a representative from Pennsylvania introduced a resolution, declaring "that a permanent residence ought to be fixed for the general Government of the United States, at some convenient place, as near the centre of wealth, population, and extent of territory, as may be consistent with convenience to the navigation of the Atlantic Ocean, and having due regard to the particular situation of the western country." Objection was made to the expression "General Government," and "Congress of the United States" suggested. The New York and New England members had concluded that the east bank of the Susquehanna was the proper locality; some, the Delaware; and others, further South. Considerable discussion ensued in reference to the different situations. An effort was made by the Northern members to hold the sessions at New York until buildings were erected elsewhere, but this was not agreed to by the delegates from the South. A representative from Georgia was desirous of waiting to see whether North Carolina and Rhode Island would not join the Confederacy, and expressed regret that the matter had inaugurated a sectional feeling of jealousy; he asked, "Are the eastern members to dictate in this manner, and fix a seat of government? Why not come forward and demand of us the power of legislation, and say, 'Give us up your privileges, and we will govern you?' If a part of the States have the power to fix the seat of government, they may as well take the Government from the other. This looks like autocracy; not the united but the partial voice of America to decide." A Mr. Sedgwick, of Massachusetts, replied; he said, "In my view, on the principle of population, it is far beyond the centre [alluding to the Potomac]; for I do not think it just, on this subject, to take the constitutional computation. Will any gentleman pretend that men, who are merely the subjects of property or wealth should be taken into the estimate; that the slaves of the country—men who have no rights to protect—should be taken into view in determining the centre of the government? If they were considerate, gentlemen might as well estimate the black cattle of New England." Very warm remarks were made by several members, and Mr. Madison declared that if a prophet had arisen in the Virginian Convention that adopted the Constitution, and told them of the grasping propensities of the North, that State would never have acceded to the Constitution. The Massachusetts orator rejoined, "Will it be contended that the majority shall not govern; and shall the minority, because they cannot carry their points, accuse the House of a want of candour? Are we to be told that an important State would not have joined the Union had it known what would have been the proceedings this day? He believed that a deliberation of six weeks would not result in the change of opinion of a single member, and he was for immediate action." Mr. Madison continued to urge a postponement of the question until another day; he did not wish to address a determined and silent majority. "If this be the temper of the House to-day, let me appeal to a more favourable temper to-morrow. If gentlemen refuse this appeal, I must submit; but I will to the last moment assert my right, and remonstrate against a precipitate decision." Mr. Burke, of South Carolina, observed that the Northern States had had a fortnight to manage this matter, but would not now allow the Southern States a day, and stated that a league had been formed between the Northern States and Pennsylvania to the prejudice of the South. A Connecticut member feared that the whole of New England would consider the Union destroyed if the Potomac was selected. The matter was postponed until the next day, when there were twenty-one votes for the Potomac and twenty-nine votes for the Susquehanna; but this ballot was merely on the amendment, the original bill did not come up; after a long discussion the House adjourned and on meeting the next day, the consideration of the subject was resumed with even greater manifestations of sectionalism than on the preceding occasion.

On September 7, the Pennsylvania resolution, which was, offered four days previously, was adopted; when the following was brought forward:—

"That the permanent seat of the Government of the United States ought to be at some convenient place on the east bank of the River Susquehanna, in the State of Pennsylvania; and that, until the necessary buildings be erected for that purpose, the seat of government ought to continue at New York.

Mr. Lee, of Virginia, moved to strike out the words, "east bank of the River Susquehanna, in the State of Pennsylvania" and insert in lieu thereof, "the north bank of the River Potomac, in the State of Maryland." This motion was lost by twenty-one yeas and twenty-nine nays. Wilmington, Delaware, was proposed, but negatived by nineteen yeas and thirty-two nays. A suggestion to examine "the various sites on the Potomac, Susquehanna, and Delaware Rivers," was unsuccessful. The "banks of either side of the River Delaware, not more than eight miles above or below the lower falls," received but four votes out of fifty. "The banks of the Susquehanna," instead of the "east bank," obtained twenty-six yeas, and twenty-five nays. A proposition offered to insert, after the word "Pennsylvania," the words "or Maryland," was lost by twenty-five yeas and twenty-six nays. A division on the question was then called for by Mr. Lee, and the vote was then taken on striking out New York as the temporary seat of government; receiving twenty-four yeas and twenty-seven nays. To omit the "city of New York," and insert "borough of Wilmington, in the State of Delaware," obtained twenty-one votes against thirty. A similar proposition was made in favour of Philadelphia, with twenty-two yeas and twenty-nine nays. The original resolution was then adopted. A resolution to appoint commissioners to carry out the act was considered, when various amendments were offered, all tending to retard a definite settlement of the question, but it was finally carried by twenty-eight yeas and twenty-one nays. A committee was then appointed to bring in a bill in conformity with the resolutions, which they did on September 21, and it was passed the next day and sent to the Senate, where it was amended so as to read, that a "district of ten miles square, bounded on the south by a line running parallel at one mile's distance from the city of Philadelphia, on the east side of the River Delaware, and extending northerly and westerly, so as to include Germantown." With this amendment the bill was returned to the House on September 26, when it was immediately considered. Mr. Jackson, of Georgia, said, "Who are those that say to us that Germantown is the most proper spot that can be selected? They are the representatives of the State Sovereignities, where the large and small States are equally represented." It was moved to postpone the business until the next session, which was lost by twenty-five yeas and twenty-nine nays. Mr. Madison's suggestion to confine the law of Pennsylvania over the proposed district until Congress should otherwise provide, was agreed to, and no further action was taken upon the subject during that session, which ended in three days. During the early part of the second session of Congress, which met in January, 1790, the senate had passed a bill to locate the seat of government on the north bank of the Potomac; this act was taken up in the House on the 6th of July, 1790, and after much discussion on sundry amendments proposed, was passed on the 9th of that month. The bill contained the following clause:—

That a district of territory, on the River Potomac, at some place between the mouths of the eastern branch and the Connochoqueague, be, and the same is hereby, accepted for the permanent seat of the Government of the United States.

The measure was carried in consequence of Messrs. Lee and White, from Virginia, having offered to vote for the bill in reference to the assumption of the debts incurred by the States to conduct the revolutionary war, which had become a sectional question, provided two members from the North would change their votes in favour of the Potomac. More than half the aggregate of these debts was contracted by the Southern states, yet they, on principle, for a long while resolutely opposed, forcing the amount on the United States, as it was not created for the establishment of an Union, but for independence. Jefferson returned from his mission to France, during the argument, and acted the part of peacemaker, at the request of Washington; the Northern members having threatened secession and a dissolution of the Union. The bill declared that the Government was to remove to the new city in December, 1800; and until that date, Congress should hold its meetings at Philadelphia.

Prior to these transactions the State of Maryland had passed an act (on December 3, 1788) ceding to Congress a district ten miles square for the seat of Government of the United States, and the State of Virginia made a similar grant on December 3, 1780. The two cessions were accepted by the law of July 16, 1790, and the amendment thereto approved, March 3, 1791. The district of ten miles was accordingly located, and its lines and boundaries properly established by a proclamation of George Washington, President of the United States, on the 30th of March, 1791; and by the act of Congress, approved February 27, 1801, Congress assumed jurisdiction over the said district, in accordance with the Constitution. The territory was named the District of Columbia, and the seat of government, WASHINGTON. In 1848 so much of the district as was ceded by Virginia—being all that part lying south of the Potomac—was ceded back to that State, leaving the Maryland part only in the present District of Columbia, which embraces about sixty square miles, in the form of a right-angled triangle, with its base upon the Potomac. Virginia required the return of her share, to protect her citizens therein residing, by her own laws, as they had virtually become "subjects" to northern rule, and were completely disfranchised. So soon as Washington ceases to be the "permanent residence of the Congress of the United States," the territory reverts to Maryland, and the property with the public buildings thereon to the former owners of the soil, who had made a deed of gift to the Government for that special purpose.

The question may now be asked, whether it was not a false step to dedicate any particular spot for the capital of a league of States, and whether it would not have been better to have preserved the archives and held the sessions of Congress in some established city? We have seen that great trouble arose in reference to the question at the very outset of the operations of the Constitution, and recent events prove to us very clearly that the possession of neutral territory alone gives strength and force to the Lincoln Administration. Let the Confederates seize the capital and destroy the vipers' nest, and the backbone of tyranny in America will be broken. Washington politics and Washington society have been degenerating for years, under the influence of Northern spoilsmen, who have gone thither to attain their own selfish ends. The hotels have been crowded with "borers" from New York and New England, and it became one of the most disreputable cities in the world, with a population that gambled away the prosperity of the Sovereign States. The conservative elements of commerce, the arts, sciences, and manufactures, were much needed to give a tone of sobriety and responsibility to the place. It certainly has been a great mistake to have made the Federal seat of government of so much importance. Why should a league of States have jurisdiction anywhere, except on the ocean—the highway of nations? The laws of the respective States protect life and property. And how unjust it has been that in a Republic the citizens of the District of Columbia were deprived of a representation in Congress, or a voice in the selection of President. A resident of Washington, no matter however great his qualifications, could not be a senator or member of the House of Representatives, or President or Vice-President, as persons holding those offices must by law be domiciled in the States. There has been something radically wrong in the arrangement from the beginning to the end. It gave more apparent importance to the "Union" than it deserved, and there is no doubt that the moral effect produced thereby has caused the people of the North to enter upon that career of madness and cruelty that brings down on them the condemnation of the civilized world. We heartily endorse the following graphic description of the course of affairs at Washington, made some time ago by the Times:—

What, may we ask, did Congress meet for at Washington? Did these senators and representatives do anything for the people who sent them to the Federal capital? Did they improve the laws of the States? Did they make railroads or canals, or perform any of the usual duties of legislation? No; they merely took their seats to listen to, to join in, acrimonious disputes on the everlasting subject of slavery. To talk about slavery, to abuse each other, defy each other, hudgeon each other about slavery, was the whole occupation of the Federal Congress. To this one question every other was made subservient. Whether a duty was imposed, or a new State admitted, the interests of the two rival sections were pitted against each other as if they had been hostile States making a treaty of peace instead of component parts of the same nation. How, then, can it be said by Mr. Seward that society on the American continent could encounter no reverse so disastrous as the division of the American Union? To us, on the contrary, it seems that the Union has been long ago divided, that the prophecy of Jefferson has been fulfilled, and that the coincidence of a geographical line with a division of interests and institutions have long since made North and South two nations. The withdrawal from the same Confederacy is only the formal recognition of this diversity. What, indeed, does it amount to? Merely that the two sections of the Union will not commit to the same authority the management of their post-office, their mint, and their national defences. In every other respect they will remain the same. As each State legislated for itself before, so it will now. As each determined for itself the question of Freedom or Slavery within its borders, so it will now. Why should Virginia go to war with New York, or South Carolina with Massachusetts, simply because they do not send delegates to quarrel in the same dreary capital? Under a Constitution which had become an anachronism, and which could never be modified, the situation of the Federal States had become intolerable. A mischievous Union has bred the war now raging. The best hope of permanent peace is a final separation.

The Union has been a mere "club" of States; the district of Columbia, the "Club House;" the Congress, the "directors;" the army and navy; the "servants." How improper was it then for the "directors" to assess the "members" south of Mason and Dixon's line, to support those north of that parallel by a system of protective tariffs; and how contrary to the "bye-laws" it was to endeavour to legislate the use of the common property of the "association" in the territories to the advantage of one section. But now we see the interference of the North with the domestic concerns of the South. It is a pity that the New Englanders had not better understood social etiquette, and that there had been a "limit" to the number of members. It was the New States in the West, peopled by the Red Republicans of Europe, uniting with the Puritan commonwealths of the East, inhabited by Black Republicans, that overthrew, by the Chicago platform, the institutions of the country, as established by the fathers of the Revolution. The Southerners have deemed fit to "resign" from this "club." In another column we give eminent northern authority on the right of Secession.

Three Months in the Confederate Army.

THE FIRST FIGHT.

Camp, 3rd Alabama Volunteers, near Norfolk, — May, 1861.

The monotony of camp life has been enlivened during the past week. Last Sunday an unusual number of furloughs had been given to visit the city, and strong detachments from each company of our regiment were just sitting down to the well-supplied public table of the Atlantic Hotel, when a peremptory summons arrived for our immediate return to camp. We were to strike tents in two hours. Several of the regiments had received marching orders. Rumours of mysterious movements on the part of the enemy were already circulating in the streets. Hastily leaving our untasted meal, we hurried towards camp in such conveyances as the offer of extravagant prices could procure. The whole regiment was in a buzz of preparation. Comrades had already packed our knapsacks. The tents were stripped of their contents, ready to fall at the order to strike. Our negro followers were busy cooking three days' rations, or packing the superfluous baggage upon carts sent for from town. Soon each company was drawn up in line on the company parade-grounds—the roll called—no one was missing. Several non-commissioned officers now passed up and down the line, dealing out from huge baskets carbides, conical balls, and caps—thirty rounds to each man. "Rest" was then ordered. Buoyant with the hope of a speedy meeting with the hated foe, feverish with impatience, we waited for two weary hours. Meanwhile orderlies galloped in from headquarters. The officers stood in little groups conversing in low tones. After all, we were doomed to disappointment. At 6 o'clock the usual dress-parade was held; we were then dismissed to our quarters; cautioned to sleep on our arms; and, at all events, to be prepared for an early start in the morning.

That night we slept in our now naked tents without being disturbed by any alarm. Next morning, at half-past 3, the reveillé sounded. At 4 the order to "strike tents" was given, and the canvas-built town fell, as if by magic, to the ground. At half-past 4 the regiment was in line of march—whither, none of us as yet knew. After a march of about three hours we halted upon a broad expanse of fallow land, and there, we now learned, we were to pitch our new camp. It was not in human nature to abstain from grumbling after such repeated disappointments, nor was our ill-humour mollified by finding, a few hours later, that our baggage had taken the wrong way, and we would not be able to pitch our tents before nightfall. The whole of that long day we were exposed to a broiling sun, with not so much as a shrub for a shelter, and with no food nor water except what our haversacks and canteens afforded. Trifling though it was, it was the first hardship we had been called upon to endure, and appearing to us utterly purposeless, we grumbled accordingly.

— May, 1861.

A few days have shown that the alarms of Sunday were not altogether groundless. Day before yesterday the Federal steamer Monticello, a merchant vessel converted into a gunboat, appeared before our unfinished battery at Sewall's Point, and from a distance of about one mile and a-half, commenced a brisk fire of shells and round shot, which was promptly and effectively answered by the four guns already in position. The steamer, after firing 125 rounds, was forced to signal for some tugs to haul her off, having been struck in some part of her machinery.

Yesterday I had an opportunity for visiting the scene of the conflict. The only damage sustained by the battery, from a fire of several hours, consisted of two embrasures being knocked into one, and this trifling injury was repaired during the night; not a man was hurt, except one very slightly wounded by a splinter from a tree. The result of this, the first engagement since war has been openly declared, is truly wonderful. The battery was defended by the Columbus City Guards, ninety-eight men, under Captain Colquitt. They have not been above a week at their present post, and, as they were recruited as an infantry company, have had but an exceedingly imperfect drill at the guns. The captain is an old artillery officer; and assisted by three practised gunners, who act as instructors to the company, he has been able to defend this rude and unfinished structure of turf and sandbags against a most formidable attack. Though the men were for the first time under fire, they behaved, not indeed with the coolness of veterans, but with a reckless daring amounting to foolhardiness. After each discharge some of them sprang upon the guns, waving their hats and shouting defiance at the Yankee craft. Captain Colquitt told us that he felt himself unable to restrain their mad enthusiasm. "The boys must be allowed a little frolic this time," he added, "after another brush or two they will sober down." The trees in the rear of the battery are literally mowed down, and the fields behind are thickly strewn with shell and shot. Few of the former exploded; the nearest within about twenty paces of the battery. Some have been found filled with sawdust instead of powder; a fact which argues ill for the faithfulness of the operatives in the Federal arsenals.

It was suspected in Norfolk that the attack of the Monticello might be intended to cover a landing in the rear of the battery, and a battalion of infantry had been hastily despatched to foil this intention. The ill success which had attended the steamer seems to have caused its abandonment, if it was ever entertained. The work is now continued with renewed energy, and in the course of a week fourteen heavy guns will command the channel, and defy the assault of any ordinary force.

It was not until several weeks after the occurrence of this little affair that the Northern accounts of it reached us. We were then amused to learn that the engagement was one of immense importance, that the rebel battery had been utterly demolished, that the rebels themselves had been seen rushing into the woods like flocks of scared sheep, and that foremost among the fugitives was an officer of high rank desecrated galloping away in wild haste. Such a success was cheaply purchased at the cost of a few lives on board of the steamer and the crippling of its machinery. It was long a question among us whether these ludicrous falsehoods were wholly due to the inventive genius for which the Yankee nation is celebrated, or whether the poor scribblers had so lost their heads through fear that they believed at least a part of what they wrote. Thus the fugitive officer of high rank might have been the mounted vidette despatched to Norfolk with the news of the attack; the frightened rebels rushing wildly into the woods might have been the gang of negroes employed upon the works, who, at the discharge of the first gun, scampered away to the ditch dug for their protection in anticipation of such an emergency. On another occasion, when a young lady waved her handkerchief at the harmless pyrotechnic display with which we are favoured every afternoon by their great "Sawyer gun" at Fort Calhoun, the correspondents of the New York papers gravely reported that a white flag had been raised by the rebels at Sewall's Point.

LUXURIOUS LIVING.

During the last week in May, and nearly the whole month of June, no event took place to ripple the stagnant surface of camp routine. The roll-calls, the company and battalion drills, the dress parade, became almost as dull as the long intervals between them. All of us had shouldered the musket with the firm conviction that we would at once enter upon a campaign crowded with soul-stirring events, but which would be necessarily short. To men accustomed to mix in the busy pursuits of life—men who at a heavy sacrifice of interests and feelings left business and family behind them—no trial of patience can be more severe than to spend week after week in compulsory idleness approaching to inanition, and varied only by periodically performing the part of unthinking machines.

If material comforts could have compensated us, we should have had no reason to complain, for however much we might claim sympathy in other respects, we could not in this. Norfolk had been in times of peace the great market garden of New York and Philadelphia, and as the blockade cut off its ordinary customers, we became the beneficiaries of its abundance and lived literally on the fat of the land. Excellent beef and mutton was furnished at much more reasonable prices than we of the Gulf States were accustomed to. Fowls, including the largest and fattest of turkeys, were correspondingly cheap. The choicest vegetables could be obtained for almost nothing; indeed, several of the market gardeners in the neighbourhood gave us a free entrance to their teeming gardens, on no other condition than the unnecessary one, that we should take nothing save what we wanted for our own use, nor should waste anything wantonly. It will afford some idea of the cheapness of the place, that fresh agoutis and monkeys could be bought at 5d. per dozen; butter, far superior in quality to the best procurable in Mobile or New Orleans, cost from 7½d. to 10d. per lb. Strawberries, during the month of May, were sold by the quart, at 5d. In June melons took their place at even cheaper rates; soft shell crabs, which in the cities on the Gulf, are deemed a very rare and expensive luxury, had here a mere nominal value, and were ultimately excluded from the camp, as well as some other over-abundant luxuries, for sanitary reasons. Thus we were enabled, at the small rate of a shilling a day per head, to supply our mess table, very much after the manner of a well-regulated household. Coffee, salt meat, rice, and bread, were furnished as rations, but formed the least part of our meals. On Sundays, to give still greater variety to our bill of fare, we had what we termed our birthday dinners, when each member of the mess in turn became the host of the others. On such occasions, some special delicacy in the shape of game and wines was provided, and guests invited from among the different regiments or from the city. Most of the messes had substituted crockery for the rude tin ware that came from the quartermaster's store.* All had constructed deal tables and benches for their use, which were mostly sheltered from sun or rain by rough sheds. In our weary leisure hours we amused ourselves with amateur carpentering, and each tent could boast of a gun rack, or a set of shelves, or some other testimony of the ingenuity and industry of its inmates. Long before the authorities furnished us lumber for the purpose, most of the messes had, at their own expense, planked the floors of their tents. Cheap carpets even were introduced, and in individual cases, buffalo robes and heavy rugs ensured a still more comfortable couch to the owners. In course of time our company purchased three additional tents, which it had received permission to pitch upon its allotted ground, and then we could boast of having a chapel, a dining-room, and a writing-room of our own during the day-time, besides the sleeping-space so much needed during the sultry summer nights.

There was never any lack of money. Our brevet second-lieutenant, who acted as quartermaster, and also as banker, for the company, brought with him about six hundred pounds in gold, partly the original property of the company, partly made up by contributions from some of the monied institutions of Mobile, as well as some of the parents or relatives of members. This sum was devoted to general company purposes, and also to the cashing of our individual drafts, within reasonable limits. For a long time we were able to make a considerable premium upon our drafts, as the Mobile banks did not suspend specie payment until a much later period, when compelled by an injunction by the Governor for political reasons. Our custom was therefore eagerly sought by the local banks of Norfolk. The further fact that an advertisement was inserted by our captain in the city papers, stating that all debts contracted by members of the company would be promptly paid on presentation to him, gave to us all an almost unlimited individual credit. In thus putting us upon our honour, Captain Sands ran but little risk, for each man in his command had a good name and his social respectability at stake, as the company proudly and justly claimed to be composed of the élite of the youth of Mobile. Inequalities of wealth indeed exist among us; comparatively few enjoy an income which can be properly called independent; by far the greater number depend upon parents, upon the proceeds of a business more or less damaged by their absence, or upon employers. Where the latter is the case, the salaries are nearly all continued, either in whole or in part. Still there are in our company, as well as in others, some instances of men who, in leaving home, have deprived themselves of all their pecuniary resources. It is for those cases that our company fund is especially useful, and it is a maxim in the application of that fund that no member should want for anything he really needs. Besides, the rich share freely their surplus with less favoured companions. Where a member of a mess is not quite able to bear his share of the expense, he is never asked for it, nor is the matter ever alluded to. Were we a company of strangers, thrown together by some caprice of fortune, this species of communism would be a practical impossibility. Lifelong acquaintances as we nearly all are, each mess composed of old friends, it serves only as another tie to bind us more closely together in the bonds of brotherhood.

Reviews.

IMPERIALISM IN FRANCE.*

THE main principle and chief characteristic of political quackery is, that it exalts theories and despises facts. All men agree to name the best Government as that which confers the greatest happiness on the greatest number; but there is no such agreement in practice. In England there are thousands of intelligent individuals who do not believe in any country being free, happy, and prosperous, unless it adopts the British Constitution. In vain we point out that different races, living under the influence of different climates, require different rule; and that if we apply the glorious principles of the British Constitution, it must be with considerable modification to suit the modified circumstances. English liberty might be anarchy in the East, and elsewhere seem too restricted; but our partiality for our Constitution is more excusable than the determination of such men as Mazzini to carry out their political views. They insist that freedom, happiness, and prosperity are inseparable from universal suffrage and mob rule. If a people is free, prosperous, and happy, without mobism, these geni of disorder are shocked at the immorality. Look at the kingdom of Italy for an illustration. In a few months she was, by the aid of her powerful ally, created and constituted. In less than two years she was, to a wonderful extent, consolidated. She had a free press, free discussion, popular representation; and personal liberty was fully guaranteed. This state of affairs Mazzini and his followers could not tolerate, and they have been ceaseless in their efforts to plunge the new-born nation into civil war, and were not so very far from attaining their object when they succeeded in making a tool of Garibaldi. Or take the case of America. With all its faults, we admit that the Constitution of the United States deserved the respect and consideration of mankind. It was a Constitution to which freemen were justly proud to owe allegiance. Its provisions were so excellent that if it had not been for the excessive greed of the North, the inevitable separation of States might have been postponed for a generation, if not for a much longer period; and they have proved strong enough to hold together two, and more than two, distinct nations for nearly a hundred years; for, looking at the character of the North and South, we rather wonder that secession did not take place much earlier in the nineteenth century. We, therefore, do not find fault with the admiration expressed by some persons for the institutions of America, but we cannot sympathize with the fanaticism of Mr. Bright and his party, who defend the most despotic acts of the Lincoln Government, because they are done in the name of a free Government. The Federal press is gagged, the States' rights are disregarded, free discussion is prohibited, personal liberty is taken away, State prisons are full of citizens immured without trial for imaginary political offences, and yet not a word of censure or remonstrance is heard from the Member for Birmingham. Nay, both by his silence, and through his organ of the press, he endorses these doings. Mr. Bright is the staunch opponent of warfare, and yet he has not a remark to utter when a war is waged by the North to conquer the independence of the South. The outraged Constitution of the United States and the bloodshed, lust, and ambition are forgiven; for under that Constitution Mr. Bright sees that the mob and not the intelligence of the country, is dominant. Mr. Bright, the boasted friend of humanity, has not protested against the conduct of such men as Butler, Mitchell, and Turchin. At length, "as a military measure," the Lincoln Government decrees emancipation; that is, a servile war in the South—and Mr. Bright is silent. We are not charging the honourable member with moral cowardice, or with moral complicity in these doings, but we cite his case as an instance of the blindness that is induced by political quackery.

This example, however, is not more remarkable than that offered us by the comments made on the rule of Napoleon III. by the sympathizers with the habits of Leicester-square. We are not going to defend or even discuss the merits of Imperialism or any other form of government. We embrace the opportunity afforded by the work before us of directing attention to the results of the reign of the Emperor of the French, and which, in a most remarkable manner, refute the assailants of a Prince whose consummate ability and success have commanded the admiration of his enemies. We may, however, observe, that America and France at this time show the form of government does not guarantee the de facto nature of the Government. Under Imperialism a people may be prosperous, happy, and free; and under a form of Republicanism a people may be ruined and enslaved.

The author of "Ten Years of Imperialism" gives a very graphic account of what has been done since that memorable day when Napoleon, seeing France on the brink of another era of anarchy, cut the gordian knot by a coup d'état,—an act which was afterwards ratified by the votes of eight millions of Frenchmen. A "Flaneur" devotes a large portion of his modest volume to a description of New Paris, and the subject is certainly worthy of the elaborate treatment. The Paris improvements are an example of the great energy of the Imperial Government. They have been costly; but it is absurd to say that the country has been in any way drained to adorn the capital. The Emperor has been anxious to promote improvements in all parts of his dominions, and provincial towns have not lacked encouragement to better their condition. If any one will be at the pains to examine the development of French railways that have been inaugurated in the last ten years, he will find that the prosperity of France, and not the advantage of Paris, or merely military exigencies, have been consulted. It has been frequently alleged that the alterations in Paris have had no other view than distributing the working classes, and making the city more secure against insurrection. Now, it is true, wide streets are not so favourable to insurrection as narrow streets and labyrinths of rookeries; but it must also be conceded that public baths and washhouses, full employment, and general abundance, are so many securities for internal order; yet we should not sneer at a Government for attempting such improvements, because, as a secondary consequence, they were guarantees of its stability.

But it is not only in the rebuilding of Paris that the Emperor has displayed zeal and ability. That work is not unimportant, but it is, nevertheless, the least of the results of ten years of Imperialism. Under Louis Philippe, France had sunk in the scale of nations; her influence in Europe was diminished. At present she is the dominant Power of the Continent; her army has not only been somewhat increased, but the material and spirit of it improved. It is more than ever a volunteer army; for without unduly taxing the resources of the country, the occupation of the soldier is made lucrative. In the Crimea many defects were observed, and in Italy it was apparent that these defects had been remedied. The navy has also been augmented—a fact it is unnecessary to impress upon Englishmen, who have, indeed, exaggerated notions of the increase in the French navy.

*Ten Years of Imperialism in France (Impressions of a "Flaneur." London: William Blackwood and Sons.

The most wonderful transformation has taken place in the habits and thoughts of the people. They are no longer swayed by the passion for military glory, but have, with national energy and with surprising success, become a commercial nation. We do not deny that there is a vast amount of undue speculation, but that is an evil which works its own cure. Much has been done by the direct agency of the Government, and grants of money; but the chief cause of this prosperity is the cessation of political agitation, and the security and repose afforded by a strong Government.

In literature there has been a corresponding activity:—

In 1851, 7350 books and pamphlets appeared, while for the last two years the number has been close on 15,000, and this does not include musical publications, engravings, and lithographs, in which a proportionate increase has taken place.

In the condition of the working-classes there is a marked change:—

Whoever has known something about the mode of living of the ouvrier before 1845 will be astonished at the change which has taken place. The change is, above all, visible in the substitution of animal food for bread, and the traditional soupe with lard and onions. A great proportion of the workmen who formerly had at most once a day meat, now have it regularly twice a day, in the forenoon and in the evening; the consequence, greater health and strength, which must strike at the first glance.

Amongst the plans for the amelioration of the working class is one which might in some parts of our country be adopted with advantage. At Mulhouse—

Single or double cottages have been built, with little plots for gardens around them, and they are let at a little higher rent, so that after a number of years the tenant becomes the proprietor. It is surprising what a change this chance of becoming the proprietor makes in the habits of the workman; the public-houses in the neighbourhood feel it keenly.

The "Flaneur" commends the system of the capitalist sharing his profits with the workman. He does this everywhere, and in the instances cited by our author, instead of all the workman's profit being given him as wages at the end of the week, a portion of it is given him at different intervals.

We do not endorse all the statements and opinions of a "Flaneur," but his book will repay perusal.

GENERAL J. H. MORGAN.

The following orders, though not recent, will be read with interest. The first is an address to the Confederate troops, and the second a threat of retaliation that will no doubt have the effect of checking Federal injustice and spoliation:—

Headquarters, Morgan's Brigade,
Hartsville, Tennessee, August 22.

Soldiers,—Your gallant bearing during the last two days will not only be inscribed in the history of the country and the annals of this war, but is engraven deeply in my heart.

Your zeal and devotion on the 20th, at the attack of the trestle-work at Saundersville and of the Springfield Junction stockade, your heroism during the two hard fights of yesterday, have placed you high on the list of those patriots who are now in arms for our Southern rights.

All communication cut off between Gallatin and Nashville, a body of 300 infantry totally cut off or taken prisoners, the liberation of those kind friends arrested by our revengeful foes, for no other reason than their compassionate care of our sick and wounded, would have been laurels sufficient for your brows. But, soldiers, the utter annihilation of General Johnson's Brigade, composed of twenty-four picked companies of regulars, and sent on purpose to take us, raises your reputation as soldiers, and strikes fear into the craven hearts of your enemies. General Johnson and his staff, with 200 men, taken prisoners, sixty-four killed and 100 wounded, attests the resistance made and bears testimony to your valour.

But our victories have not been achieved without loss. We have to mourn some brave and dear comrades. Their names will remain in our breasts—their fame outlives them. They died in defence of a good cause; they died, like gallant soldiers, with their front to the foe.

Officers and men, your conduct makes me proud to command you. Fight always as you fought yesterday, and you are invincible.

JOHN H. MORGAN,
Colonel Commanding Cavalry.

Headquarters, Morgan's Brigade, Hartsville, Tenn.

Having noticed in the Cincinnati Daily Gazette, of the 15th inst., an article dated "Paris Ky., Aug. 14, 1862," whereby it appears that the agents of the Federal Government are (to use their own words) forcing Morgan's "friends to pay for the act of their favourite chieftain," and thus violating all laws hitherto respected and acknowledged by civilized nations, forgetting and wilfully closing their eyes to the fact that I, in my justifiable attacks on Federal troops and Federal property, have always respected the private property and persons of Union men; I do hereby declare that to protect Southern citizens and their rights I will henceforth put the law of retaliation in full force, and act upon it with vigour. For every dollar exacted from my fellow-citizens I will have two from men of known Union sentiments, and will make their persons and property responsible for this payment. God knows it was my earnest wish to have conducted this war according to the dictates of my heart, and consonant with those feelings which actuate every honorable mind; but forced by the vindictive and iniquitous proceedings of our Northern foes to follow their example, in order to induce them to return to more humane conduct, I will, for the future, visit them in their exactions, retaliate upon them and theirs the cruelties and oppression with which my friends are visited, and continue the course until our enemies consent to make war according to the law of nations.

Signed by me, this 15th day of August, A.D., 1862.

JOHN H. MORGAN,
Colonel Commanding Brigade.

THE SOUTHERN COLONIZATION SCHEME.

President Lincoln has followed up his decrees for enslaving the free citizens of the North and emancipating the negroes of those territories which shall remain in rebellion, by enunciating another scheme for establishing a new and very peculiar colony, beginning apparently with Florida. Every schoolboy knows the peculiar conformation of that State, which is not unlike the Italian peninsula, only projecting into the Gulf of Mexico instead of the Mediterranean Sea. It is the southernmost apex of the North American Continent, torrid in climate, completely Southern in all its traits and associations, but somewhat removed from the highway of commerce or ordinary worldly business. Happening, however, during the present war to stand apart from the military control of the Confederates, Mr. Lincoln and his coadjutors are able to do in that quarter a little more as they please than they can even in Maryland or Pennsylvania, New York, or Washington itself. As yet we have only a bare outline of the project; but, according to our information, it is of this nature. Some ten or twenty thousand volunteers are to be detached to Florida, to "influence" that State and its neighbours; each volunteer receiving a homestead of public lands, and free transport for his family to the principal port where they are to be located. "It is intended by this means to infuse into the Southern States an industrious and loyal population, in order to protect the Union men." It has been confessed by Mr. Seward himself that the boasted "Union men" do not exist; but that does not matter much, we infer; for "it is supposed that the manufacturing and productive districts of England can be made to contribute to this emigration." German "Redemptioners" having been victimised in past days, and Irish emigrants having, in our own, yielded to the blandishments of the recruiting officers who fail to entrap the Yankees, the Seward-Lincoln party are resolved to try it on with Englishmen. The Lancashire lads and lasses, having been starved by the stoppage of the cotton trade, it is assumed that they will gratefully let themselves be carried to squat on other men's land, in a country just now ravaged by war, and always a prey to that most terrible of wild beasts—the yellow fever! The plan is borrowed from Austria and her military frontier; but the grand differences are, that the armed settlers of the European despot were not left without support in their rear, were not planted in a pestilential climate, were secured in subsistence and possessions by a great Power, and were not avowedly invited to fight the battles of a bankrupt and disorganized alien Government by acting as substitutes for slaves. We describe this notable enterprise on the authority of a New York contemporary; it is of a piece, however, with the Panama scheme, and is only so much madder than President Lincoln's other recent projects as we might expect each new act to be in the development of that official insanity to which the well-meaning occupant of Washington's chair has so manifestly succumbed.

NORTHERN PRECEPT AND PRACTICE.

(From the Mobile Register.)

The foundation argument of Southern secession was that the North had violated the compact between the States to such a degree that it was no longer safe for the South to be under the same government with it. Hence the extraordinary appeal to arms, as preferable to the bad faith and political companionship of false and faithless allies. Yet the North makes war to save the "compact" they had first broken. The fugitive slave clause is a solemn and plainly written provision of the Constitution, and put there for the benefit and safety of Southern property. It is as binding a provision as that under which Lincoln was elected President, or the Black Republican Senators hold their seats in Congress. Yet this clause is trampled upon by the men who are shedding our people's blood to uphold the Constitution. To hold the institution of slavery intact in the District of Columbia, is an obligation as binding as any that can be imposed upon the honour of statesmen. Yet the Black Republicans have swept it away by a vote in Congress. The Freedom of the Press, the Habeas Corpus, the personal liberty of the citizen, the freedom from arrest, except by due form of law, and the trial by jury, are all corner stones of the Constitution of the United States. And yet there is not a monument of right and liberty set up in Magna Charta, or any English or American bill of rights which has not been set at naught and treated with contempt by these champions of the Constitution.

A glance at the past shows that these howlers for the Constitution and Union are new-born converts. They are on the record as its avowed and deadliest enemies.

We have before us a slip from the St. Louis Republican of 1856—the period of the Presidential canvass of Fremont and Buchanan. We find in it some of the utterances of Black Republican sentiment at that time. Nothing but war upon the Union was then breathed. It was denounced as a "league with the Devil," and "a covenant with Hell." The old flag of stars and stripes was mutilated, and Black Republicans held their meetings, and marched in procession under banners with all but sixteen stars erased. When Hamlin was nominated as a candidate for Vice-President, a salute of sixteen guns was fired at Portland, Maine. These men thus blackballed the Southern States, and excluded them from the Union years before the Act of Secession. Hear how they talked, and see how they acted, in 1856:—

"War between the Northern and Southern States—LET IT COME!"—[Black Republican party of Dubuque.]

"I have no doubt that the Free and Slave States ought to separate."—[J. S. Pike, of the New York Tribune.]

"It is the duty of the North, in case they fail of electing a President and a Congress that will restore freedom to Kansas, to revolutionize the Government."—[Resolution of a Black Republican meeting in Wisconsin.]

"I pray daily that this accursed Union may be dissolved, even if blood has to be spilt."—[Black Republican Clergyman of Poughkeepsie.]

"We earnestly request Congress at its present session to take such initiatory measures for the speedy, peaceful and equitable dissolution of the existing Union, as the exigencies of the case may require."—[Black Republican petition to Congress.]

"The Union is not worth supporting in connection with the South."—[H. Greeley.]

"The Constitution is a reproach and a league with Tophet."—[Wm. L. Garrison.]

"Let the Union slide."—[N. P. Banks.]

DISUNIONISM.—Hannibal Hamlin, Lot M. Morrill and Charles W. Broddard, Esq., of Danville, addressed a Fremont meeting at Norway, on Monday, standing under an American flag, on which were only sixteen stars.—[Democratic Advertiser.]

The disunion flag, with only sixteen stars, still continues to float across the public highway in this village—an emblem of sectionalism, and a disgrace to the party who placed it there.—[Norway Advertiser.]

The truth is, the whole North has gone mad. Nothing but one of those hallucinations which God sometimes permits to take possession of the minds of nations as well as individuals can account for the spectacle the world now beholds. A whole people mounting in hot haste, and spurring and riding at John Gilpin speed on the high road to ruin. End as the war may, there is no redemption at the end of it for the people who have made it. We believe it is susceptible of demonstration, that the very worst solution of the struggle for the North, would be the full fruition of their darling hopes, and their tremendous efforts—to wit, the conquest of the South. It would be the effort and the result of Sampson's strength upon the pillars of the Temple. The North would be buried in the same political ruins with the South.

The hallucination of which we speak is not confined to the Abolitionists. There is "method in their madness." But the once conservative men of the North are not a whit behind them in the depth and guilt of the moral aberration. There is Daniel S. Dickinson, who once electrified us by declaring in his Senatorial seat that if war should come between the North and the South on the negro question, his sword should be drawn for the South! He is now one of the most truculent of the subjugators. He made his sword speech to win Southern votes for the Presidency. He is now our enemy.

Look again at Pickyune Butler and Caleb Cushing. There are no two men south of Mason and Dixon's line—not even W. L. Yancey and Barnwell Rhett—who are more directly and largely instrumental as the immediate authors of this revolution than these two men. We saw them with our own eyes secede (that is the word) from the last political convention that preserved the semblance of nationality, because, as they averred, it was not sound enough for them on the Southern question. They helped to snap the last ligament of the National Union and did that which made the revolution absolutely inevitable. And now where are they? At least neutral, we should think—at least, holding their hands in the struggle which they contribute to make! Not at all. Butler is in New Orleans, with fire, and sword, and proclamation, to burn, and murder, and violate, among a people whose offence is that they accepted a war which he, either in his blindness or guilt, forced upon them.

The whole Democratic party at the North, with now and a brilliant exception like that of Vallandigham, is given over to this national madness. He drew the sword to re-establish a Union of consent. They keep it drawn to glut in blood their vengeance for their own folly, and in the desperate hope of retrieving themselves from the financial bankruptcy and political ruin in which the war has overwhelmed them. Verily, "whom the Gods would destroy, they first make mad."

THE RELIGIOUS ELEMENT IN THE WAR.

(Correspondence of the Charleston Courier.)

Probably at no period of the war has the religious element in the army been more predominant than it is at present. In many instances chaplains, army missionaries, colporteurs and tracts have accomplished great benefits; but by far the most cogent influences that have operated upon and subdued the reckless spirit of the soldiery, are those which are born in the heart itself, upon the field of battle.

It is not strange, therefore, as you go through various camps, even on a week day, that your ears are here and there saluted with the melody of a choir of voices, rich, round and full, sung with all the seriousness and earnestness of true devotion; or that before the lights are out in the evening, many tones are heard in thanksgiving for the blessings of the day; or that the Bible and prayer-books are common books upon the mess-table; or that, when Sunday arrives, the little stand from which the chaplain is wont to discourse, is the centre of a cluster of interested and pious listeners.

In many of the regiments much of this kindly influence is due to the pure and elevated character of the officers. Wherever these are found, you invariably also find a neat, well-disciplined, orderly, quiet command, as prompt in the camp as they are brave upon the field. Now and then you may hear a taunt about "our praying captain" or "colonel," but even these thoughtless expressions come from men who venerate their officers, and would follow them to the death.—As you know, some of our ablest generals are men who have dropped the gown of the Christian for the apparel of the soldier. Polk was a bishop, Pendleton a clergyman, D. H. Hill a religious author, Jackson a dignitary of the church, while scores of others, occupying subordinate positions, are equally well known for their devotion to the shrine of Christianity. All of these gentlemen have been eminently successful in whatever they have undertaken, have passed unharmed through the dangers by which they have been frequently environed, and are living illustrations of the truth that a fighting Christian is as terrible to his enemies as he is gentle to his friends.

General Jackson never enters a fight without invoking God's blessing and protection. The dependence of this strange man upon the Deity seems never to be absent from his mind, and whatever he does, or says, it is always prefaced "by God's blessing."

In one of his official dispatches, he commences "By God's blessing, we have to-day defeated the enemy." Said one of his officers to him the other day, "Well, General, another candidate (referring to Pope) is waiting your attentions." "So I observe," was the quiet reply, "and by God's blessing, he shall receive them to his full satisfaction."

After a battle has been fought the same rigid remembrance of Divine Power is observed. The army is drawn up in line, the General dismounts from his horse, and there, in the presence of his rough, bronzed-faced troops, with heads uncovered and bent awe-stricken to the ground, the voice of the good man, which but a few hours before was ringing out in quick and fiery intonations, is now heard subdued and calm, as if overcome by the presence of the Supreme Being, in holy appeal. Few such spectacles have been witnessed in modern times, and it is needless to add that few such examples have ever told with more wondrous power upon the hearts of the men. Are you surprised, after this recital, that "Stonewall" Jackson is invincible, and that he can lead his army to certain victory, whenever "God's blessing" precedes the act?

FRANCIS FORD, Manufacturer,
MANCHESTER, Three and Six Cord Spool
Thread, Cotton Balls, Knitting and Embroidering
Cottons. Imported by FOSTER AND MOORE,
Norfolk, Va.; F. RIMAILHO AND NEYREY,
New Orleans.

R. D. RUSDEN, MANCHESTER,
ENGLAND, American Drills of all kinds.
Denims, Shirts, Shirts, and all sorts of Manchester Goods.

SEARING AND CO.,
Commission Merchants,
MOBILE AND NEW ORLEANS, C.S.A.
Represented by R. G. BEESLEY, Cotton Broker,
2, Byron-court, Royal-exchange, Manchester.

ROBINSON & OLIVER,
Commission Merchants,
NEW ORLEANS,
C.S.A.

Represented by
Jos. T. ROBINSON & Co.,
No. 3, India Buildings, Water-street,
Liverpool.

JOHN FRASER & CO.,
CHARLESTON,
South Carolina.
FRASER, TRENHOLM, & CO.,
Liverpool,
Commission Merchants.

REID AND STEWART, Com-
mission Merchants, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.
Represented by Andrew Stewart, 1, Rumford-place,
Liverpool.

HARPER AND CAUGHEY,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA. Represented by J. and A. CAUGHEY,
Tempest Chambers, Tempest Hey, Liverpool.

TO EAST INDIA MERCHANTS:
A GENTLEMAN, in his 30th Year,
who has had nearly 16 Years' experience in
the Manchester Yarn and Cloth Market as a SALES-MAN, also 24 Years' experience in East Indian and
American Cottons, desires to go out to Bombay,
under the auspices of a first class firm, to act as their Cotton buyer.
Address, BOX, J. 19, Post-office, Manchester.

TO SOUTHERN AMERICAN FAMILIES IN
PARIS.

A FRENCH LADY,—living with
her mother and her daughter in a pleasant
location close by the Champs-Elysées—offers the comfort of a home and motherly care and attention, together with the advantages of the best education and excellent music-fencing, for TWO YOUNG CHILDREN, or for a YOUNG LADY
under fifteen.
Address, MADAME DE W., care of Mr. Largier,
17, Rue de la Paix, Paris.

A. M. GAUTIER, Tailor, 229,
Rue de la Chaussée d'Antin in Paris.

MRS. E. PRESTON,
31, BURY STREET, ST. JAMES, S.W.
Furnished Apartments and Bed Rooms to Let.
References to Hon. Wm. L. Yancey, Hon. J. E.
Macfarland, and Henry Hotze, Esq.

WILLIAM FREEMAN,
Publisher of the INDEX, supplies Stationery of all kinds, and for exportation.

WILLIAM FREEMAN,
Publisher of the INDEX, supplies Books, Newspapers, Magazines, and all Periodicals and Publications.

WILLIAM FREEMAN,
Publisher of THE INDEX, will promptly
attend to all orders from or for the Continent of Europe and the States. Commissions for goods of all kinds undertaken on moderate terms.

WORKS RECENTLY PUBLISHED
BY
WILLIAM FREEMAN,
102, FLEET STREET.

SHIFTING SCENES: and Other Poems. By J.
STANTAN Rigg. Fcap. 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.; handsomely bound, 5s.

POEMS OF TRUTH AND FANCY. By S. R.
REDMAN. Crown 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.
THE WEARMOUTH ABBOTS. (Second Edition).
A Tale, Illustrative of Saxon Christianity. Fcap.
8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.

JESUS THE SOUL'S NEED. By C. A. PORTER.
Royal 32mo. paper, 8d.; cloth, 1s.

PROGRESS; or, The International Exhibition.
By the Rev. W. ANDERSON, Author of "Self-
made Men." Royal 32mo. paper cover, 3d.

THE FATHERS OF THE WESLEY FAMILY.
By the Rev. S. BEALE. Crown 8vo. cloth, 1s. 6d.

THE TRUE THEORY OF A CHURCH. Or, The Right of Principle of Christian Confederation.
Elicited and Developed by the Rev. F. G. HORTON.
Crown 8vo. sewed, 1s.

DECISION AND CONSCIENTY. Exemplified
and Honoured in the Life of Daniel and his Three Friends. By THOMAS COLEMAN, Author of "Two
Thousand Confessors." Fcap. 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.

GOLD OR GRACE: WHICH IS THE BEST?
By the Rev. SAMUEL WALKER, Curate of St.
Matthew's, Gosport. Crown 8vo. sewed, price 2d.

HOW THEY GOT THERE. By the Rev. W.
BARKER. Being an Answer to "How Did They Get There?" Crown 8vo. sewed, price 2d.

IN THE PRESS.
ESSAYS, CRITICAL, BIOGRAPHICAL, AND MIS-CELLANEOUS. By S. F. WILLIAMS.

PUNCH IN THE PULPIT. (Second Edition).
TO BE, OR NOT TO BE; on Man's Present and Future Condition Considered.

JESUS, OUR ARK.

THE MODEL CHURCH. The Nature, Constitution, Government, and Characteristics of the Christian Church in New Testament Times. By

the Rev. L. B. BROWN, of Berwick-on-Tweed.

London: William Freeman, 102, Fleet Street.

European and Confederate States Advertising Agency.

THE object of this Agency is to
effect a direct trade alliance between the European and the Southern Press, through the medium of advertising. The most practicable mode
of introducing the Merchants, Manufacturers, Capitalists, Insurance Companies, &c., of Foreign Countries, to the Southern Trade, is by an organised,
classified, and liberal SYSTEM OF ADVERTISING.
Trade, like time and tide, waits for no man. The commerce of the world will not pause in ruinous inactivity but will continue its irresistible ebb and flow the moment peace is established. One of the most dangerous, corrupting, and insidious means to be used by the North will be the medium of advertising in Southern papers. Advertising Agencies
are already organised in every Northern city, and only bide their time. We must see to it that our papers are so filled with Foreign Advertisements
and the advertisements of Southern Importers,
Dealers, and Manufacturers, that there will not be
space left in any Southern newspaper for the advertisement of a single Yankee notion. Then will
our papers present to their readers a faithful
mirror of Dealers, Manufacturers, &c., in the Old World, and of our business men at home, and thus attach to Southern interest that mighty lever "the Press," and disrupt the tie which, by means of Northern advertising, has had so much influence in
binding the South to dependence upon its enemies.

Through the medium of a liberal advertising
patronage, our Southern editors can be maintained
against the stagnation in their business, which proceeds from interrupted or disorganised trade.

The object of this Agency is threefold—
1st. To advertise European Merchants, Manufacturers, Hotels, Railroads, Insurance Companies, &c.,
&c., in Southern papers.

2nd. To advertise Southern business, property,
&c., in European journals.

3rd. To advertise home industry and Southern enterprise in our own papers, and thereby build up
the cities of our Confederacy, instead of those of
our enemies.

Our arrangements abroad are all completed. We now address you this preliminary Circular, to ask
you to send us duplicate copies of your paper, according to the programme letter (which shall be strictly confidential), stating your terms of advertising, &c.

We will soon appoint agents in each important
sea-board and inland city. Atlanta, at present, is selected for the Central Office, on account of its geographical position. We respectfully ask for this enterprise your hearty co-operation and assistance,
and guarantee, in return, strict integrity in all
business transactions.

By order of the Board of Directors,
WILLIAM H. BARNES,
SUPERINTENDENT.

Atlanta, Ga., August 24, 1861.

Louisiana Mutual Insurance Company.

OFFICE:
Iron Building, corner Camp and Natchez Streets.
Amount of Premiums for the year ending 28th February, 1861 630,528 70
Amount of Profits for the year ending
28th February, 1861 213,759 74
Amount of Assets for the year ending
28th February, 1861 366,420 98
The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of THIRTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent.
interest on outstanding Scrip, and have ordered
the redemption of Fifty per cent. of the Scrip issue
of 1860.

Interest and redeemable Scrip payable on and after the second Monday of May 1861.
Certificates of Scrip for the year 1861 deliverable
on and after 1st June 1861.

CHARLES BRIGGS, President.
R. P. JANVIER, Secretary.

New Orleans, March 20, 1861.

Home Mutual Insurance Company of New Orleans.

OFFICE: 78, Camp Street,
Amount of premiums for year ending
31st December, 1861 433,725 47
Amount of Profits for year ending 31st
December, 1861 282,908 38
Amount of Assets on 31st December, 1861 1,338,306 77
The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of
FIFTY PER CENT., after paying Six per cent.
interest on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved
to redeem the Scrip of 1857.

Interest and redeemable Scrip, payable in cash on
and after 10th February next.

Certificates of Scrip, for the year 1861, deliverable
on and after 15th March, 1862.

A. BROTHER, President.
JAMES H. WHEELER, Secretary.

New Orleans, January 11, 1862.

Merchants' Mutual Insurance Com- pany of New Orleans.

At a meeting of the Board of Directors held this
day it was resolved to declare a Scrip dividend of TWENTY PER CENT., on the net earned premiums of the last year, and also to pay Six per cent.
interest on the outstanding Scrips of the Company. Scrip Certificates to be issued on and after the first day of August next.

DIRECTORS:

Geo. Connelly. J. N. Nevins.
John Pemberton. S. O. Nelson.
P. Maspero. C. H. Slocumb.
P. Poutz. F. Voorheer.
C. Honold. B. O. Vignaud.
G. Miltenberger.

CITIZENS' MUTUAL INSURANCE COMPANY
of New Orleans.

The Board of Trustees, have resolved to pay an interest of SIX PER CENT. in cash on the outstanding certificates of profits to the holders thereof,
or their legal representatives, on and after the
second Monday in February next; also, to declare a dividend of Twenty per cent. (20 per cent.) on the
net earned premiums of the Company, for the year
ending 30th November, 1861, for which certificates
will be issued on and after the second Monday in February next.

TRUSTEES:

Geo. W. West, Vice-
President.
D. Jamison.
A. Miltenberger.
J. Leisy.
Jas. A. White.
Douglas West.

M. Masson.
R. P. Hunt.
Martin Gordon, jun.
C. de la Riviere.
A. Bohn.
Muna Augustin.
Omer Gaillard.

WEBER BROTHERS,
Commission Merchants,
SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA, C.S.A.

PAYNE, HUNTINGDON AND
CO., NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A.,
Cotton Factors.

MOSES GREENWOOD, NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Cotton
Factor and Commission Merchant.

MCDOWELL, WITHERS, AND CO., MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A., Com-
mission Merchants.

GARLAND GOODE, MOBILE,
Cotton Factor and Commission Merchant.

BOYKIN AND McRAE, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

MILLER AND BATIE, Exchange
Brokers, MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

R. AND D. G. MILLS, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
GALVESTON, TEXAS, C.S.A.

ROTCHFORD, BROWN, AND
CO., Cotton Factors, NEW ORLEANS,
LOUISIANA, C.S.A.

R. W. RAYNE, NEW ORLEANS
LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Commission Merchant, offers facilities to European Consigners o Boots and Shoes to supply the markets of Louisi
see, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Alabama. Specifi
cations furnished of goods suitable to these markets.

ANDREW LOW AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

CHARLES GREEN,
Commission Merchant, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

H. D. WEDE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

JAMES CHAPMAN,
Commission Merchant, CHARLESTON.

N. A. HARDEE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

J. W. ANDERSON AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

R. N. GOURDINE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Charleston.

J. H. ASHBIDGE AND CO.,
Shipping and Commission Merchants, NEW Orleans—No. 80, lower-margins west, Liverpool.
Agents—Liverpool and New Orleans Mail Steam
Navigation Company.

S. A. PLUMMER AND CO.,
Importers and Dealers in Hardware,
PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA, C.S.A.

H. O. BREWER & CO.,
MOBILE, ALABAMA,
General Commission and Shipping Merchants.

WARWICK AND BARKSDALE,
GALLEGO FLOUR MILLS.
This immense establishment of capacity to manufacture 1000 barrels of Flour per day, purely for
South American Market. RICHMOND.

JOSEPH R. ANDERSON,
TREDEGAR IRON WORKS
Manufacturers of Locomotive and other Engines,
all descriptions of Machinery, Rifled Cannon, &c.
RICHMOND.

DUNLOP, MONCURE, & CO.,
General Commission Merchants,
RICHMOND.

A. G. MILWAINE, AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Tobacco, Cotton,
Grain, and other produce, PETERSBURG,
VIRGINIA.

C. W. WHITE,
Commission Merchant,
ST. THOMAS, WEST INDIES.

HAMILTON AND GRAHAM,
Importers, Wholesale Dealers in Dry
Goods, &c., PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA.

H. LEVY AND SON,
Commission Merchants, MOBILE.

Grescent Mutual Insurance Company,
New Orleans.
OFFICE:
Corner of Camp and Commercial Place.

TWELFTH ANNUAL STATEMENT.

Amount of Premiums for ten months
ending 30th April, 1861 831,876 14
Profits for ten months to 30th April,
1861 237,238 27
Assets, 30th April, 1861 1,442,959 95
The Trustees have declared a Scrip Dividend of THIRTY PER CENT., after paying interest at the
rate of Six per cent. per annum on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved to redeem Forty per cent.
of the issue of 1858, payable as follows:—
Twenty per cent. 16th June, 1861.
Twenty per cent. 1st September, 1861.
Scrip Certificates for the year 1861, deliverable on
and after the 12th day of August next.

THOMAS A. ADAMS, President.
G. W. SPRATT, Secretary.

The Index.

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS,
LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

Published every Thursday Evening.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

Subscriptions, Twenty-six Shillings per annum.
Stamped, Thirty Shillings per annum.

Nos. I. to XXV. NOW READY.

Office:—102, Fleet-street.

In this great metropolis, on the native soil of free speech and a free press, every interest—political social, religious, literary, scientific, benevolent
commercial, however remote, however small the
class to which it addresses itself—has long had its recognized representative in Journalism, through
which it seeks to obtain a share of the public attention. The one solitary exception has heretofore been in the case of the Confederate States of America. Engaged in a life-and-death struggle against a vastly superior foe—hemmed in on all sides, quite as effectually by the deserts of the Far West and of Mexico, as by the enemy's armies and navies—they suffer even more from that intellectual
blockade which excludes them from communion
with the rest of mankind, than from the commercial difficulties of obtaining their much needed
supplies. The disruption of the American Union—
despite repeated warnings—started Europe without at once awakening it to a full consciousness of the reality and importance of the event. So little had the internal politics of America entered into
the routine of European thoughts, that even now—when the effects are undonable and irrevocable—
the causes still remain a mystery and a riddle to by far the greater portion of the intelligent European public. When the catastrophe occurred, the Northern States had the ear of the Governments
and of the peoples; and so zealously have they retained it, so ingeniously and persistently have
they pleaded their cause, so imperfect and dis-
torting was the medium through which alone the South's voice could be heard, that Europe may fairly be said to have listened to but one side of the quarrel. It is true that the respectable portion of the English press has treated the weaker party in
that spirit of fair play upon which every English-
man prides himself; and, as the struggle progressed, has evinced a painstaking study of a perplexing subject, which stands in honourable contrast to the flippancy and indecorum of American Journalism. But this has not supplied the want, so long and keenly felt, of some organ of Southern interests and Southern opinions, to which the Statesman, the Journalist, the Merchant, and the
public at large might look for reliable intelligence
of the progress of events, and for valuable indications of the manner in which the South itself views
and weighs the importance and bearing of those
events.

This want it is one of the principal objects of
"THE INDEX" to supply as far as possible. The measure of success which may reward the effort will necessarily depend upon the co-operation of the friends, and of the private, as well as official, representatives of the South in Europe. This cooperation has been most generously accorded us.
There is a large amount of Southern intelligence
which reaches Europe through various private channels. Still more important information is obtained from Northern sources, which finds no
outlet through the muzzled press of those States.
Much of such valuable material has already been
placed at our disposal; and we have a reasonable
prospect of making "THE INDEX" the receptacle
and depository of all, or nearly all, that is available
in the United Kingdom and on the Continent. Our arrangements are such that our friends may rely on
this respect upon a scrupulous and sound discretion, and the inviolable sanctity of private
communications.

While we have thus frankly explained one of the principal objects of "THE INDEX," it may be misapprehension to state—in order to prevent a possible
misapprehension—that it is not the sole object.
Literature and General News—in fact, every ingredient of a Weekly Journal—will command our earnest attention; and it will be our unremitting
endeavour to make "THE INDEX" worthy of that
liberal patronage which is promised us in advance.
"THE INDEX" will be represented by competent Correspondents at the different capitals of the Continent, at Washington, and at Havannah. It is our design, also, that "THE INDEX" should partake of
the character of a Magazine, without departing
from its proper sphere as a Review of current
events.

For the leaders and literary contributions, we shall enjoy the valuable aid of the pens of gentlemen already favourably known to the public.

The Cotton Market will monopolize much of our
space, and is entrusted to hands theoretically and
practically familiar with the subject and all questions bearing upon it.

It is superfluous to add that "THE INDEX" is
necessarily committed to the advocacy of the principles of Free Trade.

Subscribers will be furnished with handsome
Covers for each Half-Yearly Volume.

A full list of the original "INDEX" Subscribers
and a carefully prepared Table of Contents will accompany the concluding number of each Volume.

Subscriptions and Advertisements to be sent, and
Post-office Orders made payable to

WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102, FLEET ST., E.C.

Printed by HENRY F. MACKINTOSH, of 11,
Crane-court, Fleet-street; and Published for
the Proprietors by WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102,
Fleet-street, London E.C., October 16, 1862.

THE INDEX

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS, LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

OFFICE:—102, FLEET STREET.

Vol. I—No. 26.]

LONDON—THURSDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 23, 1862.

[PRICE 6D.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE
NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK—
America	401
England	403
Europe	403
COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET—
Liverpool Letter	403
Manchester Letter	403
TOBACCO MARKET	403
LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH	404
FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE—
New York	404
Paris	404
Berlin	405
THREE MONTHS IN THE CONFEDERATE ARMY—
Mischief and its Cure	406
Conclusion	407
LEADERS—
The Want of a Policy	403
Northern Duplicity before the War	409
The Prussian Crisis	410
THE LOUISIANA PURCHASE	411
REVIEWS—
The Distinction of Races	413
America in the Quartermen	414
Short Notices	415
ADVERTISEMENTS	416

NOTICE.

From and after October 30, the Office of "THE INDEX" will be Removed to 13, Bouverie-street, Fleet-street.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

The telegrams from New York, as far as they relate to the war movements, are striking illustrations of the art of saying much and meaning little. The Northern accounts of battles are so much alike, that "ditto," with a change of names and places would be quite as accurate and intelligible.

At first the Confederates are always beaten and pursued; next day it is not quite certain whether the Confederates have left the battle-field; a few hours afterwards it is reported that the Federal loss was heavy, but, of course, not so heavy as that of the Confederates; and the victory, before it is forty-eight hours old, dwindles down to an "indecisive engagement." Such is the New York current history of the war, and it requires considerable care in finding the few grains of truth that are unwittingly mixed up with the heap of words.

It seems that an engagement took place at Corinth, Mississippi, on October 3 and 4. The Confederates, who are reported to have mustered 40,000, were under the command of Generals Price and Van Dorn; and the Federals, whose numbers are not stated, were commanded by General Rosencrantz. The first intimation we get of the result of the battle, is an official report of the Federal commander, in which he says,—"The enemy is in full retreat, leaving his dead and wounded. The loss is serious on the Federal side, particularly in officers; but bears no comparison with that of the enemy. Seven hundred Confederate prisoners captured." On the 7th inst. the latest official reports state, "The Federals captured two batteries and 300 prisoners." In twenty-four hours the number of prisoners is officially declared to be decreased from 700 to 300. As usual, it is added that the Confederates are "throwing everything away, and that the Federals are in sharp pursuit."

A later report makes the official statement we have quoted a little out of date. We are informed that the battle was resumed on Sunday, the very day on which General Rosencrantz, or General Halleck, says "the Confederates have been routed, and are in full retreat." This account claims up to Saturday night "nearly 1000 prisoners" for the Federals. Thus we have three statements of the number captured—300, 700, and nearly 1000. These despatches are worth notice, as they show the careless way in which the Northern authorities invent their accounts of battles.

General Grant, whose corps was attacked at the beginning of the fight, is one of the most modest commanders the world has seen. He telegraphs to the Secretary of War, "that the enemy cannot escape without losing everything but their side arms." Now, a Southern commander—albeit the Southerners are not given to boasting—would claim such an advantage as a decided victory. Not so General Grant, who "does not allege that the victory was decisive."

The latest news is that the battle was very severe, and that the Confederates succeeded in reaching the main public square of Corinth, "but new batteries were opened upon them, and they retreated." If we may judge of these accounts by others we have had from the North, we may conclude that the Federals did not gain a victory; that at the early part of the fighting they were driven back, and that the "hot pursuit," and the "throwing away arms," is about as true as was General Halleck's description of General Beauregard's evacuation of Corinth. Without further information, it would be premature to claim a Confederate victory; but from the Federal reports we gather that, if the Southerners did not win, it was a drawn battle. The Federal loss is admitted to have been severe, and especially amongst officers; and altogether this victory at Corinth reads so much like a Federal defeat, that even New York, ready to believe all things good of the Federal troops, is not elated by it. What confirms the suspicion of disaster is, that the last mail, which did not leave New York until the 11th inst., says very little about the battle of Corinth. If anything could have been said confirmatory of the Federal triumph, we may be sure it would not have been kept back.

From Perryville the accounts are "confused" and somewhat amusing. After being informed of a battle on the 9th, in which the Federals were victorious, and the Confederates had been routed and were being pursued, we are coolly informed, "The report of a battle having been fought at Perryville on the 9th inst. was incorrect. General Buell officially reports that an engagement occurred at Perryville on the 8th, lasting from 10 a.m. till dark. The enemy was repulsed, but not without some momentary advantage on the left. The main body of the enemy fell back in the direction of Harrodsburg. General Buell adds, 'Our loss is probably pretty heavy, including valuable officers.' The uncertainty about the loss is ominous; and possibly, when this last rumour is also corrected, it will be found that the Federals have sustained a severe defeat."

The Confederate forces have again entered Maryland. According to the telegram, "The Confederates under General Stuart have again crossed the Potomac, at Hancock, into Maryland. They pushed forward across the country, and yesterday occupied Mercersburg and Chambersburg, in Pennsylvania. Their force is estimated at 3000 men; their advance, consisting of 1000 cavalry and six pieces of artillery. The inhabitants of Mercersburg and Chambersburg had no means of resistance. The Governor of Pennsylvania is, however, sending troops up the Cumberland Valley." We can readily believe that this news "created great astonishment in New York." After all the assurances that the Confederates were retreating towards Richmond, and that General McClellan's army was following them up—after the congratulatory addresses about the Southern forces being driven out of Maryland—after the order of the Governor of Pennsylvania thanking the militia for having so effectively protected the State—it must be astonishing to hear that a Confederate force has crossed the Potomac, pushed through Maryland, and occupied two places in Pennsylvania. If General Stuart has no more than 3000 men with him, or if he has not been reinforced, it is possibly another of his brilliant exploits, which show the skill and daring of the Southerners, and the weakness or the want of precaution of the Federal Generals. Whatever may be the issue of this expedition, it is very reassuring to the friends of the South as to the position and strength of the Confederate army. Under date of October 11, evening, we are informed that—"Chambersburg, Pennsylvania, surrendered to the Confederates on the conditions that private property should be respected, but that public property would be removed or destroyed. The Confederates are moving in the direction of Gettysburg, to destroy the bridge at that point, and prevent the approach of General McClellan's troops."

Several skirmishes are reported, in which the Confederates "are routed," to which it is not worth while to refer in detail. They are devised to console the Northern public for the "victories" under Rosencrantz and Buell. It is also stated that General Morgan has been routed by General Damont at Frankfort; but without strong evidence no one will believe that the astute Confederate commander would place himself in a position from which he could not withdraw without being routed.

The significant item in the late news is that at New York gold is 27½ premium, and exchange 141, and that though money is abundant, stocks are lower.

In the Confederate Congress a resolution has been introduced, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase or impress one million bales of cotton at a fixed price, and also to send agents to Europe to sell this cotton. The resolution also proposes the repeal of all laws prohibiting the export of cotton from ports occupied by the enemy, when such cotton is purchased by foreign Governments or subjects.

The Ministers of the Central American Republics having protested against the colonization scheme being carried out in Central America, the Federal Government has abandoned it. What would become of the negroes if the North could become dominant, it is not easy to determine. They cannot be deported or transported, and they will not be allowed to live in the United States. The only plan in that case seems extermination.

It is reported that "General Bragg has issued a proclamation, urging the North-Western States to exercise their State sovereignty, and make a separate treaty of peace with the Confederates, as the Federal Government refused to conclude a general treaty. He declares that the South will never interfere with the free navigation of the Mississippi, and concludes by making a vigorous appeal to the people to desist from a war which he says can only, after greater sacrifices, terminate in a treaty of peace."

The State Legislature of Virginia has passed a resolution, declaring that no citizens shall be called to account for driving from the State or putting to death any person, with or without arms, who may be found aiding or abetting in giving effect to Mr. Lincoln's proclamation for freeing the slaves—a proclamation which the resolution stigmatizes as fiendish.

The conscription in the North is not making much progress. In Maine we are told it "has been nominally enforced, but each conscript was allowed to call himself a volunteer and to receive the usual bounty money." The Maine conscripts may be glad that they are allowed to call themselves volunteers, and get the bounty. It shows in what spirit the conscription is to be enforced.

The Count de Paris has addressed the following letter to General Sickles. The Count displays some judgment in selecting a fitting correspondent for his communication. Let France be grateful that no member of the Bourbons is likely to try his notion of "free institutions" in that country.

Claremont, Sept. 11, 1862.

My dear General,—I have just read the letter you wrote to the New York Times in answer to the misrepresentations circulated about our departure from America, and I hasten to thank you for having taken up the pen under these circumstances. Although we are accustomed to calumny, and despite it, nevertheless it is very gratifying to see the facts put in their true light, and our situation so well understood and so clearly explained, especially by a member of the army with whose destinies we have been associated during nearly a year. We shall always remember that campaign with the Army of the Potomac as one of the best and most interesting epochs of our youths. It is with regret that we left our companions in arms, and nothing can be more valuable to us than such testimonies of remembrance and esteem. I need not add that our hearty wishes still accompany them; that the distance has only strengthened the interest we take in the success of the great cause for which we fought together. Depend upon it, however ignorant and prejudiced may be the public at large, there are still on this side of the Atlantic some hearts who follow with emotion the struggle of a great and free nation for her institutions, and who cannot believe in the ultimate success of the efforts of a deluded minority to establish a new community whose corner-stone shall be so odious, so dangerous, and so precarious an institution as that of slavery. Before ending this letter (for the bad English of which I must apologize), let me still tell you, my dear General, how glad I should be to shake hands again with you, and to talk once more with you of your winter quarters in that wild corner of Maryland; or of the summer days when your tent was pitched on the field of battle of Fair Oaks! I beg you, my dear General, to believe me always very truly yours,

LOUIS PHILIPPE D'ORLEANS.

The Liverpool Albion states:—

Advices from New Orleans report the arrest of Mr. J. G. Lingham, a British subject, by General Butler, and his incarceration for three years in Fort Pickens, for being one of the directors of the Merchants' Bank, which, it is alleged, made some over-issues. The abolishing of habeas corpus leaves Mr. Lingham without a chance of being favourably heard, and the particulars have been sent to his relations in London for representation to the Government, who have, with becoming promptitude, sent out instructions to the Embassy at Washington. Until lately Mr. Lingham acted as Vice-Consul in New Orleans, and was partner in the firm of W. H. Haynes and Co. there. His brother, the rector of Lambeth, arrived in this town on Friday, and has been most assiduous in concerting measures for his brother's release.

ENGLAND.

At an agricultural meeting at Hereford, the Secretary of State for War took the opportunity of giving a direct contradiction to the language used at Newcastle by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Mr. Gladstone said that our neutrality had been so construed as to give an advantage to the North; and that the Southern leaders had "made an army, a navy, and what is more, a nation." Sir G. C. Lewis says:—

The Government of this country was placed in the position of having to choose between two opposite courses—viz., recognition of the Southern States on the one hand, and sympathy or alliance with the States of the Federal section of the Union on the other. Well, the Government avoided both those extremes. They had consistently and strenuously pursued a middle course of strict neutrality, and had abstained from giving direct or indirect countenance or assistance to either of the belligerent parties. (Hear, hear.) It had been said that great complaints had been made by the Government at Washington that the Government of England had not maintained this strict neutrality, because it had recognized the South as a belligerent Power; and it had been said that, by recognizing the South as a belligerent Power, we had departed from a strict line of neutrality. Now he (Sir G. Lewis) could not but think that, if any impartial person reflected on the course of this unhappy contest, he would come to the conclusion that no word of the English language would apply with greater aptitude to the Southern States than the word "belligerents." These parties had combined for the purpose of carrying on a war; and when they looked to the number of armed men they had raised—when they looked to the large armies they had brought into the field, to the ability of the generals by whom those armies were commanded, and to the pertinacity with which the contest on their part had been waged—it could not, surely, be denied that they deserved the name of "belligerent" in reference to the manner in which they had carried on the war against the United States. Under these circumstances, it seemed to him (Sir G. Lewis) that a more unfounded charge could not have been made against the Government of this country than that of having departed from the principle of strict neutrality by recognizing the Southern States as belligerents. (Hear, hear.) But when the Government was asked to go a step further, and to say that the Southern States have constituted themselves an independent Power, then it seemed to him that international law would not be on our side. Everybody who read the accounts in the newspapers of what was doing in America could see that, although there was a war there between these two contending Powers, it was a war which was as yet undecided—a war which was waged on the part of the Northern States for the purpose of restoring the States to the condition of union they were in before the war began; and on the part of the Southern States it was a war to establish their independence. But the war must be admitted to be undecided. The battle-fields were still reeking with the blood of thousands of soldiers killed on both sides; and until the war had been decided on one side or the other, or until it had been decided so far in favour of the Southern States as to induce the Northern States to recognize their independence, or to prove to foreign States that the contest was exhausted, and that the Northern States were incapable of continuing the contest—until that moment arrived, it could not be said, in accordance with the established doctrines of international law, that the independence of the Southern States had been established. (Hear, hear.) He believed it was the general opinion of the people of this country that the contest would issue in the establishment of the independence of the South. He himself did not express that opinion, but that was the general opinion in this country. Let them look to the state of things established between the parties. It could not be said that the Southern States of the Union had de facto established their independence. That being a matter of notoriety, he could not think they were guilty of any neglect in not recognizing the independence of the Southern States.

The members for North Essex, who may be considered to represent the independent or malcontent section of the Conservative party, enjoyed on Friday last their annual opportunity of addressing a large gathering of their most influential constituents. Major Beresford, as the senior member, took the lead. He regretted the attempt made to throw out the Government by an amendment to Mr. Stanfield's motion for retrenchment, and hinted that the Opposition might, had that question been pushed to a division, have manifested signs of internal disunion. He justified the Revised Code of the Education Office, and gloried in the defeat of the Anti-church rate party. The bill of Sir J. Trevelyan was thrown out by one vote—the vote which the gallant Major, though crippled with gout, went down to the House to record. He approved the neutral policy of the Government in regard to the American war, and admired the energy with which Lord Palmerston (his lordship always gets the credit of such acts of the Ministry as Conservatives commend) had acted in the case of the Trent. He expressed a personal sympathy with the South, and remarked that, as an agricultural people struggling with enemies chiefly addicted to commercial pursuits, the Confederates excited the interest of English agriculturists. With a sneer at the Irish emigrants who are trying to escape the American conscription, and a warm commendation of the heroic patience of the Lancashire operatives, Major Beresford sat down, and Mr. Du Cane succeeded him. This gentleman attacked Mr. Gladstone with considerable severity, excused the alleged differences of opinion in the Conservative ranks, displayed a remarkable acquaintance with the "Hand-book of Poetical Quotations," and an equally remarkable ignorance upon American affairs:—

We required all our faith in the doctrine of neutrality to prevent our re-echoing—much, indeed, as we appreciated it in private—Mr. Roebuck's cry for intervention. But, however tempting the doctrine of intervention might be, the hour in his (Mr. Du Cane's) humble opinion, had not come, and he trusted the hour never would come, to talk about intervention; and he would say, instead of abandoning that doctrine of neutrality which we had regarded hitherto as the polestar of our foreign policy, let us rather seize this great moment of its trial to test our enduring faith in its correctness. If we were to break the blockade to-morrow, and set free once more the commerce of the South, he believed it would be months, perhaps years, before any available supply of cotton could be brought to bear upon our manufacturing districts; and long before that time one of two things must inevitably happen,—either, on the one hand, the North must wake from its dream of madness, and recognize the great truth which we have long maintained, that the Union for which it was contending was "the baseless fabric of a vision," or, on the other, the prolonged, successful, and, in many features, heroic resistance of the South would earn for it the protection of the civilized world as an independent Power."

This is about the most complete collection of errors and inconsistencies, in a few words, that we have lately seen. If the blockade were broken, what should prevent cotton from coming forward? And if Europe is to remain neutral, how is the South, as an independent Power, to receive the protection of the civilized world? The members for North Essex have given great pleasure to the Globe and the Times, and have been somewhat caustically treated by the Conservative organs. The Morning Herald remarks that

A demonstration of the opinions of Messrs. Beresford and Du Cane is one thing, and a Conservative demonstration is another; and we are inclined to think of the two the latter would have been the more useful at the present moment.

Mr. Lindsay, at Chertsey, referred to Mr. Gladstone's Newcastle speech, and to that of Sir G. C. Lewis, at Hereford. He said:—

I think that the day is not far distant when humanity will demand that the great Powers of Europe shall step forward to stay the fierce carnage that is going on, and recognize in the family of nations a people who have shown themselves to be a nation. (Loud cheers.) I do not mean to say that England should do so alone; that could not be expected of her. But I have good reason to believe that some at least of the great Powers of Europe have felt for some time that the Southern Confederacy ought to be received into the family of nations. (Cheers.) And if they are not received into the family of nations, I have reason to believe that the barrier which stops the way is not any of the great Powers of Europe—is not the unanimous Cabinet of England, but is a section of that Cabinet—that the recognition of the Southern States by the great Powers of Europe is delayed in a greater degree than people suppose by that section of the Cabinet to which I am alluding. (Hear, hear.) The words of Sir Cornwall Lewis were, indeed, remarkable. He—evidently to some extent opposed to the views of his eminent colleague—remarked that, according to international law, the Powers of Europe can hardly recognize the Southern States until the Northern States have done so. If we wait—or rather, if the great Powers of Europe wait —until the Northern States recognize the Southerners as an independent nation, this terrible war, from which we are great sufferers, may not be ended for the next quarter of a century. For how is it carried on? The generals in the Northern army say they will carry on the war until the whole of the people of the Southern States, consisting of 9,000,000 or 10,000,000, are exterminated—till they are swept from the face of the earth, black and white alike—till God's fairest image in this fair world is laid low in the dust, and there remains nothing but a desert for the armies of the North to march over. (Hear, hear.) If these are the opinions of a large section of the Northern people—and they appear to me to be the opinions of the mass of the people in the North—we may well ask when is this war to end? But I think the question is practically settled now. Let us for a moment consider the progress of that war. The Northern States asked for a certain time to allow them to restore the broken Union—to bring the men of the South back to their allegiance. They did, by virtue of the superior force of their fleet, gain possession of New Orleans. When they got hold of the great capital of the South they found no Union sentiment there. What were the words of the Mayor of New Orleans? "By strength of arms you have gained possession of our town—we are at your feet—deal with us as you please—but we tell you that we are determined to govern ourselves and be an independent people. Your taxes we will not pay, your flag we will not hoist, your laws we will not respect." Has any Union sentiment been displayed in that great capital? None whatever. By force of arms the Northerners acquired positions in the South, but the Southerners, standing upon the defensive, have harried them back, saying, "The soil is ours, and we will drive our invaders from it." They have shown that they can maintain their position against the fearful odds of the North. They have shown by their statesmen, and the mode in which they conduct their affairs, that they are to all intents and purposes a nation. Now let me ask this question. It is said that the Powers of Europe must not interfere until one party or the other gives way. Now, I should like to know, looking at the present aspect of affairs, when either party is likely to give way? Is there one man in a thousand in this country who thinks that the broken Union can be restored? I believe there is not. On the other hand, is there any probability, I may say any possibility, of the North conquering the South? I believe there is not; and the best proof of that is the language of the people themselves, and above all the proclamation of the Government of Washington. They admit in this proclamation that they are unable to bring back the South to the Union. Is not their proclamation a proof that their cause is a hopeless one, and that they cannot restore the Union by constitutional means? They sweep away the Habeas Corpus Act, they proclaim a servile war, and declare that they will protect the slaves in any measures which they may deem necessary for securing their freedom—for that is in reality the effect of the proclamation. In this state of things, seeing as we do the Constitution trampled under foot, hearing what the people of the Northern States say, and feeling that we are suffering to a large extent by this wicked, this worthless war, I do think the time has arrived when the nations of Europe should step forward and do this at least—exercise the power which they have a perfect right to exercise, and that we should receive at the Court of St. James's the gentleman whom these ten millions of independent people have sent here to express to us their grievances and their wrongs. But it may be asked, if the Powers of Europe were to recognize the South, would that bring about a termination of the war? Now, I have always entertained the opinion that such would be the effect. The war is waged on the part of the North to put down the rebellion, as it is called, and to restore the Union. Now, if the Southern States were acknowledged, the people would no longer, in the eyes of Europe, be considered rebels, but would be looked upon as an independent nation. The object of the people in the North would be gone, and they would begin to ask themselves, "What are we waging war for? It is no longer in the face of Europe to put down rebellion, or to restore a Union which, in their opinion, is gone, and gone for ever." I am thoroughly convinced that the moral effect of the recognition of the Southern States would be such that the sword in the North would be loosened in its grasp, and that this terrible war would soon cease.

Mr. Lindsay concluded his speech, which was loudly cheered throughout, by warning the Government against trifling with the sufferings, and presuming too far upon the patience, of the starving operatives of Lancashire.

The increase of pauperism in the manufacturing districts was larger last week than for some time past. There were more than 7000 fresh paupers; 1600 in Manchester, 1000 in Blackburn, and 1900 in Ashton-under-Lyne. The case of the last-mentioned town is particularly distressing. There are two Relief Committees, one of which seems to have been got up in a species of hostility to the other. The first Committee has shown some jealousy of ministers of religious denominations, though it placed on its list of members, at the suggestion of Lord Derby, the senior clergyman, the senior Catholic priest, and the senior Dissenting preacher of the town. This jealousy may have been at the bottom of the schism; which is now kept up, apparently, only in the hope of support from the Mansion-house Committee to the party which does not possess either the confidence of the town, or that of the Executive Committee in Manchester. It is a great pity that the Lord Mayor should have persisted in his refusal to hand over the funds at his disposal to the last-named body; as the existence of two centres of distribution is not calculated to promote either harmony or economy. The effect of the Ashton-under-Lyne disputes has been to prevent the place, which is in extreme need, receiving any aid from the London Committee.

We have called attention before now to the peculiarly painful position of the overlookers, who, as men of a higher class than the bulk of the operatives, and accustomed to situations of trust and authority, feel with especial keenness the degradation of having to apply for relief, parochial or eleemosynary. They are now making an effort to obtain assistance to emigrate. This appears to us a sad mistake. Valuable as they would be to any country, they are not peculiarly adapted to a colonial life; and they will be much wanted in this country when trade revives, as one day it must do. Emigration is a remedy for permanent over-population, not for temporary trouble, however severe.

At the weekly meeting of the Manchester Executive Committee, it was announced that £5500 had been received, and that £5000 more was expected from Australia; that Birmingham had given £6000, and would probably give £2000 more; and that £800 had been collected in the churches of the diocese of Bath and Wells. (It appears, further, that £25,000 has been subscribed in India.) Mr. Farnall, Poor Law Special Commissioner, made the following report:—

My tabular report for this week on twenty-four unions in the cotton manufacturing districts shows that there is an increase in the number of persons receiving parochial relief as compared with the numbers so relieved last week of 7845 persons.

There are now 176,483 persons receiving parochial relief in the unions adverted to; in the corresponding week of last year 43,801 persons were so relieved; there is, therefore, an increase of 132,682 persons in the receipt of parochial relief, or 302.9 per cent.

The total weekly cost of outdoor relief is now £10,648 13s. 8d.; in the corresponding week of last year it was £2191 9s. 8d.; there is, therefore, an increase of £8457 4s., or 386 per cent.

The average percentage of pauperism on the population of these unions is now 9.2 per cent.; in the corresponding week of last year it was 2.3 per cent.

The average amount of out-door relief per head per week in these unions is now 1s. 3½d.; the lowest amount is 11½d.; and the highest is 1s. 8d.

On the 13th inst. I reported that during the five preceding weeks the increase of persons in the receipt of parochial relief in the above unions was 27,823 persons. This sixth report gives an additional increase of 7,845 persons, so that in six consecutive weeks 35,668 persons have become paupers in these unions.

I have now received authentic reports from the hon. secretaries of forty-seven local committees formed in the cotton manufacturing districts for the distribution of charitable aid, and I am enabled to state that in the forty-seven districts adverted to the number of operatives and workpeople usually employed is 352,240; that of this number 79,654 were when the reports were dated in full work, that 129,114 were working short time, and that 143,172 were wholly unemployed; and, further, that the loss of wages in these forty-seven districts amounted to £117,112 per week. The township of Preston is included in this return.

The Bishop of Exeter has directed that collections shall be made in the churches of his diocese.

An operatives' meeting has been held in Salford, at which some very unreasonable complaints were made against the Guardians of the Poor and the Relief Committee. The speakers objected to the giving of relief in tickets authorizing the bearers to receive articles of food from shopkeepers, instead of in money—a very just and necessary precaution; and also reviled the Committee for reserving large funds in hand, instead of distributing the moneys in their hands as fast as they are received. But this is an isolated case of misconduct and folly; the general behaviour of the operatives continues to be unimpeachable.

Another anti-Garibaldi riot has taken place at Birkenhead; this time without the slightest provocation. A private debating society were about to discuss the question of the late expedition to Rome in a schoolroom belonging to a church. The Irish rabble, which abounds in the place, got scent of this, and attacked the building. The riot continued for some days, the police were overpowered and maltreated, and the magistrates had not the courage to read the Riot Act, and call on the military to enforce order. It is a strange fact that while no one can accuse of timidity the class from which either is taken, the two cowardliest things in England are its magistrates and its mobs.

While his countrymen were thus demeaning themselves in the neighbourhood of Liverpool, Sir Robert Peel's "mannikin traitor," the O'Donoghue, has appealed to Irish sympathy for the ruffians who, well-provided with bludgeons of murderous weight, attacked and broke up the meeting in Hyde Park, and whom he represents as victims of English persecution. It is much to be feared that these outrages on the civil liberty of English Protestants will provoke retaliation on the Irish, and a popular reaction against the religious liberty accorded to the Catholics. Certainly no people ever showed themselves more utterly unworthy of freedom, and no religionists, save and except the Covenanting assassins of Scotland, and the bloodthirsty Puritans of Massachusetts, ever did so much to justify the suppression of their tenets by the strong arm of the law. It cannot be tolerated that Irish mobs should interfere with English freedom of discussion on all subjects, religious and political; and if the Government do not take strong measures to enforce the law, it is tolerably clear that the people will ere long take it into their own hands. The conduct of the Home Secretary is, as usual, simply imbecile; in no other country than this, and by no other than a Whig Administration, would the continuance of such a man in office be endured. The patience with which the country bears the blundering incapacity of one-half the Cabinet, and the eccentric conduct of the remainder, is the strongest testimony that could be possibly given to the personal popularity of the Premier.

If a man's own words were a nourishing diet, Lord Russell ought to have acquired a much more substantial figure than he actually enjoys. He has repeatedly admitted that the Germanic Confederation has nothing whatever to do with the Danish Duchy of Schleswig; yet he has recently written a despatch to the Danish Government, in which he disapproves of the inclusion of Schleswig in the common Constitution of the kingdom of Denmark, and seems to lend his countenance to the claims which Prussia is disposed to advance upon the Duchy. The Danish Government has given to his impudent advice a reply more courteous than it deserves, but conveying a decided and final negative. His lordship had better understand distinctly that he will not be allowed to use the influence of England adversely to a nation more closely akin to us than any other, and in which Englishmen generally feel a deeper interest than in any country except, perhaps, Portugal, "our ancient and faithful ally."

The following very diplomatic reply has been given to a Mr. Moore, who "wanted to know what Mr. Gladstone thinks about slavery:—

11, Downing-street, Whitehall, Oct. 17.

Sir,—I am desired by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to acknowledge the favour of your letter of the 13th inst.; and I am to say that he hopes that the policy of this country will never be directed to the support or encouragement of slavery; but, in viewing the conflict which now rages in America, we must all, Mr. Gladstone thinks, wish it were in our power, by friendly means, to stop the effusion of human blood.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

Mr. W. L. Moore.

CHARLES L. RYAN.

EUROPE.

FRANCE.—"In the interest of the policy of conciliation, which he has laboured so loyally to carry out," M. Thouvenel has received from the Emperor a courteous dismissal. His successor, M. Drouyn de Lhuys is a man of far higher calibre. He resigned when the Emperor declined to carry out the policy of peace which he had advocated in 1855, and has since remained aloof from the Government. But he is supposed to represent the reactionary party in foreign politics, and his appointment is considered of evil augury for the Italian cause. At the same time, other changes of a similar complexion are made in the corps diplomatique. M. Benedetti is recalled from Turin; and M. de Lavalette is succeeded at Rome by the Prince de Latour d'Auvergne, who was accredited in a semi-official capacity to the Pope when at Gaeta, and who is suspected of anti-Italian tendencies. Rumours are rife of an impending Ministerial crisis at Turin; the consequence of this death-blow to the hopes which M. Rattazzi has taught his countrymen to entertain from his personal influence with the Emperor.

GERMANY.—The Prussian Government has followed up its coup d'état—if the dismissal of the Chambers is so to be considered—by severe measures of repression towards the press. Several newspapers are daily seized, and numbers of prosecutions have been instituted against journalists. This is a dangerous course, and should it be extended, and efforts be made to restrain the liberty of meetings for political discussion, as is generally apprehended, the consequences may be serious. The leaders of the Liberal party are very anxious to prevent outbreaks; but there are limits to the influence of leaders, and the patience of parties, in such crises as that through which Prussia is now passing.

In reply to deputations which have waited upon His Majesty to present Royalist or "Conservative" addresses, the King delivered the following remarkable speech:—

I am happy to see before me an assemblage of men all animated by the same sentiment, and come from all parts of the monarchy, especially in times so difficult as these. There exists a serious crisis, more serious than I had thought it could possibly become.

From the moment when I assumed the Regency, and put myself at the head of the Government, I placed my firm hope in the confidence of my people. But my words at that period have often been misinterpreted, because a misleading press had altered them. I am deeply convinced of the necessity of undertaking a task wholly belonging to me—the reform of the army, and of finishing it. It is against this very task, which is mine, that the most unexpected obstacles have been raised.

But what can avail all present wealth, all the development of industry—what can avail all the good things that God has given us, if there is no means of protecting them when they are threatened?

Seldom has any enterprise been attacked as that task has been which I began with a view to the protection and the prosperity of my country. It is true I was obliged to ask for it sacrifices on the part of my people; but I am fully convinced that those sacrifices were not excessive, as the financial statement demonstrates.

Where the demands might appear in reality too onerous I was ready to lighten them. To that end I consented to the suppression of the additions to the taxes. But has there been gratitude for this? On the contrary, the Chamber of Deputies voted an address which contained anything but thanks. This causes me much pain.

As you have remarked, it is not the transformation of the army which forms the point of attack properly speaking; but the mark is elsewhere. The intentions, at first disguised, have become partly unmasked.

I wish to conserve the Constitution ictegrally to my people; but it is also my invincible determination to keep unimpaired the crown transmitted to me by my ancestors, and the constitutional rights of that crown; this is necessary in the interest of my people.

For this, as well as for the protection of the good things mentioned above, there must be a permanently well-constituted army, and not a pretended popular army, which, as a Prussian has not feared to say, is to be the support of the Parliament. I am firmly resolved to yield nothing more of the rights which have been transmitted to me. Tell this to your constituents.

It seems not improbable that the result of the Prusso-French commercial treaty will be the dissolution of the Zollverein, and the formation of a South-German Customs Union, on protection principles, in which Austria will be included. This would be an inconvenience to Europe, and possibly a misfortune to Germany. But Prussia has brought it upon herself, by acting independently of her confederates; and the indignation of the South-German States is very natural, considering the treatment they have received.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, October 22.

The great depression noted in my last report continued unabated on Thursday and Friday, the sales each day reached barely a thousand bales, and a further decline of ½d. was submitted to in Surats. Fair Dhollerahs were down as low as 15½ to 16d., and one sale from the quay was reported at 15½d. The Scotia's news on Saturday did not attract much attention, but a rather better tone was shown in the market, and the sales reached 2500 bales. The improvement chiefly proceeded from exporters buying more freely under the impression that prices would not decline further. On Monday the sales reached 3000 bales; and on Tuesday 4000, the prices for Surats gradually hardening. In Manchester a better tone was also displayed, and more hopeful views taken of the future; and to-day the business in our market reaches 6000 bales at rather higher prices, making an advance of a full half-penny from the low sales last week in Surats. In American cotton, scarcely any business has been done in the last few days. Yesterday no sales whatever were recorded, and to-day only 100 bales; the price of Middling Orleans may be put nominally at 26d. In Surats the quotations may be given as 16½ to 16½ for Fair Dhollerah, 16½ to 16½ for Omrawuttee, 16½ for Comptah, 18½ for Broach, and 20½ for Sawginned Dharwar.

The City of Baltimore's news is to hand to-day, reporting some fighting in Kentucky, without a decisive result; and announcing that a resolution had been offered to the Confederate Congress to empower the Government to impress one million bales of cotton and offer it for sale to foreign nations, permitting it to be shipped through ports in enemy's hands. Considerable attention has been called to this motion, and various conjectures put forward as to its import and object. But it is difficult to see how it can be of any practical avail. It is not to be supposed that the Federals in New Orleans would permit cotton sold by the Confederate Government, to be shipped unmolested, and the proceeds applied to furnish their enemies with the sinews of war.

It is evident that the proposition is futile so far as ports in the hands of the Federals are concerned, and at other ports it only authorises that contraband shipment which has been already practised as far as the blockade permitted.

It is not improbable, however, that this motion may be so construed as to damp the market.

MANCHESTER, Tuesday, October 21

The tone of our market is rather stronger, and the general feeling somewhat more confident since the close of last week; but at the same time, although the inquiry for yarns, and still more for cloth, is a little more animated, we can hardly report any increase in the amount of business doing, which in all departments still continues on the most limited scale.

Yarns appear in general to be very firmly held, and since Friday prices exhibit increasing steadiness, but the demand, although not so depressed as at the close of last week, is still, both for the home trade and for export, extremely languid, and has led to a very inconsiderable amount of business to-day. For doubled yarns there is scarcely any inquiry; and we hear of no transactions. The finer counts continue generally steady, but the medium and lower numbers are flat, and slightly worse to sell.

Goods are very firm, and little desire is shown by manufacturers to press sales. Some sellers report more inquiry for India shirtings, &c., and also for T. cloths and L. cloths for the Levant; but it does not appear to have produced any business, and the total amount of transactions seems to have been quite insignificant, although the tendency of the market has been slightly in favour of sellers.

TOBACCO MARKET.

LONDON, October 23.

The market strong, with a prevailing idea that prices will advance.

In stemmed the business has been very limited—for leaf the demand has been fair, as well for home trade as for exportation—there is an evident desire to purchase for re-sale; but holders are indisposed to offer in quantity. Manufactured is scarcely offered—holders expect a still higher scale of prices towards the close of the year.

LATEST DIRECT INTELLIGENCE FROM THE SOUTH.

The following is a list of State prisoners confined at Fort Delaware by Ministerial warrants from Washington:—

H. Gaskins, North Carolina; B. Colbert, North Carolina; Z. McMath, North Carolina; Liet. John Cornelius, North Carolina; Reuben Sexton, North Carolina; K. S. Lewis, North Carolina; P. T. Johnson, South Carolina; John Duncan, South Carolina; E. T. Wade, South Carolina; Barfield Powers, South Carolina; Adam Carter, South Carolina; Isaac Carter, South Carolina; Lafayette Wakefield, South Carolina; B. Hough, South Carolina; Herbert Hanchan, South Carolina; — Hughston, South Carolina; — Livingston, Florida; — McCleodon, Georgia; J. L. Greer, Virginia; — Forney, Virginia; Lieut. Justin Sowers, Virginia; H. K. Gregg, Wm. P. Smith, John T. Dowel, B. Buck, S. S. Sarvis, A. B. Hudson, J. A. Farmer, S. H. Collins, C. P. Wilson, E. N. Jeanneret, S. C. White, Wm. Savage, J. R. Gihbs, Jno. McGrath, W. P. Hare, W. M. Wescott, S. M. Jordan, Robert T. Kelly, Phillip Ritchie, David McGrath, Leander Carlisle, Townsend Henton, J. S. Lynn, M. Welch, C. D. Blackburn, J. R. P. Wall, J. W. Gay, H. Peyton, Robert Hamilton, J. W. Wason, A. H. Lawyer, Robert Barr, Charles Greaves, Jno. Byrne, D. D. Dobatch, Wm. Russ, D. Hamilton, J. O. Martin, Francis Clymer, Daniel Clymer, Ignace Matuski, J. A. Barron, Jackson Berlin, J. B. Barclay, Jos. Parsons.

We are permitted to make the following extracts from a letter written by a high official personage in Richmond, under date of September 15:—

The battle-fields have given us 30,000 additional stands of arms since May 1; importation through the blockade, about 25,000 more. If we can continue at this rate for only three months more, there will be nothing left to desire, and we shall be able to arm all the new conscripts we may need. * * * The new levies of 600,000 men for Lincoln's army will probably require additional exertions on our part; but we have long since ceased to fear for the result. The term of enlistment of one-half of that number will expire before they can be brought into the field against us, and the other 300,000 will barely bring up the Federal armies to their old standard.

THE CONFEDERATE STATES STEAMER ORETO OR FLORIDA.

The Charleston Mercury gives the following interesting information concerning this vessel, which recently entered the harbour of Mobile, under peculiarly trying circumstances:—

The Augusta and Atlanta papers publish a despatch from Mobile, announcing the arrival of "an iron-clad man-of-war" at that port. The statement is incorrect. A special correspondent at Mobile furnishes us with some authentic information in regard to the arrival referred to. The vessel is the steam corvette Oreto, now called the Florida, and is not an iron-clad. Our readers are aware of the difficulties which the commander of this ship encountered at Nassau, owing to the rigour of the British neutrality regulations. Having finally escaped from the clutches of the Court of Admiralty, Captain Maffit steamed away to the Gulf, and boldly ran the gauntlet of the blockaders at the mouth of Mobile Bay, in broad daylight, on the 4th inst. The captain was at the time sick with fever, as was most of her small crew of thirteen men. The Florida ran within sixty yards of the Yankee vessels, and her sides are peppered all over with shrapnel and grape shot. One eleven-inch shell went through her sides a foot above the water line, and lodged in the "coal bunkers." The Florida is a beautiful and well-armed corvette of great speed. Her armament consists of eight guns. Her dash through the blockaders, with a sick crew of only thirteen men, in broad daylight, is one of the most daring naval exploits of the war. The Florida did not fire a shot, as her crew were unable to man even a single gun. She had one killed and two wounded. She now lies below the city in quarantine.

Foreign Correspondence.

(From our Commercial Correspondent.)

NEW YORK, October 10.

It is said that "figures cannot lie;" neither can they when properly placed or fully told. Some people tell falsehoods by making misstatements, others by withholding the "whole" truth; the latter is the puritanical method of deception, and as Mr. Salmon P. Chase belongs to that "good" breed, he follows its precepts. Some time ago he favoured us with an account of Federal finances, up to May 29, now he gives us a statement for the three months ending June 30, or thirty-two days later, that he calls "receipts and expenditures of the United States," which, to a careless reader would look like a schedule of the indebtedness of the Washington Government; but not so, while he candidly admits that the estimate does not include "trust funds," nothing whatever is said about the vast sums that have not yet appeared on the books of the Treasury department, and are in the meanwhile represented by quarter-masters' receipts, colonel's vouchers, and a quantity of other methods too numerous to mention. Yet the newspapers upon the faith of the partial figures furnished, boldly state that the cost of the war is thus $800,000,000; they may dodge the matter about as much as they like however, but the truth is that at least one hundred millions of dollars per month have been squandered, and when we get at the full particulars, even this stupendous amount may be much increased.

The bubble is continuing to enlarge in size, and will burst before long. Gold has touched 29, and exchange 41 per cent. The bankers and importers are head over ears in debt to their correspondents in Europe, and are now hastening forward remittances; they appear to be getting rid of their stupidity, and are endeavouring to save as much from the wreck as possible. It is likely that the exportation of the precious metals will be prohibited before November 1, when Mr. Chase has more interest to pay in specie.

Military affairs are all favourable for the Confederates, at this time they are better off for arms than the Federalists; they are, no doubt, short of luxuries and certain descriptions of clothing.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, October 21.

We have had an exciting, and I may say, an uneasy time of it since I last wrote. There has been a ministerial crisis—the friends of the Pope are in a state of exultation; the friends of Italy have been downhearted and the outsiders, the general public, have been amazed, anxious, and all at sea as to what was going on. To give an elaborate account of the crisis would be tedious, but a few words to lay the whole affair before you will not be unacceptable, as I perceive that, with two exceptions, the Herald, and the Post, your daily contemporaries have not kept the British public au courant of the very serious change in the Imperial policy, which has been looming in the distance for some months past, and which now seems to have come to a head.

Early in August last a new journal was started, called La France. Its founder and manager was no less a personage than M. de la Guernonière, a gentleman who has received the nick-name of the Emperor's porte-plume, it being well known that his ready pen was employed in editing the rough notes of his Majesty, which startled the world at the beginning of 1859 and 1860, under the form of pamphlets. No one has forgotten "Napoleon III., et l'Italie," or "Le Pape et le Congrès," and bearing in mind these remarkable brochures the public naturally looked to the columns of La France for an exposition of the Emperor's intentions. In one sense the public were not disappointed. From the very first day, M. de la Guernonière proclaimed to allow the Italians to go to Rome, would be sacrificing the interests of France, and in a series of articles which created a perfect storm of disapprobation among the liberal party laid down a comprehensive plan for the partition of Italy into two kingdoms—one north to belong to Victor Emmanuel, the other south to belong to some other prince, "to be designated hereafter,"—and the Pope to remain between the two, with Rome and the Patrimony of St. Peter, like a piece of ham between two not over-well buttered crusts. In the event of this proposal not being approved of by a Congress which was to be summoned for this purpose, M. de la Guernonière gravely declared, that the French troops must indefinitely remain at Rome. Well, this plan was denounced, both by the Clericals who deemed the share of the Pope too small, and by the Liberals, who appeared to consider that France had no right to partition Italy. It was thought strange that the Moniteur said nothing—it was whispered that an illustrious lady, whose name it would be a profanation to drag into politics, had succeeded in converting her august consort to her own views on the Papal question, and neat epigrams were fired at poor M. de la Guernonière, who was taunted with having degenerated into Juno's peacock, after having been the thunder beaver of Jove. At the same time M. Thouvenel's friends in Paris—and he has many friends—made no secret of that Minister's determination to resign if the eternal Roman question were not speedily settled. Matters stood thus, when the Moniteur published (on the 25th ult.) the three remarkable State papers, written in May last, which filled with exultation both the friends of Italy, and the friends of the Pope. The documents in question containing arguments enough to establish conclusively either position. The report, meanwhile, of M. Thouvenel's retirement continued to gain ground, and matters stood thus when the Emperor returned from Biarritz to St. Cloud. Two Cabinet councils were held, but nothing appeared to be decided about Rome, when last Tuesday afternoon, just as the Bourse was about to close, a rumour spread like wild-fire that sent Rentes down one per cent. M. Fould had resigned; M. de Persigny had resigned; M. Thouvenel had resigned. A military man was about to be made Minister of the Interior, and the "plan" of M. de la Guernonière was about to be carried out.

Now the public (I mean the general public, whose sympathies for Italy are of the least pronounced character), cared comparatively little about M. Thouvenel; M. de Persigny's loss would have been viewed with equanimity; but M. Fould! M. Fould who is looked upon as the plank which stands between the country and the gulf of bankruptcy, whose tight hold of the purse strings is considered a guarantee of peace abroad, and prosperity at home; if M. Fould resigns, then indeed all hopes of peace, prosperity, the extension of liberal reform, the reorganization of the finances—in fact, all the hopes which M. Fould's appointment had raised, and which his administration has to a great extent confirmed must be given up.

The Moniteur on Thursday, somewhat calmed down the apprehensions for which there was too much cause, by announcing the appointment of M. Drouyn de Lhuys to the Foreign Office, vice Thouvenel—but as I write it is not known with any degree of certainty whether the other ministers named above, Fould and Persigny, will consent to remain in—Persigny solus as I have said before, is held to be very cheap, but it is understood that his departure would at no distant period involve that of his financial colleague. That both tendered their resignations, I am able to assure you, but the natural inference from the silence of the Moniteur on the subject, and from the assurances of the Semi-official press that M. Drouyn de Lhuys will merely continue to offer "de sages conseils" to the Court at Rome, is that they have withdrawn them pro tem on the understanding that there would be no decided change in the policy of the Government.

The Emperor is fully alive to the movements of public opinion, and the panic caused by the mere report of the resignation of M. Fould may have induced him to pause before committing himself to a policy which would not only deprive him of the services of that Minister, but estrange from him the great mass of his liberal supporters, the Democratic Bonapartists. This, however, is merely a conjecture. All we know is that the Moniteur has only announced the resignation of M. Thouvenel; that it may not announce those of M. de Persigny and M. Fould before the week is over is but a hope.

M. Drouyn de Lhuys, the new Foreign Secretary, enjoys high reputation as a diplomatist, and universal esteem as a man of integrity and character. He owes this prestige to a feeling which has become a rare one among French statesmen of a certain class who seem to look upon principles as aeronaunts look upon the ballast in a balloon, a thing to be thrown overboard when they want to rise. He has never sacrificed his convictions to his place. He amazed his official friends in 1855 when he threw up his portfolio in consequence of the Emperor's refusing to ratify the convention he had agreed to at Vienna, for the settlement of the Crimean war; and in the following year, in consequence of a public rebuke to the Senate for doing so little work for its money, he resigned his place in that illustrious assembly—a sacrifice which his colleagues looked upon as heroic, and, indeed, to them with their peculiar notions, it must have appeared Quixotic. It is not to be supposed that such a man had taken office as a mere head clerk, and there can be no doubt that he has come to some understanding with the Emperor as to the policy which is to be pursued. His first circular has been published; it is a mere formal document, very carefully framed, so as to conceal the writer's meaning. It is to be remarked, however, that it alludes only to the Roman affair; and, therefore, it cannot be looked upon as the full programme of the new minister, wherein he is expected to state his views in general on all the great questions of the day, and in particular on that which divides men's attention with the gravest European complications—the conflict in America between north and south.

On this subject I am assured that the new Foreign Minister has arrived at the conclusion which must force itself on all impartial observers, that the independence of the South is now a fait accompli; but it would be, perhaps, unreasonable to expect a public declaration of his views in this respect. I do not think, therefore, that the second circular, aforesaid will be inserted in the Moniteur as M. Drouyn de Lhuys belongs to the old school of diplomacy, who do "wear their hearts upon their sleeve for daws to peck at."

An important periodical, the Revue Contemporaine, comments at considerable length on American affairs, and advocates the prompt recognition of the South.

"The two contending parties," says the Reviewer, "appear equally invincible when defending their own territory, equally able to retrieve their position by brilliant victories even when it appears most desperate, but they appear to be alike incapable to inflict a decisive defeat on their enemy on his own ground. If Mr. Jefferson Davis is unable to proclaim at the White-house the victory of the South, Mr. Lincoln is no more successful in his attempts to dissolve the Secessionist Congress at Richmond. Europe, whilst seconding this state of things, only bows before a fait accompli, which is the more entitled to recognition from the fact of our having done nothing to bring it about—it is the result of the force of circumstances alone. The very neutrality of Europe in the contest, compels her not to shut her eyes to the evidence of facts which have taken place at all events without her co-operation. * * * As for ourselves, we have not got two weights and measures, and it is repugnant to our feelings to admit that the New World which has ever been regarded as the model country of individual and collective liberty, is not ripe for the application of the doctrines which are applied without question to our old continent, the classic soil of right divine. No one ever questioned the right of the eight millions, which form the population of the Two Sicilies, to give up their autonomy, and annex themselves to the kingdom of Victor Emmanuel—why, therefore, should the eight millions of Confederates be denied the rights of refusing to submit any longer to the government of Washington, and constitute themselves as an independent nation. Theoretically the Southern States were entitled to claim the recognition from the first day that they thought fit to proclaim it—policy may—but no right or doctrine exists to justify it—require delay—policy may think proper before recognizing a separation, to wait until those who claim it have shown their power to enforce it—diplomacy cannot enter into relations with ephemeral or accidental Governments, but only with fully constituted and enduring organizations—Can anyone deny that by this time all these requirements have been fulfilled by the Confederate States of North America?"

A report is current of the death of Garibaldi. No telegram has yet come to hand to confirm it, but it is asserted that the last bulletins are alarming in the extreme.

The Bourse has been rather sluggish during the past week, but there are symptoms of reviving activity.

(From an occasional Correspondent).

PARIS, Oct. 21.

Your last number was in type when M. Thouvenel's fall from power was announced in the Moniteur. It had been long foreseen, and yet the three days' crisis which ended in his dismissal, without the resignation of the rest of the Cabinet, took the Paris public by surprise, and sent the funds up. The public here is the crowd which assembles under the peristyle of the bourse. It rejoices at the change, not that it loves M. Drouyn de Lhuys more, or M. Thouvenel less, but that it feared that the God of its idolatry, M. Fould might come down in the fall. When, in June last, M. de Lavalette returned to Rome, after obtaining General Cavour's recall, no one who has studied the master mind of France, could doubt that the day was not distant when the Marquis and his abettors would pay for their momentary triumph. It is not that the Emperor has changed his Italian policy; from the first, he has acted very consistently up to his declarations, and if bystanders or ministers thought that more was meant than met the ear, in giving the rein to their zeal or their inclination, they overshot the mark. The Sovereign of France has declared that he is his own minister, our English name of the Secretary of State expresses the real position of his official organs. He is responsible to the nation, and we cannot blame him if he refuses to be committed by the interpolations of his servants. M. Thouvenel's fault has been that he has allowed himself to be urged on by Messrs. de Lavalette and Benedetti, to add a glaze to the Emperor's instructions. He has tried to alter his course, or at least to quicken the pace. With the silent patience which is one of his qualities, the Emperor suffered himself to be thus goaded all the summer, now and then making a trifling concession, but not deviating from his course. Four days after his arrival at St. Cloud, he dismissed M. Thouvenel, accepted M. de Lavalette's resignation, and recalled M. Benedetti from Turin. Sunday's Moniteur contains six diplomatic changes resulting from these. M. Thouvenel's dismissal is softened by a letter, which reads more as if it were the public declaration that his services are no longer wanted, than that they are cordially remembered, and this seems to be the ex-Minister's own interpretation, from the angry haste with which he contradicted a paragraph in the Pays, ascribing his immediate departure from Paris to Madame Thouvenel's illness. It is understood that he counted on the simultaneous secession of several of his colleagues, whose remaining in office cannot have gratified him. Their resignation might have embarrassed the Emperor, which some of them, at least, would be unwilling to do, and it would have been like a claim to interfere in matters not affecting their departments, while they have the benefit of irresponsibility. Of M. Drouyn de Lhuys it is premature to speak. When he retired from public life six years ago, none of the questions of the day, excepting the long-lived Eastern difficulty, was on the tapis. Italy was not even dreamed of, and the American Union seemed to the European world in general, destined to the longevity of the Swiss Confederation. M. Drouyn de Lhuys could, therefore, have formed no opinions on these now most important questions, nor would it be safe to augur of his acts, as Minister, from his private conversations. In last night's papers, his circular to the diplomatic agents of France appears. It treats only of the Italian question, and is confined to the general tenour of the Emperor's letter of May last to M. Thouvenel. A significant fact as regards the meaning to be attached to this, may be gathered from the circumstance of M. de la Gueronnère, the editor of La France, having been invited along with him to dine at St. Cloud the day after his nomination. The Emperor wrote an autograph letter a few days ago to Victor Emmanuel, of which the contents are surmised to have been rather a caution against agitation, than encouragement to hopes which he is at present, at least, determined not to gratify.

The Prince de la Tour d'Auvergne, who goes as Ambassador to Rome, was formerly there as Secretary of Embassy, and by the charm of his manners made himself very popular in society. His brother is Archbishop of Toulon. His nomination will, therefore, give general satisfaction there. He is young for so important a post, but the Emperor has more than once shown a predilection for young blood—of the other new appointments. I need only say that M. de Talleyrand, who is going to Berlin, is not wanting in the hereditary talent, if circumstances afford scope for display. The court leaves this on the 26th for Compiègne, where the King and Queen of Portugal are expected in the course of next month. Mahomet Djemil Pasha, the new Turkish Ambassador, presented his credentials yesterday, and M. de Kisseleff his letters of recall. The ex-Ambassador of Russia gave up his post on account of advancing years, but he remains in Paris. If I add to my chronicle, Count Andrew Zamoycki's arrival here on his rather involuntary travels, I believe I shall have exhausted all the personal news.

In last night's Patrie there appears a very interesting, letter from Providence (Rhode Island), to which I call your attention. The account it gives of the position of emigrants in the States of the North should be studied by the deluded men who are being daily embarked to fill the ranks of the Union armies. There is a graphic description also of the humours of an election which Messrs. Berkeley and Bright might read with profit. This reminds me of a conversation I had a few days ago with a very intelligent Frenchman, a literary man, who spent twelve years in New York. He described to me the vexations and annoyances to which foreigners are systematically exposed in the Empire City, till from sheer lassitude they are forced to take out letters of naturalisation. He found himself in every relation of life treated as an inferior, until he consented to take this step. Another letter of very different purport to the one I have spoken of, written by M. de Leon, the late Consul-General of the United States in Egypt, which appeared a few days ago in the Constitutionnel, has attracted very general attention in political circles here. It contains a temperate refutation of many fallacies current in France, and not yet perhaps altogether exploded in England. You will find it in the Constitutionnel of the 16th. I need not tell you that the question of the recognition of the Southern Confederacy has made no way in the last week. Public opinion is undoubtedly favourable to this step, but there is in Paris at least—I do not speak of the provinces—no hearty opinion on any subject which does not affect the quotations on the Bourse. As Italy does this, it is the great preoccupation of the day, and the publishers' shops are again filled with pamphlets upon Rome. You may depend upon it that the Emperor will never hand over Rome to the Piedmontese; to do so would be to abandon the oldest policy of France, to stultify the acts of the last years, or, I may say, the whole period, of his reign, and to give to English influence a triumph which his subjects would never forgive. The almost unanimity of the French press in demanding the withdrawal of the garrison is not to be ascribed to a public feeling hostile to its continuance, but to the handsome subsidies which it is no secret that the Court of Turin has lavished on the Paris press. You must not lose sight of the difference between the press in France and in England. With us the press expresses the opinion of a more or less numerous party, here the press attempts to form that opinion. If the persevering efforts of the papers, of almost all shades, have had little effect in rousing a sympathy for Italy, so unkindly held back from the tempting prize it is straining for; this must be ascribed to the instinctive attachment of the people to the traditional policy of France, and still more to the dislike which the French army, officers and men, entertain for the Italians. Even Garibaldi's wounds have raised little sympathy here. His gallant defence of Rome is, less remembered than the story of the silver candlesticks of St. Peter's which he tried to carry off in his baggage.

BERLIN, October 19.

We are living in an atmosphere too charged with political electricity to enable me to fulfil my promise of registering the phenomena of the great and little German systems. The events which are passing around us have an immediate and practical importance, which throws into the shade a controversy, whose ill-defined bases and uncertain results remind one involuntarily of the big and little Endians immortalized by Gulliver. The approaching great German Congress at Frankfort may throw some light on a subject from which I abstain for the present.

When I closed my last, the Berlin world was on the tiptoe of expectation, but hope still had the better of apprehension. The result of the Cabinet Council on Saturday, had been kept so carefully secret, that even the ordinary notice of the intended prorogation was not sent to the President of the House of Deputies. By taking them unwarned, it was hoped that the Deputies would be found unarmed, but Herr Grabow snuffed the impending storm, and took the energetic measures I have already mentioned, to forestall it. From 9 to 12 on Monday morning, the House discussed and passed a resolution, declaring the act of the Upper House unconstitutional, and such was the celerity and secrecy with which it acted, that the Premier, Von Bismarck, only heard of the proceedings on entering the House at 12, to announce the sitting for the prorogation for 3 o'clock. He was evidently taken aback, and only covered his confusion by studying the temperature of the House on the thermometer on the wall, while the President slowly and distinctly read the resolution which showed its temper. The Parliament was prorogued before a thin assembly of either House, and astonishment prevented the manifestation of feeling, when the King's message proclaimed his intention of governing extra-constitutionally. I spoke in my last of Charles X., and in doing so, wronged his memory, for he had at least persuaded himself that the letter of the Charter was in his favour. Our French friends invented the Historical parallel as the safest and most offensive engine of attack against their Government. It is a catapult which launches only foot balls that rarely hit, and at worst but bespatter the object at which they are aimed. I forego, therefore, taking advantage of the happy misprint which in your last number converted William Frederick IV. into James I., and abstain from comparing the psdantry of our James with the late Prussian King's more artistic learning, or the duplicity of his ill-starred successor with the one-sided conscientiousness of William I. We may hope that the tragic events that marked the English Revolution may be wanting in that of Prussia, but we cannot doubt, as all freemen must wish, that the results will be as decisive. The King is not yet committed by overt acts, and there is still room for reconciliation. But though we acknowledge that historical parallels prove nothing or too much; we are not, therefore, bound to turn aside from the teachings of history. I called your attention to the calm attitude of the House of Deputies, and I am happy to bear witness that even in the trying position they have been placed in, they have shown the representatives of a nation may be offended but not ruffled. They have persevered in this dignified bearing to the last. On the third day after the prorogation, all had left the capital for their homes, a proceeding as adroit as it was worthy of their mandate. By separating at once they avoided all suspicion of factious concert, and by returning to their homes they have taken the best means of counter-acting the manoeuvres which an avowedly revolutionary Government may well be suspected of employing to mislead the rural populations. If he saw this word revolutionary applied to himself, His Majesty would doubtless be startled, for these kings are too apt to forget that more revolutions have been inaugurated by royalty than by the people, and that such revolutions are generally the most fatal to all concerned.

The liberal members dined together before parting, and Herr Schulze Delitzsch, one of their most distinguished men, gave a toast to the solidarity of Press and Tribune, which he prefaced with a speech, not so dazzling as Victor Hugo's late oration, but full of the practical good sense which this was deficient in. He showed how the press, properly conducted, is the organ of popular sentiment, how it helps the deliberations of Parliament, and, in a crisis like the present, may supply its place. Herr Bloemer, a member of the House of Lords (of which the majority are neither great nobles nor great lauded proprietors), has taken advantage of his accidental exclusion from the division on the budget, to publish a pamphlet, called, "A Word to my Fellow Citizens." It is an unimpassioned exposition of the rights of the Deputies of the Nation, such as our school-boys are (or should be) taught, and chiefly remarkable because it is thought, and really is, necessary for the instruction, not of country louts, but of the lords themselves. But it may be questioned whether there is any hope of teaching a body which could listen gravely to the argument that, inasmuch as the Constitution empowers the Upper House to pass the budget without amendments, or to reject it entirely, they were therefore entitled to reject the budget sent up by the Deputies, and to pass the one proposed originally by the Ministry, in its integrity. The Ministers who have seats in the House voted for the rejection of the amended budget, but they had sufficient prudence—call it cowardice who will—to abstain from voting on the proposal to pass their own bill. A characteristic anecdote is going the rounds of well informed circles. It is said that, in the secret sitting which resulted in this scandalous transgression of the Constitution, M. von Bismarck said that, as Minister, he must warn his hearers that the proposal was unconstitutional, although it would be very agreeable to him if they waved this objection. To return to Herr Bloemer's pamphlet; after expressing himself in justly severe terms on the Minister's for becoming the accomplices of the rejection of the budget, he goes on to show how gratuitously factious their conduct has been. The Deputies had voted nearly 134 millions of thalers. The sum in dispute was only about five millions. An act of indemnity or a supplementary budget in the next session would, as he says, certainly have been passed, to provide for such sums beyond those voted which have already been expended or which had been contracted for. The question was at first only one of organization of the army, it has become in the hands, of the Upper House, a constitutional struggle. He then gets somewhat into the clouds, and appeals to a star which is to burst through the gathering darkness and shine more brightly than ever on Prussia and her King. His Majesty with a needlessly redoubled guard at his favourite residence near Sans Souci, looks serenely on the storm he has raised, encouraged to hold his ground by the addresses which the feudal party are sending up to him. The royalist, not loyal, press, registers a dozen every day, and the liberal press not only reproduces the names of the places from which they come, but wickedly adds also the insignificant names and avocations of those who present them. "In one which the King received and answered most graciously, the signers of the address are made to say that they wish "no Parliamentary, but a royal Prussian Government." In others he is exhorted to persevere in vindicating the rights of the Crown against the usurpations of the Deputies, and he is assured that he is responsible only to God for the well-being of the country. To show you the value of these addresses in the eyes of the Berliners, I cannot resist inserting an advertisement which has just appeared in the Kladderadatsch, the Berlin Punch:—

WANTED to take up his residence in a large town, at present only inhabited by Liberals, and to represent its public opinion, a tried Conservative (if possible not convicted in any court of justice). The father of a numerous family of boys accustomed to sign addresses will be preferred.

If the insensibility of the King, even more than the stern calmness of the Prussian people, is threatening to the royal prestige, a worse augury may be found in the press prosecutions which have raged ever since the prorogation of the Houses. Seven trials have taken place in one day, five in another, and the editor of the National Zeitung, by an almost forgotten application of the law, has been sentenced not only to fine but to six weeks' imprisonment, for writing, at the time of the last elections, that the Minister of War had "ordered" "his men to the voting-urns." Voting-urns having been abolished, or not existing, the judges interpreted this part of the expressions figuratively, but refused to apply the same rule to the word ordered (commandiren). Two or three newspapers are now seized daily. It is understood that the Minister is on the look-out for a new Minister of Justice to carry out, with proper vigour, the stringent application of the gagging laws which he contemplates. Even in France such wholesale prosecutions were never heard of, and in France there might be found an excuse which does not exist in Prussia. There a new dynasty is struggling for existence against a host of malcontents of all colours; here there is no disputed succession, and, notwithstanding the shortcomings of the last forty-five years, there is a profound attachment to the reigning house.

In the Handelsstag or Trade Conference, now sitting in Munich, a proposition to stigmatize the French commercial treaty with Prussia as prejudicial to the general interests of Germany has been rejected by a majority of 138 to 60, and the wish that it should come at once into operation was approved by 100 to 96. The Conference separated after passing resolutions for the continuance and improved organization of the Zollverein, whose existence is threatened by the differences arising out of the French treaty, differences carefully fomented by Austria, which has always looked with a jealous eye on the power which the presidency of the Zollverein gives to Prussia.

FEDERAL THREATS.—On the 24th September the New York Herald published an editorial, in which after, rejoicing in the great victory of McClellan, and predicting the subjugation of the South before the meeting of Congress in December, concludes by admonishing England and France of Federal vengeance.

Then, with our glorious Union reinstated in full strength, and purged of the disorganizing elements of Southern secessionism and Northern abolitionism, we shall be prepared at once to exact atonement and reparation from England and France for the insults which they have inflicted upon us, and for the aid and comfort which they have given to our enemy in a thousand devious ways since the outbreak of this rebellion. Then we shall be prepared to try the force of our republican ideas and institutions in Canada, and to see that justice is done to Mexico.

Such are the grand and comprehensive results, in our domestic and foreign relations, foreshadowed by this great triumph of our army in Maryland, and their fulfilment is but a question of time. The Southern rebellion is doomed, and with its extinction our redeemed country will rise at once in the majesty of the most powerful nation in the world.

In the same issue an editorial appears, in which England is threatened with a repetition of the Trent affair:—

MASON AND SLIDELL COMING BACK.—We notice in the proceedings of the rebel Congress that it has been determined to recall Mason and Slidell from Europe. Perhaps this has been done with the hope of thereby securing a recognition of the confederacy, on the same principle that a skilful angler slowly withdraws his bait when he wishes the fish to make an eager rush for the hook. The question is, however, how are these diplomatic rebels to get back? We know that the Navy Department is about despatching Commodore Wilkes with a fleet to the West Indies, with instructions to allow no more Anglo-rebel vessels to break the blockade. Commodore Wilkes, therefore, will be on hand just in time to renew his acquaintance with Slidell and Mason. It is doubtful if they will consent to run the risk of another interview with him.

But the plotters and schemers, the bakers in the abolition administration oven—they are all right; they live in clover, dress superbly, and fare sumptuously. Hundreds of our merchants—and I blush to say it—are of this class. Their souls (which could be covered with an English sixpence) are fast and firm with the dominant party, and they are bound to make all the hay they can while the sun shines; they know that this unnatural position cannot always last, and when it is past they want something to lean upon that will carry them through the wreck that will follow. What care they for desolate firesides, for broken hearts, and orphans' tears? The war is right and just; the supremacy of the Government must be maintained; the South must be made to pay obedience to the same; let the war proceed.—From a New York Letter.

A press of matter obliges us to postpone the publication of several interesting articles until our next issue.

Three Months in the Confederate Army.

MISCHIEF AND ITS CURE.

The luxurious ease in which we whiled away the idle weeks of May and June, had its proverbial effect upon our military morals and soldierly character. Day by day our duties, and the engagements we had entered into with our country, appeared less solemn and less serious to our eyes. It seemed ridiculous to think or speak of stern resolves and heroic self-devotion where there was nothing to do but to eat well, to drink well, to sleep well, and to wax fat upon an admirably hygienic system of moderate exercise and calm repose. The daily drill had become intolerably monotonous, and puerile. No pet guard of some martinet monarch could march more regularly than we, none with greater ease and accuracy execute the various manoeuvres which extort applause at a holiday review. At dress parade no regiment could form a more exact line, and at the order "parade rest," the row of white gloved hands was a geometrical marvel to behold. All this, we knew, was very well in its place, but we felt also, and felt it keenly, that it was not the true school of the soldier. Of foot-sore marches, such as our brethren in North and Western Virginia had, of privations which should harden us into veterans, of outpost duties, of skirmishes with the enemy, we had none, nor did it seem likely that we ever would have any at our present post. Every day rendered an attack on Norfolk less probable, for battery after battery had been quietly erected to defend the approaches by water, and elaborate field-works ensured us even more completely against a land attack.

About this time an affair occurred which impressed us with an indescribable contempt of the enemy, and strengthened the already rapidly growing conviction that there was "no fight in him." General Magruder, whose small corps d'armée was stationed on the opposite side of the James River, in the vicinity of Yorktown, had for some time "felt" the Federal army at and around Fortress Monroe, and tempted General Butler, in command there, by sending out foraging parties, almost up to the very walls of the fortress. One of these foraging parties or outposts, consisting of a part of a Georgian regiment, and a part of a North Carolina regiment, under Colonel Hill, and a company of Virginia howitzers, with five pieces—in all less than 1100 men strong—was suddenly attacked by four Federal regiments of infantry, and a considerable force of regular artillery. The surprise was so complete that retreat upon the main body, some twelve miles distant, was out of the question. According to all military probabilities, the little force should have been annihilated. Instead of this, with no better defence than a hastily thrown up breastwork, it repulsed and routed the vastly superior odds of the assailants, suffering a loss of only one killed and one wounded; and killing, wounding, and taking prisoners some 300 of the enemy. The details of this engagement, known as the "battle" of Great Bethel, are so incredible that we would not fully believe them until the most ample confirmation had been received. It then appeared that the attack was made in a solid column, which our few pieces could rake at every discharge; that in no single instance could the Federals be induced to charge up to our breastwork; but each time broke and ran after one volley of our musketry. Finally the whole body fled in wild disorder, strewn the roads with arms and knapsacks, hundreds of which were sent as trophies to Norfolk and Richmond. In the annals of warfare a more disgraceful tale of gross imbecility on the part of the commanders, and arrant cowardice on the part of the men, had never been told. There was one redeeming feature, indeed, and only one. Every man in a Confederate uniform spoke respectfully of Major Winthrop, a member of a distinguished New York family, who was shot through the heart by a North Carolinian rifleman while springing forward, sword in hand, vainly encouraging his men to follow. Sincerely did we pity him for being thrown by fate among such a gang of slinking vagabonds. When the Northern account of the affair reached us, we learned, for the first time, that before coming up with us, two of the attacking regiments had, in the darkness of the night, mistaken each other for enemies. One, a regiment of Germans, fired upon the other, a New York militia regiment, nine rounds of musketry, with as many discharges from a field-piece, at a distance of 150 yards, killing two and wounding five; whereupon the latter regiment broke and ran. The New York press, with a cynicism that added to our disgust, remarked that the Germans had proved themselves stancher men than the natives, but very poor shots.

The affair of Great Bethel, though an important success for our arms, did us harm. When men are already restless and discontented by inactivity, it is not well for them to learn to underrate and despise their enemy. General Butler, who had planned the expedition, became a by-word and a mockery among us. We punned upon the initials of his name, and he was generally known as "Bethel Failure Butler." The "masked rebel batteries," by which he accounted for his disgrace, and the other preposterous lies which made up his official report of the engagement, were a standing joke with us. We accepted the raw undisciplined rabble we had so easily routed as a fair specimen of all the Federal armies present and prospective, and we found it impossible to believe that a people could seriously contemplate a long war, which received the news of so indelible disgrace in the manner the Northern people seemed to have done. We, had the same thing happened to us, should have been disposed to exaggerate our loss as an extenuation of the disgrace; they, at the very time that we buried eighty-seven of their dead, published their loss to the world as eighteen killed and thirty-seven wounded, apparently without perceiving how their own figures added to their shame that any body of troops should flee in disorder before one-fourth of their number after so trifling a loss.

Despising the enemy, despairing of winning any glory in meeting him, or of having any serious work to do, disgusted with the dull routine of camp-life, we were gradually losing that stern sense of responsibility, that pride in our position, with which we had entered the ranks. A sort of demoralization, not in the worst meaning of the word, but still serious enough to be painfully felt, was spreading through the regiment. Men began to look upon it as a clever thing to slip through the lines after "taps," spend the night in town, and return without detection before roll-call in the morning. If detected, the extra twenty-four hours of guard duty was not deemed a punishment, because the public opinion of the regiment no longer considered it a disgrace. Cases of "sleeping on post" also began to occur, partly because extra guard duty had become too frequent a punishment, and partly because of our fancied security from any danger whatever. Idleness had bred silly camp gossip, which in turn gave rise to petty jealousies among the different companies, and even quarrels among individuals. An unfortunate editor in our mess, who had been plagued into writing, sorely against his will, letters from camp to his paper at home, became suddenly the object of almost universal enmity, for no better reason than a typographical blunder. He had written of his own company that only one other excelled it in drill, and none in gentlemanly behaviour. The types had substituted the word equalled for excelled, and forthwith every other company considered itself insulted in the most sensitive chord of its self-respect, and individual members felt themselves called upon to resent the insult. More serious quarrels arose. One day a member of one of the Mobile companies was found shot through both thighs in the vicinity of the camp. As neither he nor any of the parties in the secret ever divulged a word that could give a clue to the cause of the accident, the official inquiries resulted in nothing; but it was evident that a duel had been fought—one of the most serious crimes according to the military code. Nor were the disturbances confined to our own regiment. Men, when in town, whether with or without furloughs, had several times come into collision with members of other corps. Intemperance—always the cause of such disputes—had once or twice resulted in bloodshed. On one occasion a serious riot was imminent between the Alabamians and Virginians in the city, when, fortunately, the major of our regiment rode up to the spot, and without inquiring into the cause, ordered "every member of the 3rd Alabama at once to camp," an order which was instantly obeyed. It is but fair to add that the esprit de corps of the regiment never failed to severely condemn the offenders or even the participators in such disturbances. Not quite so decided was our public opinion, however, in a less serious occurrence. A captain of our regiment had knocked down a saucy Norfolk bookseller, for some offensive personal remark. It was thought a very shabby thing of the colonel to do, to order the captain into arrest for his summary resentment of an insult, and even to make him answer before the Mayor for the offence, like any ordinary civil disturber of the peace.

During the period to which I refer, our colonel was appointed a brigadier-general. I presume he must have been deeply impressed with the truth of the old adage about Satan and idle hands, for he suddenly found us so much work to do, that Satan would have been sorely puzzled to find any idle hands among us. Our comfortable camp, whose broad smooth avenues looked like the streets of a well-regulated city, was summarily transferred into a dense pine forest. From sunrise to sunset the men were now busy felling the huge trees. To clear a space large enough for the camp of 1100 men, with ten ample company parade grounds, and one regimental parade sufficient for two battalions to drill at once, was neither small nor easy work. When the trees were felled and burned—branches, leaves, and undergrowth—the "stumps" or roots had to be dug up, hewn into firewood, and the cavities filled with solidly trodden earth. This on Southern plantations is called "grubbing," and is about as severe and back-straining an employment as fashionable young gentlemen ever undertook. Next came digging and draining, more clearing of the forest, and lastly there were guard barracks to be erected, and our newly-acquired carpenters' skill came into play. Lest all these various tasks allotted each day to each company should not sufficiently employ us, the general discovered that he had urgent need of some thousands of fascines for the entrenchments. The spade and shovel have never in the Confederate army been deemed fit implements for the soldiers, except in a case of sudden emergency, and thus our field-works had been thrown up by a gang of several hundred negroes, hired from, or gratuitously furnished by, their owners for this purpose. But fascine-making was, in the general's opinion, quite suitable work for his intelligent and industrious command, and fascines we did make, at the rate of about 100 a day to each company.

Besides this dose of "hard labour" administered to the whole regiment, the general had special remedies for individual cases. A few summary dismissals by Courts Martial—bodies which were singularly deaf to the eloquence of counsel, and stolid to influence of the social position and family—were read from the head of the regiment with very salutary effect. One or two officers were rumoured to have been compelled to send in their resignations to be accepted on the slightest lache on their part. Measures even more severe were reported from other regiments. A whole company had been deprived of their arms, and placed under arrest, for venturing upon a remonstrance against some order they considered unjust. In another instance the penalty of death was decreed for "sleeping on post," but commuted by the general into the wearing of "the ball and chain." The hand of justice evidently was heavy upon us, and the reins of discipline were drawn tight. Increased guard duty also came. There were details for provost marshal's guard, for brigade headquarter guard, fortification guard, special duty; patrols, which, added to our own regimental guard, required daily nearly one-third of our effective strength.

Strange to say, and yet perhaps naturally enough, with the inauguration of this new regime all discontent, if not all grumbling, ceased. There was no more restlessness of inactivity; we were happier, healthier, and we might fairly claim—what was freely accorded to us by staff officers who visited us from time to time—to be the best disciplined, most efficient, and smartest-looking brigade in the service, and a credit to any army, either of the Old or the New World.

CONCLUSION.

Towards the end of June and commencement of July, it was noticed in the regiment with what ease long furloughs to visit home and honourable discharges were obtained. An application for either, if made in due form, was almost always certain to be successful. It is true that every discharge was made contingent upon the condition that a substitute should be furnished; but this condition was in practice a merely nominal one, since a number of applicants were always ready and eager to fill up any vacancy in our ranks. Many of these applicants were constantly waiting in Norfolk, courting popularity in the regiment, and watching their opportunity to enter. Admission into our company was specially sought after. It therefore became optional with any of us to continue in the ranks or to leave them. The matter at first created no little surprise, and gave rise to some severe comments, but in course of time came the explanation, and proved that the policy of the Government was wise and farsighted. New levies on a far larger scale were already then in contemplation. The regiments then in the field were drawn from the flower of the Southern youth. Ours, for instance, was composed almost exclusively of men who in any society might claim the rank of gentlemen. These men had had two or three months' practical experience of active service; they had most of them qualified themselves in the school of obedience for the duties of command. The military ambition aroused in them, seconded by their personal and family influence at home, were valuable auxiliaries to the Government in promptly raising to a reasonable standard of efficiency the 300 new regiments which, a month later, were authorized by Congress.

With scarcely an exception, the young men who obtained long furloughs to visit home profited by them to raise companies of their own, which were afterwards tendered to the Government; in many cases fully equipped, and even armed, at individual expense. Sometimes two or three combined together to raise a company, dividing among themselves the commands, according to the amount of money or the number of recruits which each had contributed. Battalions, and even whole regiments, were thus formed and organized. As a rule, and unless some special grounds for rejection existed, troops thus raised were accepted by the War Department, and those who tendered them received suitable commissions. Recruiting was easy, and every young man of respectable social position, and a moderate degree of popularity in his town or county, found little difficulty in obtaining the complement of men he required. Father or guardian would furnish the means to feed them until the formal acceptance of the command; for the Government, except where special authorization had been given, allowed neither pay nor rations until the whole regiment, fully organized, was mustered into service and its officers were commissioned. Female relatives would assist the aspirant to military honours with blankets for his recruits, stripped from the family bedsteads, and with clothing made by themselves and their servants. At a later period, and where unusually large means were requisite, the ladies would club together to give amateur entertainments—concerts, masks and charades—which never failed to yield large proceeds to be devoted to the necessities of this or that newly-formed or forming regiment. It is not, probably, an exaggerated average to estimate that every man of the first levies, relieved from his enlistment, came back into the service with a company. It was thus that, at comparatively little cost to the Confederate Treasury, the 300,000 men called for after the battle of Manassas (Bull Run) were ready to hand as soon as wanted. By a judicious policy, bringing into play individual ambitions, and individual wealth and talents, the Government was saved the expense of a system of recruiting, the delay of drilling raw recruits; and it, moreover, accomplished that most difficult of all tasks with a suddenly improvised army—securing a respectable social status and military proficiency in the distribution of the subaltern commissions. Comparatively few of the officers in the present Confederate armies, who are not graduates of a military college, received their appointments before they had served some time at least in the ranks.

At first, before we understood the secret motives which prompted the policy of easy discharges, we were little disposed to take advantage of it. Many disdained commissions and claimed that the place of honour was in the ranks. All felt that we had no right to wantonly absolve ourselves from a solemn obligation into which we had voluntarily entered; all dreaded the judgment of public opinion at home. At first one or two in the regiment, who had families dependent upon them, went home, allowing unmarried brothers to take their places. The scramble for commissions, however, did not commence until our general gave us, as it were, the signal. In organizing his staff, he made his selections, with one exception, from the rank and file. Our company supplied him an assistant adjutant-general and two aids-de-camp; the rest of the regiment a brigadier-quartermaster and a number of minor staff employés. These sudden promotions spread the taste for military titles. It was not in human nature to see the messmate of to-day, on the morrow gallop into camp on a handsome charger, giving orders, without desiring to follow in the same rapid path of promotion. Three months after the period of which I write our mess of twelve had only three of the original members left; and these could not be tempted by gold lace. The company—still numbering its old effective strength—had furnished to the army one major, five captains of infantry, one of artillery, one of cavalry—in all, forty-three commissioned officers. It is only fair to those who thus exchanged the musket for the sword to say, that youthful ambition, though a strong, was not the strongest, motive for the exchange. The mere garrisoning of a fortified place, without prospect of meeting the foe, had become distasteful to them, and they longed to seek danger and win glory on more exciting fields. All of them found the danger they sought, and most of them have purchased the glory with their lives. Nor were the comrades they left behind destined to spend their lives in inglorious inactivity, or in felling trees, "grubbing" stumps, ditching, and fascine-making. In the battles before Richmond no regiment earned a more enduring fame than the 3rd Alabama Volunteers. They have been repeatedly decimated; they have lost seven-eighths of their effective strength; yet they have never broken, never faltered, never for a moment lost their regimental organization even in the deadliest of the fight.

My notes are now drawing to a close. The full details of the battle at Manassas reached us on the 23rd of July, exactly three months after we had left Mobile for the war. A court-martial was in session at the time at our brigade headquarters. An unfortunate member of a North Carolina regiment was being tried for sleeping on post. The proceedings were suspended, and when the Recorder had read the details of the great victory, the President rose and said, "On this day no Confederate soldier shall be tried for his life. The Judge-Advocate will withdraw the charge. The Court is adjourned." At the same time a civil tribunal was in session at Norfolk to try some soldiers for a broil in the streets. There also the proceedings were suspended, to allow the reading of the news. The State Attorney entered a nolle prosequi. The disputants shook hands. Everybody shook hands. The commanders of the corps between which feuds had obtained, made mutual apologies. Alabamians and North Carolinians and Virginians pledged each other to everlasting friendship, and to stand by each other like brothers in defence of the sacred cause. From that day, I believe no silly State feuds or rivalries ever disturbed the friendly goodwill among the Confederates from the wild South-west, from the cities of the Gulf, and from the older States of the Atlantic seaboard.

My military experiences did not end with the date of the battle of Manassas; but from that date I ceased to shoulder the musket as a private in the ranks. The object of these rude sketches has been to throw some light upon the formation of our first armies. With the period at which these sketches end, begins a new system of military organization on a far larger, but less interesting scale. The efficiency of that system requires no illustration from my pen; it is illumined by the lurid glare of many a well-fought battle in the East, in the West, in the North, and in the South, of the new-born Confederate Republic.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any rate, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through Messrs. Horzner, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent at London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. Advertisements to be forwarded to the publisher at 102, Fleet-street.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1862.

The Want of a Policy.

It is no news to political observers that the Ministry is divided on the American question; that, as Mr. Lindsay justly remarks, the opposition to the recognition of the South is the act, not of the unanimous British Cabinet, but only of a section of the Cabinet. We have shown before now that England alone stood in the way of a European acknowledgment of the independence of the Confederate States; it is now sufficiently evident that not England, nor even the Government of England, but only the Foreign Secretary, and a few of his colleagues, constitute the obstacle to a just, wise, and really pacific policy. It would not, perhaps, be difficult to name the members of the Cabinet on whose support Lord Russell relies; but it would be useless to do so. Two Ministers only have publicly expressed their opinions on the subject. The Chancellor of the Exchequer declared his sympathy with the South; affirmed that her leaders "had made an army, are beginning to make a navy, and, what is more, have made a nation;" and implied, though he did not actually assert, that the time had fully come when that nation ought to be recognized. To counteract the effect of this speech, the Secretary for War delivered himself, a few days later, of one of the most remarkable arguments that ever fell from the lips of a distinguished statesman. Sir G. C. Lewis is an able man; perhaps one of the ablest men in the House. He is not a good speaker—indeed, there is scarcely any distinguished politician whose oratorical powers are so defective, and whose delivery is so signally awkward; but he has the reputation of a first-rate administrator, a man of original thought, and a philosophical statesman of the highest class. From such a man, on such a question, something distinct and sensible, at the least, might have been expected. If we could not agree with him, we should have supposed that his reasonings would be cogent and his conclusions clear. But, on the contrary, his language was more confused than usual, and his argument, so far as it was intelligible, was at variance with law, with fact, and with common sense. The speech resembled nothing so much as those which he was wont, when Home Secretary, to deliver on Wednesday afternoons, to the edification of the House, and the no small amusement of the newspapers. In those speeches it was always evident that, whatever might be his reasons for supporting the measures of his Radical and Dissenting allies, they were not the reasons which he alleged; that the conclusion at which he arrived had been predetermined before he began to cast about for something to say in its behalf. In a word, he was always put up to vindicate something which his colleagues were resolved to do, but ashamed to defend.

There can be little doubt that he was in the same position at Chertsey. The Cabinet had determined not to recognize the South; and Mr. Gladstone had made it necessary that some one should say so in their name. But as their reasons for that determination were such as would not bear the light of day—being altogether of a party, personal, and Parliamentary nature—it was necessary that their spokesman should be a man who was not above talking nonsense for the good of his country, and who would not mind putting forth utterly untenable arguments in defence of a foregone conclusion. Sir G. C. Lewis undertook to immolate his reputation for his party's sake; and he went manfully through the task assigned him. We ought not, he said, to recognize the Confederate States while the war was yet undecided. We had done no wrong in admitting their belligerent character, which no reasonable man could deny; but until the North was exhausted by the war, or consented to separation, we should commit a breach of international law by recognizing them as an independent nation. According to this doctrine, it rests entirely with the ousted Government to determine when a new Power shall be admitted to rank with its equals; for the exhaustion by aggressive war of a nation which uses its military resources with any degree of prudence requires many years—nay, decades—for its accomplishment; and if we are to accept the assertion of the Secretary for War, so long as the dispossessed Power can and will maintain the war against the disseizer, no foreign Government has a right to recognize the latter. We committed, therefore, a breach of international law in acknowledging Greece, the Spanish colonies in America, Belgium, and Italy; for neither Turkey, Spain, nor Holland were in any sense exhausted by the war with their revolted subjects, and of Italy a large part is still held in secure possession by Governments ousted of a portion of their dominions. France committed a similar wrong in recognizing the United States, and these in recognizing Mexico and offering to recognize Hungary. In a word, every existing precedent on the subject is pronounced by Sir G. C. Lewis a violation of the law of nations. But that law is made up of precedents; and therefore the assertion of the Secretary of State resolves itself into a simple and absolute absurdity. The fact is, that we have a right to recognize any de facto Government whenever we please; and that we are bound by custom to recognize it when it has proved beyond doubt its ability to maintain its independence. That so able and well-informed a statesman should have committed himself in this extraordinary manner sufficiently shows the extreme difficulty which is felt by him and his colleagues in defending a position which as yet they cannot, as a Cabinet, resolve to abandon.

But that speech of the War Minister, irrational and illogical as it is, is strictly in accord with the policy which the British Government has pursued throughout. In no case—except when the outrage on the Trent roused all England to fury—has it acted with vigour or consistency. In the House of Commons their American policy has been defended not by themselves, but by their allies below the gangway; and the only tolerable speeches made on the Ministerial side came from Mr. Foster, the Radical member for Bradford. Most of the Ministers remained obstinately silent; those who did speak gave their friends reason to wish that they also had observed a prudent reticence. Lord Russell has made himself the laughing-stock of Europe and of America. In spite of Lord Palmerston's warning that a statesman should never venture on predictions till after the event; in spite of the equally prudent advice of Mr. Hosea Biglow, whose warm Northern feelings must ensure him Lord Russell's admiration—

"Don't never prophecy unless you know!"—

he ventured to endorse Mr. Lincoln's "bills at ninety days," and to predict a termination of the war within three months after the opening of the spring campaign. He did a good deal of mischief in the cotton market by this utterly unfounded vaticination; as he has done more important mischief by his practical measures. His despatches have been models of forcible weakness and energetic imbecility. To read the first of his missives on any subject is to be impressed with a conviction of his earnest and somewhat too peremptory vigour; but when the series is complete, the question settled, and the result summed up, it plainly appears that nothing whatever has been done, and that the Minister of England has submitted to be snubbed, insulted, and defied as the Minister of Holland or Portugal might have been. He has allowed British subjects to be robbed, arrested, imprisoned, forced to take the oath of allegiance to an alien Government before they could obtain their liberation; and he has exacted no indemnity, and no security against similar outrages for the future. He has allowed British ships to be seized in British waters, to be fired upon while obviously pursuing an innocent voyage from one neutral port to another; and he has uttered no protest. The shipowners complained; and he complacently told them that as the American cruisers were resolved to interrupt their trade with Nassau, they had better give it up—that trade being as lawful as the trade between Liverpool and Dublin, and the United States' cruisers having no more right to blockade Nassau than to blockade Southampton. Not one manly act, not one effectual protest against outrageous wrongs, not one efficient measure for the protection of British subjects, with the single exception above-named, has emanated from the Foreign Office during the whole period of the American War.

What is worse, it has been made clear to all the world that the English Government has no policy whatever; that in reference to the greatest question of foreign policy that has arisen for the last half-century it does not know its own mind; that while our people are starving, our commerce interrupted, our industry paralyzed, our Ministry have no plan, no idea, no intention to do anything but fold their hands, talk of strict neutrality, spare the excited feelings of the North, and wait, like Mr. Micawber, for something to turn up. Neutrality, in the sense in which the word is employed by ministerial apologists, is not a policy; it is the negation of all policy, the proclamation of helpless perplexity and imbecile irresolution. To remain strictly neutral in the contest, jealously guarding her own rights and interests—watchful to prevent any invasion of the privileges of neutral nations, of which in such a war she is the natural guardian—waiting to recognize the new nation that was undergoing its baptism of fire until its independence should be asserted beyond doubt by its own good sword—this would have been a course worthy of the wisdom, the honour, the dignity of Great Britain; worthy of a Cabinet comprising, with few exceptions, all the ablest and most experienced of her statesmen. To proclaim neutrality, and so to interpret it as to give every advantage to the stronger party and the aggressor in the war—to allow herself to be bullied into concessions still more advantageous to that party—to permit her subjects to be wronged and her flag to be insulted, her ports to be blockaded and her ships plundered with impunity—to abandon the championship of neutral rights, and see Consulates robbed, and neutral waters invaded, without a protest—to put off the recognition of the South until it shall please the North to give leave for recognition; such is the course actually pursued—a course derogatory to the honour of the country, and disgraceful to the Ministry which has adopted it. It is plain that the Government have been deficient alike in the capacity to comprehend the magnitude of the question before them, and in the courage to deal with it vigorously and consistently. Lord Russell is full of Northern prejudices, and subject to Northern influences; he is, moreover, impressed with a superstitious fear of quarrelling with the North; and he has been allowed to control the course of the English Government in the interest of the North. What he has accomplished the world can see. He has not conciliated the Northern people; he is liable to constant and increasing insolence from their Government and its representatives; he has not prevented the development of Southern resources, and the achievement of Southern independence, but he has prevented the recognition of that independence by the European Powers; he has rendered himself an accomplice in the ruin of the cotton manufacture, and the starvation of half a million of his countrymen, and he has materially weakened the influence of England in the councils of the world. Is it not true that the Ministry should resolve to change their course? A policy of inactive neutrality will not much longer be possible. Mr. Lincoln has thought fit to declare a war to the knife. He has challenged the South to choose between victory and desolation, and the South has accepted the challenge. The issue cannot be doubtful; but the struggle may be a long one, and while it lasts there can be no relief for the misery of Lancashire; no revival of the most profitable branch of English trade. Will England remain passive under such an infliction? Will her Government still refuse to understand the prospect before them; still fold their arms, and expect from Heaven the relief which they decline to achieve for themselves? Will they hold aloof when Europe, exasperated by suffering and disgusted by the savage character which the war is about to assume, refuses any longer to await the pleasure of England, and resolves, with her or without her, to assert the rights of neutrals, and vindicate the jurisdiction of the civilized world over a quarrel which involves the interests of all nations, and which is becoming as much a scandal as a scourge to humanity at large? In one word, will England abdicate her place among the great Powers? For such an abdication, and nothing less, is involved in the longer perseverance of her Government in its present abstinence from everything like a policy on the American question.

Northam Duplicity before the War.

POSTERITY will not decide upon the lawfulness of secession by accepting, without a searching investigation, the assertions and arguments used by people engaged in a bitter and deadly conflict. A reference will be made to the Constitution and history of the United States, and upon the terms of the Federal compact will mainly depend the verdict. If in the Constitution secession had been prohibited, it would not have been less necessary or less inevitable, but it would then have been rebellion, and legally justified the attempt of the North to subdue it by force. But since secession is not prohibited, since no provision is made for such a contingency, it is not, according to the letter of the Constitution, rebellion; and since the sovereignty of the States is strictly conserved, and the powers and functions of the Federal Government strictly defined, secession, so far from being rebellion, is a constitutional act. This becomes clearer from time to time, as we find Mr. Lincoln cannot move in the matter of suppressing the so-called rebellion without violating the Constitution of the United States. If, instead of entering on this unholy war of subjugation, the peaceful overtures of the South had been frankly accepted, neither the Constitution nor the prosperity of America would have been impaired. We do not in any degree assent to the proposition of those who say, in that event long ere this the South would have been clamouring for readmission to the Union; because secession was not the result of a political intrigue, but of the operation of a natural law, which induces the political severance of communities that are distinct in character and interests. But the peaceful dissolution of the political bond would in all probability have done away with the growing enmity between the two sections, and such being the case, the States comprising the two confederacies might have formed a firmer league of friendship for their common defence than they had done since the time of Washington. Under such circumstances, the United States would not have lost its prestige; but, unfortunately for a pacific solution of the difficulty, there was the personal ambition of Mr. Lincoln and his friends, and the desire of the North to maintain such a hold over the South as would enable her to continue to reap what she had not sown, and to wax rich on the produce of Southern industry. The progress of the war has altered the feelings and motives of the Northern people. Vengeful hatred, and the desperate hope of escaping from impending national ruin, are the motives which impel the continuance of the war. Until this moment the South has not changed her programme. From first to last she has fought to be let alone. Perhaps the North may succeed in forcing the Confederate States to engage in another and direful kind of conflict; but this record will stand for ever—that after eighteen months of war, during which the South suffered terribly from an unprovoked invasion, in the moment of victory she offered peace, and she did not ask for one yard of Northern territory, but only that the North should let her alone. The next campaign may inaugurate a war of extermination, and if so, the change in hostilities must be charged to the North.

Northern aggression, and not Southern secession, violated the Constitution, and if any doubt existed as to the proper construction of the text of that instrument, it is solved by the judgment so often passed upon it by those who were parties to the compact. Before 1860 the right of secession was pretty generally admitted, and those who most opposed it never ventured to assert that any act of a convention of the people of a sovereign State would be rebellion. Those who thought secession would be contrary to the spirit of the Constitution never hinted that a sovereign State was to be kept in the Union by force of arms. Secession was not a novel idea in 1860; it had often been heard in the Federal Congress; it had been frequently discussed in the Federal press. During the canvass for the Presidential election in 1860, the Southern journals warned the North from day to day, and from week to week, that if a section attempted to force a President upon the whole Union, a President who was committed to a policy inimical to the rights of the South, the Southern States would secede. What was the reply of the North? That secession would be rebellion? Not at all. The Democrats protested there would be no need for such a measure; the Republican party boasted that the Union would get on better without the South, and the Abolitionists advocated disunion with fanatical zeal. The general rejoinder of the North was a taunt and a sneer. "You say you will go out of the Union, we only wish there was a chance of your so doing." The Hon. C. Morehead, ex-Governor of Kentucky, in the course of his speech at Liverpool on the 9th inst., which has been printed as a pamphlet, and to which we shall again revert, recalled an incident that in a remarkable manner illustrates the truth of our observation that secession was not called rebellion until after 1860, because the affair concerns two prominent members of the Lincoln Cabinet. On February 1, 1850, Mr. John P. Hale, an Abolitionist, presented to the Senate of the United States eight petitions in favour of the peaceable dissolution of the Union, and on the 7th of the same month he offered a resolution—"That the Federal Constitution in giving its support to slavery violates the Divine law, and makes war upon human rights, and is inconsistent with republican principles; that the attempt to unite slavery and freedom in one body politic has already brought on the country great and manifold evils, and has fully proved that no such Union can exist but by the sacrifice of freedom to slavery. They therefore respectfully ask Congress to propose without delay some plan for the immediate and peaceful dissolution of the American Union." We need hardly observe that Congress had no power under the Constitution to devise a plan for the dissolution of the Union; that its functions were limited to administering the affairs of the Federation according to the directions and authority delegated to it by the States. The States could secede, but Congress could not plan a secession. Besides the general repugnance to breaking up the Union—a repugnance that was felt more acutely at the South than at the North—the unconstitutional nature of the resolution insured its rejection by an overwhelming majority. There were three ayes and fifty-one noes. Who constituted the trio so anxious to dissolve the Union that they were ready to sacrifice the Constitution to effect the object? Of course the promoter of the resolution was one of its supporters. But who were the other two senators who voted for this unconstitutional dissolution of the Union? Surely, the uninitiated reader may think, they must be men who are now fighting on the side of the South. Not so. They were Northern senators—they were Mr. Seward, present Federal Secretary of State, and Mr. Chase, present Federal Secretary of the Treasury—prominent and leading members of the Government which has declared secession to be rebellion, and having failed to crush such rebellion in the field, has, in order if possible to effect it, not hesitated to decree a servile war in the South. We need not multiply proofs that secession was regarded by all sections of the late Union as a possible, and, in most quarters, as a constitutional, proceeding. By no class was it regarded as an act of rebellion, and no politician ever advocated the subjugation and conquest of a seceding State. That Messrs. Seward and Chase voted in the Senate of the United States for the dissolution of the Union is sufficient evidence of how little secession was esteemed rebellion, until it suited the ambitious designs of these men and their colleagues to induce the nation they represent to so declare it. Indeed, secession was not regarded by the North as a very great evil until the Lincoln party had exercised some influence on public opinion. When the Border States asked for guarantees to be given to the South to prevent secession, the representatives of the North repudiated the idea, and expressed their willingness to see the Union broken up into a thousand fragments, rather than give a single guarantee.

In another phase of the secession question there has been such unanimity that we need not discuss it. Leading politicians of all shades of opinion have at different times protested against the Union being maintained by force. Mr. Morehead quoted from a speech of Mr. Seward, delivered in 1848, in which the Federal Secretary of State said, "The Union could only be preserved by consent; that it was preposterous to think of maintaining it in any other way." But we can find higher authorities than the Lincolmites. Daniel S. Dickinson, once United States' senator, and now Attorney-General for the State of New York, has said, "The Union is not to be maintained, by force." Chancellor Walworth, of New York, declared, "It would be as brutal to send men to butcher their brothers of the Southern States as it would be to massacre them in the Northern States." John Quincy Adams, an ex-President, said, "If the day shall come—may Heaven avert it—when the affections of the people of these States shall be alienated from each other, when this fraternal spirit shall give way to cold indifference, or collisions of interest shall fester into hatred, then the bonds of political association will not hold together parties no longer attracted by the magnetism of conciliated interests and kindly sympathies; and far better will it be for the people of the disunited States to part in friendship from each other than to be held together by restraint." The Democratic State Convention which met at Albany in March, 1861, declared, "Civil war will not restore the Union, but will defeat for ever its reconstruction." A letter written by Edward Everett, of Massachusetts, which was published in the Boston Courier, on February 2, 1861, says, "To expect to hold fifteen States in the Union by force is preposterous. The idea of civil war, accompanied as it would be by servile insurrection, is too monstrous to be entertained for a moment. If our sister States wish to leave us, in the name of Heaven let them go in peace."

Nor is this all. When secession was accomplished the seceding States were for months unmolested. Nay, the Government of the Confederate States was constituted and administered without an official protest on the part of the North, or even without any intimation from the Northern press and Northern politicians that secession was to be treated as rebellion. Was not such inaction an emphatic, though tacit, endorsement of secession? Is there an instance in history of overt and avowed rebellion being allowed to exist for months without steps being taken to suppress it? There was not a hint of coercion, and the Confederate States, relying on this, and the constitutional character of their proceedings, made no preparations for defence. When the Lincoln Government came into power, the same policy was pursued, a policy of unparalleled duplicity. In our issue of the 5th of June, No. 6 of THE INDEX, we published the Message President Davis addressed to Congress on April 29, 1861. In that—one of the most lucid, exhaustive, and eloquent State papers ever issued—is an account of how the Southern Commissioners were played with; how Mr. Judge Campbell, of the Supreme Court of the United States, was, by the false dealing of the Lincoln Cabinet, made the instrument of lulling the suspicions of the Commissioners, while preparations were in active progress for the invasion of the South. That Message of President Davis, and the documents in connection with it, submitted to Congress on May 8, 1861, are alone amply sufficient to vindicate the South from any charge of beginning the war, and prove incontestibly the deceit, the fraud, and the ambitious designs of the North. In our comments on the documents, published in the same number of THE INDEX, under the title of "Who Commenced the War?" we observed:—

It will be seen that one of the first acts of the Confederate Government was to open with the incoming Administration of Mr. Lincoln those negotiations in which South Carolina had so signally failed with the Administration of Mr. Buchanan. In the very selection of its Commissioners it proved its earnest desire for a peaceful settlement. Of the three, each represented one of the old parties which, in by-gone times, had contended for predominance in the common Government. We have President Davis' official announcement to the Confederate Congress, that their instructions were to make every honourable concession for the sake of peace. Now, let the reader peruse for himself how these Commissioners, and through them, the Confederate Government, were lured into a false security by assurances as false as Judas' kiss; how a Justice of the Supreme Court—the most honoured office in the United States—was made the unconscious instrument of perpetrating this fraud; how a solemn promise was made, and kept like that of the witches of Macbeth; how a hostile fleet was secretly equipped, and its purpose only revealed several days after it had sailed, and when, in the ordinary course of navigation, it might be expected to reach the doomed city, warned to late; how it was the finger of God, by a tempest, that alone defeated the bloody scheme so nefariously concocted. We are strangely mistaken if any man to whom public faith is more than an empty word, and who believes nations, like individuals, to be amenable to the laws of honour, can read this history without repeating, with the Confederate President, "The crooked path of diplomacy can scarcely furnish an example so wanting in courtesy, in candour, and in directness, as was the course of the United States' Government toward our Commissioners in Washington."

We repeat, the Message of April 29, and the Message of May 8, and the accompanying documents, decide the question of Northern duplicity. Yet it is not out of place to notice the further and graphic accounts given by Mr. Morehead of the dishonest and double dealing of the Lincolmites. On one occasion Mr. Seward, in conversation with Mr. Morehead, "pledged his sacred honour that there should be no collision between the North and the South," and he added, "Nay, Governor Morehead, let me once hold the reins of power firmly in my hands, and if I don't settle this matter to the entire satisfaction of the South in sixty days, I will give you my head for a football."

Shortly after this Mr. Morehead, accompanied by Mr. W. C. Reeves, formerly United States' Minister to France, Judge Summers, from Virginia, General Donovan, from Missouri, and Mr. Guthrie, who had been Secretary of the Treasury in Mr. Pierce's Administration, had an interview with Mr. Lincoln. The conversation lasted several hours, and Mr. Morehead, as soon after as he could, wrote down the substance of it. Mr. Lincoln began by saying that he was accidentally elected President of the United States, and that he was surprised at the enmity of the South; for his speeches were not opposed to Southern institutions, except the one in which he had observed they must be all free or all slave States, and that, he said, "was an abstract opinion, and never intended to be made the basis of his political action." The sooner United States' politicians make their abstract opinions the basis of their political conduct the better it will be for the country. Mr. Lincoln said he was willing to give a constitutional guarantee that slavery should not directly or indirectly be molested in the States, or in the district of Columbia; and, further, that slavery should not be interfered with in the docks, arsenals, forts, and other places within the slaveholding States; "but as for slavery in the Territories, that his whole life was dedicated in opposition to its extension there. He was elected by a party which had made that a portion of its platform; and he should consider that he was betraying that party if he ever agreed, under such a state of the case, to allow slavery to be extended in the Territories." This was merely fencing the question that the deputation had waited on him to discuss, and General Donovan put an end to it by suggesting the three courses Mr. Lincoln might adopt in reference to secession:—1st, he might pursue a policy of noninterference; 2nd, he might give the guarantees demanded, and bring the whole power of his Administration to bear in obtaining them; or, 3rd, he might resort to coercion. We will let Mr. Morehead tell in his own words how Mr. Lincoln treated these suggestions:—

When the conversation had slackened a little, I ventured to appeal to him, in a manner in which I never appealed to any other man, and never expect to do again. I said that as to the last proposition I desired to say one word—that I trusted and prayed to God that he would not resort to coercion; that if he did, the history of his Administration would be written in blood, and all the waters of the Atlantic Ocean could never wash it from his hands. He asked me what I would do, and if I meant by coercion the collecting of the revenue and the taking back of the forts which he said belonged to the United States. I replied that that was the only mode in which it was possible that he could, under the Constitution, resort to coercion—by an attempt to collect the revenue and to take back the forts. He had placed himself in a chair with rounds to it, with his feet upon the highest round—a long, lanky man, with very large side whiskers, with his elbows upon his knees, and his hands upon the sides of his face, in an attitude of listening, and when he would speak he would drop his hands, and raise his head. Dropping his hands and raising his head, he said he would tell me a little anecdote which had happened when he first came to the bar. An old man, he said, had applied to him to bring a suit, and made out a capital case, as he thought; but when the evidence was detailed before the jury it was the worst case that he had ever listened to, and whilst the evidence was going on the old man came listening to the evidence himself, and whispered in his ear "Guv it up." (Laughter.) "Now," said he, "Governor, wouldn't this be 'guvin' it up?'" I assure you, Mr. Chairman, I don't present it in any light different from that in which it actually occurred—none whatever. I said to him, "Mr. President, it may be said that it would be 'guvin' it up,' but hadn't you better 'guv it up' without bloodshed, than drench this land with blood, and then have to 'guv it up?'"

Mr. Lincoln then referred to his oath of office, and indulged in another anecdote, this time a version of one of "Æsop's Fables." The deputation felt irritated by such unseemly, we must add vulgar, trifling with the solemn issue under consideration. Mr. Reeves addressed him seriously, and told him that if coercion were employed, Virginia would secede, and added, "Nay, sir, old as I am, and deeply as I have loved this Union, in that event I would go with all my heart and soul."

Mr. Lincoln jumped up from his chair, as Mr. Reeves was standing, advanced one step towards him, and said, "Mr. Reeves! Mr. Reeves! if Virginia will stay in, I will withdraw the troops from Fort Sumpter." Mr. Reeves stepped back and said, "Mr. President, I have no authority to speak for Virginia. I am one of the humblest of her sons; but if you do that it will be one of the wisest things you have ever done. Do that, and give us guarantees, and I can only promise you that whatever influence I possess shall be exerted to promote the Union and to restore it to what it was."

The interview then terminated. Mr. Lincoln, so far from avowing his real intentions, impressed Mr. Morehead and his friends with the idea that he did not contemplate coercion, though he was then, it is now known, engaged in preparing for war. Surely the nickname of "Honest Abe" is a biting sarcasm; for hereafter, when the history of the dissolution is written, Mr. Lincoln will be represented as one of the most deceitful, as well as one of the weakest, statesmen of his age. This corrupt and tortuous policy of the North in its treatment of the South—which is in its way as infamous as the wicked war of aggression of which it was the prelude, though not so execrable and hideous as the officially sanctioned outrages on humanity of such men as Butler and Turchin, or as the unparalleled atrocity of the attempt to exterminate the people of the South by a servile war—more than justifies the Southerners in their fierce and unalterable determination to accept death and desolation rather than the shame and inevitable ruin involved in submission to the North.

The Prussian Crisis.

ALMOST any form of Government will answer in prosperous times, but when difficulties arise, Constitutionalism, Republicanism, Imperialism, and all other political isms, are put on their trial, and if they escape shipwreck they are nearly sure to incur the damage that results from a temporary deadlock. The remarkable feature of the breakdown in Prussia is, that the Constitution has come to grief when the course seemed particularly smooth, and the race might have been won by quietly walking over the ground. The waves are unruffled, there is no indication of a storm, yet the ship founders. We are not denying that the effect must have had a sufficient cause; we merely contend the cause is not very apparent, and that it would not have produced so much effect in any other country as it has done in Prussia. King William is not inclined to give up a tittle of what he esteems his Royal prerogatives, and which are in remarkable contradiction to the position of a constitutional monarch. By accident, if not by deep design, the question at issue—we are referring now to the affair of the Budget—is one that for the people involves the whole of their constitutional liberty; for if the popular representatives cease to control the purse strings, constitutional liberty is at an end; and so long as the people have a direct control over Government expenditure despotism is impossible. On the other hand, no subject could have been broached that more nearly touches a King of Prussia. If the King could have given way on any and every other question of expenditure, he could not, without belying the traditions of his dynasty, and weakening what he has been taught to believe the foundation of his authority, have made the slightest concession in regard to army expenditure. If Prussian Constitutionalism can pass through this ordeal unscathed, its strength, vitality, and endurance will be unquestionable—if King William succeeds in his present measure, he will be as absolute as any sovereign in the world. The probability is that there will be a compromise. The German people are too much imbued with the military spirit to insist very strongly upon a Royal Commander-in-Chief being in the matter of military expenditure a mere servant of constitutional forms; and the King knows too well the popular nature of the army to goad his people to resistance, by insisting on a proceeding that is unmistakably despotic. We should rather have said that a compromise is possible rather than probable. At present, neither party seems willing to make the slightest concession. No statesman can feel easy whilst a dispute exists between the Executive and the Legislature, which in Prussia represents the most influential classes. Those who sow discord are never sure of the kind of harvest they may reap. In a vast majority of instances, revolutionists never realize their expectations, and if they could have foreseen the results of agitation, would have cheerfully borne the evils, real or imaginary, which they sought to remedy by violent changes. Possibly the contest provoked by the Liberal opposition to the Government Budget may lead to the practical abnegation of the parliamentary system. Possibly the King's attempt to make the House of Representatives, so far as military expenditure is concerned, a mere court of registration, may be the means of defining and curtailing the Royal authority. It is a problem which can only be solved by the march of events.

That the King's act is unconstitutional, is undeniable; and we must do His Majesty the justice to note that he does not make any effort to conceal from his subjects the design and character of the bold game he is playing. The point in dispute will be readily appreciated by Englishmen. According to the Prussian Constitution, the Chamber of Lords has a veto on the monetary resolutions of the Chamber of Deputies, but it has no power to alter or modify such resolutions; it can only reject or accept them. The way in which the Chamber of Lords exceeded its constitutional functions is so well expressed in the resolution proposed to the Chamber of Deputies by M. de Forckenbeck, on behalf of the Committee of the Budget, that we cannot give a clearer view of the case than by quoting it:—

The resolution voted by the Chamber of Lords to its sitting of October 11, relative to the Budget of 1862, violates the sense and the letter of Article 62 of the Constitution, in so much as not confining itself to adopt or reject the resolution of the Chamber of Deputies of October 3, which was alone submitted to it, after the rejection of that resolution, and adopted the Budget project of the Government, which did not come under its powers at all; that consequently that resolution is null and without value, and the Royal Government cannot derive any right therefrom.

Upon this resolution being submitted, eight members protested and left the assembly, and it was adopted without discussion by the 237 members who remained. This evidences a remarkable unanimity, which could never have been brought about but for the palpable unconstitutionality of the proceedings of the Chamber of Lords. The King, undaunted by such a general protest—and be it observed, the feeling of the Chamber was well known before the above resolution was voted—caused the session of the Diet to be closed in the afternoon of the same day.

From a comparison of the dates, it would seem that the dismissal was intended to take place before the Chamber of Deputies could pass any resolution on the decision of the Upper Chamber—an intention which was frustrated by the precipitate action of the deputies. The unanimous endorsement of the Budget Committee's blunt resolution cannot fail to strengthen and encourage the Liberal party.

The Message was as outspoken as the resolution. It is avowed that "His Majesty is under the necessity of wielding the public affairs outside the conditions prescribed by the Constitution." A plainer declaration could not have been framed. The King, finding the two Chambers cannot agree, thinks it incumbent on him, on behalf of the public service, to set aside the Constitution, or, at all events, temporarily suspend its operation—thus assuming a function equivalent to that of a State Convention in America, yet with an important difference. A Convention is a perfectly constitutional authority; whereas the act of the King of Prussia is unconstitutional. But the candid tone of the Message renders it unnecessary to discuss its illegality.

In order that there might not be any misconception as to the Royal policy, it is stated, "The Government of His Majesty the King could not rally to the resolutions of the Chamber of Representatives," thus approving the proceedings of the Chamber of Lords, and more than hinting that the King, through his Ministers, reserves to himself the right to reject the financial measures of the Chamber of Representatives. The reason assigned is somewhat curious. The Government "would render itself culpable of a serious forgetfulness of its duties if, conformably to the resolution of the Chamber, at the price of abandoning the considerable sacrifices it has already made, and to the detriment of the power of Prussia, it were to retract the reform of the Constitution of the army, accomplished in conformity with former votes of the national representation." Are we to infer that, in the opinion of the King, the enactments of the Chamber of Representatives, once sanctioned by the Sovereign, are, like the laws of the Medes and Persians, unalterable, and that the deputies have not the power to repeal their own or their predecessors' acts? Such a doctrine is untenable, but not quite novel. A section of American politicians have enunciated the principle in regard to secession, by saying sovereign States have a right to enter a Union but not to retire from it. But the doctrine is evidently fallacious, for it is obvious that the power to make must include the power to unmake. This applies to individuals as well as to legislatures; hence in all compacts there is a stipulation for a forfeit in the event of nonfulfilment.

The message is emphatic, but the speech made by King William, in reply to an address from various deputations, is positively defiant. The King seems bent on crushing opposition by a daring avowal of his intention not to regard the Constitution when it interferes with his sovereign will. He makes a merit of consenting "to the suppression of additional imposts" thus asserting that the financial measures of the Chamber of Representatives are subject to his gracious condescension. The Chamber ought to feel grateful when the King thinks proper to endorse its acts. "Did I receive gratitude in return? On the contrary, the Chamber of Deputies has issued an address which contains anything but thanks."

Yet this is the mildest part of His Majesty's speech. It appears as if he desired to goad his subjects to do their worst. The 237 deputies are flatly charged with disloyalty and insidious designs. "The reform of the army is not the real object of attack, it is elsewhere. Views formerly concealed have dropped the mask, at least in part." He wishes to preserve the Constitution intact, but immediately adds, "It is my indispensable mission, and my firm will also, to maintain intact the crown inherited from my ancestors, and its constitutional rights;" and further on, "I am firmly resolved not to sacrifice anything more of my hereditary rights;" and he reminds his auditors that the motto of Prussia is "with God, for the King and the country." No sovereign, either constitutional or despotic, ever addressed a bolder defiance to his subjects. To carry out such a policy he needs a well-organized army, and not a self-styled national army, which ought, as a Prussian has not blushed to say, to "stand behind the Parliament." He thus insults the national forces of Prussia, and looks for an army that will fight for the King, and not for the Constitution. If the Royal policy of defiance succeeds, we must conclude that the Prussian people are not fit for constitutional government.

Troubles never come singly. The delegates of the South German States assembled at Munich have protested against the Prusso-French Treaty as inadmissible and detrimental to the interests of trade. Prussia is a member of the Zollverein, and yet enters into this treaty as though commercially independent. If the South German States are as firm as the House of Representatives, either the Zollverein must be dissolved or the treaty must be revised. King William has overrated his influence in supposing the Bund would submit to his dictation; and he cannot checkmate his federal colleagues by a coup d'état. It would have been but common prudence to have obtained the assent of the States to the treaty before it was signed; as it is, there seems to be a strong desire to resent the high-handed slight. The delegates at Munich have declared in favour of a customs union with Austria by a majority of 138 to 57. Unless Prussia recedes from the position she has assumed, it is not improbable that the present Zollverein may be dissolved, and a union formed between the South German States and Austria. Such a result would benefit Austria, but it would be distasteful to Prussia. King William, who so lately ascended the throne with the fairest prospects of being popular with his own subjects, and influential with the German Bund, has managed very effectually to displease the one and the other. When he informed his people that he reigned by the Grace of God, in a way that inferred his Divine right to the kingship, he was honest as well as explicit. So far as the Constitution did not infringe on his notions of Royal prerogative, he would observe it faithfully, but his Royal prerogative was a higher and better thing than the Constitution, which must give place to it. King William, like his predecessors, is a martinet, and like them, looks to the army as the bulwark of the throne. This is not surprising, seeing that the kingdom of Prussia owes its existence to military prowess; but the army would be an insecure support against a popular uprising; since it is not only recruited from, but intimately attached to, the people. The Prussian military system in an especial manner fosters the civil feeling and sentiment of the soldier, and it will be difficult to raise an anti-national army. We do not suppose the King intended to rule the German States imperiously; but that making the French Treaty on his own responsibility was a blunder he must deplore.

King William is trying to extricate himself from difficulty by fostering the cry of nationality, and pointing to the Danish Duchies. This is likely to please his subjects, who are fanatics on the point of "Fatherland" being co-extensive with the German language—they may possibly lay claim some day to portions of the Western States of America—and who, under such excitement, will, if they are very blind indeed, forget their constitutional wrongs. A war with Denmark would be highly popular with the Prussian army, as the most bitter hostility exists between Germans and Danes. The members of the German Diet would be heartily glad to detach the Duchies from Denmark. Accordingly, propositions have been made to Denmark which it was well known Denmark could not accept, and which it is hardly consistent with the self-respect of Denmark to do more than refuse by a simple but decided negative. It is impossible to doubt that the proposition was so framed as to ensure its rejection. Meantime our Foreign Secretary, who has been in Germany, in the midst of Schleswig-Holstein exiles—it was arranged that an exiled Holstein clergyman should preach before Queen Victoria—has advised Denmark that he thinks unfavourably of her claims upon the Duchies, and counsels her to cancel the common Constitution for the kingdom of Denmark and Schleswig. This is remarkable, for whatever diversity of opinion there may be about Holstein, there is no question that Germany has no right to interfere in Schleswig; and his lordship knows this, for on January 31, 1861, he wrote to our representative, Mr. John Ward:—"The German Diet has no jurisdiction in Schleswig, and no right to interfere with her administration;" and on February 23, 1861, he observes, in a despatch to Lord Cowley, "Schleswig is a Danish Duchy, and although it is at once for the honour and for the interest of Denmark that Schleswig should be treated in an equitable manner, the King of Denmark cannot, without compromising the interests of his country, enter into negotiations with Germany on the conditions which His Majesty may be pleased to make with that Duchy." We will not seek to fathom his lordship's motive in thus eating his own words and tendering such unfriendly advice to a friendly Power, and which, we need hardly add, has been "positively declined," and which, without much impropriety, might have been "scornfully rejected." His lordship fears an outbreak in Europe, and thinks to avert it by sacrificing Denmark. Such a compromise with right might postpone complications for a time, to make them worse some little while hence. It is not likely either Prussia or Denmark will rely on the moral support, or be guided by the counsel, of our present Foreign Secretary, who seems to think his duty consists in giving advice gratis to those who neither need it nor heed it, and always to render his advice palatable to the stronger Power.

The Louisiana Purchase.

No portion of the late American Union has undergone such a variety of political changes as the territory of Louisiana. A slight sketch of its history may not, therefore, be uninteresting at the present time.

Ferdinand de Soto, who had distinguished and enriched himself in the conquest of Peru, was appointed by Charles the Fifth of Spain, to the office of Governor of Cuba, and obtained a grant for Florida, where he hoped to find and plunder populous and wealthy nations. With an expedition he sailed from Havannah in May, 1539, landing at Tampa Bay, whence he penetrated into the interior. After these few explorations, he reached the banks of the Mississippi, in the neighbourhood of Memphis, where he passed the winter of 1541, and died the following spring. The remnant of his party constructed rafts and floated down to the Gulf of Mexico, and disembarked at a Spanish settlement near the site of Tampico. These discoveries, made in the vain hope of finding gold, were not prosecuted, and 130 years elapsed before the Mississippi was again visited by white men.

Colbert, the first Minister of Finance under Louis the Fourteenth, formed the "West India Company" in 1664, for the extension of commerce with the islands of the Caribbean Sea, which had been partially occupied by the French during the previous thirty years, and to this new association the province of Canada was transferred, in consequence of the incapacity of the "Company of New France." Tracy, the Viceroy, after regulating matters in the West Indies, proceeded to Canada with a military force, and defeated the Indians, who had much annoyed the early settlers. This induced an exploration in a southerly direction, and after nine years' search the Mississippi was reached on the 17th of June, 1673. These adventurous Frenchmen were afraid to descend the river below Arkansas, as they were told that there were hostile tribes of Indians, there, and knowing that the Spanish, who were in Mexico, might learn of their discoveries they resolved to return north, and arrived at Quebec in 1681. The reports concerning the "great river" having been received in Canada several years anterior to the return of these pioneers, La Salle obtained a commission for perfecting its discovery in 1677, set out upon his journey the following year; and after passing through a variety of perils took formal possession of the mouth of the river on the 9th of April, 1682, on behalf of the King of France; the country on its banks received the name of LOUISIANA. He returned to France, and in 1684 was furnished with a frigate and three other ships, on board of which were embarked twelve priests, twelve gentlemen, fifty soldiers, a number of hired mechanics, and a small body of volunteer agricultural emigrants, well furnished with tools and provisions, in all 280 persons, designed to plant a colony at the mouth of the Mississippi. The ships missed the entrance of the river, and landed their passengers on the coast of Texas in February, 1685. By sickness and despair the colonists were reduced to thirty-six persons. In this extremity, in January, 1689, La Salle set off with sixteen men for Canada, and after three months' wanderings, he was murdered by two of his companions, who were killed by the others. Nine of the men joined the Indians, and the remaining five arrived at the mouth of the Arkansas, where they met a party who had set out from Canada to meet the emigrants from France, but not finding them, were on their return home. The twenty men left in Texas obscurely perished, but France in after times claimed the region thus transiently occupied as a part of Louisiana, which claim was revived more than a century afterwards.

The prosperity of the western part of St. Domingo in 1698 induced the French to make another effort to plant a colony on the Mississippi. D'Iberville, a Canadian, was selected as a leader in the enterprise, and placed in charge of two frigates with two tenders, and about 200 passengers, mostly discharged soldiers. The ships came to anchor near the group of Chateaufort; some of the colonists built huts on Ship Island, others entered the Mississippi, which they knew by its muddy appearance, and ascended it as far as Red River; returning inland, they joined their companions. The drowned lands of the Lower Mississippi did not invite settlement; the shores of the Bay of Biloxi were, therefore, selected for the incipient colony, when D'Iberville embarked for France to obtain supplies in May, 1699. The Spanish considered the settlement as an intrusion upon territory which they claimed, but an alliance between their throne and a Bourbon Prince prevented any serious opposition. It was rather English than Spanish rivalry that the French had to dread. The course and mouth of the Mississippi had become known in Europe, and Coxé, a London physician, but a large proprietor in New Jersey, purchased the old patent of Carolina, granted in 1630, under which he put forward pretensions to the Mississippi, which two armed English vessels had been sent to explore. Sauvolle, left as Governor during D'Iberville's absence, made treaties with the neighbouring Indians—the Choctaws—while Bienville took a trip into the interior. Coming back to the river, about fifty miles from the gulf, he encountered one of Coxé's vessels, whose commander he assured had made an error; that it was not the Mississippi, but a dependency of Canada, occupied by the French. The master turned about and left the river, and this reach is still called English Turn. D'Iberville got back about the end of the year with two vessels and sixty Canadians. After establishing a settlement at Natchez, he again returned to France. In 1702, Sauvolle and many of the colonists died. D'Iberville came the third time from France with provisions and soldiers, who located at Mobile, where they were joined by a number of those who had preceded them, and this Alabamian settlement became the headquarters for the colony. Although recruits repeatedly arrived, the whole number of colonists for the next ten years never exceeded 200, such was the loss by sickness.

In order to encourage the rapid settlement of Louisiana, the whole province was granted in 1712, with a monopoly of the trade to Anthony Crozat, a wealthy French merchant, who expected to make great gains from the discovery of mines and a trade with Mexico. He contracted to send every year two ships from France with goods and emigrants. He was to be entitled to import an annual cargo of slaves from Africa, notwithstanding the monopoly of that business was in the hands of a special company. The French Government agreed to pay 50,000 livres for warlike defences. A trading house was established at Montgomery, Alabama, in 1714, and another in 1716, at Natchitoches. After five years of large outlay and small returns, Crozat was obliged to resign his patent. Other speculators, still more sanguine, were found to fill his place. The exclusive commerce of Louisiana for twenty-five years, with extensive power of Government and a monopoly of the Canadian fur trade, was bestowed on the "Company of the West," otherwise called the "Mississippi Company," known presently as the Company of the Indies, and notorious for the stock jobbing, and bubble hope of profit to which it gave rise. At the date of this transfer, the colony contained, soldiers included, about 700 people. The Mississippi Company undertook to introduce 6000 whites, and half as many negroes; and their connection with Law's Royal Bank,* and the great rise in the price of shares, of which new ones were constantly created, gave them, for a time, unlimited command of funds. Private individuals, to whom grants of land were made, also sent out colonists on their own account. Law received twelve miles square on the Arkansas, which he undertook to settle with 1500 Germans. D'Iberville died at St. Domingo. Bienville remained on the Mississippi, and was appointed Governor in 1718; in that year he set a party of convicts to clear up a swamp, the site of the present city of New Orleans, and the seat of Government was removed thence in 1723.

The failure of Law's Royal Bank, and the decline in the Company's stock, put a sudden check to immigration. There were, however, several thousand inhabitants in Louisiana, and the colony was considered as fairly established. The unhealthiness of the climate was an obstacle to its progress; the unfitness of the colonists was another difficulty, many of them being convicts or vagabonds collected from the highways of Europe. But these proved so unprofitable that their further importation was forbidden, and the chief reliance for agricultural operations was on African slaves. The German settlers in Arkansas moved to the neighbourhood of New Orleans, fixing themselves in that rich tract known as the "German coast." Trade, in its most minute ramifications, was carried on by the colonists at prices fixed by the Company; but there were a species of merchants or brokers who conducted transactions with the Indians on a system of barter. Constant communication existed between Canada and Louisiana, which was interrupted frequently by English traders from Carolina, and hostile Indians. These obstructions caused serious loss to the Mississippi Company, which, with the expense of the war with the Natchez, caused them to resign Louisiana to the Crown in 1732, when affairs were carried on pretty much as before. Bienville was appointed Royal Governor. The enmity of the Chickasaws was so great, that the French determined to attempt the conquest of that haughty nation, while the Canadians were fighting the Iroquois; but they were repulsed—the native race receiving aid from the English traders. The colony of Louisiana, though by far the most important French domain in America, had made but little progress at the breaking out of the war with the British, in 1756, which was disastrous to the French arms. Canada being conquered, France was stripped of all her possessions in North America, except that part of Louisiana west of the Mississippi, together with the Island of Orleans, which she at once ceded to Spain, in consideration of her losses in the contest.

The Treaty of Peace was made at Fontainebleau on November 3, 1762, at which time Spain exchanged Florida for the Havana. By the terms of the treaty, the navigation of the Mississippi, from its source to its mouth, was to be free to both parties, without liability to stoppage, search, or duty.

The French were not pleased at being placed under Spanish rule; the transaction was attended by afflicting events to the ancient population of the province, and the delay in the delivery to Spain caused them to entertain a hope that the transfer was a mere simulation for the purpose of securing Louisiana to the crown of France against the hazard of future wars. It was not until 1766 that Don Antonio de Ulloa was sent over to receive possession; he remained two years at the head of a military force, but never took formal control of the country, and was compelled to withdraw, on his refusal to furnish the Council with his powers and instructions from the King of Spain. Don Alexander O'Reilly arrived the next year, and, after a bloody tragedy, the Council was abolished, and the laws of Spain introduced. Louisiana was then placed under the captain-generalship of Cuba.

The treaties between Great Britain, France, Spain, and the United States, concluded in 1783, opened the navigation of the Mississippi without restrictions to the United States; ceded the Floridas back to Spain, and bounded the possessions of the two countries by a line eastward of the thirty-first parallel on the Mississippi, to the Apalachicola River, down the St. Mary's River to the Atlantic. These treaties were soon followed by embarrassing disputes, in which the Spaniards laid claim to a large tract of country, and exclusive right to the navigation of that portion of the Mississippi which passed through their territories, against both of which claims the United States protested. In 1788, Spain offered to cede the free navigation of the Mississippi to the inhabitants of all the territory west of the river, in the hope that they might detach themselves from the American Union, which then existed under the Articles of Confederation, who treated the proposition with contempt. The United States again, in 1790, made an effort to procure the right of the Mississippi; also the island on which New Orleans is situated and the Floridas, and offered to protect the other possessions of Spain in America in case of a war with England. The proposition was not assented to, but five years afterwards a treaty was made for the freedom of the river, and the use of New Orleans as a depot for ten years. The possession of Louisiana became an object of great moment. Genet, the French Minister, on his own responsibility endeavoured to get up a filibustering expedition in America to conquer it, but Washington opposed the scheme on the grounds of neutrality. Governor in commotion—every man, woman, and child became a financier—the boot-black and the collier of to day were the grandees of to-morrow, and their splendid equipages dazzled the populace. The Royal Bank stock went up to six hundred times its par value, and dividends were rendered at 200 per cent. The exhaustless mines near the Mississippi would reimburse any investment, it was said. In three years John Law was a bankrupt and a beggar. The Government of France received a terrible shock: the deluded votaries of stock-jobbing were undone; the magnificent western company—the Mississippi scheme—became a bye word; the banking bubble, when inflated to the skies, burst.

Blount, of Tennessee, had a plot to invade it with the aid of British troops from Canada; he was disgraced, and the British Government exonerated. Bonaparte was anxious to regain the ascendancy of France in America, and on the 1st of October, 1800, the treaty of Ildefonso was concluded between the Catholic King and French Consul, by which Spain promised and engaged to retrocede to the French Republic, six months after the full and entire execution of the conditions therein stipulated in relation to the Duke of Parma, the colony and province of Louisiana with the same extent that it had in the hands of Spain, and that it had when France possessed it, and such as it should be after the treaties subsequently entered into between Spain and the other Powers. The stipulation to the Duke of Parma was, that he should be put in possession of Tuscany. Another stipulation provided for a preference to Spain in the event of Louisiana passing again out of the hands of France. Laussat, the Colonial Prefect, arrived in Louisiana, and issued a proclamation denouncing the previous separation of the province from France, as the fruit of a corrupt Government, an ignominious war, and a corrupt peace. In the meanwhile, and before the existence of the treaty between Spain and France, which had been made in secret, was announced, the Spanish Governor of Louisiana had abruptly suspended the right of deposit on the mouth of the Mississippi, which had been secured to the United States until the year of 1805.

As soon as it became known in the United States that France had again come into possession of her old province, the greatest anxiety and uneasiness were manifested on every hand. The West was suddenly in a flame. New Orleans was about to escape, and with one deep and pervading sentiment, they exclaimed, "the Mississippi must be ours; its mouth is the only issue which nature has given to our waters, if our liberty be disputed, nothing shall prevent our taking forcible possession. If Congress refuses us effectual protection, we shall adopt the measures which our safety requires. No protection, no allegiance." It was everywhere taken for granted that France would entirely exclude American citizens from the Province; and Congress itself, and the President, Mr. Jefferson, shared in the general uneasiness. Mr. Munroe was despatched to Paris. Mr. Livingston, the minister there, had already displayed some temper on the subject, and had advised his Government to extreme measures. "Hasten to France," said Mr. Jefferson to Mr. Munroe. "If we cannot, by purchase of the country, ensure a perpetual peace and friendship with all nations, then, as war cannot be far distant, it behoves us immediately to prepare for it." Mr. Munroe was directed to offer two millions of dollars for the city of New Orleans; and Mr. Rost, of Pennsylvania, proposed in the Senate to place five millions of dollars at the disposition of the President, and to raise fifty thousand men to take possession of Louisiana by force. Napoleon was informed of all this; he saw a thick cloud impending over France, and another fifteen years' war with England, as he expressed it, on the eve of breaking out; he consulted with two of his ministers upon the subject. One said, "we should not hesitate a moment to make a sacrifice of that which is slipping from us;" while the other replied, "we must retain Louisiana, there does not exist in the face of the globe, a single port, a single city, susceptible of becoming as important as New Orleans." Napoleon, however, yielded to the first opinion, and Barbé Marbois opened negotiations at once. Mr. Munroe arrived in France. He had the singular good fortune of reaching Paris on the eve of the rupture of the peace of Amiens. Mr. Livingston met him with the expression, "I wish that the resolution offered by Mr. Rost in the Senate had been adopted. Only force can give us New Orleans." Mr. Livingston had no confidence in the overtures of M. de Marbois. The three negotiators met together and deliberated. The question came before them in every possible point of view, and when the terms were agreed upon and presented to the First Consul, he said, "Let the Louisianians know that we separate from them with regret, that we stipulate in their favour everything they can desire; and let them, hereafter, happy in their independence, recollect that they have been Frenchmen, and that France, in ceding them, has secured for them advantages which they could not have obtained from any other power." The treaty was dated at Paris, the 13th of April, 1803; it ceded to the United States, for ever and in full sovereignty, the province of Louisiana, with all its rights and appurtenances in full, and in the same manner as they had been acquired by France from Spain. Eight stipulations exist in the treaty, one of which gave to the inhabitants all the privileges enjoyed by the citizens of the several American States

The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States; and in the meantime they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess.

The United States agreed to pay sixty millions of francs, and to discharge certain claims due by France to American citizens, for illegal seizures made by the French navy during the late war. The stipulation for the cash amount was as follows:—

For the payment of sixty millions of francs, the United States shall create a stock of eleven millions two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, bearing an interest of six per cent. per annum, payable half-yearly in London, Amsterdam, or Paris, amounting by the half-year to three hundred and thirty-seven thousand five hundred dollars, according to the propositions which shall be determined by the French Government, to be

* In the year 1715, John Law, a Scotchman, settled in Paris. He was a singular character, a restless projector, a daring financier, high minded, and full of enterprise. This extraordinary man soon succeeded in gaining a ruling influence over the Duke of Orleans, then Regent of France, obtained a charter for a bank of $1,200,000, substituted paper for specie, and set the whole French nation mad with magnificent schemes of creating wealth, as it were, by the waud of a magician. The Chancellor, D'Aguesseau, opposed this daring scheme with infinite peril to himself. To the Royal Bank of Law was attached a great commercial company, in which were to be concentrated all the rights, privileges, and possessions of all the trading companies then chartered in France. To this company was granted the great territory of Louisiana, as it was surrendered up by Crozat. All Paris was paid at either place: the principal of said stock to be reimbursed at the Treasury of the United States, in annual payments of not less than three millions of dollars each; of which the first payment shall commence fifteen years after the date of the exchange of ratifications; this stock shall be transferred to the Government of France, or to such person or persons as shall be authorized to receive it, in three months at most after the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty, and after Louisiana shall be taken possession of in the name of the Government of the United States.

It is further agreed, that if the French Government should be desirous of disposing of the said stock to receive the capital in Europe, at shorter terms, that its measures for that purpose shall be taken so as to favour, in the greatest degree possible, the credit of the United States, and to raise to the highest price the said stock.

Much as political affairs influenced the sale of Louisiana, there is no doubt that the financial necessities of the Consulate also rendered it desirable. Before the treaty was ratified by the Senate of the United States, the celebrated house of Hope and Company, of Amsterdam, had made a heavy advance on the forthcoming American scrip.

The following commercial arrangements were embodied in the treaty:—

As it is reciprocally advantageous to the commerce of France and the United States to encourage the communications of both nations for a limited time in the countries ceded by the present treaty, until general arrangements relative to the commerce of both nations may be agreed on; it has been agreed between the contracting parties, that the French ships coming directly from France or any of her colonies, loaded only with the produce and manufactures of France or her said colonies; and the ships of Spain coming directly from Spain or any of her colonies, loaded only with the produce or manufactures of Spain or her colonies, shall be admitted during the space of twelve years in the ports of New Orleans, and in all other legal ports of entry within the ceded territory, in the same manner as the ships of the United States coming directly from France or Spain, or any of their colonies, without being subject to any other or greater duty on merchandize, or other or greater tonnage than that paid by the citizens of the United States.

During the space of time mentioned, no other nation shall have a right to the same privileges in the ports of the ceded territory; the twelve years shall commence three months after the exchange of ratifications, if it shall take place in France, or three months after it shall have been notified at Paris to the French Government, if it take shall place in the United States; it is, however, well understood that the object of the above article is to favour the manufacture, commerce, freight, and navigation of France and of Spain, so far as relates to importations that the French and Spanish shall make into the said ports of the United States, without in any way affecting the regulations that United States may make concerning the exportations of the produce and merchandize of the United States, or any right they may have to make such regulations.

These articles in reference to commerce, would seem to be in direct conflict with the treaties of the United States with Great Britain and other countries; that of November 19, 1794, with England, says:—

The River Mississippi shall, however, according to the treaty of peace, be entirely open to both parties; and it is further agreed, that all the ports or places on its eastern side, to whichsoever of the parties belonging, may freely be resorted to and used by both parties, in as ample a manner as any of the Atlantic ports or places of the United States, or any of the ports or places of his Majesty in Great Britain.

There shall be between all the dominions of His Majesty in Europe and the territories of the United States, a reciprocal and perfect liberty of commerce and navigation. The people and inhabitants of the two countries respectively, shall have liberty freely and securely, and without hindrance and molestation, to come with their ships and cargoes to the lands, countries, cities, ports, places, and rivers, within the dominions and territories aforesaid, to enter into the same, to resort there, and to remain and reside there, without any limitation of time. Also to hire and possess and warehouses for the purposes of their commerce, and, generally, the merchants and traders on each side shall enjoy the most complete protection and security for their commerce; but subject also as to what respects this article to the laws and statutes of the two countries respectively.

But the fact is, that the "United States," as a Government, has never been formally acknowledged by the other Powers. The early treaties mentioned the names of the individual States, and no change was made after the adoption of the Constitution; hence all agreements with other countries were only binding upon States which were members of the Union anterior to their date. What greater evidence can we have in favour of the doctrine of State Rights? A new partner in a commercial house is not liable for the engagements of the firm contracted before he became connected with it.

The King of Spain protested against the transfer, and it was not until February, 1804, that he gave his acquiescence. The French flag had been displayed only twenty days at New Orleans, when the American ensign was unfurled to the breeze on the 20th December, 1803. There was some ambiguity in the treaty, that left the western boundary in dispute, which was in 1819 settled with Spain, by fixing the Sabine as the limits, resulting in that country annexing Texas to Mexico, and ceding Florida to the United States.

Soon after the treaty was made Mr. Jefferson called Congress together, when it was denied by the Northern members in the Senate that the Constitution permitted the acquisition of foreign territory, and more particularly without the consent of its inhabitants, but the administration was too powerful to render opposition other than futile in the extreme.

The Southerners were right. Article IV., Section 3, says—

New States may be admitted by Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of legislatures of the States concerned, as well as of the Congress.

The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or any particular State.

The Federalists insisted that Jefferson was not entitled to any merit for securing Louisiana. In vain they reproached him with having permitted himself to push this undeserved success too far; with having, by thus accepting from fortune too vast a gift, included a territory within the limits of the confederation which, by the force of circumstances, would be one day led to separate itself from the Atlantic States, after having thinned their population to increase its own. The public, intoxicated with joy, cared very little about these distant possibilities, which made more impression upon the mind of Jefferson, while depressing it as little. On this subject, in a letter to Mr. Breckenridge, dated August 12, 1803, he said:—

Besides, if it should become the great interest of those nations to separate from this, if their happiness should depend upon it so strongly as to induce them to go through that convulsion, why should the Atlantic States dread it? But, especially, why should we, their present inhabitants, take side in such a question? * * * The future inhabitants of the Atlantic and Mississippi States will be our sons. We leave them in distinct but bordering establishments. We think we see their happiness in their Union, and we wish it. Events may prove it otherwise, and if they see their interest in separation, why should we take side with our Atlantic rather than our Mississippi descendants? It is the elder and the younger son differing. God bless them both, and keep them in Union, if it be for their good, but separate them if it be better.

The act of 20th of March, 1804, which established the Territorial Government, divided Louisiana into two sections; that portion now known as the State of that name was called Orleans. The people of Orleans were not satisfied with their local administration, and applied to Congress for a change in 1805, when a Territorial Government was established similar to that of Mississippi, which provided for its admission into the Union as a State as soon as its population had reached 60,000; and on the 8th of July, 1812, under the name of Louisiana, she became a full member of the American Confederacy, upon the condition that the free navigation of the Mississippi and other rivers within her borders should be secured for ever to all the older States, free from "any tax, duty, import, or toll." The State of New York at that very day exacted a toll of one dollar for every passenger that passed up or down the Hudson and it was a clear violation of the treaty with France to exclude Louisiana from this privilege. But the United States also broke faith in enacting the Missouri compromise line, upon the admission of the State of that name in 1821, it being a portion of the territory ceded by France. Nor have they to this day settled with the creditors of France in America for the four millions of property illegally seized and disposed of. Arkansas, another part of the purchase, became a State in 1836. The Louisiana purchase, in fact, comprised the whole of the country west of the Mississippi from the Gulf of Mexico to the British possessions, with an undefined western boundary. This included the whole of Iowa and that portion of Minnesota west of the Mississippi, Kansas, Oregon, and the remaining territory to the Pacific, other than that ceded by Mexico to the United States in 1848.

Louisiana withdrew from the Federal Union on January 28, 1861, and joined the Confederate States at their formation on the 4th of February following. Arkansas did likewise on May 6, and Missouri on November 28 of the same year.

When Louisiana seceded, the people of the North alleged that whatever right any of the original States might have to retire from the compact, the commonwealths that had been purchased could not justly assume such power. The Federalists disregarded the terms of the treaty as well as the following clause in the Constitution:—

"The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States."

Nor had the pecuniary consideration anything to do with the matter; the amount was paid principally by the Southern States, who at the time had the preponderance in the Union. As well might a claim have been set up against the original States, in consequence of the Federal Government having assumed their debts contracted to carry on the Revolutionary War, which were as follows:—

New Hampshire	$300,000
Massachusetts	4,000,000
Rhode Island	200,000
Connecticut	1,600,000
New York	1,200,000
New Jersey	800,000
Pennsylvania	2,200,000
Delaware	200,000
Maryland	800,000
Virginia	3,200,000
North Carolina	2,200,000
South Carolina	4,000,000
Georgia	300,000
	$21,000,000

Subsequently the surplus funds in the Treasury were divided among all the States, except South Carolina, which declined to receive her share, on the grounds of the unconstitutionality of raising more money than was needed for the support of the Government by a system of protection tariffs.

The amount paid for the Louisiana territory was $14,914,872²⁸/₁₀₀. The United States received from the sales of land situate therein, between the years 1833 and 1839, inclusive, the following sums:—

Louisiana	$6,880,880
Missouri	3,240,369
Arkansas	3,110,377
Iowa	1,307,643
Iowa grant	1,270,690
	$15,809,959

Large sales of land were made both before and since those years, but we have not the figures before us. The number of acres unsold in 1847 was about 1,000,000,000, and there yet remains in the territory belonging to the Northern States about 800,000,000 acres.

The money paid for internal improvement in the States by the General Government between the years 1790 and 1847 amounted to $17,000,000, of which only $4,000,000 were expended in the South, and since 1847 the disbursements in the North have been in a far greater ratio. It will, therefore, be seen by account current that there is a large balance to the credit of the States composing the Southern Confederacy, to say nothing of the naval fleet and public buildings in possession of the Federalists.

In an early number we will furnish an account of Burr's conspiracy for the conquest of Louisiana.

Reviews.

THE DISTINCTIONS OF RACE.*

This book is not, strictly speaking, either an original or a translation. It is founded upon M. de Gobineau's "Inégalité des Races," and reproduces the leading ideas and arguments of that work in an English dress. But it contains a good deal that is not to be found in the pages of the French theorist; and on several minor points Mr. Hotze's notes express a difference of opinion with the author from whom the principal features of the book are avowedly borrowed. While it deals with the same topics in the same manner and from the same point of view, it is to a considerable extent an independent work; and its value is much enhanced by the notes of the American editor, and by an appendix, in which Dr. Nott, of Mobile, one of the chief ethnologists of America, has embodied the result of the most recent discoveries in his own and cognate branches of science. Its principal fault is attributable to its hybrid character; it is a good deal out of proportion. In many parts it is too full for an elementary treatise—a character which, indeed, it was hardly intended to bear—or for a summary of conclusions like Darwin's "Origin of Species;" while it is far too meagre to be considered in any degree exhaustive of the vast field of inquiry upon which it enters. Nevertheless, it distinctly establishes some conclusions, and points the way to many more which have a very important bearing on historical philosophy and political science.

It was the doctrine of Robert Owen, that education makes the man—that individual character depends wholly, or almost wholly, upon the influences brought to bear upon the infant, the child, and the adult, and not upon any moral efforts of his own, or upon any peculiarities inherent in his physical or psychical nature. This doctrine is repudiated alike by Christianity and by common sense. Religious men denounce it, because it absolves individuals from that responsibility for their own actions which is the foundation alike of heathen and of Christian ethics, and strikes at the root of a faith which attributes to every man the power to mould his life according to the light which God has vouchsafed him, and holds him answerable if he wilfully disobey the voice of conscience and of Revelation. Practical men ridicule the idea that there is no inherent difference in individual characters and capacities, as one which is in flagrant contradiction with each man's daily and hourly experience. We see men who have been brought up together from infancy resembling one another less than each resembles a score of strangers, whose antecedents have been altogether different. We see that while the similarity produced by education is for the most part superficial and eradicable, the distinctions which are reputed congenital are inherent in nature and character, and can never be effaced. We know that, whatever demagogues and theorists may say to the contrary, an average child taken in infancy from the hovels of Whitechapel or the garrets of St. Giles', to be brought up along with the heir of a noble family, would not possess the attributes, moral, intellectual, or physical, of his playmate. To some of us it may have happened to see children taken at the earliest age into a strange family, and brought up with its offspring; to such it never yet occurred to find in the adopted child the marked characteristics which distinguish the natural progeny. Our simplest proverbial philosophy, our most thoughtful and searching inquiries, our accepted religious creeds, alike insist upon the influence of the ancestor upon the posterity whom he may never have seen, and of whose education he is not even in the remotest degree the author. We all remember maxims by the score which indicate the ineradicable character of hereditary qualities; a truth early apprehended and recorded in the traditional sayings of every civilized nation. Revelation assures us that the sins of the fathers are visited on the children; and science, as usual, confirms and illustrates abundantly the brief assertion of Revelation. Women who have watched over the cradles of a score of infants, and philosophers who have carefully digested the phenomena collected by hundreds of patient observers, are cordially agreed in affirming the inherent diversity of character which education may cloak, but which it can never eradicate, and scarcely even modify. No competent schoolmaster, no observant nurse, no one who ever had anything to do with the young, believes that they are what education makes them, or doubts that each human soul comes into life with a nature of its own, as distinct from the nature of every other as the bodily features of each individual are distinct. The idea that the individual mind is a "blank tablet," or rather, a lump of plastic clay, of which the teacher may make what he will, is not seriously entertained by any reasoning man or woman who has attended to facts instead of indulging in speculation.

* The Moral and Intellectual Diversity of Races, with particular reference to their respective influence in the Civil and Political History of Mankind. From the French of the Comte de Gobineau. With an Analytical Introduction and copious Historical Notes, by H. HOTZE. To which is added an Appendix, containing a summary of the latest scientific facts bearing upon the question of Unity or Plurality of Species, by J. C. NOTT, M.D., of Mobile. (Philadelphia, J. P. Lippincott and Co., 1860.)

But what no thoughtful person will admit to be true of individuals, thousands will believe when some fanatic asserts it to be true of nations, and even of races or groups of nationalities. The equality of men is known to be an arrant absurdity; yet the inequality of races is not a popular idea. Everybody knows that individuals differ, not merely by education but by nature—are not merely differently moulded, but made of different material. Every one discerns, moreover, a greater difference between nation and nation than in the same nation between man and man. And yet there are hundreds of intelligent people ready to believe that the greater difference is produced by causes which they know to be inadequate to produce the less—who will have it that circumstances, which do not create the individuality of the individual, create the individuality of nations. John Smith differs from William Brown not merely because the former was brought up at home and the latter away from home, but because one was born with a clear mind and a weak will, and the other with a strong will and a confused intellect; because they are the children of different parents. But we are to hold that France differs from England—the average Englishman from the typical Frenchman—merely because the one has enjoyed liberty and order while the other has alternated between revolution and despotism—mistaking cause for effect; or because the one lives some hundred miles south of the other; or for any reason, except that which is most simple and obvious—because the two are descended from races of an entirely distinct character. Even the curious resemblance in many important respects between the Frenchman and the Irishman—who have nothing in common, except an ancestry which was divided before the memory of man—makes no impression on that numerous class who are determined to believe that while men are made by God, nations are the offspring of accident. The truth is, that so far from national character being moulded by national circumstances, the circumstances are governed, and, in fact, created by the character. England is a free country, because freedom is a necessity of natural existence to the race by which the national character of England has been determined. France oscillates between revolutionary chaos and personal despotism, because the capacity of self-government, and the determination to enjoy individual liberty, are not among the many noble and brilliant gifts that belong to the nature of the Celtic race. We have implanted representative institutions in Ireland; but they do not flourish there, despite the presence of a large colony of English blood, and if Ireland were severed from Great Britain, few men doubt that she would within ten years be subject to a despotism. No race of Scandinavian blood has ever endured that kind of tyranny which seems to be popular with Celtic nations. The former may have a despot on the throne, but they will have freedom in the cottage. The latter, even when governed by universal suffrage, expect and almost demand a more than paternal control in all social relations, and in all municipal affairs, from the Government of their choice. England tolerates a social tyranny over opinion, but will not bear interference with action; the Germans, who are patient of vexatious bureaucratic interference with everything they do, insist on a license of thought and speech greater than exists in any other country. Nothing would ever make the Turk a labourer or a merchant worthy of the name; the Greek, in the same climate and under the same Government, is as superior to the dominant race in industry and mercantile skill as he is inferior to them in manliness and soldierly qualities. It may be doubted whether the Neapolitans will ever show themselves fit to be either soldiers or freemen: the Piedmontese, who speak the same tongue and live in a very similar climate, have proved in the council and in the field their worthiness to be placed in the first rank among nations. The Lombards come next to them, and every one knows that the Piedmontese and Lombards are not Italians.

We might multiply without end the proofs of radical and ineffaceable distinctions between nations of the same stock. Everyone of those named above is of that which is called the Aryan race, and speaks a language descended from the Sanscrit. But the great purpose of the book before us is to trace the wider differences which exist between different races; to indicate clearly the greatness of the gulf which separates the Caucasian from the Mongolian, and both from the African family of mankind; to show that those differences are not fortuitous or temporary, but fixed and congenital; that as races differ in physical appearance, so they differ in moral and intellectual attributes; and that it is absurd and misleading to speak of them as if they belonged to one stock, or to reason as if that which is true of one race were necessarily true of the others. Both M. de Gobineau and Mr. Hottze were wise enough to avoid the rock on which Mr. Darwin made shipwreck. He, insisting on tracing similarities to a common descent, conjectured one origin for men and shell-fish, and roused against him at once the natural and the religious prejudices of his readers. In treating of human species, the authors of this volume have been content to waive all speculations as to origin, and to confine themselves to the facts of invariable and immemorial specific difference. Whether Negro, Chinese, and Englishmen be all descendants of one primeval pair, they do not inquire, nor need we. It is enough that, so far as the records of human existence can be traced, the distinctions of race were what we find them now; and that, therefore, we are justified in regarding them as being permanent in the only sense in which any earthly phenomenon can be called permanent. With the "origin of species" we are not called upon to concern ourselves; the fact of specific difference suffices us. So long as the world of which we know has existed, the Negro has been a Negro, the Asiatic an Asiatic, the Caucasian a Caucasian; and we must conclude, therefore, that these distinctions will remain as long as the races continue to exist.

We have used the term "species" to designate the various races of mankind. If man be a species of the genus monkey, or course we have no right to do so; but if the human creation be a genus apart, then it would seem that Negro and European are as much distinct species as are horse and ass, or hare and rabbit. There are only two rational objections ever urged against the doctrine of specific difference among mankind. The first is, that inasmuch as the various races were originally located in distinct regions, we may suppose their physical differences to be merely the effect of climate, operating during innumerable generations. The answer to this is, that the supposition is wholly gratuitous. Races that have lived in the same climate for centuries remain as distinct as ever; neither sun nor soil can make the Caucasian resemble the Mongolian, or bring the Negro one whit nearer to the white man. Again, it is asserted that hybridity is a test of specific difference, and that human mixed races exhibit no signs of hybridity—that is, do not exhibit that infertility which is its assigned attribute. Of this objection we think that Dr. Nott's appendix conclusively disposes. He demonstrates clearly, first, that the permanent fertility of mixed races has not yet been established; and, secondly, that among animals infertility is a matter of degree; some crosses between species admittedly distinct being fertile to the third generation.

But admitting that even the most widely distinct of human races are only to be called varieties, it is impossible to deny that they are historically permanent varieties, and that their characteristics are, so far as we know or can judge, immutable and inexchangeable. The last refuge of those who dislike the idea of human inequality is to affirm that these characteristics are merely physical; that the Negro and the Chinese are equals in intellect and moral character; and that each of them is, or might by education be made, the equal of the European. To look at a specimen of each race is to feel that those who argue thus are arguing against conviction. It is impossible to believe in the intellect of the negro, or the moral vigour of the Mongolian. But if the question is to be discussed, it should first be asked how, if the Negro was qualified by nature to be the rival of the white man, it happens that he has always remained a savage, except where he has been made the white man's slave? It should be asked, if there be in the Mongolian or the Hindoo no inherent inferiority to the European, why within historic memory neither Mongolian nor Hindoo ever made any progress in civilization? Are we again to be met with the doctrine of circumstances—or, in other words, of chance? And again, how comes it that, whether slave in Africa or in the Confederate States, or freeman in Jamaica or in Massachusetts, the moral and physical peculiarities of the Negro remain unaltered? Everywhere he is sensual, indolent, and incapable of taking care of himself; everywhere he is an unwelcome guest, except where he is utilized by slavery. How comes it that the Chinese is everywhere a Chinese, unfit to be a slave, and disliked as a free immigrant, carrying everywhere the virtues and the vices which have made China what it is? But it is scarcely worth while to discuss an assertion so notoriously untrue and so obviously absurd. Whenever and wherever we find each race, we find its moral and its intellectual characteristics as strongly marked, and as invariable as its physical peculiarities; and the same experience which proves the invariability of the one, establishes the permanence of the other.

It is absurd—it is dishonest—to select a few individuals from the inferior races, who have been distinguished by peculiar ability and exceptional force of character, and to present them as types of their race. Of course there are Red Indians who are cleverer than a stupid American; Chinese who are more virtuous and more energetic than a lazy and vicious Englishman; and even Negroes who are more capable than incapable Europeans; though in many cases it proves, on inquiry, that these selected specimens were men of mixed blood. It is as ridiculous to affirm that, because Toussaint Louverture displayed capacity which would have done credit to an ordinary European, therefore Negroes might be made equal to Europeans, as it would be to assert that every clown might, by education, be made the rival of a Pitt, a Newton, or a Napoleon.

M. de Gobineau believed, on good historic evidence, that all civilization was initiated by a tribe of the Aryan stock; that even the exceptional culture of China and Hindostan are due to the presence of a white race which has since died out. And this is probable a priori, inasmuch as a race capable of bringing civilization to the point which it has reached in China and Hindostan, could hardly be incapable of further developing it. We have seen no parallel instance within historic memory; because we have seen no Aryan civilization imposed on an Asiatic race. But we have seen the same experiment tried on American tribes by the Jesuits; and it was found that, as soon as the white instructors were withdrawn, their docile pupils returned to their former savage state. The Asiatic races, of a somewhat higher quality than these, retained what they have received, but were incapable of adding to it. The Negroes resemble the tribes of Paraguay. One instance there is in which civilized Negroes have been freed from the presence of the whites; and in despite of the influence of a considerable population of mixed race, Hayti has relapsed into African barbarism. A race which cannot improve its civilization must be inferior to one which never ceases to improve; a race which cannot keep the civilization it has received can only be saved from utter barbarism by continual contact and close juxtaposition with its civilizers.

And here we come to a point which is not treated in this volume—the conditions on which such juxtaposition of races is possible or desirable. Can they live together as equals, when both feel that nature has made them unequal? The experiment has been tried in the West Indies, and has utterly and disastrously failed. There remain, then, but three possible issues where, as in the Southern States, vast masses of two distinct and widely separate races are interfused—the extermination of the weaker, the amalgamation of both, or the subjection of the inferior. The removal of either race from the South is a matter of obvious impossibility; the destruction of either would be a crime from which the Enemy of Mankind might shrink with horror. Amalgamation must, we should think, revolt the feelings of every member of the superior race; it certainly is a consummation heartily to be deprecated by every man who knows what is the character of the mulatto blood. What remains, then, but that the Negro race should exist in a condition of permanent subjection, under the governance and tutelage, in some form or other, of the white man?

This problem is not directly touched in Mr. Hottze's book; but the whole argument prepares for it, leads up to it, and suggests a solution not the less clearly because it contains no immediate reference to the question.

AMERICA IN THE QUARTERLY REVIEWS.

THE QUARTERLY, No. 224. (London: Murray.)

The breakdown of the North and the success of the South have surprised the thinkers of Europe, as well as the general public. The boasting of the North has been repeated until it has commanded some share of credence, and the malignant slanders of Mrs. Stowe and the New England Clergy in respect to the South have been fully believed. It is now known that the reverend gentlemen who clamour for an anti-slavery God, and an anti-slavery Bible, who preach upon the goodness of a Sharp's rifle, and who hate the negro as much as they hate the Southerner, are quite as mendacious as Federal commanders. It is now known that the people of the South are not an enervated race, and that their slaves are not illused, and are not ready for revolt. Still, the heaven is not altogether taken away. The writer of the singularly able article, "The Confederate Struggle and Recognition," has here and there fallen into some errors with regard to Southern society. He refers, for instance, to "mean whites," a class which has no existence, except in the mouths of Northern slanderers; but such inaccuracies, do not in the main, affect the merit and usefulness of the essay. In two years a wonderful progress has been made in getting information as to the institutions and social status of the South, and we may express a hope, without being charged with being over sanguine, that in another two years all the mists of Northern slanders will be cleared away.

The failure of the North, so complete and unexpected, is ascribed to democratic institutions. These, we are told, keep the talent of the country in obscurity, and promote mediocrity.

By what malignant fate has it come to pass that the people who individually are proverbial for their readiness in surmounting obstacles that seem to others hopeless, should as a nation have made the most ignominious failure that the world has ever seen, in an enterprise in which all the chances were on their side? There can be but one explanation—it is that which is in everybody's mouth. They were infamously led. It has been well said that a regiment of asses with a lion at their head will do more than a regiment of lions with an ass at their head. Good leaders are the one thing needful; which no other excellences, however supereminent, can replace. In this case there was everything else the most sanguine patriot could have desired—gallant soldiers, magnificent equipments, an overwhelming superiority of numbers, and so easy communication with their sources of supply. But there is one fatal defect, which has made them, with all these advantages, the inferiors of the ill-armed, ill-fed, ill-clad, out-numbered Confederates. The defect was, that they had not, and have not now, one man who can be called a general in the field, nor one man who can be called a statesman in the Cabinet.

The Americans have never denied that this poverty of greatness was the result of their democratic institutions.

In this description the advantages of the Federals, great as they undoubtedly were, are somewhat exaggerated, and, in like manner, the disadvantages of the Confederates are rather heavily shaded. No wonder. For eighteen months the world has been forced to listen to Northern glorification of its own process, and the miserable condition of the "rebels." The North had more men and vastly better equipments than the South; but then, her men were not quite of the same stock, nor were they fighting for the liberty of their country against the attempted subjugation of invading hosts. We admit the genius of the Southern commanders; we admit they have displayed the most consummate military ability; whilst the Northern commanders have been conspicuous for their blundering; and that such a difference in the end is, other circumstances being equal, enough to account for victory. But though it is true a great captain can do wonders with inferior soldiers, it is not less true that good soldiers will, in the course of two campaigns, find good commanders. Actual war is a greater leveller than Democracy, and Mr. Lincoln would not have been able to keep an able soldier in the background. In the American armies the officers are taken from the same class as the private soldiers, and therefore, if there had been any military capacity in the Northern fighting element, it would have appeared. We are not saying the Federals have not military ability. In the Seven Days' Battle, although utterly routed, McClellan saved his army from capture and annihilation by very clever generalship. We contend that the mixed people of the North are inferior in the battle-field to the people of the South.

But the South, as well as the North, has been subject to the influence of democratic institutions; how, then, are we to explain the superiority of the former? The author of the article on which we are commenting says that the institution of slavery, by creating an aristocracy, has saved the South [from sinking into the condition of the North. We must also allow for the difference of race and settlement. On one side of Mason and Dixon's line the emigrant settlers are few—on the other side emigration has peopled whole districts and States. Nor is this all. In the North there are descendants of the early settlers, who constitute the most respectable, but not, unfortunately, the most influential class, and they have inherited many of the characteristics of Puritanism; in the South the old chivalry of the cavalier gives a tone to society. There is a marked difference between the inhabitants of the Confederate States and the United States, which may have been fostered, but was not primarily induced by the differences of institutions, and in no degree by differences of climate.

After some telling observations on the Lincoln despotism, and the quiet submission of the Northerners to the loss of their liberty, and on the lessons Europe is learning from America, the matter of recognition is treated lucidly, and, as we think, unanswerably. By refusing to recognize a fact we find ourselves in a position which is supremely ridiculous.

In admitting diplomatically the indisputable fact that Mr. Jefferson Davis and the Congress at Richmond are the rulers of the Southern States, we do not merely pay them an idle civility. What we thereby do is to saddle them with a responsibility for all that is done to British citizens by the authorities of the region over which they rule. As matters stand now, we have no redress if a British subject is maltreated. If the wrong be done at a seaport, we might bombard the town; but if it were done at Montgomery or Richmond, we should be absolutely without resource. We could not plead international law to the Government at Richmond; for international law regulates only the relation between two nations, and the Confederates, by our own decision, are not a nation. We could not invade the territory of the Confederate States, because, on our theory, they are still part of the territory of the Government that rules at Washington. As a matter of strict law, the only person we can call to account for any wrong done to one of the Queen's subjects at Richmond is President Lincoln. It of course would be out of the question practically that any proceedings so absurd should be taken. But still that ridiculous predicament brings home to us the fact that the only Government responsible to us for the well-treatment of English subjects over a vast region of North America, is the Government which, of all others, has the least power to secure it. The anomaly, of course, is equally great on the other side. There are hundreds of Confederate citizens in England who have no legal guardian of their rights. To Mr. Adams or to any of the Federal consuls they could not apply without disavowing the allegiance which they believe themselves to owe to the new Government; and, in disavowing the existence of that Government, we of course refuse to admit any authority in its agents. These things are not a mere matter of form; if they were, the whole machinery of consuls and diplomatists would be a very useless burden upon the Consolidated Fund. The neglect of them may at any moment seriously compromise both national interests and private rights.

We commend this article to Sir G. C. Lewis, who will find out that, according to all historical precedent, the United States ought not to be the first to acknowledge the independence of the Confederate States; and that England, as well as the United States, has on all occasions, until now, been ready to accept facts without entering "upon any scrutiny of the process by which these facts were accomplished."

THE EDINBURGH. (London: Longman and Co.)

"The American Revolution" is a very comprehensive article so far as the number of topics treated in it, but it is more in the character of a review of the topics, than a thorough investigation of them. If we may judge from the essay before us, the writer of it represents a large class of Englishmen. His mind in reference to America is in a transition state. He has not any sympathy with the North; he does not wish the war of conquest to succeed; he cannot refrain from acknowledging such of the virtues of the South as have been made manifest by the war, but he does not give his hearty adherence to the Southern cause. Unconsciously, he still looks at Southern society through a distorted medium. He places faith in the mendacious statements of Mr. Cairnes, though he exposes the absurdity of that writer's arguments in reference to Mr. Lincoln's proclamation. We must confess we are surprised that a writer in the Edinburgh, who displays great ability, and whose sincere desire to mete out justice we do not question, should rely on the unauthorized statements of Mr. Cairnes. The slander about the "mean whites," for instance, can be disproved by a reference to the census of the late United States, and is, moreover, in itself highly improbable, not to say incredible. What Mr. Cairnes would have us believe is, that in the Southern States the negro population is sadly used, and that 7-10ths of them consist of thieving pauper vagabonds. By seeking to prove so much he disproves the whole of his assertions; but from the cool audacity with which false statements are put forth, they are for the moment half believed. Mr. Cairnes has traded upon the weakness of humanity. He knows that to accuse the innocent is not far from condemning the innocent, in the opinion of the world. Christianity and civilization restrain men who value their good names, or who are "troubled with a conscience," from bearing false witness against their neighbours, and especially from following the example of the Belfast Professor, and maligning a whole nation; but it is too common to believe and enjoy the mendacious charges preferred by those who feel no shame, in supporting a pet cause, or gratifying their private spleen, by slandering those without cause whom they hate without reason.

The writer in the Edinburgh admits that if the North conquered, "the change to the negro would be only a change of masters," and this is undoubtedly true. If the Government could not deport the negroes—and if the Government could do so, the masses of the people would not sanction the measure—they would not live there with them upon terms of social equality; they would not tolerate the presence of the coloured race as equals; and nothing would remain but slavery under a race that hates the negro, even though that slavery should be called by some other name. Many a Northern commander has cheered on his men by promising to them the rich possessions of the South, and the joy of living in Southern mansions the lords of Southern slaves. Mr. Lincoln has a little mistaken the motives, at all events the primary motives, of his subjects in entering on this war. The South is an El Dorado to the North, and it was not intended to desolate it. The object was not to free but to own the slaves—not to kill the goose that lays the golden eggs, but to take possession of it. If the South had been poor and declining, the North would not have spent a dollar for the restoration of the Union. In the midst of all his reverses, the Northerner cannot help chuckling at the credulity of the few on this side the Atlantic who think he is fighting for what he is pleased to call "the nigger."

The future of slavery we shall not discuss. We will not on this occasion contest the idea that the union with the North supported it, and that disunion weakens it. We may, however, assure the writer of "The American Revolution," that "the atrocities of slavery and of Lynch law" do not exist in the South, and that the Southern slave is under the protection of Southern law. To injure or kill a slave is punished as surely and as severely as injuring or killing a white man. As to Lynching, it might as well be said to be the custom in England because there are in this country murders and assaults. Lynching is as much a transgression of the law in the Southern States as it is in this country.

The only other point we need comment on in the essay before us—an essay we commend to the careful perusal of our readers—is with regard to the Confederate Government. After condemning the conduct of the Federals, the writer says, "Do not let us, however, forget that in all likelihood the measures of the Confederate Government have not been less arbitrary or less vigorous." To this we reply, that personal freedom, and the free expression of opinion, have not been violated in the Confederate States. The criticisms of the opposition press have not been violated with persecution. The Constitution of the Confederate States has not been violated by Act of Congress, or by act of the President; on the contrary, it has been zealously watched and guarded. The Southern public are not deprived of the blessing of liberty, and hence they are more determined to defend their country from subjugation.

SHORT NOTICES.

Undiscovered Crimes. By WATERS. (Ward and Lock.)

The title of this book may attract purchasers, but it is deceptive. The undiscovered crimes narrated in this volume have never been committed, and if any criminally disposed person should be encouraged by the perusal of this work to defy the hulks and the gallows, he will find that he has been allured into wrong doing by an absurd fiction, and that it is next to impossible to elude the vigilance and vengeance of the law. The guilty sometimes escape, but not so often, we suspect, as the innocent suffer unjustly. This book should have been respectfully dedicated to would-be criminals. It was intended, no doubt, to be sensational; but it consists of proxy trash, which can produce no other sensation than that of weariness, with perhaps a slight flavour of disgust.

An Old Man's Thoughts about Many Things.

(Bell and Daldy.)

The worst feature in this work is, that it contains no thought. It is a wordy, superficial trifling with very deep things. We do not mean by trifling that the author is guilty of any irreverence or buffoonery, but simply that he does not attempt to do more than dilate on the surface of subjects which are generally treated profoundly. The author is evidently sincere, and displays considerable learning. His essays on statues and books are the best, and will compensate the reader for the dreariness of some others. They are light and gossiping, without being frivolous—a rare merit in these days of light literature.

Lloyd's Steel-plate Coloured Map of the United States, the Canadas, and New Brunswick.

This map, which is 4 feet long and 5 feet wide, is elaborately finished, and engraved from the most recent surveys. It is a country and railroad map, and, notwithstanding its fulness, easy of reference. It will be found useful in following the movements of the contending armies in America.

THE INDEX, VOL. I.

A limited number of the first half-yearly volume of the THE INDEX, neatly bound, can be obtained by timely application at this office. Price 21 1s. Covers for the first half-yearly volume of THE INDEX can also be obtained. Price 2s. 6d.

FRANCIS FORD, Manufacturer,
MANCHESTER: Three and Six Cord Spool Thread, Cotton Balls, Knitting and Embroidering Cottons—Imported by POSTER AND MOORE, Norfolk, Va.; F. RUMALHO AND NEYREY, New Orleans.

R. D. RUSDEN, MANCHESTER,
ENGLAND, American Drills of all kinds, Devices, Stripes, Shirtings, and all sorts of Manchester Goods.

SEARING AND CO.,
Commission Merchants,
MOBILE AND NEW ORLEANS, C.F.A.
Represented by R. G. BEESEY, Cotton Broker, 2, Byrton's-court, Royal-exchange, Manchester.

ROBINSON & OLIVER,
Commission Merchants,
NEW ORLEANS,
C.S.A.
Represented by
Jos. T. ROBINSON & Co.,
No. 3, India Buildings, Water-street,
Liverpool.

JOHN FRASER & CO.,
CHARLESTON,
South Carolina.
FRASER, TRENHOLM & CO.,
Liverpool,
Commission Merchants.

RED AND STEWART, Com-
mission Merchants, SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.
Represented by Andrew Stewart, 1, Rumsford-place,
Liverpool.

HARPER AND CAUGHEY,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA. Represented by J. and A. CAUGHEY,
Tempest Chambers, Tempest Hey, Liverpool.

TO EAST INDIA MERCHANTS.
A GENTLEMAN, in his 30th Year,
who has had nearly 16 Years' experience in
the Manchester Yarn and Cloth Market as a SALES-
MAN, also 24 Years' experience in East Indian and
American Cottons, desires to go out to Bombay,
under the auspices of a first class firm, to act as their Cotton buyer.
Address, BOX, J. 19, Post-office, Manchester.

TO SOUTHERN AMERICAN FAMILIES IN
PARIS.
A FRENCH LADY,—living with
her mother and her daughter in a pleasant
location close by the Champs-Élysées—offers the
comforts of a home and motherly care and attention, together with the advantages of the best
education and excellent music-teaching, for TWO YOUNG CHILDREN, or for a YOUNG LADY
under fifteen.
Address, MADAME DE W., care of Mr. Largier,
17, Rue de la Paix, Paris.

VENTNOR, ISLE OF WIGHT.
Water Residence to be Let, or in Apartments furnished. The House, pleasantly situated, has a southern aspect, faces the Sea, and is situated from all north and east winds. Plans and views showing its situation, &c.; can be seen and particulars had of S. Juddenhall, 1, Paragon Place, New Kent Road, London, or Blinda House, Esplanade, Ventnor.

SHIRTS.—International Exhibition.
Class 27 C. No. 4572. Prize Medal and honourable mentions 1851 and 1862. Shirts, Collars, Flannels, and every description of underclothing manufactured on the premises.
J. BRIE AND CO.,
43, Conduit Street, Regent Street, W.
The only Shirtmakers admitted as Exhibitors at the International Exhibition of 1862.

A. M. GAUTIER, Tailor, 229,
Rue de la Chausée d'Antin (Paris).

MRS. E. PRESTON,
31, BURY STREET, ST. JAMES, S.W.
Furnished Apartments and Bed Rooms to Let.
References to Hon. Wm. L. Yancey, Hon. J. E.
Macfarland, and Henry Hotze, Esq.

WORKS RECENTLY PUBLISHED
BY
WILLIAM FREEMAN,
102, FLEET STREET.

SHIFTING SCENES: and Other Poems. By J.
STANTAN BIGG. Fcap. 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.; hand-
somer bound, 6s.
POEMS OF TRUTH AND FANCY. By S. R.
KEDMAN. Crown 8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.
THE WEARMOUTH ABBOTS. (Second Edition).
A Tale. Illustrative of Saxon Christianity. Fcap.
8vo. cloth, 3s. 6d.
JESUS THE SOUL'S NEED. By C. A. PORTER.
Royal 32mo. paper, 8d.; cloth, 1s.
PROGRESS: or, The International Exhibition.
By the Rev. J. ANDERSON, Author of "Self-
made Men." Royal 32mo. paper cover, 3d.
THE FATHERS OF THE WESLEY FAMILY.
By the Rev. S. BEALE. Crown 8vo. cloth, 1s. 6d.
THE TRUE THEORY OF A CHURCH; or, The
Right of Principle of Christian Confederation, Elucidated and Developed by the Rev. F. G. HORTON.
Crown 8vo. sewed, 6s.
DECISION AND CONSISTENCY. Exemplified
and Honoured in the Life of Daniel and his Three Friends. By THOMAS COLEMAN, Author of "Two
Thousand Confessors." Fcap. 8vo. cloth, 2s. 6d.
GOLD OR GRACE: WHICH IS THE BEST?
By the Rev. SAMUEL WALKER, Curate of St.
Matthew's, Cornhill. Crown 8vo. sewed, price 2d.
HOW THEY GOT THERE. By the Rev. W.
BARKER. Being an Answer to "How Did They Get There?" Crown 8vo. sewed, price 2d.
IN THE PRESS.
ESSAYS, CRITICAL, BIOGRAPHICAL, AND MIS-CELLANEOUS. By S. F. WILLIAMS.
PUNCH IN THE PULPIT. (Second Edition).
TO BE, OR NOT TO BE? or, Man's Present and Future Condition Considered.
JESUS, OUR ARK.
London: William Freeman, 102, Fleet Street.

European and Confederate States
Advertising Agency.

THE object of this Agency is to
effect a direct trade alliance between the European and the Southern Press, through the medium of advertising. The most practicable mode
of introducing the Merchants, Manufacturers, Capitalists, Insurance Companies, &c., of Foreign Countries, to the Southern Trade, is by an organised,
classified, and liberal system of advertising.
Trade, like time and tide, waits for no man. The commerce of the world will not pause in ruinous inaction, but will commence its irresistible ebb and
flow the moment peace is established. One of the most dangerous, corrupting, and insidious means to be used by the North will be the medium of advertising in Southern papers. Advertising Agencies
are already organised in every Northern city, and only bide their time. We must see to it that our papers are so filled with Foreign Advertisements
and the advertisements of Southern Importers,
Dealers, and Manufacturers, that there will not be
space left in any Southern newspaper for the advertisement of a single Yankee notion. Then will
our papers present to their readers a faithful
mirror of Dealers, Manufacturers, &c., in the Old World, and of our business men at home, and thus attach to Southern interest that mightily lever "the Press," and disrupt the tie which, by means of Northern advertising, has had so much influence in
binding the South to dependence upon its enemies.

Through the medium of a liberal advertising
patronage, our Southern editors can be maintained
against the stagnation in their business, which proceeds from interrupted or disorganised trade.

The object of this Agency is threefold:—
1st. To advertise European Merchants, Manufacturers, Hotels, Railroads, Insurance Companies, &c.,
&c., in Southern papers.
2nd. To advertise Southern business, property,
&c., in European journals.

3rd. To advertise home industry and Southern commerce in our own papers, and thereby build up
the cities of our Confederacy, instead of those of
our enemies.

Our arrangements abroad are all completed. We now address you this preliminary Circular, to ask
you to send us duplicate copies of your paper, accompanied by a private letter (which shall be strictly confidential), stating your terms of advertising, &c.

We will soon appoint agents in each important seaboard and inland city. Atlanta, at present, is selected for the Central Office, on account of its geographical position. We respectfully ask for this enterprise your hearty co-operation and assistance,
and guarantee, in return, strict integrity in all
business transactions.

By order of the Board of Directors,
WILLIAM H. BARNES,
SUPERINTENDENT.
Atlanta, Ga., August 24, 1861.

Louisiana Mutual Insurance Company.

OFFICE:
Iron Building, corner Camp and Natchez Streets.
Amount of Premiums for the year ending 28th February, 1861..... 600,528 70
Amount of Profits for the year ending
28th February, 1861..... 213,750 74
Amount of Assets for the year ending
28th February, 1861..... 866,420 98
The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of THIRTY PER CENT. after paying Six per cent.
interest on outstanding Scrip, and have ordered
the redemption of Fifty per cent. of the Scrip Issue
of 1859.
Interest and redeemable Scrip payable on and after the second Monday of May next.
Certificates of Scrip for the year 1861 deliverable
on and after 1st June, 1861.
CHARLES BRIGGS, President.
R. P. JANVIER, Secretary.
New Orleans, March 20, 1861.

Home Mutual Insurance Company of
New Orleans.

OFFICE:..... 78, Camp Street.
Amount of premiums for year ending
31st December, 1861..... 433,725 47
Amount of Profits for year ending 31st
December, 1861..... 282,908 58
Amount of Assets on 31st December,
1861..... 1,338,306 77
The Trustees have declared a Scrip dividend of FIFTY PER CENT. after paying Six per cent.
interest on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved
to redeem the Scrip of 1857.
Interest and redeemable Scrip, payable in cash on
and after 10th February next.
Certificates of Scrip, for the year 1861, deliverable
on and after 15th March, 1862.
A. BROTHER, President.
JAMES H. WHEELER, Secretary.
New Orleans, January 11, 1862.

Merchants' Mutual Insurance Com-
pany of New Orleans.

At a meeting of the Board of Directors held this day it was resolved to declare a Scrip dividend of TWENTY PER CENT. on the net earned premiums of the last year, and also pay Six per cent.
interest on the outstanding Scrips of the Company. Scrip Certificates to be issued on and after the first day of August next.
DIRECTORS.
Geo. Connelly. J. N. Nevins.
John Pemberton. S. O. Nelson.
P. Maspero. C. H. Slocumb.
P. Pont. B. F. Vignard.
C. Ronold. R. O. Vignard.
G. Miltenberger.

Citizens' Mutual Insurance Company
of New Orleans.

The Board of Trustees, have resolved to pay an interest of SIX PER CENT. in cash on the outstanding certificates of profits to the holders thereof,
or their legal representatives, on and after the
second Monday in February next; also, to declare a dividend of Twenty per cent. on the net earned premiums of the Company, for the year ending 20th November, 1861, for which certificates
will be issued on and after the second Monday in February next.

TRUSTEES.
Geo. W. West Vice.
M. Masson.
President. R. P. Hunt.
Martin Gordon, jun.
A. Miltenberger. Cesarre Olivier.
J. Levey. A. Echm.
Jas. A. White. Muna Augustin.
Douglas West. Omer Gaillard.

WEBER BROTHERS,
Commission Merchants,
SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA, C.S.A.

PAYNE, HUNTINGDON AND
CO., NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A.,
Cotton Factors.

MOSES GREENWOOD, NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Cotton
Factor and Commission Merchant.

MCDOWELL, WITHERS, AND CO., MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A., Com-
mission Merchants.

GARLAND GOODE, MOBILE,
Cotton Factor and Commission Merchant.

BOYKIN AND McRAE, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

MILLER AND BATIE, Exchange
Brokers, MOBILE, ALABAMA, C.S.A.

R. AND D. G. MILLS, Cotton
Factors and Commission Merchants,
GALVESTON, TEXAS, C.S.A.

ROCHFORD, BROWN, AND CO., Cotton Factors, NEW ORLEANS,
LOUISIANA, C.S.A.

R. W. RAYNE, NEW ORLEANS
LOUISIANA, C.S.A., Commission Merchant, offers facilities to European Consignors o
Boots and Shoes to supply the markets of Tennessee, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Alabama. Specifications furnished of goods suitable to these markets.

ANDREW LOW AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

CHARLES GREEN,
Commission Merchant, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

H. D. WEDE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

JAMES CHAPMAN,
Commission Merchant, CHARLESTON.

N. A. HARDEE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

J. W. ANDERSON AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, SAVANNAH,
GEORGIA.

R. N. GOURDINE AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Charleston.

J. H. ASHBIDGE AND CO.,
Shipping and Commission Merchants, NEW ORLEANS.
Office—No. 80, Tower-buildings West, Liverpool.
Agents—Liverpool and New Orleans Mail Steam
Navigation Company.

S. A. PLUMMER AND CO.,
Importers and Dealers in Hardware,
PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA, C.S.A.

H. O. BREWER & CO.,
MOBILE, ALABAMA,
General Commission and Shipping Merchants.

G. FOWLER,
ENGLISH BOOKSELLER,
(From the Palais-Royal),
279, Rue St. Honoré, (near the Rue Royale)
PARIS.

WARWICK AND BARKSDALE,
GALLEGO FLOUR MILLS.
This immense establishment of capacity to manufacture 1000 barrels of Flour per day, purely for
South American Market. RICHMOND.

JOSEPH R. ANDERSON,
FREDERICK IRON WORKS
Manufacturers of Locomotive and other Engines,
all descriptions of Machinery, Rifled Cannon, &c.,
RICHMOND.

DUNLOP, MONCURE, & CO.,
General Commission Merchants,
RICHMOND.

A. G. MILWAINE, AND CO.,
Commission Merchants, Tobacco, Cotton,
Grain, and other produce, PETERSBURG,
VIRGINIA.

C. W. WHITE,
Commission Merchant,
ST. THOMAS, WEST INDIES.

HAMILTON AND GRAHAM,
Importers, Wholesale Dealers in Dry
Goods, &c., PETERSBURG, VIRGINIA.

H. LEVY AND SON,
Commission Merchants, MOBILE.

Crescent Mutual Insurance Company,
New Orleans.

OFFICE:
Corner of Camp and Commercial Place.

TWELFTH ANNUAL STATEMENT.
Amount of Premiums for ten months
ending 30th April, 1861..... $31,876 14
Profits for ten months to 30th April,
1861..... 237,238 27
Assets, 30th April, 1861..... 1,422,350 95
The Trustees have declared a Scrip Dividend of
THIRTY PER CENT. after paying interest at the
rate of Six per cent. per annum on all outstanding Scrip, and have resolved to redeem Forty per cent.
of the issue of 1858, payable as follows:—
Twenty per cent. 10th June, 1861.
Twenty per cent. 9th September, 1861.
Scrip Certificates for the year 1861, deliverable on
and after the 12th day of August next.
THOMAS A. ADAMS, President.
G. W. SPRATT, Secretary.

The Index,

A WEEKLY JOURNAL OF POLITICS,
LITERATURE, AND NEWS.

Published every Thursday Evening.

PRICE SIXPENCE.

Subscriptions, Twenty-six Shillings per annum.
Stamped, Thirty Shillings per annum.

Nos. I. to XXVI. NOW READY.

Office:—102, Fleet-street.

In this great metropolis, on the native soil of free speech and a free press, every interest—political social, religious, literary, scientific, benevolent
commercial, however remote, however small the
class to which it addresses itself—has long had its recognized representative in Journalism, through
which it seeks to obtain a share of the public attention. The one solitary exception has heretofore been in the case of the Confederate States of America. Engaged in a life-and-death struggle against a vastly superior foe—hemmed in on all sides, quite as effectually by the deserts of the Far West and of Mexico, as by the enemy's armies and navies—they suffer even more from that intellectual
blockade which excludes them from communion
with the rest of mankind, than from the commercial difficulties of obtaining their much needed
supplies. The disruption of the American Union—
despite repeated warnings—started Europe without at once awakening it to a full consciousness of the reality and importance of the event. So little had the internal politics of America entered into
the routine of European thoughts, that even now—
when the effects are undeniable and irrevocable—
the causes still remain a mystery and a riddle to by far the greater portion of the intelligent European public. When the catastrophe occurred, the Northern States had the ear of the Governments
and of the peoples; and so zealously have they retained it, so ingeniously and persistently have
they pleaded their cause, so imperfect and dis-
torting was the medium through which alone the South's voice could be heard, that Europe may fairly be said to have listened to but one side of the quarrel. It is true that the respectable portion of the English press has treated the weaker party in
that spirit of fair play upon which every English-
man prides himself; and as the struggle progressed, has evinced a painstaking study of a perplexing subject, which stands in honourable contrast to the slipshod and indecorum of American Journalism. But this has not supplied the want, so long and keenly felt, of some organ of Southern interests and Southern opinions, to which the Statesman, the Journalist, the Merchant, and the
public at large might look for reliable intelligence
of the progress of events, and for valuable indications of the manner in which the South itself views and weighs the importance and bearing of these events.

"This want is one of the principal objects of
"THE INDEX" to supply as far as possible. The measure of success which may reward the effort will necessarily depend upon the co-operation of the
friends, and of the private, as well as official, representatives of the South in Europe. This cooperation has been most generously accorded us.
There is a large amount of Southern intelligence
which reaches Europe through various private channels. Still more important information is obtained from Northern sources, which finds no outlet through the muzzled press of these States.
Much of such valuable material has already been
placed at our disposal, and we have a reasonable
prospect of making "THE INDEX" the receptacle
and depository of all, or nearly all, that is available
in the United Kingdom and on the Continent. Our arrangements are such that our friends may rely on
this respect upon a scrupulous and sound discretion, and the inviolable sanctity of private
communications.

While we have thus frankly explained one of the principal objects of "THE INDEX," it may be necessary to state—in order to prevent a possible
misapprehension—that it is not the sole object.
Literature and General News—in fact, every ingredient of a Weekly Journal—will command our earnest attention; and it will be our unremitting
endeavour to make "THE INDEX" worthy of that
liberal patronage which is promised us in advance.
"THE INDEX" will be represented by competent
Correspondents at the different capitals of the Continent, at Washington, and at Havannah. It is our design, also, that "THE INDEX" should partake of
the character of a Magazine, without departing
from its proper sphere as a Review of current
events.

For the leaders and literary contributions, we shall enjoy the valuable aid of the pens of gentlemen already favourably known to the public.

The Cotton Market will monopolize much of our
space, and is entrusted to hands theoretically and
practically familiar with the subject and all questions bearing upon it.

It is superfluous to add that "THE INDEX" is
necessarily committed to the advocacy of the principles of Free Trade.

Subscribers will be furnished with handsome
Covers for each Half-Yearly Volume.

A full list of the original "INDEX" Subscribers
and a carefully prepared Table of Contents will accompany the concluding number of each Volume.

Subscriptions and Advertisements to be sent, and
Post-office Orders made payable to
WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102, FLEET ST., E.C.

Printed by HENRY F. MACKINTOSH, of 11,
Crown-court, Fleet-street; and Published for
the Proprietors by WILLIAM FREEMAN, 102,
Fleet-street, London E. C.—October 23, 1862.

BOSTON PUBLIC LIBRARY

3 9999 07770 163 7

